

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

ANDOVER-HARVARD LIBRARY

AH 659K 0

HARVARD DEPOSITORY BRITTLE BOOK

362
30

THE SACRED BOOKS OF THE EAST

London
HENRY FROWDE

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE
AMEN CORNER, E.C.

THE
SACRED BOOKS OF THE EAST

TRANSLATED

BY VARIOUS ORIENTAL SCHOLARS

AND EDITED BY

Max Müller
F. MAX MÜLLER

VOL. XXXV

C.
Orford

AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

1890

[All rights reserved]

1881
Divinity School.

Oxford

PRINTED AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

BY HORACE HART, PRINTER TO THE UNIVERSITY

○

Milindapañha.
THE QUESTIONS

OF

KING MILINDA

TRANSLATED FROM THE PÂLI

BY

Thomas William
T. W. RHYS DAVIDS

○.
Oxford

AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

1890

[All rights reserved]

BL

1010

.53

v.35

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
INTRODUCTION	xi
The Sinhalese version of the Milinda	xii
Buddhaghosa's four references to it	xiv
MSS. and edition of the text	xvi
King Milinda the same as Menander	xviii
Notices of him in classical writers	xix
His coins	xx
His birthplace, Kalasi, probably=Karisi	xxiii
The author not the same as Nâgârguna	xxv
Passages in the Pi/akas referred to silently	xxvii
Pâli books, &c., referred to by name	xxix
Pi/aka passages quoted	xxxix
Length of the Pi/akas	xxxvi
Results of these comparisons	xxxviii
Differences between our author and the Pi/akas	xl
Proper names outside the Pi/akas	xlili
Differences of language between our author and the Pi/akas	xlvi
The Milinda as a work of art	xlvi

TRANSLATION OF THE TEXT.

Book I. The Secular Narrative	1
Description of Sâgala	2
Previous births of Milinda and Nâgasena	4
Milinda's greatness and wisdom and love of disputation	6
Birth story of Nâgasena	10
His admission as a novice into the Order	20
His conversion	25
His attainment of Arahatsip	29
Milinda confutes Âyupâla	30
Nâgasena arrives; his character	34
Milinda goes to him	36

	PAGE
Book II. The Distinguishing Characteristics of Ethical Qualities	40
Individuality and name	41
The chariot simile	43
The riddle of seniority	45
(Interlude) How kings and scholars respectively discuss	46
No soul in the breath	48
Aim of Buddhist renunciation	49
Re-incarnation	50
Wisdom and reasoning distinguished	51
'Virtue's the base'	53
Faith	54
Perseverance	57
Mindfulness	58
Meditation	60
Continued identity and re-individualisation	63-77
Wisdom and intelligence distinguished	66
Time	77
Origin and development of qualities	82
Is there a soul?	86
Thought and sight	89
Contact, sensation, and idea	92
Book III. The Removal of Difficulties	100
Rich and poor	100
Renunciation again	101
Nirvâṇa and Karma	106
Difficulties of various kinds as to transmigration, individuality, and the Buddha	120
Book IV. The Solving of Dilemmas	137
Milinda finds dilemmas in the Holy Writ	137
And takes the Buddhist vows	138
Third meeting between him and Nāgasena	140
1st Dilemma. If the Buddha has really quite passed away, what is the good of paying honour to his relics?	144
2nd Dilemma. How can the Buddha be omniscient, when it is said that he reflects?	154
3rd Dilemma. Why did he admit Devadatta to the Order, if he knew of the schism he would create?	162

	PAGE
4th Dilemma. Vessantara's earthquake	170
5th Dilemma. King Sivi	179
7th Dilemma. Difference in prophecies as to the duration of the faith	185
8th Dilemma. The Buddha's sinlessness and his sufferings	190
9th Dilemma. Why should the Buddha have meditated?	196
10th Dilemma. Why did the Buddha boast?	198
11th Dilemma. How could the Buddha revoke regulations he had made?	202
12th Dilemma. Why did the Buddha refuse to answer certain questions?	204
13th Dilemma. Contradictory statements by the Buddha as to fear	206
14th Dilemma. How can Pirit cure disease?	213
15th Dilemma. How could the evil one turn people against the Buddha?	219
16th Dilemma. Contradiction as to conscious crime	224
17th Dilemma. Contradiction as to the Buddha's wish to be the chief	225
18th Dilemma. How could a schism have arisen in the Buddha's life?	227
19th Dilemma. Why do members of the Order accept reverence?	232
20th Dilemma. The evil results of preaching	234
22nd Dilemma. Was not the Buddha once angry with Sudinna?	237
23rd Dilemma. The tree talking	241
24th Dilemma. The Buddha's last meal	242
25th Dilemma. Adoration of relics	246
26th Dilemma. The splinter of rock	248
27th Dilemma. Contradictory description of the Samana	251
28th Dilemma. Buddha's boasting	253
29th Dilemma. How can the kind punish others?	254
30th Dilemma. Was not the Buddha angry at Kâtumâ?	257
31st Dilemma. How could Moggallâna have had miraculous powers seeing that he was murdered?	261
32nd Dilemma. Why should the rules of the Order be kept secret?	264
33rd Dilemma. Contradictions about falsehood	268

	PAGE
34th Dilemma. Did not the Omniscient One once doubt?	270
35th Dilemma. Suicide	273
36th Dilemma. Love to all beings	279
37th Dilemma. Wickedness and prosperity	283
38th Dilemma. Women's wiles	294
39th Dilemma. Did not the Arahats once show fear?	297
40th Dilemma. Did not the Omniscient One once change his mind?	301
Appendix. Devadatta in the Gātakas	303
Addenda et Corrigenda	305
Index of Proper Names	307
Index of Subjects	311

Transliteration of Oriental Alphabets adopted for the Translations of the Sacred Books of the East	317
---	-----

INTRODUCTION.

THE work of which a translation is here, for the first time, presented to the English reading public, has had a strange and interesting history. Written in Northern India, at or a little after the beginning of the Christian era, and either in Sanskrit itself or in some North Indian Prakrit, it has been entirely lost in the land of its origin, and (so far as is at present known) is not extant in any of the homes of the various sects and schools of the Buddhists, except only in Ceylon, and in those countries which have derived their Buddhism from Ceylon. It is true that General Cunningham says¹ that the name of Milinda 'is still famous in all Buddhist countries.' But he is here drawing a very wide conclusion from an isolated fact. For in his note he refers only to Hardy, who is good evidence for Ceylon, but who does not even say that the 'Milinda' was known elsewhere.

Preserved there, and translated at a very early date into Pāli, it has become, in its southern home, a book of standard authority, is put into the hands of those who have begun to doubt the cardinal points of Buddhist doctrine, has been long a popular work in its Pāli form, has been translated into Sinhalese, and occupies a unique position, second only to the Pāli Piṭakas (and perhaps also to the celebrated work of Buddhaghosa, the 'Path of Purity'). From Ceylon it has been transferred, in its Pāli form, to both Burma and Siam, and in those countries also it enjoys so high a repute, that it has been commented on (if not translated). It is not merely the only work composed among the Northern Buddhists which is regarded with reverence by the orthodox Buddhists of the southern schools; it is the only one which has survived at all amongst them. And it is the only prose work composed in ancient India which would be considered, from the modern point of view, as a successful work of art.

¹ In his 'Ancient Geography of India,' p. 186.

The external evidence for these statements is, at present, both very slight and, for the most part, late. There appeared at Colombo in the year of Buddha 2420 (1877 A.D.) a volume of 650 pages, large 8vo.—the most considerable in point of size as yet issued from the Siṃhalese press—entitled MILINDA PRASAVAYA. It was published at the expense of five Buddhist gentlemen whose names deserve to be here recorded. They are Karolis Piris, Abraham Liwerā, Luis Mendis, Nandis Mendis Amara-sekara, and Chārlis Arnolis Mendis Wijaya-ratna Amara-sekara. It is stated in the preface that the account of the celebrated discussion held between Milinda and Nāgasena, about 500 years after the death of the Buddha, was translated into the Māgadhi language by 'teachers of old' (purwākārīn wisin);—that that Pāli version was translated into Siṃhalese, at the instance and under the patronage of King Kīrtti Sṛī Rāga-siṃha, who came to the throne of Ceylon in the year of Buddha 2290 (1747 A.D.), by a member of the Buddhist Order named Hīnati-kumburē Sumaṅgala, a lineal successor, in the line of teacher and pupil (anusishya), of the celebrated Wœli-wita Saranaṅkara, who had been appointed Saṃgha-rāga, or chief of the Order—that 'this priceless book, unsurpassable as a means either for learning the Buddhist doctrine, or for growth in the knowledge of it, or for the suppression of erroneous opinions,' had become corrupt by frequent copying—that, at the instigation of the well-known scholar Mohotti-watte Gunānanda, these five had had the texts corrected and restored by several learned Bhikkhus (kīpa namak lawā), and had had indices and a glossary added, and now published the thus revised and improved edition.

The Siṃhalese translation, thus introduced to us, follows the Pāli throughout, except that it here and there adds, in the way of gloss, extracts from one or other of the numerous Pitaka texts referred to, and also that it starts with a pro-phcey, put into the mouth of the Buddha when on his death-bed, that this discussion would take place about 500 years after his death, and that it inserts further, at the point indicated in my note on p. 3 of the present version, an account of how the Siṃhalese translator came to write his version. His own account of the matter adds to the details given above that he wrote the work at the Upasatha Ārāma of the Mahā Wihāra near Sṛi-wardhana-pura, 'a place famous for the possession of a temple containing the celebrated Tooth Relic, and a monastery which had been the residence of Wœliwita Saranaṅkara, the Saṃgha-rāga, and of the famous scholars and commentators Daramiṭi-pola Dhamma-rakkhita and Madhurasatoṭa Dhammakkhanda.'

As Kirtti Sṛi Rāga-siṃha reigned till 1781¹, this would only prove that our Pāli work was extant in Ceylon in its present form, and there regarded as of great antiquity and high authority, towards the close of the last century. And no other mention of the work has, as yet, been discovered in any older Siṃhalese author. But in the present deplorable state of our ignorance of the varied and ancient literature of Ceylon, the argument ex silentio would be simply of no value. Now that the Ceylon Government have introduced into the Legislative Council a bill for the utilisation, in the interests of education, of the endowments of the Buddhist monasteries, it may be hoped that the value of the books written in those monasteries will not be forgotten, and that a sufficient yearly sum will be put aside for the editing and publication of a literature of such great historical value². At present we can only deplore the impossibility of tracing the history of the 'Questions of Milinda' in other works written by the scholarly natives of its southern home.

That it will be mentioned in those works there can be

¹ See Turnour's Mahavansa, p. lxviii.

² I believe that none of the many vernacular literatures of India can compare for a moment with the Siṃhalese, whether judged from the point of view of literary excellence, variety of contents, age, or historical value. And yet a few hundreds a year for ten years would probably suffice, on the system followed by the Pāli Text Society, for the editing and publication of the whole.

but little doubt. For the great Indian writer, who long ago found in that beautiful and peaceful island the best scope for his industrious scholarship, is already known to have mentioned the book no less than four times in his commentaries; and that in such a manner that we may fairly hope to find other references to it when his writings shall have been more completely published. In his commentary on the Book of the Great Decease, VI, 3, Buddhaghosa refers to the quotation of that passage made in the conversation between Milinda and Nāgasena, translated below, at IV, 2, 1¹. And again, in his commentary on the Ambattha Sutta (D. III, 2, 12) he quotes the words of a conversation between Milinda and Nāgasena on the subject he is there discussing. The actual words he uses (they will be found at pp. 275, 276 of the edition of the Sumaṅgala Vilāsinī, edited for the Pāli Text Society by Professor Carpenter and myself) are not the same as those of our author at the corresponding passage of Mr. Trenckner's text (pp. 168, 169; IV, 3, 11), but they are the same in substance.

The above two references in Buddhaghosa to our author were pointed out by myself. Dr. Morris has pointed out two others, and in each of those also Buddhaghosa is found to quote words differing from Mr. Trenckner's text. The former of these two was mentioned in a letter to the 'Academy' of the 12th November, 1881. In the Manoratha Pūraṇī, his commentary on the Aṅguttara, on the passage marked in Dr. Morris's edition as I, 5, 8, Buddhaghosa says:—

'Imasmim pan' atthe Milinda-rāgā dhamma-kathika-Nāgasenattheram pukkhi: "Bhante Nāgasena, ekasmim akkharakkhane pavattita-kittasamkhārā sake rūpino assa kīva mahā-rāsi bhavēyāti?"'

And he then gives the answer:—'Vāhasatānam kho mahā-rāga vihinam addha-kūlañ ka vāhā vihi sattammanāni dve ka tumbā ekaakkharakkhane

¹ This was already pointed out in a note to my translation of the text commented on ('Buddhist Suttas,' vol. xi of the Sacred Books of the East, p. 112).

pavattitassa kīttassa saṅkham pi na upenti kalam pi na upenti kala-bhāgam pi na upentīti.'

This passage of the Milinda, referred to by Buddhaghosa, will be found on p. 102 of Mr. Trenckner's edition, translated below at IV, 1, 19. But the question is not found there at all, and the answer, though much the same in the published text, still differs in the concluding words. Mr. Trenckner marks the passage in his text as corrupt, and it may well be that Buddhaghosa has preserved for us an older and better reading.

The other passage quoted by Dr. Morris (in the 'Academy' of the 11th January, 1881) is from the Paṇḍita Sūdanī, Buddhaghosa's still unedited Commentary on the Maggħima Nikāya. It is in the comment on the Brahmāyu Suttanta, and as it is not accessible elsewhere I give this passage also in full here. With reference, oddly enough, to the same passage referred to above (pp. 168, 169 of the text, translated below at IV, 3, 11) Buddhaghosa there says:—

'Vuttam etam Nāgasenattherena Milinda-raññā puttḥena: "Na mahārāga Bhagavā gūyham dasseti kkhāyam Bhagavā dassetīti."'

In this case, as in the other quotation of the same passage, the words quoted are not quite the same as those given in the published text, and on the other hand they agree with, though they are much shorter than, the words as given in the Sumaṅgala Vilāsinī.

It would be premature to attempt to arrive at the reason of this difference between Buddhaghosa's citations and Mr. Trenckner's edition of the text. It may be that Buddhaghosa is consciously summarising, or that he is quoting roughly from memory, or that he is himself translating or summarising from the original work, or that he is quoting from another Pāli version, or that he is quoting from another recension of the text of the existing Pāli version. We must have the full text of all his references to the 'Questions of Milinda' before us, before we try to choose between these, and possibly other, alternative explanations. What is at present certain is that when Buddhaghosa wrote his great works, that is about 430 A.D., he had before him a book giving the conversations between Milinda and Nāgasena. And more than that. He introduces his comment above referred to on the Ambaṭṭha Sutta by saying, after simply quoting the words of the text he is explaining: 'What would be the use of any one else saying anything on this? For Nāgasena, the Elder, himself said as follows in reply to Milinda, the king¹— and he then quotes Nāgasena, and adds not a word of his own. It follows that the greatest of all Buddhist writers known to us by name regarded the 'Questions of Milinda' as a work of so great authority that an opinion put by its author into the mouth of Nāgasena should be taken as decisive. And this is not only the only book, outside the Pāli Piṭakas, which Buddhaghosa defers to in this way, it is the only book, except the previous commentaries, which he is known even to refer to at all. But, on the other hand, he says nothing in these passages to throw any further light on the date, or any light on the authorship, of the work to which he assigns so distinguished, even so unique, a position.

So far as to what is known about our 'Questions of Milinda' in Ceylon. The work also exists, certainly in Pāli, and probably in translations into the local dialects, in Burma and Siam. For Mr. Trenckner mentions (Introduction, p. iv) a copy in the Burmese character of the Pāli text sent to him by Dr. Rost, there is another copy in that character in the Colombo Museum², and Mr. J. G. Scott, of the Burmese Civil Service, has sent to England a Burmese Nissaya of the Milinda (a kind of translation, giving the Pāli text, word for word, followed by the interpretation of those words in Burmese³). A manuscript of the Pāli text, brought from Siam, is referred to in the Sinhalese MSS. in the marginal note quoted by Mr. Trenckner at p. vi of the

¹ Kim ettha aññena vattabbaṃ? Vuttam etam Nāgasenattheren' eva Milinda-raññā putt'heṇa . . . (Sumaṅgala Vilāsinī, loc. cit.).

² See p. 51 of the 'Journal of the Pāli Text Society' for 1882.

³ This Nissaya is now in the possession of his brother, the Bursar of St. John's College, Cambridge.

Introduction to his edition. And there exists in the library of Trinity College, Cambridge, a complete MS., in excellent condition, in the Siamese-Pāli character¹, while there are numerous fragments in the Paris Bibliothèque Nationale of one or more MSS. of the text, in the same Kambojan character used in Siam for the writing of Pāli texts².

It may be noticed here that there are seven MSS. of the text written in the Ceylon character known to exist in Europe. Two of them (one a very ancient one) are in the Copenhagen University Library, two in the Bibliothèque Nationale³, one in the Cambridge University Library³, and two in the India Office Library⁴. Three only of these seven have been used by Mr. Trenckner for his very able and accurate edition of the text, published in 1880.

That is all the external evidence at present available. What can be inferred from the book itself is about as follows. It consists of the discussion of a number of points of Buddhist doctrine treated in the form of conversations between King Milinda and Nāgasena the Elder (Thera). It must be plain to every reader of the following pages that these are not real conversations. What we have before us is really an historical romance, though the didactic aim overshadows the story. Men of straw, often very skilfully put together, are set up for the purpose, not so much of knocking them down again, as of elucidating some points of ethical or psychological belief while doing so. The king himself plays a very subordinate part. The questions raised, or dilemmas stated, are put into his mouth. But the solutions, to give opportunity for which the questions or dilemmas are invented, are the really important part of the work, and these are put into the mouth of Nāgasena. The dialogues are introduced by a carefully constructed

¹ By the kindness of the Master and Fellows of the College I have been allowed to collate this MS. in London.

² See 'Journal of the Pāli Text Society' for 1882, p. 35.

³ See 'Journal of the Pāli Text Society' for 1883, p. 146.

⁴ See 'Journal of the Pāli Text Society' for 1882, p. 119.

preliminary story, in which the reader's interest in them is aroused by anticipation. And the ability of this part of the work is very great. For in spite of the facts that all the praise lavished therein upon both Milinda and Nāgasena is in reality only praise of the book itself, and that the reader knows this very well, yet he will find it almost impossible to escape from the influence of the eloquent words in which importance and dignity are lent to the occasion of their meeting; and of the charm and skill with which the whole fiction is maintained.

The question then arises whether the personages were any more real than the conversations. Milinda is supposed to be the Menander, who appears in the list of the Greek kings of Baktria, since he is described in the book as being a king of the Yonakas reigning at Sāgala (the Euthydemia of the Greeks), and there is no other name in the list which comes so near to Milinda. This identification of the two names is certainly correct. For whether it was our author who deliberately made the change in adapting the Greek name to the Indian dialect in which he wrote, or whether the change is due to a natural phonetic decay, the same causes will have been of influence. Indra or Inda is a not uncommon termination of Indian names, and meaning king is so appropriate to a king, that a foreign king's name ending in -ander would almost inevitably come to end in -inda. Then the sequence of the liquids of m-n-n would tend in an Indian dialect to be altered in some way by dissimilation, and Mr. Trenckner adduces seven instances in Pāli of l taking the place of n, or n of l, in similar circumstances¹.

There remains only the change of the first E in Menander to I. Now in the Indian part of the inscription, on undoubted coins of Menander, the oldest authorities read Minanda as the king's name², and though that interpretation has now, on the authority of better specimens, been given up, there is no doubt that Milinda runs more easily from the tongue than Melinda, and Mil may well have seemed as appropriate a commencement for a Milakkha's name as -inda is for the ending of a king's name. So Men-ander became Mil-inda.

¹ 'Pāli Miscellany,' part i, p. 55.

² For instance, Wilson in his 'Ariana Antiqua,' p. 283.

It may be added here that other Greek names are mentioned by our author—Devamantiya at I, 42, and the same officer, together with Anantakâya, Mankura, and Sabbadinna, at II, 3. There is a similar effort in these other Pâli forms of Greek words to make them give some approach to a meaning in the Indian dialect: but in each case the new forms remain as really unintelligible to an Indian as Mil-inda would be. Thus Deva-mantiya, which may be formed on Demetrios, looks, at first sight, Indian enough. But if it meant anything, it could only mean 'counsellor of the gods.' And so also both Ananta and Kâya are Indian words. But the compound Ananta-kâya would mean 'having an infinite body,' which is absurd as the name of a courtier. It may possibly be made up to represent Antiochos. What Mankura and Sabbadinna (called simply Dinna at p. 87) may be supposed to be intended for it is difficult to say¹. But the identification of Milinda with Menander is as certain as that of Kandagutta with Sandrokottos.

Very little is told us, in the Greek or Roman writers, about any of the Greek kings of Baktria. It is a significant fact that it is precisely of Menander-Milinda that they tell us most, though this most is unfortunately not much.

Strabo, in his Geography², mentions Menander as one of the two Baktrian kings who were instrumental in spreading the Greek dominion furthest to the East into India. He crossed the Hypanis (that is the Sutlej) and penetrated as far as the Isamos (probably the Jumna).

Then in the title of the lost forty-first book of Justin's work, Menander and Apollodotus are mentioned as 'Indian kings.'

Finally, Plutarch³ tells us an anecdote of Menander.

¹ Compare Mr. Trenckner's note at p. 70 of the 'Pâli Miscellany.'

² Edit. Müller, xi, 11, 1.

³ De Repub. Ger., p. 821.

He was, he says, as a ruler noted for justice, and enjoyed such popularity with his subjects, that upon his death, which took place in camp, diverse cities contended for the possession of his ashes. The dispute was only adjusted by the representatives of the cities agreeing that the relics should be divided amongst them, and that they should severally erect monuments (μνημεῖα, no doubt dāgabas or sthûpas) to his memory.

This last statement is very curious as being precisely analogous to the statement in the 'Book of the Great Decease'¹, as to what occurred after the death of the Buddha himself. But it would be very hazardous to draw any conclusion from this coincidence.

The only remaining ancient evidence about Menander-Milinda (apart from what is said by our author himself), is that of coins. And, as is usually the case, the evidence of the coins will be found to confirm, but to add very little to, what is otherwise known.

As many as twenty-two² different coins have been discovered, some of them in very considerable numbers, bearing the name, and eight of them the effigy, of Menander. They have been found over a very wide extent of country, as far west as Kâbul, as far east as Mathurâ, and one of them as far north as Kashmîr. Curiously enough we find a confirmation of this wide currency of Menander-Milinda's coins in the work of the anonymous author of the 'Periplus Maris Erythræi.' He says³ that Menander's coins, together with those of Apollodotos, were current, many years after his death, at Barygaza, the modern Baroach, on the coast of Gujarat.

The portrait on the coins is very characteristic, with a long face and an intelligent expression, and is sometimes that of a young man, and at other times that of a very old man. It may be inferred therefore that his reign was as long as his power was extensive. All the coins have a legend in Greek letters on one side, and a corresponding legend in Ariano-pāli letters on the other side. On twenty-one out of the twenty-two, the inscriptions, according to the latest interpretations from a comparison of the best examples, are respectively,

¹ Mahâparinibbâna Suttanta VI, 58-62, translated in my 'Buddhist Suttas' (vol. xi of the Sacred Books of the East), pp. 133-135.

² This number would be greatly increased if the differences of the monograms were allowed for.

³ Chapter 47 of Müller's edition.

BASILEÛS SÔTÊROS MENANDROU and

MAHARAGASA TRADATASA MENANDRASA¹.

Wilson read² the last word Minadasa. But when he wrote, in 1840, the alphabet was neither so well known as it is now, nor had such good examples come to hand. So that though the Mi- is plain enough on several coins, it is almost certainly a mere mistake for Me, from which it only differs by the centre vowel stroke being slightly prolonged.

Fifteen of the coins have a figure of Pallas either on one side or the other. A 'victory,' a horse jumping, a dolphin, a head (perhaps of a god), a two-humped camel, an elephant goad, a boar, a wheel, and a palm branch are each found on one side or the other of one of the coins; and an elephant, an owl, and a bull's head each occur twice. These are all the emblems or figures on the coins. None of them are distinctively Buddhist, though the wheel might be claimed as the Buddhist wheel, and the palm branch and the elephant would be quite in place on Buddhist coins. It may be said, therefore, that the bulk of the coins are clearly pagan, and not Buddhist; and that though two or three are doubtful, even they are probably not Buddhist.

One coin, however, a very rare one, differs, as to its inscription, from all the rest that have the legend. It has on one side and on the other,

BASILEÛS DIKAIΟΥ MENANDROU,

MAHARAGASA DHARMIKASA³ MENANDRASA.

¹ See Alfred Von Sallet, 'Die Nachfolger Alexander's des Grossen in Baktrien und Indien,' Berlin, 1879; and Professor Percy Gardiner's 'Catalogue of the Coins of the Greek and Scythic Kings of Bactria and India,' London, 1886.

² In his 'Ariana Antiqua,' p. 283, London, 1841.

³ The r is a little doubtful and is written, if at all, after the dh, though intended to be pronounced before the m.

Is any reference intended here to the Buddhist Dharma as distinct from the ordinary righteousness of kings? I think not. The coin is one of those with the figure of Pallas on the side which bears the Greek legend, and five others of the Baktrian Greek kings use a similar legend on their coins. These are Agathocles, Heliokles, Archebios, Strato, and Zoilos. There is also another coin in the series with a legend into which the word Dharma enters, but which has not yet been deciphered with certainty—that bearing in the Greek legend the name of Sy-Hermaios, and supposed to have been struck by Kadphises I. If there is anything Buddhist in this coin of Menander's, then the others also must be Buddhist. But it is much simpler to take the word dharmikasa in the sense of the word used in the corresponding Greek legend, and to translate it simply 'the Righteous,' or, better still, 'the Just.' Only when we call to mind how frequent in the Pāli texts is the description of the ideal king (whether Buddhist or not) as dharmiko dhamma-rāga, we cannot refuse to see the connection between this phrase and the legend of the coins, and to note how at least six of the Greek kings, one of whom is Menander, are sufficiently desirous to meet the views of their Buddhist subjects to fix upon 'Righteousness' or 'Justice' as the characteristic by which they wish to be known. The use of this epithet is very probably the foundation of the tradition preserved by Plutarch, that Menander was, as a ruler, noted for justice; and it is certainly evidence of the Buddhist influences by which he was surrounded. But it is no evidence at all that he actually became a Buddhist.

To sum up.—Menander-Milinda was one of those Greek kings who carried on in Bactria the Greek dominion founded by Alexander the Great. He was certainly one of the most important, probably the most important, of those kings. He carried the Greek arms further into India than any of his predecessors had done, and everything confirms the view given by our author at I, 9 of his justice and his power, of his ability and his wealth. He must have reigned for a considerable time in the latter part of the second century B.C., probably from about 140 to about 115, or even 110 B.C.¹ His fame extended, as did that of no other Baktrian king, to the West, and he is the only Baktrian Greek king who has been remembered in India. Our author makes him say, incidentally², that he was born at Kalasi in Alasandā (= Alexandria), a name given to an island presumably in the Indus, And, as was referred to above, Plutarch has preserved the tradition that he died in camp, in a campaign against the Indians in the valley of the Ganges.

[It is interesting to point out, in this connection, that the town (gāma) of Kalasi has not been found mentioned elsewhere. Now among the very numerous coins of the Baktrian kings there is one, and only one, giving in the legend, not the name of a king, but the name of a city, the city of Karisi. As this coin was struck about 180 B.C. by Eukratides, who was probably the first of these kings to obtain a settlement on the banks of the Indus, it is possible that the two names, one in the Pāli form (or more probably in the form of the dialect used by our author), the other in the local form, are identical; and that the coin was struck in commemoration of the fact of the Greeks having reached the Indus. If that be so, then that they gave the name Alasanda (Alexandria) to the island on which the town was built, and not to the town itself, seems to show that the town was not founded by them, but was already an important place when they took it.]

Beyond this all is conjecture. When our author says that Milinda was converted to Buddhism³, he may be either relating an actual tradition, or he may be inventing for his own purposes. There is nothing inherently impossible, or even improbable, in the story. We know that all the Baktrians, kings and people alike, eventually became

¹ See the chronological table in the Introduction to Professor Gardner's work, quoted below.

² See the translation below of III, 7, 5.

³ See p. 420 of the Pāli text.

Buddhist. But the passage occurs in a part of the book which is open to much doubt. We have to place against it the negative evidence that none of Menander's coins show any decisive signs of his conversion. And the passage in question goes much further. It says that he afterwards gave up the kingdom to his son, and having entered the Buddhist Order, attained to Arahatsip. The Simhalese MSS. add a marginal note to the effect that the whole of this passage with its context was derived from a MS. brought from Siam. Mr. Trenckner is therefore of opinion¹ that it belongs to a spurious supplement. That may be so, in spite of the fact that it is quite in our author's style, and forms an appropriate close to the book. But it is incredible that an author of the literary skill so evident throughout the work should have closed his book deliberately in the middle of a paragraph, without any closing words to round it off. The Siamese MS. may after all have preserved the reading of older and better MSS. than those in Ceylon, and the last leaf of the book may have been lost there. There must have been some conclusion, if not in the manner of the paragraph under discussion, then in some other words which we may not be able to trace. But even if our author actually wrote that Menander did become a Bhikkhu and an Arahata, that is very poor evidence of the fact, unless he not only intended what he states to be taken quite literally, but also wrote soon after the events he thus deliberately records.

Now the opinion has been expressed above that we have to deal with a book of didactic ethics and religious controversy cast into the form of historical romance. If this is correct no one would be more astonished than the author himself at the inconsistency of modern critics if they took his historical statements au grand sérieux, while they made light of his ethical arguments. It is true that he would scarcely have been guilty of anything that seemed grossly improbable, at the time when he wrote, to the readers whom he addressed. But if, as is most probable, he wrote in North-

¹ 'Introduction,' pp. v, vi.

Western India when the memory of the actual facts of Menander's reign was fading away—that is, some generations after his death—he may well have converted him to Buddhism, as the most fitting close to the discussion he records, without intending at all to convey thereby any real historical event.

This brings us to the next point of our argument.

We have seen that the work must have been written some considerable time before Buddhaghosa, and after the death of Menander. Can its date be determined with greater accuracy than this? The story of Nāgasena introduces to us his father Sonuttara, his teachers Rohana, Assagutta of the Vattaniya hermitage, and Dhammarakkhita of the Asoka Ārāma near Pāṭaliputta, and there is also mention of a teacher named Āyupāla dwelling at the Saṅkheyya hermitage near Sāgala. None of these persons and none of these places are read of elsewhere in any Buddhist text, whether Sanskrit or Pāli. For the Asvaguṇa referred to in passing at p. 351 of the Divyāvadāna has nothing in common (except the name) with our Assagutta, the Rohana of Aṅguttara, III, 66, is quite distinct from our Rohana, and there is not the slightest reason for supposing Nāgasena to be another form of the name Nāgārguṇa, found in both the Chinese and Tibetan Buddhist literatures¹, and in the Jain lists². The famous Buddhist scholar so called was the reputed founder of the Mahāyāna school of Buddhism. Our Nāgasena represents throughout the older teaching. If there is any connection at all between the two names, Nāgasena must have been invented as a contrast to Nāgārguṇa, and not with the least idea of identifying two men whose doctrines are so radically opposed. Even were there any reason to believe this to be the case, it would not help us much, for the date of Nāgârjuna is quite as much open to dispute as that of the author of the 'Questions of Milinda'.¹

¹ See the passages quoted by Dr. Wenzel in the 'Journal of the Pāli Text Society' for 1886, pp. 1-4.

² See Professor Weber in the 'Handschriftenverzeichniss der königlichen Bibliothek in Berlin,' vol. v, part 2, p. 365.

I ought to mention here that an opinion of a Nāgasena is, according to Burnouf², discussed at length in the Abhidharma Kosa Vyākhyā; and that Schiefner³ quotes from a Tibetan work, the Bu-ston, the statement that a schism took place under a Thera Nāgasena 137 years after the Buddha's death. It would be very interesting if the former were our Nāgasena. And if Schiefner's restoration of the name found in his Tibetan authority be correct, and the authority itself be trustworthy, it is possibly the fading memory of that Nāgasena which induced our author to adopt the name as that of the principal interlocutor in his 'Questions of Milinda.'

Finally, Professor Kern, of Leiden—who believes that Buddha is the sun, and most of his principal disciples stars—believes also not only that our Nāgasena is an historical person, but also that there never was a Buddhist cleric of that name; and that Nāgasena is simply Patañjali, the author of the Yoga philosophy, under another name. If this is not a joke, it is a strange piece of credulity.

The only reason alleged in support of it is that Patañjali has the epithets of Nāgesa and of Phariṇ. That he was a Hindu who believed in the soul-theory of the current animistic creed, while all the opinions put into Nāgasena's mouth are those of a thorough-going Buddhist and non-individualist, is to count as nothing against this chance similarity, not of names, but of the name on one side with an epithet on the other. To identify John Stuart Mill with Dean Milman would be sober sense compared with this proposal.

¹ Compare on this point Dr. Wenzel, loc. cit., with Dr. Burgess in the 'Archaeological Reports for Southern India,' vol. i, pp. 5-9. Dr. Burgess thinks the most probable date of his death is about 200 A. D.

The identification of Nāgârjuna and Nāgasena was made independently by Major Bird in the 'Journal of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society' for October, 1844 (who was followed by the Rev. R. Spence Hardy at p. 517 of his 'Manual of Buddhism,' published in 1860), and by Benfey in his article 'Indien' in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopedia (who was followed by Burnouf at p. 570 of his 'Introduction,' &c., published in 1844).

² Loc. cit.

³ Note to his translation of Tāranātha, p. 298.

But it is deliberately put forward to support an accusation against the Buddhists of having falsely appropriated to themselves every famous man in India¹. Any mud, it would seem, is good enough to pelt the Buddhists with. Yet who is it, after all, who really makes the 'appropriation,' the Buddhists or Professor Kern himself?

It would seem, therefore, that most of our author's person and place names are probably inventions of his own².

But it is quite different with the books quoted by our author. In several passages he has evidently in his mind certain Pāli texts which deal with similar matters. So far as yet ascertained the texts thus silently referred to, either in the present volume or in the subsequent untranslated portion of the book, are as follows :

Page of this volume.

8 . .	Dīgha Nikāya II, 1, 2.
10 . .	„ „ II, 20.
10 . .	„ „ II, 1.
38 . .	„ „ II, 10.
38 . .	„ „ II, 11.
40 . .	Kathā Vatthu I, 1.
41 . .	Aṅguttara I, 15, 4-7.
41 . .	Dīgha Nikāya II, 17.
41 . .	„ „ II, 23.
42 . .	„ „ II, 26.
59 . .	„ „ XVII.
80 . .	Mahāvagga I, 1, 1.
129 . .	Various (see my note).
132 . .	Kullavagga IX, 1, 4.
163 . .	Kullavagga VII, 1, 27.
170 . .	Vessantara Gāṭaka.
179 . .	Sivi Gāṭaka.
204 . .	Magghima Nikāya LXIII.

¹ Kern's 'Buddhismus' (the German translation), vol. ii, p. 443.

² As these pages were passing through the press I have found Assagutta of the Vattaniya hermitage, mentioned in the last chapter of the Saddhamma Samgaha, which is passing through the press for the Pāli Text Society. But this is taken no doubt from the Milinda, and is not an independent reference to any such teacher as an historical person. (The Saddhamma Samgaha was written by Dhamma-kitti in Ceylon, probably in the twelfth century.)

Page of this volume.

- 212 . . Gâtaka (No. 69).
 256 . . Sutta Vibhaṅga (Pâr. 4).
 257 . . Kâtuma Sutta (No. 67).
 259 . . Kullavagga IX, 1, 3.
 264 . . Mahāvagga II, 16, 8.
 275 . . Dhamma-kakka-pavattana Sutta.
 277 . . Āṅguttara II, 1, 1.
 283 . . The 540th Gâtaka.
 285 . . Amba Gâtaka (No. 474).
 285 . . Dummedha Gâtaka (No. 122).
 286 . . Tittira Gâtaka (No. 438).
 286 . . Khantivāda Gâtaka (No. 313).
 287 . . Kūla-Nandiya Gâtaka (No. 222).
 287 . . Takkha-sūkara Gâtaka (No. 492).
 288 . . Kariyā-piṭaka II, 6.
 288 . . Sīlava-nāga Gâtaka (No. 72).
 288 . . Sabba-dāṭha Gâtaka (No. 241).
 289 . . Apannaka Gâtaka (No. 1).
 289 . . Nigrodha-miga Gâtaka (No. 12).
 290 . . Nigrodha Gâtaka (No. 445).
 290 . . Mahā-paduma Gâtaka (No. 472).
 290 . . Mahā-patāpa Gâtaka (No. 358).
 294 . . Ummagga Gâtaka (No. 546).
 298 . . Kullavagga VII, 3, 11.
 302 . . Āṅguttara IV, 13.

Page of the
Pāli Text.

- 220 . . Gâtaka, No. 310 (vol. iii, p. 32).
 231 . . Sutta Nipāta I, 4.
 236 . . Gâtaka (vol. i, p. 56).
 256 . . „ (vol. iv, p. 232, line 20).
 277 . . Vessantara Gâtaka.
 289 . . Gâtaka (vol. i, p. 57).
 291 . . Gâtaka (Nos. 258, 541, 494, and 243).
 313 . . Magghima Nikāya, No. 75 (p. 502).

In several other passages he refers to a Pāli book, or a chapter in a Pāli book, by name. This is much more valuable for our purposes than the silent, and sometimes doubtful, references in the last list. So far as is yet ascertained, these references are as follows :

Page of this volume.
1, 2 . .	Vinaya, Sutta, Abhidhamma.
21 . .	The Suttantas.
21 . .	The Abhidhamma.
21 . .	Dhamma Saṃgāṇi .
21 . .	Vibhaṅga.
21 . .	Dhātu Kathā.
21 . .	Puggala Paññatti .
21 . .	Kathā Vatthu.
22 . .	Yamaka.
22 . .	Paṭṭhāna .
22 . .	The Abhidhamma Piṭaka.
25 . .	The Abhidhamma.
27 . .	The Abhidhamma.
28 . .	The three Piṭakas.
31 . .	Mahā Samaya Suttanta (No. 20 in the Dīgha).
31 . .	Mahā Maṅgala Suttanta (Sutta Nipāta II, 4).
32 . .	Sama-kitta-pariyāya Suttanta (unknown).
32 . .	Rāhulovāda Suttanta (No. 147 in the Magghima).
32 . .	Parābhava Suttanta (Sutta Nipāta I, 6).
34 . .	The three Piṭakas.
56 . .	Samyutta Nikāya (the words quoted are in the Sutta Nipāta).
71, 88 . .	The Abhidhamma.
137 . .	The ninefold Scriptures.
195 . .	Moliya Sīvaka chapter of the Samyutta .
213 . .	Ratana Sutta (in the Sutta Nipāta II, 1).
213 . .	Khandha Parittā (not traced).
213 . .	Mora Parittā (Gātaka , Nos. 159, 491).
213 . .	Dhagagga Parittā (in the Gātaka Book).
213 . .	Āśāñāya Parittā (in the Dīgha Nikāya).
213 . .	Aṅgulimāla Parittā (not traced).
232 . .	The Pātimokkha.
264-267 . .	Pātimokkha, Vinaya Piṭaka.
Page of the Pāli Text.
241 . .	Dhamma-dāyāda Sutta of the Magghima Nikāya (vol. i, p. 13).
242 . .	Samyutta Nikāya (vol. i, p. 67).
258 . .	Dakkhiṇā Vibhaṅga of the Magghima Nikāya (No. 142).
281 . .	Kariyā Piṭaka G. 53.

Page of the
Pāli Text.

- 341 . . Navaṅgam Buddha-vaṅṇanam.
 341 . . The Gāṭaka Book.
 341 . . The Dīgha Nikāya.
 341 . . The Magghima Nikāya.
 342 . . The Samyutta Nikāya.
 342 . . The Khuddaka Nikāya.
 348 . . The three Piṭakas.
 349 . . Mahā Rāhulovāda (in the Magghima, No. 147).
 349 . . Mahā Maṅgala Suttanta (in the Sutta Nipāta II, 4).
 349 . . Sama-kitta Pariyāya (not traced).
 349 . . Parābhava Suttanta (in the Sutta Nipāta I, 6).
 349 . . Purābheda Suttanta (Sutta Nipāta IV, 10).
 349 . . Kalaha-vivāda Suttanta (Sutta Nipāta IV, 11).
 349 . . Kūla Vyūha Suttanta (Sutta Nipāta IV, 12).
 349 . . Mahā Vyūha Suttanta (Sutta Nipāta IV, 13).
 349 . . Tuvaṭṭaka Suttanta (Sutta Nipāta IV, 14).
 349 . . Sāriputta Suttanta (Sutta Nipāta IV, 16).
 350 . . Mahā-samaya Suttanta (in the Dīgha, No. 20).
 350 . . Sakkha-paṇṇa Suttanta (Dīgha, No. 21).
 350 . . Tirokudda Suttanta (in the Khuddaka Pāṭha, No. 7).
 350 . . Ratana Suttanta (in the Sutta Nipāta II, 1).
 350 . . The Abhidhamma.
 362 . . Ekuttara Nikāya (= Aṅguttara I, 13, 7).
 369 . . Dhaniya-sutta of the Sutta Nipāta (I, 2).
 371 . . Kummūpama Suttanta of the Samyutta Nikāya (not yet printed).
 372 . . Vidhura Punnaka Gāṭaka.
 377 . . Sakka Samyutta of the Samyutta Nikāya (not yet printed).
 378 . . Dhammapada (verse 327).
 379 . . Samyutta (55, 7).
 381 . . Sutasoma Gāṭaka (No. 537).
 384 . . Kaṇha Gāṭaka (No. 440, vol. iv, p. 10).
 385 . . Sutta Nipāta (I, 12, 1).
 389 . . Samyutta Nikāya.
 392 . . Ekuttara Nikāya (= Aṅguttara X, 5, 8).
 396 . . Lomahamsana Pariyāya.
 399 . . Samyutta Nikāya (III, 5, 6, vol. i, p. 73).
 401 . . " " (XVI, 1, 3, vol. ii, p. 194).
 402 . . Kakkavāka Gāṭaka (No. 451, vol. iv, p. 71).
 403 . . Kulla Nārada Gāṭaka (not traced).

Page of the
Pāli Text.

403 . . . Samyutta Nikāya (not traced).
405 . . . Lakkhaṇa Suttanta of the Dīgha Nikāya (No. 30).
406 . . . Bhallāṇiya Gāṭaka (No. 504, vol. iv, p. 439).
408 . . . Parinibbāna-suttanta of the Dīgha Nikāya (D.
XVI, 5, 24).
408 . . . Dhammapada (verse 32).
409 . . . Samyutta Nikāya (XIV, 16, vol. ii, p. 158).
411 . . . Sutta Nipāta (II, 6, 10).
414 . . . " " (III, 11, 43).

Lastly, our author quotes a large number of passages from the Pitaka texts, which he introduces (without naming any book) by the formulas: 'It was said by the Blessed One;' or, 'It is said by you' (you in the plural, you members of the Order); or, 'It was said by so and so' (naming some particular member of the Order). A great many of these quotations have already been traced, either by Mr. Trenckner or myself. Occasionally words thus attributed, by our author, to the Buddha, are, in the Pitakas, attributed to some one else. Such passages are distinguished in the following list by an asterisk added to the letter B, which marks those of them attributed by our author to the Buddha. The women quoted are distinguished by the title 'Sister.'

II, 1, 1, p. 45.	Sister Vagirâ.	Samyutta Nikâya V, 10, 6.
II, 1, 9, p. 53.	B*.	" " VII, 1, 6.
II, 1, 9, p. 54.	B.	Not traced.
II, 1, 11, p. 57.	B.	" "
II, 1, 13, p. 61.	B.	Samyutta Nikâya XXI, 5.
II, 2, 4, p. 69.	B.	Not traced.
II, 3, 1, p. 79.	B.	Magg'hima Nikâya XXI.
II, 3, 2, p. 80.	B.	" " XVIII.
III, 4, 3, p. 101.	B*.	Samyutta Nikâya II, 3, 2.
III, 4, 4, p. 104.	B.	Ânguttara III, 35, 4.
III, 6, 1, p. 114.	B.	Not traced.
IV, 1, 10, p. 145.	Sâriputta.	" "
IV, 1, 13, p. 150.	B.	Dîgha Nikâya XIV, 6, 1.
IV, 1, 35, p. 170.	B.	" " XIV, 3, 13.
IV, 1, 42, p. 179.	In the Sutta.	Not traced.
IV, 1, 55, p. 185.	B.	Kullavagga X, 1, 6.
IV, 1, 55, p. 186.	B.	Dîgha Nikâya XIV, 5, 62.

IV, 1, 67, p. 196.	You.	Not traced.
IV, 1, 67, p. 196.	You.	" "
IV, 1, 71, p. 199.	B.	Dîgha Nikâya XIV, 3, 60.
IV, 1, 71, p. 199.	B.	" " XIV, 3, 63.
IV, 2, 1, p. 202.	B.	Not traced.
IV, 2, 1, p. 202.	B.	Dîgha Nikâya XIV, 6, 3.
IV, 2, 4, p. 204.	B.	" " XIV, 2, 32.
IV, 2, 6, p. 206.	B.	Dhammapada 129.
IV, 2, 6, p. 206.	B.	Not traced.
IV, 2, 15, p. 213.	B.	Dhammapada 127, 8.
IV, 2, 20, p. 214.	You.	Not traced.
IV, 2, 20, p. 214.	You.	" "
IV, 2, 27, p. 224.	You.	" "
IV, 2, 29, p. 225.	B.	Dîgha Nikâya XIV, 2, 32.
IV, 2, 29, p. 225.	B.	Not traced.
IV, 2, 31, p. 227.	You.	" "
IV, 2, 31, p. 227.	You.	" "
IV, 3, 1, p. 229.	B.	Various (see note).
IV, 3, 1, p. 229.	You.	Aggañña Sutta (Dîgha).
IV, 3, 5, p. 234.	You.	Not traced.
IV, 3, 5, p. 234.	You.	" "
IV, 3, 15, p. 238.	Sâriputta.	" "
IV, 3, 15, p. 238.	B.	Pârâgika I, 5, 11.
IV, 3, 19, p. 241.	B*.	Gâtaka III, 24.
IV, 3, 19, p. 241.	B.	Gâtaka IV, 210.
IV, 3, 21, p. 242.	The Theras.	Dîgha Nikâya XIV, 4, 23.
IV, 3, 21, p. 243.	B.	" " XIV, 4, 57.
IV, 3, 24, p. 246.	B.	Not traced.
IV, 3, 24, p. 246.	B.	Mahâ-parinibbâna Sutta (D. XVI, 5, 24).
IV, 3, 27, p. 248.	You.	Not traced.
IV, 3, 27, p. 248.	You.	Kullavagga VII, 3, 9.
IV, 3, 31, p. 251.	B.	Not traced.
IV, 3, 31, p. 251.	B.	" "
IV, 3, 33, p. 253.	B.	Brahmagala Sutta (D. I, 1, 5).
IV, 3, 33, p. 253.	B.	Sela Sutta (SN. III, 7, 7).
IV, 3, 35, p. 254.	B*.	The 521st Gâtaka.
IV, 3, 38, p. 257.	B.	Dhaniya Sutta (SN. I, 2, 2).
IV, 4, 1, p. 261.	B.	Aṅguttara I, 14, 1.
IV, 4, 4, p. 264.	B.	Aṅguttara III, 124.
IV, 4, 9, p. 268.	B.	Pâtimokkha (Pâk. 1).
IV, 4, 11, p. 270.	B.	Not traced.
IV, 4, 11, p. 271.	B.	" "

IV, 4, 13, p. 273.	B.	Sutta Vibhaṅga (Pār. 3, 5, 13).
IV, 4, 13, p. 273.	B.	Not traced.
IV, 4, 16, p. 279.	B.	Āṅguttara XI, 2, 5, and the 169th Gāṭaka .
IV, 4, 16, p. 280.	You.	The 540th Gāṭaka .
IV, 4, 17, p. 283.	You.	Not traced.
IV, 4, 42, p. 294.	B*.	The 536th Gāṭaka .
IV, 4, 44, p. 297.	B.	Not traced.
IV, 4, 46, p. 301.	You.	" "
The Pāli Text.
P. 211, l. 6.	B.	Muni Sutta (SN. I, 12, 3).
211, l. 8.	B.	Kulavagga VI, 1, 5.
213, l. 6.	B.	Dhammapada 168.
213, l. 7.	B.	Magghima Nikāya 77.
215, l. 10.	B.	Not traced.
215, l. 12.	B.	Āṅguttara I, 14, 4.
217, l. 9.	B.	Samyutta Nikāya XXI.
217, l. 11.	B.	Not traced.
219, l. 14.	B.	" "
219, l. 15.	It is said.	Gāṭaka (No. 433).
221, l. 20.	B.	Kāḍḍanta Gāṭaka (vol. v, p. 49).
221, l. 24.	It is said.	Not traced.
223, l. 16.	B.	Magghima Nikāya (No. 87).
223, l. 18.	It is said.	" " "
225, l. 2.	B.	Sela Sutta (SN. III, 7, 33).
228, l. 2.	B.	Sutta Nipāta I, 4, 6 = III, 4, 26.
230, l. 13.	B*.	Kapi Gāṭaka (vol. iii, p. 354).
232, l. 7.	You.	Not traced.
232, l. 10.	You.	" "
235, l. 2.	B.	Magghima I, p. 177 = Vinaya I, p. 8.
235, l. 4.	B.	Magghima (No. 86).
236, l. 27.	B.	Āṅguttara I, 15, 10.
240, l. 3.	B.	Magghima Nikāya (No. 142).
242, l. 17.	Sāriputta.	Not traced.
242, l. 26.	B.	Samyutta Nikāya 44.
245, l. 1.	B.	Samyutta 6, 14 (vol. i, p. 157) = Thera-gāthā 256, 7 = Di- vyāvadāna, p. 300.
253, l. 1.	You.	Not traced.
255, l. 8.	You.	" "
262.	B.	" "
323.	You.	" "

The Pāli Text. P. 333.	B.	Dhammapada 54-56 (taken in part from Aṅguttara III, 79).
366, l. 6.	B.	Samyutta XX, 8, 5.
366, l. 10.	Sāriputta.	Thera-gāthā 985.
367, l. 8.	B.	Not traced (see S. XII, 63, 8).
367, l. 19.	Mahā Kaṭṭhāyana.	Thera-gāthā 501.
368, l. 2.	B.	Samyutta 46, 7.
368, l. 6.	Sāriputta.	Not traced.
368, l. 20.	Kulla Panthaka.	" "
369, l. 5.	B.	Sutta Nipāta I, 2, 12.
369, l. 22.	The Theras who held the Synod (at Rāgagaha).	Not traced.
370, l. 11.	Sāriputta.	Not traced.
371, l. 14.	Upasena.	Thera-gāthā 577.
371, l. 28.	B.	Samyutta I, 17, 2 (vol. i, p. 7).
372, l. 12.	Rāhula.	Not traced.
372, l. 23.	B.	Gāṭaka (No. 545).
373, l. 13.	Sāriputta.	Not traced.
374, l. 5.	Sāriputta.	" "
374, l. 16.	Sāriputta.	" "
375, l. 15.	B.	Magg'hima (vol. i, p. 33).
376, l. 3.	Anuruddha.	Not traced.
376, l. 17.	Rāhula.	" "
377, l. 14.	B.	Samyutta 55, 7.
378, l. 5.	Sāriputta.	Not traced.
378, l. 17.	B.	Mahā-parinibbāna Sutta (D. XVI, 2, 12).
379, l. 1.	B.	Dhammapada 327.
379, l. 14.	B.	Samyutta 55, 7.
380, l. 1.	Sāriputta.	Not traced.
381, l. 15.	B.	Sutasoma Gāṭaka (No. 537).
383, l. 3.	Sister Subhaddā.	Not traced.
384, l. 4.	B.	Kaṇha Gāṭaka (vol. iv, p. 10).
385, l. 1.	B.	(?) Magg'hima Nikāya (No. 62).
385, l. 28.	B.	Sutta Nipāta I, 12, 1.
386, l. 12.	B.	Dhammapada 81.
386, l. 19.	B.	Dhammapada 404 (from SN. III, 9, 35).
386, l. 26.	Subhūti.	Not traced.
387, l. 8.	B.	Dhammapada 28.
387, l. 16.	Sister Subhaddā.	Not traced.
388, l. 14.	B.	Magg'hima Nikāya (vol. i, p. 424).

The Pāli Text.
P. 389, l. 9.	B.	Samyutta Nikāya XVI, 3.
390, l. 17.	Vaṅṅsa.	Not traced.
391, l. 6.	Subhūti.	" "
391, l. 21.	B.	Dhammapada 350.
392, l. 3.	B.	Anguttara X, 5, 8.
392, l. 10.	B.	Not traced.
393, l. 3.	Vaṅṅsa.	" "
393, l. 25.	B.	" "
394, l. 6.	Upasena.	" "
394, l. 16.	Upasena.	" "
394, l. 28.	Sāriputta.	" "
395, l. 9.	Mahā Kassapa.	" "
395, l. 22.	Upasena.	Thera-gāthā 580.
396, l. 3.	B.	Magghima Nikāya (vol. i, p. 74).
396, l. 20.	Sāriputta.	Not traced.
397, l. 15.	Sāriputta.	" "
398, l. 5.	Pindola .	" "
399, l. 16.	B.	Samyutta Nikāya III, 5, 6 (vol. i, p. 73).
401, l. 10.	B.	Samyutta Nikāya XVI, 1, 3 (vol. ii, p. 194).
402, l. 8.	B.	Kakkavāka Gāṭaka (vol. iv, p. 71; not in III, 520).
402, l. 26.	Brahmā.	Samyutta Nikāya VI, 2, 4 (vol. i, p. 154 = Thera-gāthā 142).
403, l. 13.	B.	Kulla-nārada Gāṭaka (vol. iv, p. 223).
403, l. 27.	B.	Samyutta Nikāya (vol. iii, p. 125).
404, l. 12.	Pindola .	Not traced.
405, l. 3.	B.	Dīgha Nikāya XXX.
405, l. 22.	Anuruddha.	Not traced.
407, l. 1.	Sāriputta.	Thera-gāthā 982, 3.
407, l. 20.	Anuruddha.	Not traced.
408, l. 8.	B.	Dīgha Nikāya XVI, 5, 24.
408, l. 22.	B.	Dhammapada 32.
409, l. 17.	B.	Samyutta Nikāya XIV, 16 (= Thera-gāthā 148, 266).
410, l. 8.	Sāriputta.	Not traced ¹ .
411, l. 9.	Sāriputta.	" "
411, l. 29.	B.	Sutta Nipāta II, 6, 10.

¹ That is, not in the Piṭakas. The stanza is found in the commentary on the Dhammapada (Fausböll, p. 147), and also in Buddhaghosa's Papañka Sūdanī (see Trenckner's note)—each time with a variation at the close of the verse.

The Pāli Text.
P. 412, l. 21.	Mogharāga.	Not traced.
413, l. 6.	Rahula.	" "
414, l. 1.	B.	Sutta Nipāta (not traced ¹).
414, l. 18.	B.	" " III, 11, 43.
415, l. 14.	B.	Not traced.
416, l. 4.	Sāriputta.	" "
416, l. 29.	Upāli.	" "
417, l. 12.	B.	" "
418, l. 1.	Moggallāna.	" "
419, l. 11.	Sāriputta.	" "

Now the Pāli Piṭakas consist of the following twenty-nine books:

Title.	No. of printed pages 8vo.
1. The Sutta Vibhaṅga . . .	617*	} THE VINAYA PIṬAKA.
2. The Khandhakas . . .	668*
a. Mahāvagga . . . 360
b. Kullavagga . . . 308
3. The Parivāra	226*
Total	1511*
4. The Dīgha Nikāya . . .	750	} THE SUTTA PIṬAKA. (The four great Nikāyas.)
5. The Magghima Nikāya . .	1000
6. The Saṃyutta Nikāya . .	1250
7. The Aṅguttara Nikāya . .	1500
Total	4500
8. The Khuddaka Pāṭha . .	10*	} THE KHUDDAKA NIKĀYA. (The repeaters of the Dīgha add these to the Sut- ta Piṭaka. The repeaters of the Magghima add them to the Abhi- dhamma Piṭaka.)
9. The Dhammapadas . . .	40*
10. The Udānas	80*
11. The Iti-vuttakas . . .	100*
12. The Sutta Nipāta . . .	200*
13. The Vimāna Vatthu . .	85*
14. The Peta Vatthu . . .	90*
15. The Thera-Gāthā . . .	100*
16. The Theri-Gāthā . . .	35*
17. The Gātakas	70
18. The Niddesa	300
19. The Paṭisambhidā . . .	400
20. The Apadānas	400
21. The Buddha Vaṇsa . . .	60*
22. The Kariyā Piṭaka . . .	30*
Total	2000

¹ Mr. Trenckner gives no reference, and I have searched through the Sutta Nipāta, which has no index, in vain.

23. The Dhamma Saṅgami	260*	}	THE ABHIDHAMMA PIṬAKA.
24. The Vibhaṅga	325
25. The Kathā Vatthu	440
26. The Puggala Paññatti	75*
27. The Dhātu Kathā	100
28. The Yamakas	400
29. The Paññāna	600	}
Total Abhidhamma	2200
	10,211

This shows the total extent of the three Piṭakas to be about 10,000 pages 8vo. as printed, or to be printed, by the Pāli Text Society¹. If our English Bible, in the older authorised version, were to be printed in the same manner and type and on the same size of page, it would occupy about 5,000 pages. So that the Buddhist Bible without its repetitions (some of which are very frequent, and others very long), would only occupy about double the space of the English Bible. This would not have been a literature too large to be familiarly known to our author. What is the conclusion which can fairly be drawn, from a comparison of the last list with those preceding it, as to his knowledge of those books now held, by living Buddhists, to be canonical?

The answer to this question will be of some importance for another reason beyond the help it will afford towards settling the date of the original 'Questions of Milinda.' As is well known, Asoka, in the only one of his edicts, addressed specially to the members of the Buddhist Order of mendicants, selects seven portions of the Buddhist Scriptures, which he mentions by name, and expresses his desire that not only the brethren and sisters of the Order, but also the laity, should constantly learn by heart and reflect upon those seven. Now not one of the seven titles which occur in the edict is identical with any of the twenty-nine in the last list. Whereupon certain Indianists have rejoiced at being able to score a point, as they think, against these unbrahmanical Buddhists, and have jumped to the conclusion that the Buddhist canon must be late and spurious; and that the Buddhism of Asoka's time must have been very different from the Buddhism of the Pāli Piṭakas. That would be much the same as if a Japanese scholar, at a time when he knew little or nothing of Christianity, except the names of the books in the Bible, were to have found an open letter of Constantine's in which he urges both the clergy and laity to look upon the Word of God as their only authority, and to constantly repeat and earnestly meditate upon the Psalm of the Shepherd, the words of Lemuel, the Prophecy of the Servant of the Lord, the Sermon on the Mount, the Exaltation of Charity, the Question of Nicodemus, and the story of the Prodigal Son—and that our Oriental critic should jump to the conclusion that the canonical books of the Christians could not have been known in the time of Constantine, and that the Christianity of Constantine was really quite different from, and much more simple than the Christianity of the Bible. As a matter of fact the existence of such a letter would prove very little, either way, as to the date of the books in the Bible as we now have them. If our Japanese scholar were to discover afterwards a Christian work, even much later than the time of Constantine, in which the canonical books of the Christians were both quoted and referred to, he would have much surer ground for a sounder historical criticism. And he would possibly come to see that the seven portions selected for special honour and commendation were not intended as an exhaustive list even of remarkable passages, much less for an exhaustive list of canonical books, but that the number seven was merely chosen in deference to the sacred character attaching to that number in the sacred literature.

¹ This estimate excludes the space occupied by notes. The books marked with an asterisk in the foregoing list have already been printed.

Such a book is our Milinda. It is, as we have seen, later than the canonical books of the Pāli Piṭakas, and on the other hand, not only older than the great commentaries, but the only book, outside the canon, regarded in them as an authority which may be implicitly followed. And I venture to think that the most simple working hypothesis by which to explain the numerous and varied references and quotations it makes, as shown in the preceding lists, from the Piṭakas as a whole, and from the various books contained in them, is that the Pāli Piṭakas were known, in their entirety, and very nearly, if not quite, as we now have them, to our author. For out of the twenty-nine books of the Piṭakas, we find in the lists of works referred to by him the three Piṭakas as a whole, the Vinaya Piṭaka as a whole, and all of its component books except the Parivāra (which was composed in Ceylon), the Sutta Piṭaka and each of the four great Nikāyas, the Abhidhamma Piṭaka and each of its seven component books, and the Khuddaka Nikāya as a whole and several of its separate books. And when we further recollect the very large number of quotations appearing in my lists as not yet traced in the Piṭakas, we see the necessity of being very chary in drawing any argument ex silentio with respect to those books not occurring in the lists.

To sum up.—It may be said generally that while the Sutta Vibhaṅga and the Khandhakas, the four great Nikāyas, and the Abhidhamma were certainly known to our author, he very likely had no knowledge of the Parivāra; and it remains to be seen how far his knowledge of the Khuddaka Nikāya, which he happens to mention once¹ as a whole by name, did actually extend. At present it is only clear that he knew the Khuddaka Pāṭha, the Dhammapada collection of sacred verses, the Sutta Nipāta, the Thera and Theri-gāthā, the Gātakas, and the Kariyā Piṭaka. I hope to return to this question in the Introduction to my second volume, only pointing out here that the doubtful books (those concerning which our author is apparently silent) would occupy about two thousand pages octavo, out of the ten thousand of which the three Piṭakas would, if printed, consist: and that those two thousand pages belong, for the most part, precisely to that part of the Piṭakas which have not yet been edited, so that there they may very likely, after all, be quoted in one or other of the numerous quotations entered as 'not traced' in my lists¹.

¹ Page 342 of the printed text.

Such being the extent, so far as can at present be shown, of our author's knowledge of the three Piṭakas, the question arises as to the degree and accuracy of his knowledge. In the great majority of cases his quotations or references entirely agree with the readings shown by our texts. But there are a few exceptions. And as these are both interesting and instructive, it will be advisable to point them out in detail.

The reference to the Avīki Hell as being outside the earth, if not at variance with, is at least an addition to the teaching of the Piṭakas as to cosmogony². But there is some reason to believe that the passage may be an interpolation, and the difference itself is not only doubtful but also of no particular importance.

The description of the contents of the Puggala Paññatti given in I, 26, does not really agree with the text. The book, in its first section, sets out six different sorts of discrimination or distinction. One paragraph only is devoted to each of the first five discriminations, and the author or authors then proceed, in the rest of the book, to deal with the details of the last of the six. Our author gives the six as the divisions of the book itself.

But I think it is clear that so far as the description is inaccurate, the error is due, not to any difference between the text as he had it and that which we now possess, but simply to our author laying too great a stress upon the opening paragraphs of the book.

In the reference to the Buddha's first sermon, the Foundation of the Kingdom of Righteousness (in I, 38), our author says that 'eighteen koṭis of Brahma gods, and an innumerable company of other gods, attained to comprehension of the truth.' There is no statement of the kind in the Piṭaka account of this event (see my translation in 'Buddhist Suttas,' pp. 146-155). But it is not inconsistent with the Pāli, and is doubtless added from some edifying commentary.

¹ About half of the canonical books, besides a considerable number of the uncanonical works, have already been edited in the last few years, chiefly owing to the Pāli Text Society's labours.

² See the passages quoted in my note at p. 9.

There is a difference of reading between the lines put into Sāriputta's mouth, at II, 2, 4, and those ascribed to Sāriputta in the Thera Gāthā (1002, 1003). If the Milinda reading is not found in some hitherto unpublished passage, we have here a real case of divergence.

Perhaps the most important apparent variation between our author and the Piṭaka texts is the statement put by him, in IV, 4, 9, into the mouth of the Buddha, that a deliberate lie is one of the offences called Pārāgika, that is, involving exclusion from the Order. Now in the old Canon Law there are only four Pārāgika offences—breach of chastity, theft, murder, and a false claim to extraordinary spiritual powers (see my translation in vol. i, pp. 1-5 of the 'Vinaya Texts'); and falsehood is placed quite distinctly under another category, that of the Pāṭikkīyas, offences requiring repentance (see p. 32 of the same translation). If our author was a member of the Order, as he almost certainly was, it would seem almost incredible that he should make an error in a matter of such common knowledge, and of such vital importance, as the number and nature of the Pārāgikas. And indeed, in the immediate context, he refers to the Pāṭikkīya rule, though not in the exact words used in the text of the Pātimokkha. I think that he must have known very well what he was talking about. And that a passage, not yet traced, will be found in the unpublished parts of the Piṭakas, in which the Buddha is made to say that falsehood is a Pārāgika—just as a Christian might maintain that falsehood is forbidden in the Ten Commandments, and yet be perfectly aware of the exact phraseology of the Ten Words.

In IV, 4, 26, our author identifies the learned pig in the Takkha-sūkara Gāthaka with the Bodisat. He differs here from the Gāthaka Commentary, in which the Bodisat is identified with the tree-god, who acts as a kind of Greek chorus in the story. And the summaries in IV, 4, 28 of Ruru Gâtaka, and in IV, 4, 30 of the Sabba-dâttha Gâtaka, do not exactly agree with Professor Fausböll's text¹. But the commentary is not the text; and it is well known that there are numerous such light variations in the different expansions of the verses, which latter alone form the actual text.

In IV, 4, 44 we find our author giving a version of a well-known incident in the Buddhist Gospel story different from the oldest version of it in the Piṭaka texts. This is another instance of an expansion of the original adopted from some unknown commentator, and does not argue an ignorance of the text as we have it.

I have noticed in the untranslated portion of our author, four or five cases of readings apparently different from the Piṭaka texts he refers to. These I hope to deal with in my next volume. But I may notice here that two stanzas, given on p. 414 of the text, and said on p. 413 to be 'in the Sutta Nipâta,' are not found in Professor Fausböll's edition of that work; and we have there, in all probability, another case of real divergence. But the reading in the Milinda may possibly be found to be incorrect.

The general result of this comparison, when we remember the very large number of passages quoted, will be held, I trust, to confirm the conclusion reached above, that our author knew the Piṭakas practically as we now have them, that is as they have been handed down in Ceylon.

Outside the Piṭakas there are unfortunately no references to actual books. But there are several references to countries and persons which are of importance, in as much as they show a knowledge in our author of places or occurrences not mentioned in the sacred books. It will be most convenient to arrange these passages first in an alphabetical list, and then to make a few remarks on the conclusions the list suggests. They are as follows:—

Name.	Page of the Pâli Text.
Anantakâya (Yonako)	29, 30.
Alasando (dîpo)	82, 327, 331, 359.
Asoka (dhamma-râgâ)	121.

¹ See my notes to the passages quoted.

Name.	Page of the Pāli Text.
Asokârâma (near Patna)	16, 17.
Assagutta (âyasmâ)	6, 7, 14.
Âyupâla (âyasmâ)	19.
Ūhâ (nadî)	70.
Kalasi (gâmo)	83.
Kasmîra (raṭṭham)	82, 327, 331.
Kola-paṭṭana (seaport)	359.
Gandhâra (raṭṭham)	327, 331.
Kandagutto (râgâ)	292.
Kîna (? China)	121, 327, 331, 359.
Takkola (? = Karkota)	359.
Tissatthera (lekḥâkariyo)	71.
Devamañtiya (Yonako)	22-24, 29, 30.
Dhamma-rakkhita (âyasmâ)	16, 18.
Nikumba (raṭṭham)	327.
Bindumatî (ganikâ)	121.
Bhaddasâla (senâpati-putto)	292.
Bharukakḥḥa (men of)	331.
Mañkura (Yonako)	29, 30.
Madhura (nigamo)	331.
Yonakâ (the tribe)	1, 4, 20, 68.
Rakkhita-tala (in the Himâlayas)	6, 7, 12, 18.
Rohana (âyasmâ)	7, 10.
Vaṅga (Bengal)	359.
Vattaniya (senâsanam)	10, 12, 14-16.
Vigamba-vatthu (senâsanam)	12.
Vilâta (raṭṭham)	327, 331.
Saka-yavana (the countries of)	327, 331.
Sanḥeyya (parivenam)	19, 22.
Sabbadinna or Dinna (Yonako)	29, 56.
Sâgala (nagaram)	1, 3, 5, 14, 22.
Suratṭha (nigamo)	359, men of, 331.
Suvanna-bhûmi (? Burma)	359.
Sonuttara (brâhmano)	9.

It will be noticed that the only names of persons, besides those occurring in the story itself, are, in one passage, Asoka and Bindumatî the courtesan, and in another Kandragupta and Bhaddasâla who fought against him. Of places, besides those in the story, we have a considerable number of names referring to the Panjâb, and adjacent countries; and besides these the names only of a few places or countries on the sea coast. The island Alasanda in the Indus, and the town of Kalasi situated in that island, have been discussed above. The country of the Sakas and Yavanas, Gandhâra, Kashmîr, Bharukakka, Surat, and Madhura, explain themselves. Nikumba and Vilâta were probably in the same neighbourhood, but these names have not been met with elsewhere, and I can suggest no identification of them. The places on the sea coast, to which a merchant ship could sail, mentioned on p. 359, are mostly well known. Kola-pattana must, I think, be some place on the Koromandel coast, and Suvanna-bhûmi be meant for the seaboard of Burma and Siam. The author mentions no places in the interior south of the Ganges.

At four places he gives lists of famous rivers. In three out of the four he simply repeats the list of five—Gaṅgâ, Yamunâ, Akiravatî, Sarabhû, and Mahî—so often enumerated together in the Piṭakas¹. In the fourth passage (p. 114) he adds five others—the Sindhu, the Sarassatî, the Vetravatî, the Vitamsâ, and the Kândabhâgâ. Of these the first two are well known. Professor Eduard Müller suggests² that the Vitamsâ is the same as the Vitastâ (the Hydaspes of the Greeks and the modern Bihat). The Vetravatî is one of the principal affluents of the Jumna; and the Kândrabhâgâ rises in the North-West Himâlayas, and is not unfrequently referred to as the Asiknî of the Vedas, the Akesines of the Greek geographers, the modern Kinâb³.

The list is meagre enough. An ethical treatise is scarcely the place to look for much geographical or historical matter. But unless our author deliberately concealed his knowledge, and made all the remarks he put into the mouth of Nâgasena correspond with what that teacher might fairly be expected to have known, the whole list points to the definite conclusion that the writer of the 'Questions of Milinda' resided in the far North-West of

¹ See pp. 70, 87, 380 of the Pâli text.

² 'Journal of the Pâli Text Society,' 1888, p. 87.

³ See Lassen, 'Indische Alterthumskunde,' vol. i, p. 43 (first edition, p. 55 of the second edition), and the passages there quoted.

India, or in the Panjâb itself. And this is confirmed by the great improbability of any memory of Menander having survived elsewhere, and more especially in Ceylon, where we should naturally look for our author's residence if he did not live in the region thus suggested.

As my space is here limited, I postpone to the next volume the discussion as to how far the knowledge displayed by our author, the conditions of society with which he shows himself acquainted, and the religious beliefs he gives utterance to, afford evidence of his date. I will only say here that on all these points his work shows clear signs of being later than the Piṣāka texts. And in the present state of our knowledge, or rather of our ignorance, of Pāli, there is very little to be drawn from the language used by our author. In the first place we do not know for certain whether we have the original before us, or a translation from the Sanskrit or from some Northern dialect. And if, as is probably the case, we have a translation, it would be very difficult to say whether any peculiarity we may find in it is really due to the translator, or to the original author. No doubt a translator, finding in his original a word not existing in Pāli, but formed according to rules of derivation obtaining in Pāli, would coin the corresponding Pāli form. And in doing so he might very likely be led into mistake, if his original were Prakrit, by misunderstanding the derivation of the Prakrit word before him. Childers in comparing Buddhist Sanskrit with Pāli, has pointed out several cases where such mistakes have occurred, and has supposed that in every case the Sanskrit translator misunderstood a Pāli word before him¹. As I have suggested elsewhere it is, to say the least, quite as likely that the Sanskrit Buddhist texts are often founded on older works, not in Pāli, but in some other Prakrit². And it may be possible hereafter to form some opinion as to what that dialect was which the Sanskrit writers must have had before them, to lead them into the particular blunders they have made. In the same way an argument may be drawn from the words found exclusively in Milinda as to the dialect which he spoke, and in which he probably wrote. A list of the words our author uses, and not found in the Piṭakas, can only be tentative, as we have not as yet the whole of the Piṭaka texts in print. But it will be useful, even now, to give the following imperfect list of such as I have noted in my copy of Childers' 'Dictionary.'

¹ See the articles in his 'Pāli Dictionary,' referred to under note 3, p. xi of the Introduction.

² See the note on pp. 178, 179 of my 'Buddhist Suttas.'

Word.	Page of the Pāli Text.	Note.
Āḷaka . . .	418 . . .	See 'Journal,' 1886, p. 158.
Anekamsikatā . . .	93 . . .	" " " p. 123.
Āṇāpako . . .	147 . . .	Peon, officer.
Anīka//ha . . .	234 . . .	Sentinel.
Anughāyati . . .	343 . . .	Trace by smell.
Anuparivattati . . .	204, 253, 307 . . .	Turn towards.
Antobhaviko . . .	95 . . .	'Journal,' 1886, p. 124.
Āvapana . . .	279 . . .	" " " p. 157.
Asipāsā . . .	191 . . .	A caste so called.
Anupeseti . . .	31, 36 . . .	Send after.
Āsādaniyam . . .	205 . . .	Injury.
Aṭonā ¹ . . .	191 . . .	Professional beggars.
Āyūhito . . .	181 . . .	Busy.
Āyūhako . . .	207 . . .	Busy.
{ Bhaddiputtā ² . . .	191 . . .	} A caste so called.
{ Bhaṭṭiputtā . . .	133 . . .
Bhavatīha . . .	92, 93, 342 . . .	Introducing verses.
Kāṇḍakanta . . .	118 . . .	A kind of gem.
Kavaka . . .	156, 200 . . .	Wretch.
Dhamadhamāyati . . .	117 . . .	To blow.
Ekāniko . . .	402 . . .	On the one true path.
Ghanikā . . .	191 . . .	Musicians.
Gilānako . . .	74 . . .	A sick man, a patient.
Hiriyati . . .	171 . . .	Is made afraid of sin.
Issatthako . . .	419 . . .	Archer.
Galūpikā . . .	407 . . .	Leech.
Kali-devatā . . .	191 . . .	Worshippers of Kali.
Kaṭumika . . .	78, 79 . . .	Reminding.
Kummiga . . .	346 . . .	Animal.

¹ Hīnaṭi-kumburē (p. 252) reads anāṇayo.

² The Sinhalese has bhaddiputrāyo.

Name.	Page of the Pāli Text.	Note.
Lakanaka . . .	377 . .	Anchor.
Laṇṇaka . . .	137, 242, 256, 362 . .	Epithet of the Nikāyas.
Laṅghako . . .	34, 191, 331 . .	Tumbler.
Lekhaniyo . . .	172 . .	Sharp (of medicine).
Mamkata . . .	384 . .	Done by me.
Manthayati . . .	173 . .	Churn.
Mazibhaddā . . .	191 . .	A caste so called.
Naṭṭhāyiko . . .	201 . .	(?) Farmer.
Nārāṭa . . .	105 . .	The weapon so called.
Niyyāmaka . . .	194, 376 . .	Pilot.
Okassa . . .	210 . .	Rudely.
Pabbatā . . .	191 . .	A caste so called.
Pakkhanno . . .	144, 390 . .	Lost, fallen.
Parimaggakā . . .	343 . .	Touchers of.
Parimutti . . .	112 . .	Release.
Pariraṅgita . . .	75 . .	Marked over.
Parisamha . . .	198 . .	Subtle.
Pariyoga ¹ . . .	118 . .	Cauldron.
Paṭisallīyati . . .	139 . .	To be secluded.
Paṭisīsa . . .	90 . .	Chignon.
Peṇāhikā . . .	402 . .	A bird so called.
Pitaka . . .	18, &c. . .	See my note to p. 28.
Pimsati . . .	43 . .	Compound (a medicine).
Ratani ² . . .	85 . .	Cubit.
Sakkika . . .	226 . .	True.
Sāmayiko . . .	22 . .	Learned in doctrine.
Supāna . . .	147 . .	Dog.
Tamyathā . . .	1 . .	See Trenckner's 'Pāli Miscellany,' p. 55.
Thāla . . .	62 . .	Gong.
Tipeṭako . . .	90 . .	Who knows the Pitakas.
Ukkhadeti . . .	241 (see 315) . .	Perfume the body.
Ūhana . . .	32 . .	Synthesis.
Ukkalati . . .	143 . .	Revoke.
Upama . . .	41, 44 . .	Cessation.
Viggādharo . . .	153, 200 . .	Magician.
Yogāvāro . . .	43, 400 and foll. . .	See my note on p. 68.
Yogin . . .	2, 400 foll. . .	Ascetic.

¹ This word has been found in the Pitakas (e.g. Magg'hima I, 480) in the sense of 'practice.'

² The Pitaka form is ratana.

This list might be considerably extended if words were included which differ from those used in the Piṭakas only by the addition of well-known suffixes or prefixes—such, for instance, as viparivattati, at p. 117, only found as yet elsewhere in the Tela Kaṭṭhā Gāthā, verse 37. But such words are really only a further utilisation of the existing resources of the language, and would afford little or no ground for argument as to the time and place at which our author wrote. I have thought it best, therefore, to omit them, at least at present.

If we turn from isolated words to the evidence of style it will be acknowledged by every reader that the Milinda has a marked style of its own, different alike from the formal exactness of most of the Piṭaka texts, and from the later manner of any other Pāli or Sanskrit-Buddhist authors as yet published. It is no doubt the charm of its style which has been one of the principal reasons for the great popularity of the book. Even a reader who takes no interest in the points that are raised, or in the method in which the questions are discussed, will be able, I trust, to see, even through the dark veil of a lame and wooden translation, what the merits of the original must be. And to a devout Buddhist, in whose eyes the book he was reading offered a correct solution of the most serious difficulties in religion, of the deepest problems of life,—to whose whole intellectual training and sympathies the way in which the puzzles are put, and solved, so exactly appealed,—to such a reader both the easy grace of the opening dialogue, as of a ship sailing in calm waters, and the real eloquence of occasional passages, more especially of the perorations by which the solutions are sometimes closed, must have been a continual feast. I venture to think that the ‘Questions of Milinda’ is undoubtedly the master-piece of Indian prose; and indeed is the best book of its class, from a literary point of view, that had then been produced in any country. Limits of space prevent the discussion of this last proposition, however interesting: and it would be, no doubt, difficult to prove that anything from India was better than the corresponding thing produced by our noble selves, or by those whose Karma we inherit. But in ancient Indian literature there are only two or three works which can at all compare with it. It ought not to seem odd that these also are Buddhist and Pāli; that is, that they come from the same school. And while the Dīgha Nikāya may be held to excel it in stately dignity, the Visuddhi Magga in sustained power, and the Gāṭaka book in varied humour, the palm will probably be eventually given to the 'Questions of Milinda' as a work of art.

I am aware that this conclusion is entirely at variance with the often repeated depreciation of Buddhist literature. But the fact is that this depreciation rests upon ignorance, and is supported by prejudice. As a critical judgment it will not survive the publication and translation of those great Buddhist works which it overlooks or ignores. Some Sanskrit scholars, familiar with the Brahmin estimate of matters Indian, and filled with a very rational and proper admiration for the many fine qualities which the old Brahmins possessed, may find it hard to recognise the merits of sectarian works written in dialects which violate their most cherished laws of speech. But the historical student of the evolution of thought, and of the rise of literature in India, will more and more look upon the question as a whole, and will estimate at its right value all Indian work, irrespective of dialect or creed.

T. W. RHYS DAVIDS.

TEMPLE,

August, 1889.

THE QUESTIONS
OF
KING MILINDA.

THE QUESTIONS OF KING MILINDA.

REVERENCE BE TO THE BLESSED ONE, THE ARAHAT, THE SAMMÂ-SAMBUDDHA.

BOOK I.

THE SECULAR NARRATIVE ¹.

- I. King Milinda, at Sâgala the famous town of yore,
To Nâgasena, the world famous sage, repaired.
(So the deep Ganges to the deeper ocean flows.)
To him, the eloquent, the bearer of the torch
Of Truth, dispeller of the darkness of men's minds, Subtle and knotty questions did he put, many,
Turning on many points. Then were solutions given
Profound in meaning, gaining access to the heart, Sweet to the ear, and passing wonderful and strange.
For Nâgasena's talk plunged to the hidden depths Of Vinaya and of Abhidhamma (Law and Thought)

¹ Bâhira-kathâ, literally 'outside talk;' so called in contradistinction to the religious character of the subjects treated of in the remaining books.

Unravelling all the meshes of the Suttas' net, Glittering the while with metaphors and reasoning high.

Come then! Apply your minds, and let your hearts rejoice,

And hearken to these subtle questionings, all grounds

Of doubt well fitted to resolve.

2. Thus hath it been handed down by tradition—
There is in the country of the Yonakas¹ a great centre of trade², a city that is called Sâgala, situate in a delightful country well watered and hilly, abounding in parks and gardens and groves and lakes and tanks, a paradise of rivers and mountains and woods. Wise architects have laid it out³, and its people know of no oppression, since all their enemies and adversaries have been put down.
Brave is its defence, with many and various strong towers and ramparts, with superb gates and entrance archways; and with the royal citadel in its midst, white walled and deeply moated. Well laid out are its streets, squares, cross roads, and market places⁴. Well displayed are the innumerable sorts of costly merchandise [2] with which its shops are filled. It is richly adorned with hundreds of alms-

¹ That is Ionians, the Pâli word for Baktrian Greeks.

² Nânâ-pu/a-bhedanam, literally 'the distributing place of parcels of merchandise of many kinds.' Trenckner renders it 'surrounded with a number of dependent towns,' but surely entrepôt is the idea suggested.

³ Sutavanta-nimmitam; which Trenckner renders 'pious are its people.' But I prefer the Sinhalese interpretation.

⁴ This list recurs at pp. 34, 330 of the text. See below, p. 53.

halls of various kinds ; and splendid with hundreds of thousands of magnificent mansions, which rise aloft like the mountain peaks of the Himâlayas. Its streets are filled with elephants, horses, carriages, and foot-passengers, frequented by groups of handsome men and beautiful women, and crowded by men of all sorts and conditions, Brahmans, nobles, artificers, and servants. They resound with cries of welcome to the teachers of every creed, and the city is the resort of the leading men of each of the differing sects. Shops are there for the sale of Benares muslin, of Koṭumbara stuffs¹, and of other cloths of various kinds ; and sweet odours are exhaled from the bazaars, where all sorts of flowers and perfumes are tastefully set out. Jewels are there in plenty, such as men's hearts desire, and guilds of traders in all sorts of finery display their goods in the bazaars that face all quarters of the sky. So full is the city of money, and of gold and silver ware, of copper and stone ware, that it is a very mine of dazzling treasures. And there is laid up there much store of property and corn and things of value in warehouses—foods and drinks of every sort, syrups and sweetmeats of every kind. In wealth it rivals Uttara-kuru, and in glory it is as Âṅakamandâ, the city of the gods².

3. Having said thus much we must now relate the previous birth history of these two persons (Milinda

¹ It is worth noting, as there is a doubt about the spelling, that Hînaśi-kumburê reads Koṭumbara, not Kodumbara.

² Here follow in Hînaśi-kumburê's version two pages of introductory matter, explaining how he came to undertake his translation.

and Nâgasena) and the various sorts of puzzles¹. This we shall do under six heads:—

1. Their previous history (Pubba-yoga).
2. The Milinda problems.
3. Questions as to distinguishing characteristics.
4. Puzzles arising out of contradictory statements.
5. Puzzles arising out of ambiguity.
6. Discussions turning on metaphor.

And of these the Milinda problems are in two divisions—questions as to distinctive characteristics, and questions aiming at the dispelling of doubt; and the puzzles arising out of contradictory statements are in two divisions—the long chapter, and the problems in the life of the recluse.

THEIR PREVIOUS HISTORY (PUBBA-YOGA).

4. By Pubba-yoga is meant their past Karma (their doings in this or previous lives). Long ago, they say, when Kassapa the Buddha was promulgating the faith, there dwelt in one community near the Ganges a great company of members of the Order. There the brethren, true to established rules and duties, rose early in the morning, and taking the long-handled brooms, would sweep out the courtyard and collect the rubbish into a heap, meditating the while on the virtues of the Buddha.

5. One day a brother told a novice to remove the heap of dust. But he, as if he heard not, went about his business; and on being called a second time, and a third, still went his way as if he had not heard. Then the brother, angry with so intractable a novice, dealt him a blow with the broom stick.

¹ These six words are added from Hīnaśī-kumburê.

[3] This time, not daring to refuse, he set about the task crying; and as he did so he muttered to himself this first aspiration: 'May I, by reason of this meritorious act of throwing out the rubbish, in each successive condition in which I may be born up to the time when I attain Nirvâna, be powerful and glorious as the midday sun!'

6. When he had finished his work he went to the river side to bathe, and on beholding the mighty billows of the Ganges seething and surging, he uttered this second aspiration: 'May I, in each successive condition in which I may be born till I attain Nirvâna, possess the power of saying the right thing, and saying it instantly, under any circumstance that may arise, carrying all before me like this mighty surge!'

7. Now that brother, after he had put the broom away in the broom closet, had likewise wandered down to the river side to bathe, and as he walked he happened to overhear what the novice had said. Then thinking: 'If this fellow, on the ground of such an act of merit, which after all was instigated by me, can harbour hopes like this, what may not I attain to?' he too made his wish, and it was thus: 'In each successive condition in which I may be born till I attain Nirvâna, may I too be ready in saying the right thing at once, and more especially may I have the power of unravelling and of solving each problem and each puzzling question this young man may put—carrying all before me like this mighty surge!'

8. Then for the whole period between one Buddha and the next these two people wandered from existence to existence among gods and men. And our Buddha saw them too, and just as he did to the son of Moggall and to Tissa the Elder, so to them also did he foretell their future fate, saying : ' Five hundred years after I have passed away will these two reappear, and the subtle Law and Doctrine taught by me will they two explain, unravelling and disentangling its difficulties by questions put and metaphors adduced.'

9. Of the two the novice became the king of the city of Sâgala in India, Milinda by name, learned, eloquent, wise, and able ; and a faithful observer, and that at the right time, of all the various acts of devotion and ceremony enjoined by his own sacred hymns concerning things past, present, and to come. Many were the arts and sciences he knew—holy tradition and secular law ; the Sâṅkhya, Yoga, Nyâya, and Vaiseshika systems of philosophy ; arithmetic ; music ; medicine ; the four Vedas, the Purâṇas, and the Itihâsas ; astronomy, magic, causation¹, and spells ; the art of war ; poetry ; conveyancing²—in a word, the whole nineteen³.

[4] As a disputant he was hard to equal, harder

¹ Hetu, literally 'cause.' Trenckner has 'logic (?)'; Hīnaśi-kumburê repeats the word.

² Muddâ, literally 'seal-ring.' The meaning of the term (which recurs in similar lists at Dīgha I, 1, 25 ; I, 2, 14 ; and below, p. 59 of the text) is quite clear, but the exact details of the 'art' are unknown. I follow Buddhaghosa's comment on those passages. Trenckner leaves the word untranslated, and Hīnaśi-kumburê says, 'Ængillen cel-wīma,' that is, 'adhering with the finger,' which I do not understand, unless it means the sealing of a document. At IV, 3, 25, the context makes it probable that 'law of property' would be the best rendering.

³ The number of the Sippas (Arts and Sciences) is usually given as eighteen. In the Gâtaka (p. 58, l. 29, Professor Fausbøll's edition) it is twelve.

still to overcome ; the acknowledged superior of all the founders of the various schools of thought. And as in wisdom so in strength of body, swiftness, and valour there was found none equal to Milinda in all India. He was rich too, mighty in wealth and prosperity, and the number of his armed hosts knew no end.

10. Now one day Milinda the king proceeded forth out of the city to pass in review the innumerable host of his mighty army in its fourfold array (of elephants, cavalry, bowmen, and soldiers on foot). And when the numbering of the forces was over, the king, who was fond of wordy disputation, and eager for discussion with casuists, sophists¹, and gentry of that sort, looked at the sun (to ascertain the time), and then said to his ministers: 'The day is yet young. What would be the use of getting back to town so early? Is there no learned person, whether wandering teacher² or Brahman, the head of some school or order, or the master of some band of pupils (even though he profess faith in the Arahāt, the Supreme Buddha), who would be able to talk with me, and resolve my doubts ?'

¹ Lokâyatas and Vitandas. Other Pâli passages, where they are mentioned, are Kullavagga V, 3, 2; Ânguttara III, 58, 1; Sumaṅgala Vilâsini, 96, 247; and below, § 22 (p. 17). See also Weber, 'Bhagavatî', II, 246; Muir, 'Sanskrit Texts,' III, 95; Deussen, 'Das Vedânta-System,' 310.

² Samāṇa. There is no expression in English corresponding to this common word in Pâli texts. It means any 'religious' (in the technical meaning of that word) who is not a recluse according to the orthodox Brahman rules. It includes therefore many who were not Buddhists, and also even Brahmans if they had joined the Buddhists or Gains, or any other of the non-conforming bodies. The Samāṇas remained in one place during the rains, and for the rest of the year wandered from place to place, promulgating their particular views. They were not necessarily ascetics in any strict use of that term; though they were usually celibates.

11. Thereupon the five hundred Yonakas said to Milinda the king : ' There are the six Masters, O king !—Pûrana Kassapa, Makkhali of the cowshed ¹, the Niganttha of the Nâta clan, Sañgaya the son of the Belattha woman, Agita of the garment of hair, and Pakudha Kakkâyana. These are well known as famous founders of schools, followed by bands of disciples and hearers, and highly honoured by the people. Go, great king ! put to them your problems, and have your doubts resolved ².'

12. So king Milinda, attended by the five hundred Yonakas, mounted the royal car with its splendid equipage, and went out to the dwelling-place of Pûrana Kassapa, exchanged with him the compliments of friendly greeting, and took his seat courteously apart. And thus sitting he said to him: 'Who is it, venerable Kassapa, who rules the world?'

¹ So called because he was said to have been born in a cowshed. See the Sumaṅgala, p. 143. All these six teachers were contemporaries of the Buddha, and lived therefore about five hundred years before Milinda.

² All this is a mere echo of the opening paragraphs in the Sâmañña-phala (D. 2), where Agâtasattu is described as visiting these six famous sophists. And the plagiarism is all the more inartistic as the old names are retained, and no explanation is given of their being born twice at an interval of five hundred years. One may indeed ask what is a glaring anachronism to our good Buddhist romancer compared with the advantage of introducing the stock-names when he has to talk of heretics ? But the whole book is so full of literary skill, that it is at least strange that its author should have made this blunder ; and there are other reasons for thinking the whole episode an interpolation. (See note on §§ 13, 15.) So that probably our § 15 came originally immediately after § 10, and then (after the episode in §§ 15-36) § 37 takes up the narrative interrupted at the end of § 10.

'The Earth, great king, rules the world!'

'But, venerable Kassapa, if it be the Earth that rules the world, how comes it that some men go to the Avîki hell¹, thus getting outside the sphere of the Earth?' [5]

When he had thus spoken, neither could Pûrana Kassapa swallow the puzzle, nor could he bring it up; crestfallen, driven to silence, and moody², there he sat.

13. Then Milinda the king said to Makkhali of the cowshed³: 'Are there, venerable Gosâla, good and evil acts? Is there such a thing as fruit, ultimate result, of good and evil acts?'

'There are no such acts, O king; and no such fruit, or ultimate result. Those who here in the world are nobles, they, O king, when they go to the other world, will become nobles once more. And those who are Brahmans, or of the middle class, or workpeople, or outcasts here, will in the next world become the same. What then is the use of good or evil acts¹ ?

¹ Avîki (probably 'the Waveless'). The mention of this particular hell as being outside the earth is noteworthy. One would expect to find the Lokântarika hell so described. Spence Hardy indeed goes so far as to say that the Avîki is seven hundred miles directly under the great Bo Tree at Budh Gâyâ (Manual, p. 26), which would be within the sphere of the earth. But there is nothing in the Pâli texts yet published as to its position. See Kullavagga VII, 4, 8; Ânguttara III, 56; Gâtaka I, 71, 96; Pañka Gati Dîpana, 20. There is a list of the hells at Sutta Nipâta III, 10, but the Avîki is not one of them. This blunder, improbable in a writer so learned as our author elsewhere shows himself, is another reason for thinking these sections to be an interpolation.

² Pattakkhando pagghâyanto. See my note on Kullavagga IV, 4, 7, and compare Ânguttara III, 73, 4.

³ This, again, is most clumsy, as the rival teachers must have dwelt far apart. And it will be seen that, notwithstanding the parade of the six names at the beginning of this episode, the remaining four are no further mentioned.

‘ If, venerable Gosâla, it be as you say then, by parity of reasoning, those who, here in this world, have a hand cut off, must in the next world become persons with a hand cut off, and in like manner those who have had a foot cut off or an ear or their nose ! ’

And at this saying Makkhali was silenced.

14. Then thought Milinda the king within himself²: ‘ All India is an empty thing, it is verily like chaff ! There is no one, either recluse or Brahman, capable of discussing things with me, and dispelling my doubts.’ And he said to his ministers: ‘ Beautiful is the night and pleasant ! Who is the recluse or Brahman we can visit to-night to question him, who will be able to converse with us and dispel our doubts³ ? ’ And at that saying the counsellors remained silent, and stood there gazing upon the face of the king.

15. Now at that time the city of Sâgala had for twelve years been devoid of learned men, whether Brahmans, Samanas, or laymen. But wherever the king heard that such persons dwelt, thither he would go and put his questions to them¹. [6] But they all alike, being unable to satisfy the king by their solution of his problems, departed hither and thither, or if they did not leave for some other place, were at all events reduced to silence. And the brethren of the Order went, for the most part, to the Himālaya mountains.

¹ This is quite in accord with the opinions attributed to Makkhali Gosâla in the Sâmañña-phala (D. 2, 20), and in the Sumaṅgala Vilâsini on it (see especially p. 166).

² See below, p. 30.

³ This is an echo of the words in the corresponding passage of the Sâmañña-phala Sutta (D. 2, 1).

16. Now at that time there dwelt, in the mountain region of the Himālayas, on the Guarded Slope, an innumerable company of Arahats (brethren who, while yet alive, had attained Nirvāṇa). And the venerable Assagutta, by means of his divine power of hearing, heard those words of king Milinda. And he convened an assembly of the Order on the summit of the Yugandhara mountain, and asked the brethren: 'Is there any member of the Order able to hold converse with Milinda the king, and resolve his doubts?'

Then were they all silent. And a second and a third time he put the same question to them, and still none of all the number spake. Then he said to the assembled Order: 'There is, reverend Sirs, in the heaven of the Thirty-three², and east of the Vegayanta palace, a mansion called Ketumatt, wherein dwells the god Mahāsenā. He is able to hold converse with Milinda the king, and to resolve his doubts.' And the innumerable company of ¹ This paragraph is so unnecessary after what has been said in the preceding episode, and at the same time so contradictory to the fact of two teachers at least living in or near the city, that it would really seem probable that it (or perhaps § 14) came originally directly after § 10, the rest being an interpolation, and a clumsy one.

² These are the principal gods of the Vedic pantheon.

Arahats vanished from the summit of the Yugandhara mountain, and appeared in the heaven of the Thirty-three.

17. And Sakka, the king of the gods, beheld those brethren of the Order as they were coming from afar. And at the sight of them he went up to the venerable Assagutta, and bowed down before him, and stood reverently aside. And so standing he said to him : 'Great, reverend Sir, is the company of the brethren that has come. What is it that they want? I am at the service of the Order. What can I do for you?'

And the venerable Assagutta replied : 'There is, O king, in India, in the city of Sāgala, a king named Milinda. As a disputant he is hard to equal, harder still to overcome, he is the acknowledged superior of all the founders of the various schools of thought. He is in the habit of visiting the members of the Order and harassing them by questions of speculative import.'

Then said Sakka, the king of the gods, to him : 'That same king Milinda, venerable one, left this condition to be born as a man. And there dwells in the mansion Ketumatī a god, Mahāsena by name, who is able to hold converse with him and to resolve his doubts. [7] That god we will beseech to suffer himself to be reborn into the world of men.'

18. So Sakka, the king of the gods, preceded by the Order, entered the Ketumatī mansion; and when he had embraced Mahāsena the god, he said to him : 'The Order of the brethren, Lord, makes this request of you—to be reborn into the world of men.'

'I have no desire, Sir, for the world of men, so overladen with action (Karma). Hard is life as a man. It is here, Sir, in the world of the gods that, being reborn in ever higher and higher spheres, I hope to pass away!’

And a second and a third time did Sakka, the king of the gods, make the same request, and the reply was still the same. Then the venerable Assagutta addressed Mahâsena the god, and said: ‘On passing in review, Lord, the worlds of gods and men, there is none but thee that we find able to succour the faith by refuting the heretical views of Milinda the king. The whole Order beseeches thee, Lord, saying: “Condescend, O worthy one, to be reborn among men, in order to lend to the religion of the Blessed One thy powerful aid.”’

Then was Mahâsena the god overjoyed and delighted in heart at the thought that he would be able to help the faith by refuting the heresy of Milinda; and he gave them his word, and said: ‘Very well then, venerable ones, I consent to be reborn in the world of men.’

19. Then the brethren, having thus accomplished the task they had taken in hand, vanished from the heaven of the Thirty-three, and reappeared on the Guarded Slope in the Himâlâya mountains. And the venerable Assagutta addressed the Order, and said: ‘Is there, venerable ones, any brother belonging to this company of the Order, who has not appeared in the assembly?’

Thereupon a certain brother said there was, that Rohana had a week previously gone into the mountains, and become buried in meditation, [8] and suggested that a messenger should be sent to him. And at that very moment the venerable Rohana aroused himself from his meditation, and was aware that the Order was expecting him¹. And vanishing from the mountain top, he appeared in the presence of the innumerable company of the brethren.

And the venerable Assagutta said to him : ' How now, venerable Rohana ! When the religion of the Buddha is in danger of crumbling away, have you no eyes for the work of the Order ?'

' It was through inadvertence, Sir,' said he.

' Then, venerable Rohana, atone for it.'

' What, Sir, should I do ?'

' There is a Brahman village, venerable Rohana, called Kagangala², at the foot of the Himālaya mountains, and there dwells there a Brahman called Soṇuttara. He will have a son called Nāgasena. Go to that house for alms during seven years and ten months. After the lapse of that time thou shalt draw away the boy from a worldly life, and cause him to enter the Order. When he shall have abandoned the world, then shalt thou be free of the atonement for thy fault.'

' Let it be even as thou sayest,' said the venerable Rohana in assent.

20. Now Mahāsenā the god passed away from the world of the gods, and was reborn in the womb of the wife of the Brahman Soṇuttara. And at the moment of his conception three strange, wonderful things took place :—arms and weapons became all ablaze, the tender grain became ripe in a moment, and there was a great rain (in the time of drought). And the venerable Rohana went to that house for alms for seven years and ten months from the day of Mahâsena's re-incarnation, but never once did he receive so much as a spoonful of boiled rice, or a ladleful of sour gruel, or a greeting, or a stretching forth of the joined hands, or any sort of salutation. Nay rather it was insults and taunts that fell to his share: and there was no one who so much as said, 'Be so good, Sir, as to go on to the next house¹.'

¹ Paṭimāneti. Childers does not give this meaning to the word. But it is the usual one. Compare Sumaṅgala, vol. i, pp. 276, 280; Vinaya Piṭaka IV, 212; Kullavagga VI, 13, 2; Gāṭaka II, 423.

² This is a famous place in Buddhist story. It is at the extreme limit, to the East, of the Buddhist Holy Land, the ' Middle Country.' See Sumaṅgala Vilāsinī on D. 2, 40 (p. 173); Mahāvagga V, 13, 12; Gāṭaka I, 49.

But when all that period had gone by he one day happened to have those very words addressed to him. And on that day the Brahman, on his way back from his work in the fields, [9] saw the Elder as he met him on his return, and said: 'Well, hermit, have you been to our place?'

'Yes, Brahman, I have.'

'But did you get anything there?'

'Yes, Brahman, I did.'

And he was displeased at this, and went on home, and asked them: 'Did you give anything to that hermit?'

'We gave him nothing,' was the reply.

21. Thereupon the Brahman, the next day, seated himself right in the doorway, thinking to himself: 'To-day I'll put that hermit to shame for having told a lie.' And the moment that the Elder in due course came up to the house again, he said: 'Yesterday you said you had got something at my house, having all the while got nothing! Is lying allowed to you fellows?’

¹ This is the ordinary polite formula used by an Indian peasant when he wishes to express his inability (or his disinclination) to give food to a mendicant friar.

And the Elder replied: ‘Brahman, for seven years and ten months no one even went so far as to suggest politely that I should pass on. Yesterday this courtesy was extended to me. It was to that that I referred.’

The Brahman thought to himself: ‘If these men, at the mere experience of a little courtesy, acknowledge in a public place, and with thanks, that they have received an alms, what will they not do if they really receive a gift!’ And he was much struck by this, and had an alms bestowed upon the Elder from the rice and curry prepared for his own use, and added furthermore: ‘Every day you shall receive here food of the same kind.’ And having watched the Elder as he visited the place from that day onwards, and noticed how subdued was his demeanour, he became more and more pleased with him, and invited him to take there regularly his midday meal. And the Elder gave, by silence, his consent; and daily from that time forth, when he had finished his meal, and was about to depart, he would pronounce some short passage or other from the words of the Buddha¹.

22. Now the Brahman’s wife had, after her ten months, brought forth her son; and they called his name Nāgasena. He grew up in due course till he became seven years old, and his father said to the child: ‘Do you want, [10] dear Nāgasena, to study the learning traditional in this Brahmanical house of ours?’

¹ This custom is a rule with the mendicant friars. It is their way of ‘returning thanks,’ as we should say. See below, p. 25.

‘What is it called, father?’ said he.

‘The three Vedas are called learning (Sikkhâ), other kinds of knowledge are only arts, my dear.’

‘Yes, I should like to learn them, father,’ said the boy.

Then Sonuttara the Brahman gave to a Brahman teacher a thousand pieces as his teaching fee, and had a divan spread for him aside in an inner chamber, and said to him: ‘Do thou, Brahman, teach this boy the sacred hymns by heart.’

So the teacher made the boy repeat the hymns, urging him to get them by heart. And young Nâgasena, after one repetition of them, had learnt the three Vedas by heart, could intone them correctly, had understood their meaning, could fix the right place of each particular verse¹, and had grasped the mysteries they contained². All at once there arose in him an intuitive insight into the Vedas, with a knowledge of their lexicography, of their prosody, of their grammar, and of the legends attaching to the characters in them. He became a philologist and grammarian, and skilled alike in casuistry and in the knowledge of the bodily marks that foreshadow the greatness of a man³.

23. Then young Nâgasena said to his father: ‘Is there anything more to be learned in this Brahmanical family of ours, or is this all ?'

¹ Suvava//hâpitâ, or perhaps its use in ceremonies or sacrifices. The phrase only occurs in this passage. It is literally, ‘The three Vedas were well fixed by the boy.’ Hinañ-kumburê simply repeats the word.

² On the exact force of the special terms translated in these clauses, one may further compare the corresponding phrases used of learning the Buddhist texts in Kullavagga IV, 14, 17; IX, 5, 1.

³ The above are the stock phrases for the learning of a scholarly Brahman, and one or two points in the details are uncertain.

'There is no more, Nâgasena, my dear. This is all,' was the reply.

And young Nâgasena repeated his lesson to his teacher for the last time, and went out of the house, and in obedience to an impulse arising in his heart as the result of previous Karma, sought a place of solitude, where he gave himself up to meditation. And he reviewed what he had learnt throughout from beginning to end, and found no value in it anywhere at all. And he exclaimed in bitterness of soul : 'Empty forsooth are these Vedas, and as chaff. There is in them neither reality, nor worth, nor essential truth !'

That moment the venerable Rohana, seated at his hermitage at Vattaniya, felt in his mind what was passing in the heart of Nâgasena. And he robed himself, and taking his alms-bowl in his hand, he vanished from Vattaniya and appeared near the Brahman village Kagaṅgala. And young Nâgasena, as he stood again in the doorway, saw him coming in the distance. At the sight of him he became happy and glad, and a sweet hope sprang up in his heart that from him he might learn the essential truth. And he went [11] to him, and said : 'Who art thou, Sir, that thou art thus bald-headed, and wearest yellow robes ?'

'They call me a recluse, my child' (Pabbagita : literally, 'one who has abandoned ;' that is, the worldly life).

'And why do they call thee "one who has abandoned ?"'

'Because a recluse is one who has receded from the world in order to make the stain of sinful things recede. It is for that reason, my child, that they call me a recluse.'

'Why, Sir, dost thou not wear hair as others do?'

'A recluse shaves off his hair and beard on the recognition of the sixteen impediments therein to the higher life. And what are those sixteen¹? The impediments of ornamenting it, and decking it out, of putting oil upon it, of shampooing it, of placing garlands round it, of using scents and unguents, and myrobalan seeds, and dyes, and ribbons, and combs, of calling in the barber, of unravelling curls, and of the possibility of vermin. When their hair falls off they are grieved and harassed; yea, they lament sometimes, and cry, and beat their breasts, or fall headlong in a swoon—and entangled by these and such impediments men may forget those parts of wisdom or learning which are delicate and subtle.'

'And why, Sir, are not thy garments, too, as those of other men?'

'Beautiful clothes, my boy, such as are worn by worldly men, are inseparable from the five cravings². But whatsoever dangers lurk in dress he who wears the yellow robes knows nothing of. It is for that reason that my dress is not as other men's.'

'Dost thou know, Lord, what is real knowledge?'

'Yes, lad, the real knowledge I know; and what is the best hymn (mantra) in the world, that too I know.'

'Couldst thou teach it, Lord, to me too?'

¹ This odd idea of the 'impediments' in the wearing of hair and beard is in accord both with modern habits of shaving, and also with a good deal of early Christian and mediæval ethics.

² The lust of the eye, of the ear, &c.

‘Yes, I could.’

‘Teach me, then.’

‘Just now is not the right time for that; we have come down to the village for alms.’

24. Then young Nâgasena took the alms-bowl the venerable Rohana was carrying, and led him into the house, and with his own hand supplied him with food, hard and soft, as much as he required. And when he saw that he had finished his meal, and withdrawn his hand from the bowl, he said to him: ‘Now, Sir, will you teach me that hymn?’

‘When thou hast become free from impediments, my lad, by taking upon thee, and with thy parents’ consent, the hermit’s dress I wear, then I can teach it thee.’

25. So young [12] Nâgasena went to his father and mother, and said: ‘This recluse says he knows the best hymn in the world, but that he cannot teach it to any one who has not entered the Order as his pupil. I should like to enter the Order and learn that hymn.’

And his parents gave their consent; for they wished him to learn the hymn, even at the cost of retiring from the world; and they thought that when he had learned it he would come back again¹.

Then the venerable Rohana took Nâgasena to the Vattaniya hermitage, to the Vigamba Vatthu, and having spent the night there, took him on to the Guarded Slope, and there, in the midst of the innumerable company of the Arahats, young Nâgasena was admitted, as a novice, into the Order.

¹ Under the rules of the Buddhist Order any one can leave it as soon as he likes.

26. And then, when he had been admitted to the Order, the venerable Nāgasena said to the venerable Rohana: 'I have adopted your dress; now teach me that hymn.'

Then the venerable Rohana thought thus to himself: 'In what ought I first to instruct him, in the Discourses (Suttanta) or in the deeper things of the faith (Abhidhamma)?' and inasmuch as he saw that Nāgasena was intelligent, and could master the Abhidhamma with ease, he gave him his first lesson in that.

And the venerable Nāgasena, after hearing it repeated but once, knew by heart the whole of the Abhidhamma—that is to say, the Dhamma Saṅgani, with its great divisions into good, bad, and indifferent qualities, and its subdivisions into couples and triplets¹—the Vibhaṅga, with its eighteen chapters, beginning with the book on the constituent elements of beings—the Dhātu Kathā, with its fourteen books, beginning with that on compensation and non-compensation—the Puggala Paññatti, with its six divisions into discrimination of the various constituent elements, discrimination of the various senses and of the properties they apprehend, and so on²—the Kathā Vatthu, with its thousand sections, five hundred on as many points of our own views, and five hundred on as many points of our opponents' views—the Yamaka, with its ten divisions into complementary propositions as to origins, as to constituent elements, and so on—and the Paṭṭhāna, with its twenty-four chapters on the reason of causes, the reason of ideas, and the rest. And he said [13]: 'That will do, Sir. You need not propound it again. That will suffice for my being able to rehearse it.'

¹ Compare, for instance, p. 125 of the edition of this summary of Buddhist ethical psychology, edited for the Pāli Text Society, by Dr. Edward Müller, of Bern (London, 1885).

² The six kinds of discrimination (Paññatti) referred to, are those set out in § 1 of the Puggala. The work itself is an ethical tractate dealing only with the last of the six (the discrimination of individuals). See the edition by Dr. Morris, published by the Pāli Text Society (London, 1883).

27. Then Nāgasena went to the innumerable company of the Arahats, and said: 'I should like to propound the whole of the Abhidhamma Piṭaka, without abridgement, arranging it under the three heads of good, bad, and indifferent qualities.' And they gave him leave. And in seven months the venerable Nāgasena recited the seven books of the Abhidhamma in full. And the earth thundered, the gods shouted their applause, the Brahma gods clapped their hands, and there came down a shower from heaven of sweet-scented sandal-wood dust, and of Mandārava flowers! And the innumerable company of the Arahats, then and there at the Guarded Slope, admitted the venerable Nāgasena, then twenty years of age, to full membership in the higher grade of the Order.

28. Now the next day after he had thus been admitted into full membership in the Order, the venerable Nāgasena robed himself at dawn, and taking his bowl, accompanied his teacher on his round for alms to the village below. And as he went this thought arose within him: 'It was, after all, empty-headed and foolish of my teacher to leave the rest of the Buddha's word aside, and teach me the Abhidhamma first!'

And the venerable Rohana became aware in his own mind of what was passing in the mind of Nâgasena, and he said to him: 'That is an unworthy reflection that thou art making, Nâgasena; it is not worthy of thee so to think.'

'How strange and wonderful,' thought Nâgasena, 'that my teacher should be able to tell in his own mind what I am thinking of! I must ask his pardon.' And he said: 'Forgive me, Sir; I will never make such a reflection again.'

[14] 'I cannot forgive you, Nâgasena, simply on that promise,' was the reply. 'But there is a city called Sâgala, where a king rules whose name is Milinda, and he harasses the brethren by putting puzzles to them of heretical tendency. You will have earned your pardon, Nâgasena, when you shall have gone there, and overcome that king in argument, and brought him to take delight in the truth.'

'Not only let king Milinda, holy one, but let all the kings of India come and propound questions to me, and I will break all those puzzles up and solve them, if only you will pardon me!' exclaimed Nâgasena. But when he found it was of no avail, he said: 'Where, Sir, do you advise me to spend the three months of the rains now coming on¹?'

29. 'There is a brother named Assagutta dwelling at the Vattaniya hermitage. Go, Nâgasena, to him; and in my name bow down to his feet, and say: "My teacher, holy one, salutes you reverently, and asks whether you are in health and ease, in full vigour and comfort. He has sent me here to pass the three months of the rains under your charge." When he asks you your teacher's name, tell it him. But when he asks you his own name, say: "My teacher, Sir, knows your name."

¹ It would be against the rules to go at once, during the rains, to Sâgala. So he would spend that time in preparation.

And Nâgasena bowed down before the venerable Rohana, and passing him on his right hand as he left him, took his bowl and robe, and went on from place to place till he came to the Vattaniya hermitage, begging for his food on the way. And on his arrival he saluted the venerable Assagutta, and said exactly what he had been told to say, [15] and to the last reply Assagutta said: 'Very well then, Nâgasena, put by your bowl and robe.' And the next day Nâgasena swept out the teacher's cell, and put the drinking water and tooth-cleansers ready for him to use. The Elder swept out the cell again, threw away the water and the tooth-cleansers, and fetched others, and said not a word of any kind. So it went on for seven days. On the seventh the Elder again asked him the same questions as before. And on Nâgasena again making the same replies, he gave him leave to pass the rainy season there.

30. Now a certain woman, a distinguished follower of the faith, had for thirty years and more administered to the wants of the venerable Assagutta. And at the end of that rainy season she came one day to him, and asked whether there was any other brother staying with him. And when she was told that there was one, named Nâgasena, she invited the Elder, and Nâgasena with him, to take their midday meal the next day at her house. And the Elder signified, by silence, his consent. The next forenoon the Elder robed himself, and taking his bowl in his hand, went down, accompanied by Nâgasena as his attendant, to the dwelling-place of that disciple, and there they sat down on the seats prepared for them. And she gave to both of them food, hard and soft, as much as they required, waiting upon them with her own hands. When Assagutta had finished his meal, and the hand was withdrawn from the bowl, he said to Nāgasena: 'Do thou, Nāgasena, give the thanks to this distinguished lady.' And, so saying, he rose from his seat, and went away. [16]

31. And the lady said to Nāgasena: 'I am old, friend Nāgasena. Let the thanksgiving be from the deeper things of the faith.'

And Nāgasena, in pronouncing the thanksgiving discourse¹, dwelt on the profounder side of the Abhidhamma, not on matters of mere ordinary morality, but on those relating to Arahatsip². And as the lady sat there listening, there arose in her heart the Insight into the Truth³, clear and stainless, which perceives that whatsoever has beginning, that has the inherent quality of passing away. And Nāgasena also, when he had concluded that thanksgiving discourse, felt the force of the truths he himself had preached, and he too arrived at insight⁴—he too

¹ See the note above, p. 15.

² Suññatā, used here in the sense of Nirvāṇa. Compare Āṅguttara II, 5, 6; Gāṭaka III, 191; Kullavagga XII, 2, 5.

³ Dhamma-kakkhu. This perception of the impermanency of all things and all beings is called 'the Eye for the Truth,' and is the sign of the entrance upon the path to Arahatsip, i. e. Nirvāṇa. It is the same among Buddhists as conversion is among the Christians. Compare Acts xxvi, 18 ('Open their eyes, and turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God') and other similar passages.

⁴ Vipassanā. Childers says this is an attribute of Arahatsip; and Trenckner translates it 'superior intelligence.' But Arahats entered, as he sat there, upon the stream (that is to say, upon the first stage of the Excellent Way to Arahatsip).

32. Then the venerable Assagutta, as he was sitting in his arbour, was aware that they both had attained to insight, and he exclaimed: 'Well done! well done, Nāgasena! by one arrow shot you have hit two noble quarries!' And at the same time thousands of the gods shouted their approval.

Now the venerable Nāgasena arose and returned to Assagutta, and saluting him, took a seat reverently apart. And Assagutta said to him: 'Do thou now go, Nāgasena, to Pāṭaliputta. There, in the Asoka Park, dwells the venerable Dhamma-rakkhita. Under him you should learn the words of the Buddha.'

'How far is it, Sir, from here to Pāṭaliputta.'

'A hundred leagues¹, Nāgasena.'

'Great, Sir, is the distance. It will be difficult to get food on the way. How shall I get there?'

'Only go straight on, Nāgasena. You shall get food on the way, rice from which the black grains have been picked out, with curries and gravies of various sorts.'

'Very well, Sir!' said Nāgasena, and bowing only have it, because they have all the powers possessed by those in the previous stages of the path, and it is only superior as being above and beyond the intelligence of the worldly wise, or even of the mere moralist. It is less than the 'Divine Eye,' and Nāgasena was not yet an Arahāt. Compare the passages quoted by Childers under Dhamma-kakkhu and Dibba-kakkhu, and also Mahāvagga I, 6, 33; Gātaka I, 140; Sumaṅgala Vilāsinī, 237, 278.

¹ Yoganas: that is, leagues of seven miles each. See my 'Ancient Coins and Measures of Ceylon,' p. 16, in Thomas's 'Numismata Orientalia,' vol. i.

down before his teacher, and passing him on the right side as he went, he took his bowl and his robe and departed for Pâḷiputta.

33. [17] At that time a merchant of Pâḷiputta was on his way back to that city with five hundred waggons. And when he saw the venerable Nâgasena coming in the distance, he stopped the waggons, and saluted Nâgasena, and asked him: 'Whither art thou going, father?'

'To Pâḷiputta, householder.'

'That is well, father. We too are going thither. It will be more convenient for thee to go with us.'

And the merchant, pleased with Nâgasena's manners, provided him with food, hard and soft, as much as he required, waiting upon him with his own hands. And when the meal was over, he took a low seat, and sat down reverently apart. So seated, he said to the venerable Nâgasena: 'What, father, is your name?'

'I am called Nâgasena, householder.'

'Dost thou know, father, what are the words of Buddha?'

'I know the Abhidhamma.'

'We are most fortunate, father; this is indeed an advantage. I am a student of the Abhidhamma, and so art thou. Repeat to me, father, some passages from it.'

Then the venerable Nâgasena preached to him from the Abhidhamma, and by degrees as he did so there arose in Nâgasena's heart the Insight into the Truth, clear and stainless, which perceives that whatsoever has in itself the necessity of beginning, that too has also the inherent quality of passing away.

34. And the Pâḷiputta merchant sent on his waggon in advance, and followed himself after them. And at a place where the road divided, not far from Pāṭaliputta, he stopped, and said to Nāgasena: 'This is the turning to the Asoka Park. Now I have here a rare piece of woollen stuff, sixteen cubits by eight. [18] Do me the favour of accepting it.' And Nāgasena did so. And the merchant, pleased and glad, with joyful heart, and full of content and happiness, saluted the venerable Nāgasena, and keeping him on his right hand as he passed round him, went on his way.

35. But Nāgasena went on to the Asoka Park to Dhamma-rakkhita. And after saluting him, and telling him on what errand he had come, he learnt by heart, from the mouth of the venerable Dhamma-rakkhita, the whole of the three baskets¹ of the Buddha's word in three months, and after a single recital, so far as the letter (that is, knowing the words by heart) was concerned. And in three months more he mastered the spirit (that is, the deeper meaning of the sense of the words).

But at the end of that time the venerable Dham-

¹ Piṭakas. This expression is not used in the sacred books of the canon itself. When it first came into use is unknown. This is the earliest passage in which it has hitherto been found in the technical sense of a division of the Scriptures. It was in full use at the time of Buddhaghosa (see the Sumaṅgala Vilāsinī, pp. 15, 16, 17, 18, &c., and the Samanta Pāsādikā, printed in Oldenberg's 'Vinaya Piṭaka,' vol. iii, p. 293). The tertium quid of the comparison is not the basket or the box as a receptacle for preservation, but as a means of handing on (as Eastern navvies removing earth put it into baskets and pass these latter on from hand to hand). So the expression 'three baskets' means not 'the three collections,' but 'the three bodies of oral tradition as handed down from teacher to teacher.' See Trenckner's decisive argument in his 'Pāli Miscellanies,' pp. 67-69.

ma-rakkhita addressed him, and said : ' Just, Nâgasena, as a herdsman tends the cows, but others enjoy their produce, so thou too carriest in thy head the whole three baskets of the Buddha's word, and still art not yet a partaker of the fruit of Samāṇaship.'

' Though that be so, holy one, say no more,' was the reply. And on that very day, at night, he attained to Arahatship and with it to the fourfold power of that Wisdom possessed by all Arahats (that is to say : the realisation of the sense, and the appreciation of the deep religious teaching contained in the word, the power of intuitive judgment, and the power of correct and ready exposition)¹. And at the moment of his penetrating the truth all the gods shouted their approval, and the earth thundered, and the Brahma gods clapped their hands, and there fell from heaven a shower of sweet-scented sandal dust and of Mandârava flowers.

36. Now at that time the innumerable company of the Arahats at the Guarded Slope in the Himâlaya mountains sent a message to him to come, for they were anxious to see him. And when he heard the message the venerable Nâgasena vanished from the Asoka Park and appeared before them. And they said : ' Nâgasena, that king Milinda is in the habit of harassing the brethren by knotty questions and by argumentations this way and that. Do thou, Nâgasena, go and [19] master him.'

' Not only let king Milinda, holy ones, but let all the kings of India, come and propound questions to me. I will break all those puzzles up and solve them. You may go fearlessly to Sâgala.'

¹ The four Paṭisambhidâs, which form the subject of one of the books of the Sutta Piṭaka.

Then all the Elders went to the city of Sâgala, lighting it up with their yellow robes like lamps, and bringing down upon it the breezes from the heights where the sages dwell¹.

²37. At that time the venerable Âyupâla was living at the Saṅkheyya hermitage. And king Milinda said to his counsellors: 'Beautiful is the night and pleasant! Who is the wandering teacher or Brahman we can visit to night to question him who will be able to converse with us and to resolve our doubts?'

And the five hundred Yonakas replied: 'There is the Elder, Lord, named Âyupâla, versed in the three baskets, and in all the traditional lore. He is living now at the Saṅkheyya hermitage. To him you might go, O king, and put your questions to him.'

'Very well, then. Let the venerable one be informed that we are coming.'

¹ Isi-vâtam parivâtam (nagaram) akamsu. The meaning of this phrase, which has not been found elsewhere, is doubtful. Trenckner renders 'making it respire the odour of saints.' The literal translation would be 'making it blown round about by Rîshi-wind.' Perhaps it may be meant to convey the idea of 'scented with the sweet breath of the wise.' But in any case the connotation is intended to be a pleasant one. Calling to mind the analogous phrase viganavâtam ârâmam, 'a hermitage with breezes from the desert.' (Mahâvagga I, 22, 17 = Kullavagga VI, 4, 8.) I venture to suggest the rendering adopted above. Hînaṣikumburê (p. 24) has Rîshiwarayaṅge gamanâgamanayem ganita wa kîvara wâtayem pratiwâtaya kalâhuya. 'They set its air in commotion produced by the waving of the robes of the coming and going Rîshis.'

² We here take up the original episode of Milinda as interrupted at § 15 (or if there is an interpolation at § 10).

Then the royal astrologer sent a message to Âyupâla to the effect that king Milinda desired to call upon him. And the venerable one said : ' Let him come.'

So Milinda the king, attended by the five hundred Yonakas, mounted his royal chariot and proceeded to the Saṅkheyya hermitage, to the place where Âyupâla dwelt, and exchanged with him the greetings and compliments of friendship and courtesy, and took his seat respectfully apart. And then he said to him :

38. ' Of what use, venerable Âyupâla, is the renunciation of the world carried out by the members of your Order, and in what do you place the sum-mum bonum ?'

' Our renunciation, O king,' replied the Elder, ' is for the sake of being able to live in righteousness, and in spiritual calm.'

' Is there, Sir, any layman who lives so ?'

' Yes, great king, there are such laymen. At the time when the Blessed One set rolling the royal chariot wheel of the kingdom of righteousness at Benares, at the Deer Park, [20] eighteen koṭis of the Brahma gods, and an innumerable company of other gods, attained to comprehension of the truth¹. And not one of those beings, all of whom were laymen, had renounced the world. And again when the Blessed One delivered the Mahâ Samaya discourse², and the discourse on the 'Greatest Blessing'³, and the Exposition of Quietism¹, and the Exhortation to Râhula², the multitude of gods who attained to comprehension of the truth cannot be numbered. And not one of those beings, all of whom were laymen, had renounced the world³.

¹ See my 'Buddhist Suttas,' pp. 153-155. There is nothing about the eighteen koṭis in the Piṭaka text referred to.

² No. 20 in the Dīgha Nikāya.

³ In the Mahâ Maṅgala, translated in my 'Buddhism,' pp. 125-127.

‘Then, most venerable Âyupâla, your renunciation is of no use. It must be in consequence of sins committed in some former birth, that the Buddhist Samanas renounce the world, and even subject themselves to the restraints of one or other of the thirteen aids to purity⁴! Those who remain on one seat till they have finished their repast were, forsooth, in some former birth, thieves who robbed other men of their food. It is in consequence of the Karma of having so deprived others of food that they have now only such food as they can get at one sitting; and are not allowed to eat from time to time as they want. It is no virtue on their part, no meritorious abstinence, no righteousness of life. And they who live in the open air were, forsooth, in

¹ Sama-kitta-pariyâya Suttanta. It is not certain which Sutta is here referred to. Trenckner identifies it with a short Sutta in the Aṅguttara (II, 4, 5). It is true that the ten short Suttas in A. II, 4 are (in the Burmese MSS. only) called collectively Sama-kitta Vagga. But the separate Suttas have no separate titles; the title of the Vagga is not found in the Sinhalese MSS., and is probably later than the text; and it is not, after all, identical with the title here given.

² There are several Suttas of this name in the Pâli Piṭakas. The one referred to here (and also, it may be added, in the Asoka Edicts) is probably the shorter one (Kûla Râhulovâda Sutta) found both in the Magghima (No. 147) and in the Samyutta (XXXIV, 120). See Trenckner's note on this passage.

³ This way of looking at gods as laymen, still ‘in the world,’ is thoroughly Buddhist.

⁴ The dhutaṅgas, enumerated by Childers sub voce.

some former birth, dacoits who plundered whole villages. It is in consequence of the Karma of having destroyed other people's homes, that they live now without a home, and are not allowed the use of huts. It is no virtue on their part, no meritorious abstinence, no righteousness of life. And those who never lie down, they, forsooth, in some former birth, were highwaymen who seized travellers, and bound them, and left them sitting there. It is in consequence of the Karma of that habit that they have become Nesaggikā in this life (men who always sit) and get no beds to lie on. It is no virtue on their part, no meritorious abstinence, no righteousness of life !'

39. And when he had thus spoken the venerable Āyupāla was silenced, and had not a word to say in reply. Then the five hundred Yonakas said to the king: 'The Elder, O king, is learned, but is also diffident. It is for that reason that he makes no rejoinder. But the king on seeing how silent Āyupāla had become, clapped his hands [21] and cried out: 'All India is an empty thing, it is verily like chaff! There is no one, either Samana or Brahman, capable of discussing things with me and dispelling my doubts ¹!'

As he looked, however, at the assembly and saw how fearless and self-possessed the Yonakas appeared, he thought within himself: 'For a certainty there must be, methinks, some other learned brother capable of disputing with me, or those Yonakas would not be thus confident.' And he said to them:

¹ See above, p. 10, § 14.

‘Is there, my good men, any other learned brother to discuss things with me and dispel my doubts?’

40. Now at that time the venerable Nāgasena, after making his alms-tour through the villages, towns, and cities, had in due course arrived at Sāgala, attended by a band of Samanas, as the leader of a company of the Order; the head of a body of disciples; the teacher of a school; famous and renowned, and highly esteemed by the people. And he was learned, clever, wise, sagacious, and able; a skilful expounder, of subdued manners, but full of courage; well versed in tradition, master of the three Baskets (Piṭakas), and erudite in Vedic lore¹. He was in possession of the highest (Buddhist) insight, a master of all that had been handed down in the schools, and of the various discriminations² by which the most abstruse points can be explained. He knew by heart the ninefold divisions of the doctrine of the Buddha to perfection³, and was equally skilled in discerning both the spirit and the letter of the Word. Endowed with instantaneous and varied power of repartee, and wealth of language, and beauty of eloquence, he was difficult to equal, and still more difficult to excel, difficult to answer, to repel, or to refute. He was imperturbable as the depths of the sea, immovable as the king of mountains; victorious in the struggle with evil, a dispeller of darkness and diffuser of light; mighty in eloquence, a confounder of the followers of other masters, and a crusher-out of the adherents of rival doctrines (malleus hereticorum). Honoured and revered by the brethren and sisters of the Order, and its lay adherents of either sex, and by kings and their high officials, he was in the abundant receipt of all the requisites of a member of the Order—robes and bowl and lodging, and whatever is needful for the sick—receiving the highest veneration no less than material gifts. To the wise and discerning who came to him with listening ear he displayed the ninefold jewel of the Conqueror's word, he pointed out to them the path of righteousness, bore aloft for them the torch of truth, set up for them the sacred pillar of the truth¹, and celebrated for their benefit the sacrifice of the truth. For them he waved the banner, raised the standard, blew the trumpet, and beat the drum of truth. And with his mighty lion's voice, [22] like Indra's thunder but sweet the while, he poured out upon them a plenteous shower, heavy with drops of mercy, and brilliant with the coruscations of the lightning flashes of his knowledge, of the nectar waters of the teaching of the Nirvâna of the truth—thus satisfying to the full a thirsty world.

¹ This is always explained as wise in the Buddhist Vedas, that is, the three Piṭakas.

² Paṭisambhidās: see above, the note on p. 29.

³ Pārami-ppatto. This is an unusual use of Pārami, but it occurs again below, p. 36, in a similar connection, and there can be no doubt of its meaning. Trenckner translates it ‘better than any one else.’

41. There then, at the Saṅkheyya hermitage, did the venerable Nâgasena, with a numerous company of the brethren, dwell². Therefore is it said :

¹ Dhamma-yûpam; with allusion to the sacred sacrificial post, which plays so great a part in Brahman ritual.

² Literally 'with eighty thousand:' but this merely means to say, with a large (undefined) number. See the use of the phrase in the Nâlapâna Gâtaka (Fausböll, No. 20).

‘ Learned, with varied eloquence, sagacious, bold,
 Master of views, in exposition sound,
 The brethren—wise themselves in holy writ,
 Repeaters of the fivefold sacred word—
 Put Nâgasena as their leader and their chief.
 Him, Nâgasena of clear mind and wisdom deep,
 Who knew which was the right Path, which the false,
 And had himself attained Nirvâṇa’s placid heights!

Attended by the wise, by holders to the Truth,
 He had gone from town to town, and come to Sâgala ;
 And now he dwelt there in Saṅkheyya’s grove,
 Appearing, among men, like the lion of the hills.’

42. And Devamantiya said to king Milinda :
 ‘ Wait a little, great king, wait a little ! There is an Elder named Nâgasena, learned, able, and wise, of subdued manners, yet full of courage, versed in the traditions, a master of language, and ready in reply, one who understands alike the spirit and the letter of the law, and can expound its difficulties and refute objections to perfection¹. He is staying at present at the Saṅkheyya hermitage. You should go, great king, and put your questions to him. He is able to discuss things with you, and dispel your doubts.’

Then when Milinda the king heard the name
 Nâgasena, thus suddenly introduced, he was seized with fear, and with anxiety, and the hairs of his body stood on end². But he asked Devamantiya :
 ‘ Is that really so ? ’

¹ See above, p. 34, note 3.

² The name itself, which means ‘ Chief of Nâga Snakes,’ is

And Devamantiya replied: 'He is capable, Sire, of discussing things with the guardians of the world—with Indra, Yama, Varuna, Kuvera, Pragâpati, Suyâma, [23] and Santushita—and even with the great Brahma himself, the progenitor of mankind, how much more then with a mere human being!'

'Do you then, Devamantiya,' said the king, 'send a messenger to say I am coming.'

And he did so. And Nâgasena sent word back that he might come. And the king, attended by the five hundred Yonakas, mounted his royal chariot, and proceeded with a great retinue to the Saṅkheyya hermitage, and to the place where Nâgasena dwelt.

43. At that time the venerable Nâgasena was seated with the innumerable company of the brethren of the Order, in the open hall in front of the hermitage¹. So king Milinda saw the assembly from afar, and he said to Devamantiya: 'Whose, Devamantiya, is this so mighty retinue?'

'These are they who follow the venerable Nâgasena,' was the reply.

Then at the sight there came over king Milinda terrible enough, especially as the Nâgas were looked upon as supernatural beings. But it is no doubt also intended that the king had heard of his fame.

¹ Mandala-mâla, that is a hall consisting only of a roof, supported by pillars which are connected by a dwarf wall two or three feet in height. The roof projects beyond the pillars, so that the space within is well shaded. It is a kind of open air drawing-room attached to most hermitages, and may be so small that it can be rightly rendered arbour (see above, p. 25), or sufficiently large to accommodate a considerable number. Usually of wood, sometimes of stone, it is always graceful in appearance and pleasant to use. It is mentioned in the corresponding passage of the Sâmañña Phala (D. II, 10).

a feeling of fear and of anxiety, and the hairs of his body stood on end¹. But nevertheless, though he felt like an elephant hemmed in by rhinoceroses, like a serpent surrounded by the Garuḍas (the snake-eating mythical birds), like a jackal surrounded by boa-constrictors, or a bear by buffaloes, like a frog pursued by a serpent, or a deer by a panther, like a snake in the hands of a snake charmer, or a rat played with by a cat, or a devil charmed by an exorcist, like the moon when it is seized by Râhu, like a snake caught in a basket, or a bird in a cage, or a fish in a net, like a man who has lost his way in a dense forest haunted by wild beasts, like a Yakkha (ogre) who has sinned against Vessavana (the king of ogres and fairies), or like a god whose term of life as a god has reached its end—though confused and terrified, anxious, and beside himself in an agony of fear like that—yet at the thought that he must at least avoid humiliation in the sight of the people, he took courage, and said to Dēvamantiya: ‘You need not [24] trouble to point out to me which is Nâgasena. I shall pick him out unaided.’

‘Certainly, Sire, recognise him yourself,’ said he².

44. Now Nâgasena was junior in seniority (reckoned from the date of his full membership in the

¹ This again, like the passage at p. 8, is an echo of the Sâmañña Phala. (See D. 2, 10 of our forthcoming edition, or p. 116 of Grimblot.)

² In the corresponding passage of the Sâmañña Phala Givaka points out the Buddha to Agâtasattu (§ 11, Grimblot, p. 117). This would be in the memory of all his readers, and our author alters the story in this case to show how superior Milinda was to the royal interlocutor in the older dialogue.

Order) to the half of that great company seated in front of him, and senior to the half seated behind him. And as he looked over the whole of the assembly, in front, and down the centre, and behind, king Milinda detected Nâgasena seated in the middle, and, like a shaggy lion who knows no fear or frenzy, entirely devoid of nervous agitation, and free from shyness and trepidation. And as soon as he saw him, he knew by his mien that that was Nâgasena, and he pointed him out to Devamantiya.

‘Yes, great king,’ said he, ‘that is Nâgasena. Well hast thou, Sire, recognised the sage.’

Whereupon the king rejoiced that he had recognised Nâgasena without having had him pointed out to him. But nevertheless, at the sight of him, the king was seized with nervous excitement and trepidation and fear. Therefore is it said :

‘At the sight of Nâgasena, wise and pure,
Subdued in all that is the best subjection,
Milinda uttered this foreboding word—
“Many the talkers I have visited,
Many the conversations I have had,
But never yet, till now, to-day, has fear,
So strange, so terrible, o’erpowered my heart.
Verily now defeat must be my lot,
And victory his, so troubled is my mind.”’

Here ends the introductory secular narrative
(Bâhira-kathâ)¹.

¹ See note on p. 1. This book closes in Hînaśi-kumburê’s Sinhalese version with the title ‘Pûrwa Yoga yayi;’ and is of course identical with the Pubba-yoga referred to above, p. 4, as the first division of the work.

BOOK II.

LAKKHANA PAÑHA.

THE DISTINGUISHING CHARACTERISTICS OF ETHICAL QUALITIES.

CHAPTER 1.

1. [25] Now Milinda the king went up to where the venerable Nāgasena was, and addressed him with the greetings and compliments of friendship and courtesy, and took his seat respectfully apart. And Nāgasena reciprocated his courtesy, so that the heart of the king was propitiated.

And Milinda began by asking, 'How is your Reverence known, and what, Sir, is your name?'

'I am known as Nāgasena, O king, and it is by that name that my brethren in the faith address me. But although parents, O king, give such a name as Nāgasena, or Sūrasena, or Vīrasena, or Sīhasena, yet this, Sire,—Nāgasena and so on—is only a generally understood term, a designation in common use. For there is no permanent individuality (no soul) involved in the matter².'

¹ There is a free translation of the Siṃhalese version of the following dialogues (down to the end of our § 4) in Spence Hardy's 'Manual of Buddhism,' pp. 424-429. But it is very unreliable as a reproduction of either the Siṃhalese or the Pāli, and slurs over the doubtful passages.

² Na puggalo upalabbhati. This thesis, that 'there is no individual,' is discussed at the opening of the Kathā Vatthu (leaf ka of my MS.) Put into modern philosophical phraseology it amounts to saying that there is no permanent subject underlying the temporary phenomena visible in a man's individuality. But

Then Milinda called upon the Yonakas and the brethren to witness: 'This Nâgasena says there is no permanent individuality (no soul) implied in his name. Is it now even possible to approve him in that?' And turning to Nâgasena, he said: 'If, most reverend Nâgasena, there be no permanent individuality (no soul) involved in the matter, who is it, pray, who gives to you members of the Order your robes and food and lodging and necessities for the sick? Who is it who enjoys such things when given? Who is it who lives a life of righteousness? Who is it who devotes himself to meditation? Who is it who attains to the goal of the Excellent Way, to the Nirvâna of Arahatsip? And who is it who destroys living creatures? who is it who takes what is not his own? who is it who lives an evil life of worldly lusts, who speaks lies, who drinks strong drink, who (in a word) commits any one of the five sins which work out their bitter fruit even in this life¹? If that be so there is neither merit nor demerit; there is neither doer nor causer of good or evil deeds²; there is neither fruit nor result of good or evil Karma³. [26]—If, most reverend Nâgasena, we are to think that were a man

I doubt whether, even in our author's time, the conception 'subject' was common ground, or that the word puggala had acquired that special connotation.

¹ Paññânantariya-kammam karoti. See my note on Kullavagga VII, 3, 9 ('Vinaya Texts,' vol. iii, p. 246, in the Sacred Books of the East).

² This is no doubt said in these words with allusion to the opinion ascribed in the Sâmañña Phala (D. II, 17) to Pûrana Kassapa.

³ This is the opinion ascribed in identical words in the Sâmañña Phala (D. II, 23) to Agita of the garment of hair.

to kill you there would be no murder ¹, then it follows that there are no real masters or teachers in your Order, and that your ordinations are void.—You tell me that your brethren in the Order are in the habit of addressing you as Nâgasena. Now what is that Nâgasena? Do you mean to say that the hair is Nâgasena?’

‘I don’t say that, great king.’

‘Or the hairs on the body, perhaps?’

‘Certainly not.’

‘Or is it the nails, the teeth, the skin, the flesh, the nerves, the bones, the marrow, the kidneys, the heart, the liver, the abdomen, the spleen, the lungs, the larger intestines, the lower intestines, the stomach, the fæces, the bile, the phlegm, the pus, the blood, the sweat, the fat, the tears, the serum, the saliva, the mucus, the oil that lubricates the joints, the urine, or the brain, or any or all of these, that is Nâgasena ²?’

And to each of these he answered no.

‘Is it the outward form then (Rûpa) that is Nâgasena, or the sensations (Vedanâ), or the ideas (Saññâ), or the confections (the constituent elements of character, Samkhârâ), or the consciousness (Viññâna), that is Nâgasena ³?’

And to each of these also he answered no.

¹ This is practically the same opinion as is ascribed in the Sâmañña Phala (D. II, 26) to Pakudha Kakkâyaṇa.

² This list of the thirty-two forms (âkâras) of organic matter in the human body occurs already in the Khuddaka Pâṭha, § 3. It is the standard list always used in similar connections; and is, no doubt, supposed to be exhaustive. There are sixteen (half as many) âkâras of the mind according to Dîpavaṃsa I, 42.

³ These are the five Skandhas, which include in them the whole bodily and mental constituents of any being. See p. 80.

‘Then is it all these Skandhas combined that are Nâgasena?’

‘No! great king.’

‘But is there anything outside the five Skandhas that is Nâgasena?’

And still he answered no.

‘Then thus, ask as I may, I can discover no Nâgasena. Nâgasena is a mere empty sound. Who then is the Nâgasena that we see before us? It is a falsehood that your reverence has spoken, an untruth!’

And the venerable Nâgasena said to Milinda the king: ‘You, Sire, have been brought up in great luxury, as befits your noble birth. If you were to walk this dry weather on the hot and sandy ground, trampling under foot the gritty, gravelly grains of the hard sand, your feet would hurt you. And as your body would be in pain, your mind would be disturbed, and you would experience a sense of bodily suffering. How then did you come, on foot, or in a chariot?’

‘I did not come, Sir, on foot [27]. I came in a carriage.’

‘Then if you came, Sire, in a carriage, explain to me what that is. Is it the pole that is the chariot?’

‘I did not say that.’

‘Is it the axle that is the chariot?’

‘Certainly not.’

‘Is it the wheels, or the framework, or the ropes, or the yoke, or the spokes of the wheels, or the goad, that are the chariot?’

And to all these he still answered no.

‘Then is it all these parts of it that are the chariot?’

‘No, Sir.’

‘But is there anything outside them that is the chariot?’

And still he answered no.

‘Then thus, ask as I may, I can discover no chariot. Chariot is a mere empty sound. What then is the chariot you say you came in? It is a falsehood that your Majesty has spoken, an untruth! There is no such thing as a chariot! You are king over all India, a mighty monarch. Of whom then are you afraid that you speak untruth? And he called upon the Yonakas and the brethren to witness, saying: ‘Milinda the king here has said that he came by carriage. But when asked in that case to explain what the carriage was, he is unable to establish what he averred. Is it, forsooth, possible to approve him in that?’

When he had thus spoken the five hundred Yonakas shouted their applause, and said to the king: ‘Now let your Majesty get out of that if you can?’

And Milinda the king replied to Nāgasena, and said: ‘I have spoken no untruth, reverend Sir. It is on account of its having all these things—the pole, and the axle, the wheels, and the framework, the ropes, the yoke, the spokes, and the goad—that it comes under the generally understood term, the designation in common use, of “chariot.”’

‘Very good! Your Majesty has rightly grasped the meaning of “chariot.” And just even so it is on account of all those things you questioned me about—[28] the thirty-two kinds of organic matter in a human body, and the five constituent elements of being—that I come under the generally understood term, the designation in common use, of “Nāgasena.”

For it was said, Sire, by our Sister Vagirâ in the presence of the Blessed One :

“Just as it is by the condition precedent of the co-existence of its various parts that the word ‘chariot’ is used, just so is it that when the Skandhas are there we talk of a ‘being¹.’”

‘Most wonderful, Nâgasena, and most strange. Well has the puzzle put to you, most difficult though it was, been solved. Were the Buddha himself here he would approve your answer. Well done, well done, Nâgasena!’

2. ‘How many years seniority have you, Nâgasena?’

‘Seven, your Majesty.’

‘But how can you say it is your “seven?” Is it you who are “seven,” or the number that is “seven?”’

Now that moment the figure of the king, decked in all the finery of his royal ornaments, cast its shadow on the ground, and was reflected in a vessel of water. And Nâgasena asked him: ‘Your figure, O king, is now shadowed upon the ground, and reflected in the water, how now, are you the king, or is the reflection the king?’

‘I am the king, Nâgasena, but the shadow comes into existence because of me.’

‘Just even so, O king, the number of the years is seven, I am not seven. But it is because of me, O king, that the number seven has come into existence; and it is mine in the same sense as the shadow is yours².’

¹ From the Samyutta Nikâya V, 10, 6.

² Hardy (p. 427, § 4 of the first edition) has quite missed the point of this crux.

‘Most wonderful again, and strange, Nāgasena. Well has the question put to you, most difficult though it was, been solved!’

3. The king said : ‘Reverend Sir, will you discuss with me again?’

‘If your Majesty will discuss as a scholar (pandit), well; but if you will discuss as a king, no.’

‘How is it then that scholars discuss?’

‘When scholars talk a matter over one with another then is there a winding up¹, an unravelling; one or other is convicted of error², and he then acknowledges his mistake; [29] distinctions are drawn, and contra-distinctions³; and yet thereby they are not angered. Thus do scholars, O king, discuss.’

‘And how do kings discuss?’

‘When a king, your Majesty, discusses a matter, and he advances a point, if any one differ from him on that point, he is apt to fine him, saying: “Inflict such and such a punishment upon that fellow!” Thus, your Majesty, do kings discuss⁴.’

‘Very well. It is as a scholar, not as a king, that I will discuss. Let your reverence talk unrestrainedly, as you would with a brother, or a novice, or a lay disciple, or even with a servant. Be not afraid!’

¹ Âveśhanam; not in Childers, but see Gâtaka II, 9; IV, 383, 384; and Morris in the ‘Journal of the Pâli Text Society,’ 1887.

² Niggâho kariyati, as for instance below, p. 142.

³ Paṭiviseso; not in Childers, but see again Gâtaka II, 9.

⁴ Hardy, loc. cit. § 5, puts all this into the mouths of ‘the priests.’

'Very good, your Majesty,' said Nâgasena, with thankfulness.

'Nâgasena, I have a question to ask you;' said the king.

'Pray ask it, Sire.'

'I have asked it, your Reverence.'

'That is answered already.'

'What have you answered?'

'To what, then, does your Majesty refer?'

But Milinda the king thought: 'This Bhikkhu is a great scholar. He is quite capable of discussing things with me. And I shall have a number of points on which to question him, and before I can ask them all, the sun will set. It would be better to carry on the discussion at home to-morrow.' And he said to Devamantiya: 'You may let his reverence know that the discussion with the king shall be resumed to-morrow at the palace.' And so saying, he took leave of Nâgasena, and mounted his horse, and went away, muttering as he went, 'Nâgasena, Nâgasena!'

And Devamantiya delivered his message to Nâgasena, who accepted the proposal with gladness. And early the next morning Devamantiya and Anantakâya and Mankura and Sabbadinna went to the king, and said: 'Is his reverence, Nâgasena, to come, [30] Sire, to-day?'

'Yes, he is to come.'

'With how many of the brethren is he to come?'

'With as many as he likes.'

And Sabbadinna said: 'Let him come with ten.' But the king repeated what he had said. And on Sabbadinna reiterating his suggestion, the king rejoined: 'All this preparation has been made, and I say:

"Let him come with as many as he likes," yet Sabbadinna says: "Let him come with ten." Does he suppose we are not capable of feeding so many? Then Sabbadinna was ashamed.

4. And Devamantiya and Anantakâya and Man-kura went to Nâgasena and told him what the king had said. And the venerable Nâgasena robed himself in the forenoon, and taking his bowl in his hand, went to Sâgala with the whole company of the brethren. And Anantakâya, as he walked beside Nâgasena, said:

'When, your reverence, I say, "Nâgasena," what is that Nâgasena?'

The Elder replied: 'What do you think Nâgasena is?'

'The soul, the inner breath which comes and goes, that I suppose to be Nâgasena.'

'But if that breath having gone forth should not return, or having returned should not go forth, would the man be alive?'

'Certainly [31] not, Sir.'

'But those trumpeters, when they blow their trumpets, does their breath return again to them?'

'No, Sir, it does not.'

'Or those pipers, when they blow their pipes or horns, does their breath return again to them?'

'No, Sir.'

'Then why don't they die?'

'I am not capable of arguing with such a reasoner. Pray tell me, Sir, how the matter stands.'

'There is no soul in the breath. These inhalations and exhalations are merely constituent powers of the bodily frame,' said the Elder. And he talked to him from the Abhidhamma ¹ to such effect that ¹ Anantakâya confessed himself as a supporter of the Order.

5. And the venerable Nâgasena went to the king, and sat down on the seat prepared for him. And the king provided Nâgasena and his following with food, both hard and soft, as much as they required : and presented each brother with a suit of garments, and Nâgasena himself with a set of three robes. And then he said to him : ' Be pleased to keep your seat here, and with you ten of the brethren. Let the rest depart.'

And when he saw that Nâgasena had finished his meal, he took a lower seat, and sat beside him, and said : ' What shall we discuss ?'

' We want to arrive at truth. Let our discussion be about the truth.'

And the king said : ' What is the object, Sir, of your ² renunciation, and what the summum bonum at which you aim ?'

' Why do you ask ? Our renunciation is to the end that this sorrow may perish away, and that no further sorrow may arise ; the complete passing away, without cleaving to the world, is our highest aim.'

' How now, Sir ! Is it for such high reasons that all members of it have joined the Order ?'

[32] ' Certainly not, Sire. Some for those reasons,

¹⁻¹ I venture to think it is incorrect to put a full stop, as Mr. Trenckner has done, after akâsi.

² Plural. ' You members of the Buddhist Order.' The question is further elaborated below, III, 1, 3, and above, I, 38.

but some have left the world in terror at the tyranny of kings. Some have joined us to be safe from being robbed, some harassed by debt, and some perhaps to gain a livelihood.'

'But for what object, Sir, did you yourself join.'

'I was received into the Order when I was a mere boy, I knew not then the ultimate aim. But I thought: "They are wise scholars, these Buddhist Samāṇas, they will be able to teach me." And by them I have been taught; and now do I both know and understand what is at once the reason for, and the advantage of renunciation.'

'Well put, Nāgasena!'

6. The king said: 'Nāgasena, is there any one who after death is not reindividualised?'

'Some are so, and some not.'

'Who are they?'

'A sinful being is reindividualised, a sinless one is not.'

'Will you be reindividualised?'

'If when I die, I die with craving for existence in my heart, yes; but if not, no¹.'

'Very good, Nāgasena!'

7. The king said: 'Nāgasena, he who escapes reindividualisation is it by reasoning that he escapes it?'

'Both by reasoning², your Majesty, and by wisdom³, and by other good qualities.'

'But are not reasoning and wisdom surely much the same?'

'Certainly not. Reasoning is one thing, wisdom

¹ Repeated below, with an illustration, Chap. 2, § 7, p. 76.

² Yoniso manasikāra. ³ Paññā. See pp. 59, 64, 128.

another. Sheep and goats, oxen and buffaloes, camels and asses have reasoning, but wisdom they have not.'

'Well put, Nāgasena!'

8. The king said: 'What is the characteristic mark of reasoning, and what of wisdom?'

'Reasoning has always comprehension as its mark; but wisdom has cutting off¹.'

'But how is comprehension the characteristic of reasoning, and cutting off of wisdom? Give me an illustration.'

'You remember the barley reapers?'

'Yes, certainly.' [33]

'How do they reap the barley?'

'With the left hand they grasp the barley into a bunch, and taking the sickle into the right hand, they cut it off with that.'

'Just even so, O king, does the recluse by his thinking grasp his mind, and by his wisdom cut off his failings. In this way is it that comprehension is the characteristic of reasoning, but cutting off of wisdom.'

'Well put, Nāgasena!'

9. The king said: 'When you said just now, "And by other good qualities," to which did you refer?'

¹ In the long list of the distinguishing characteristics of ethical qualities given by Buddhaghosa in the Sumaṅgala, p. 63, pagānana is the mark of paññindriya, aviggāya akampiyam of paññabala, and tad-uttariyam of paññā simply. He gives no 'mark' of yoniso manasikāra.

‘Good conduct, great king, and faith, and perseverance, and mindfulness, and meditation¹.

‘And what is the characteristic mark of good conduct?’

‘It has as its characteristic that it is the basis of all good qualities. The five moral powers²—faith, perseverance, mindfulness, meditation, and wisdom—; the seven conditions of Arahatsip³—self-possession, investigation of the Dhamma, perseverance, joy, calm, meditation, and equanimity—; the Path; readiness of memory (unbroken self-possession)⁴; the four kinds of right exertion⁵; the four constituent bases of extraordinary powers⁶; the four stages of ecstasy⁷; the eight forms of spiritual emancipation⁸; the four modes of self-concentration⁹; and the eight states of intense contemplation¹⁰ have each and all of them good conduct (the observance of outward morality) as their basis. And to him who builds upon that foundation, O king, all these good conditions will not decrease¹¹.’

‘Give me an illustration.’

‘Just, O king, as all those forms of animal and vegetable life which grow, develope, and mature, do so with the earth as their basis; just so does the recluse, who is devoted in effort, develope in himself the five moral powers, and so on, by means of virtue, on the basis of virtue.’

‘Give me a further illustration.’

¹ Sīlam, saddhâ, viriyam, sati, samâdhi.

² Indriya-balâni. ³ Bogghaṅgâ. ⁴ Satipaṭṭhâna.

⁵ Sammappadhâna. ⁶ Iddhipâda. ⁷ Ghâna.

⁸ Vimokhâ. ⁹ Samâdhi. ¹⁰ Samâpatti.

¹¹ The above-mentioned meritorious conditions are those the sum of which make Arahatsip.

‘Just, O king, as all the occupations which involve bodily exertion are carried on in ultimate dependence upon the earth, just so does the recluse develope in himself the five moral powers, and so on, by means of virtue, on the basis of virtue.’ [34]

‘Give me a still better illustration.’

‘Just, O king, as the architect of a city, when he wants to build one, first clears the site of the town, and then proceeds to get rid of all the stumps and thorny brakes, and thus makes it level, and only then does he lay out the streets and squares, and cross-roads and market places, and so build the city; just so does the recluse develope in himself the five moral powers, and so on, by means of virtue, on the basis of virtue.’

‘Can you give me one more simile?’

‘Just, O king, as an acrobat¹, when he wants to exhibit his skill, first digs over the ground, and proceeds to get rid of all the stones and fragments of broken pottery, and thus to make it smooth, and only then, on soft earth, shows his tricks; just even so does the recluse develope in himself the five moral powers, and so on, by means of virtue, on the basis of virtue. For it has been said, Sire, by the Blessed One :

“Virtue’s the base on which the man who’s wise
 Can train his heart, and make his wisdom grow.
 Thus shall the strenuous Bhikkhu, undeceived,
 Unravel all the tangled skein of life².”

¹ Laṅghako, not in Childers; but compare Gâtaka I, 431, and below, pp. 191, 331 of the text.

² This verse occurs twice in the Samyutta (I, 3, 3, and VII, 1, 6).

“This is the base—like the great earth to men—
And this the root of all increase in goodness,
The starting-point of all the Buddhas’ teaching, Virtue, to wit, on which true bliss depends¹.”

‘Well said, Nāgasena!’

10². The king said, ‘Venerable Nāgasena, what is the characteristic mark of faith?’

‘Tranquillisation, O king, and aspiration³.’

‘And how is tranquillisation the mark of faith?’

‘As faith, O king, springs up in the heart it breaks through the five hindrances—lust, malice, mental sloth, spiritual pride, and doubt—and the heart, free from these hindrances, [35] becomes clear, serene, untroubled.’

‘Give me an illustration.’

‘Just, O king, as a suzerain king, when on the march with his fourfold army, might cross over a small stream, and the water, disturbed by the elephants and cavalry, the chariots and the bowmen, might become fouled, turbid⁴, and muddy. And

¹ Vara-pâtimokkhiyo, a poetical expression found only in this passage, and of the exact connotation of which I am uncertain. It is not in Childers; and Hīnaśi-kumburê gives no assistance. The whole line may mean, ‘The scheme of a virtuous life as laid down in the most excellent Pâtimokkha.’ See the use of Samyutta-Nikāya-vare below, p. 36 of the text. On the whole section compare M. P. S. I, 12.

² This section is summarised in Hardy’s ‘Manual of Buddhism,’ pp. 411, 412 (1st edition).

³ Sampasâdana and sampakkhandana. Buddhaghosa, loc. cit., does not give faith in his list, but he gives the power of faith (saddhâ-bala), and as its ‘mark’ ‘that it cannot be shaken by incredulity.’

⁴ Luṭita, not in Childers; but compare Aṅguttara I, 55, and ‘Book of the Great Decease,’ IV, 26–32.

when he was on the other side the monarch might give command to his attendants, saying: "Bring some water, my good men. I would fain drink." Now suppose the monarch had a water-clearing gem¹, and those men, in obedience to the order, were to throw the jewel into the water; then at once all the mud would precipitate itself, and the sandy atoms of shell and bits of water-plants would disappear, and the water would become clear, transparent, and serene, and they would then bring some of it to the monarch to drink. The water is the heart; the royal servants are the recluse; the mud, the sandy atoms, and the bits of water-plants are evil dispositions; and the water-cleansing gem is faith.'

'And how is aspiration the mark of faith?'

'In as much as the recluse, on perceiving how the hearts of others have been set free, aspires to enter as it were by a leap upon the fruit of the first stage, or of the second, or of the third in the Excellent Way, or to gain Arahatsip itself, and thus applies himself to the attainment of what he has not reached, to the experience of what he has not yet felt, to the realisation of what he has not yet realised,—therefore is it that aspiration is the mark of faith.'

'Give me an illustration.'

'Just, O king, as if a mighty storm [36] were to break upon a mountain top and pour out rain, the water would flow down according to the levels, and after filling up the crevices and chasms and gullies of the hill, would empty itself into the brook below, so that the stream would rush along, overflowing both its banks. Now suppose a crowd of people, one after the other, were to come up, and being ignorant of the real breadth or depth of the water, were to stand fearful and hesitating on the brink. And suppose a certain man should arrive, who knowing exactly his own strength and power should gird himself firmly and, with a spring, land himself on the other side. Then the rest of the people, seeing him safe on the other side, would likewise cross. That is the kind of way in which the recluse, by faith¹, aspires to leap, as it were by a bound, into higher things. For this has been said, O king, by the Blessed One in the Samyutta Nikâya :

¹ Udakappasâdako mañi. Doubtless a magic gem is meant: with allusion particularly to the Wondrous Gem (the Mañi-ratana) of the mythical King of Glory (see my 'Buddhist Suttas,' p. 256).

“By faith he crosses over the stream,
By earnestness the sea of life ;
By steadfastness all grief he stills,
By wisdom is he purified².”

‘Well put, Nâgasena !’

¹ In the Buddha, in the sufficiency of the Excellent Way he taught, and in the capacity of man to walk along it. It is spoken of slightly (compared with Arahatsip) in Mahâvagga V, 1, 21—in the Mahâparinibbâna Sutta VI, 9 (of Ânanda, who has faith, compared with the brethren, who have entered one or other of the stages of the Excellent Way)—and in Ânguttara III, 21 (in comparison with intuitive insight and intellectual perception). For this last comparison see further the Puggala Paññatti III, 3. From these passages a fair idea of the Buddhist view of faith could be formed. Although the Buddhist faith and the Christian faith are in things contradictory, the two conditions of heart are strikingly similar both in origin and in consequence.

² This verse is not yet reached in the Pâli Text Society's edition of the Samyutta, but it is found also in the Sutta Nipâta-I, 10, 4.

II¹. The king said: 'What, Nâgasena, is the characteristic mark of perseverance?'

'The rendering of support, O king, is the mark of perseverance². All those good qualities which it supports do not fall away.'

'Give me an illustration.'

'Just as a man, if a house were falling, would make a prop for it of another post, and the house so supported would not fall; just so, O king, is the rendering of support the mark of perseverance, and all those good qualities which it supports do not fall away.'

'Give me a further illustration.'

'Just as when a large army has broken up a small one, then the king of the latter would call to mind every possible ally and reinforce his small army³, and by that means the small army might in its turn break up the large one; just so, O king, is the rendering of support the mark of perseverance, and all those good qualities which it supports do not fall away [37]. For it has been said by the Blessed One: "The persevering hearer of the noble truth, O Bhikkhus, puts away evil and cultivates goodness, puts away that which is wrong and developes in himself that which is right, and thus does he keep himself pure."'

¹ This section is summarised by Hardy, loc. cit. p. 409.

² Buddhaghosa, loc. cit., says that paggaha (tension) is the mark of viriyindriya.

³ Aññamaññam anusâreyya anupeseyya. This is the way in which Hīnañ-kumburê understands this doubtful passage. Hardy has bungled the whole simile. Both the words are new, and I am not sure that the first does not after all come from the root sar, to follow.

‘Well put, Nāgasena !’

12. The king said : ‘What, Nāgasena, is the characteristic mark of mindfulness¹?’

‘Repetition, O king, and keeping up².’

‘And how is repetition the mark of mindfulness?’

‘As mindfulness, O king, springs up in his heart he repeats over the good and evil, right and wrong, slight and important, dark and light qualities, and those that resemble them, saying to himself : “These are the four modes of keeping oneself ready and mindful, these the four modes of spiritual effort, these the four bases of extraordinary powers, these the five organs of the moral sense, these the five mental powers, these the seven bases of Arahātship, these the eight divisions of the Excellent Way, this is serenity and this insight, this is wisdom and this emancipation³.” Thus does the recluse follow after those qualities that are desirable, and not after those that are not; thus does he cultivate those which ought to be practised, and not those which ought not. That is how repetition is the mark of mindfulness.'

¹ Sati, summarised in Hardy’s ‘Manual,’ p. 412.

² Api/āpāna and upagāṇhana, both new words. This definition is in keeping with the etymological meaning of the word sati, which is ‘memory.’ It is one of the most difficult words (in its secondary, ethical, and more usual meaning) in the whole Buddhist system of ethical psychology to translate. Hardy renders ‘conscience,’ which is certainly wrong; and Gogerly (see my ‘Buddhist Suttas,’ p. 144) has ‘meditation,’ which is equally wide of the mark. I have sometimes rendered it ‘self-possession.’ It means that activity of mind, constant presence of mind, wakefulness of heart, which is the foe of carelessness, inadvertence, self-forgetfulness. And it is a very constant theme of the Buddhist moralist. Buddhaghosa, loc. cit., makes upa/ḥhāna, ‘readiness,’ its mark.

³ These are the various moral qualities and mental habits which together make up Arahātship, and may be said also to make up Buddhism (as the Buddha taught it). It was on these that he laid special stress, in his last address to the members of the Order, just before his death (‘Book of the Great Decease,’ III, 65, in my ‘Buddhist Suttas,’ pp. 60–63); and the details of them will be found in the note to that passage.

'Give me an illustration.'

'It is like the treasurer of the imperial sovran¹, who reminds his royal master early and late of his glory, saying: "So many are thy war elephants, O king, and so many thy cavalry², thy war chariots and thy bowmen, so much the quantity of thy money, and gold, and wealth, may your Majesty keep yourself in mind thereof.'

'And how, Sir, is keeping up a mark of mindfulness?'

'As mindfulness springs up in his heart, O king, he searches out the categories of good qualities and their opposites, saying to himself: "Such and such qualities are good, and such bad; [38] such and such qualities helpful, and such the reverse." Thus does the recluse make what is evil in himself to disappear, and keeps up what is good. That is how keeping up is the mark of mindfulness.'

'Give me an illustration.'

'It is like the confidential adviser of that imperial

¹ Kakkavattissa bhandâgâriko, no doubt with allusion to the gahapati-ratanam, one of the seven treasures of the mythical King of Glory (see my 'Buddhist Suttas,' p. 257). It is particularly interesting to me to find here the use of the word 'treasurer' instead of 'householder;' for it was in that exact sense that I had understood the word gahapati in that connection, at a time when, in the then state of Pâli scholarship, it seemed very bold to do so.

² Literally 'horses.' The whole list is again a manifest allusion to the corresponding one in the Sutta of the Great King of Glory.

sovrán¹ who instructs him in good and evil, saying: "These things are bad for the king and these good, these helpful and these the reverse." And thus the king makes the evil in himself die out, and keeps up the good.'

'Well put, Nâgasena!'

13². The king said: 'What, Nâgasena, is the characteristic mark of meditation³?'

'Being the leader, O king. All good qualities have meditation as their chief, they incline to it, lead up towards it, are as so many slopes up the side of the mountain of meditation.'

'Give me an illustration.'

'As all the rafters of the roof of a house, O king, go up to the apex, slope towards it, are joined on together at it, and the apex is acknowledged to be the top of all; so is the habit of meditation in its relation to other good qualities.'

'Give me a further illustration.'

'It is like a king, your Majesty, when he goes down to battle with his army in its fourfold array. The whole army—elephants, cavalry, war chariots, and bowmen—would have him as their chief, their lines would incline towards him, lead up to him, they would be so many mountain slopes, one above another, with him as their summit, round him they would all be ranged. [39] And it has been said, O king, by the Blessed One : " Cultivate in yourself, O Bhikkhus, the habit of meditation. He who is established therein knows things as they really are¹."

¹ Pariñâyaka, the seventh treasure of the King of Glory. (Compare the 'Buddhist Suttas,' p. 259.) It will be seen that our author is in substantial agreement with the older tradition, and does not, like the Lalita Vistara, understand under this officer a general.

² Omitted by Hardy.

³ Samâdhi. Buddhaghosa, loc. cit. p. 65, gives also 'being the chief' as its mark, but he previously (p. 64) gives avikkhepa, 'serenity,' as the mark of sammâ-samâdhi, and also (p. 63) of samâdhindriya, while 'being unshaken by spiritual pride' is his mark (p. 63) of Samâdhi-bala.

' Well put, Nâgasena !'

14. The king said : ' What, Nâgasena, is the characteristic mark of wisdom² ?'

' I have already told you, O king, how cutting off, severance, is its mark³, but enlightenment is also its mark.'

' And how is enlightenment its mark ?'

' When wisdom springs up in the heart, O king, it dispels the darkness of ignorance, it causes the radiance of knowledge to arise, it makes the light of intelligence to shine forth⁴, and it makes the Noble Truths plain. Thus does the recluse who is devoted to effort perceive with the clearest wisdom the impermanency (of all beings and things), the suffering (that is inherent in individuality), and the absence of any soul.'

' Give me an illustration.'

' It is like a lamp, O king, which a man might introduce into a house in darkness. When the lamp had been brought in it would dispel the darkness,

¹ Samyutta Nikâya XXI, 5.

² Paññâ. Hardy in the 'Manual of Buddhism,' pp. 414, 415, gives a jumble of this passage and several others.

³ See above, p. 51.

⁴ Vidamseti, not in Childers ; but compare Theri Gâthâ, 74 ; Ânguttara III, 103 ; and Gâtaka III, 222.

cause radiance to arise, and light to shine forth, and make the objects there plainly visible. Just so would wisdom in a man have such effects as were just now set forth.'

'Well put, Nâgasena!'

15. The king said: 'These qualities which are so different¹, Nâgasena, do they bring about one and the same result?'

'They do. The putting an end to evil dispositions.'

'How is that? Give me an illustration.'

'They are like the various parts of an army—elephants, cavalry, war chariots, and archers—who all work to one end, to wit: the conquest in battle of the opposing army.'

'Well put, Nâgasena!'

Here ends the First Chapter.

¹ That is, the five referred to above, p. 51, § 9.

BOOK II. CHAPTER 2.

1. [40] The king said : ' He who is born, Nāgasena, does he remain the same or become another ? '

' Neither the same nor another.'

' Give me an illustration.'

' Now what do you think, O king ? You were once a baby, a tender thing, and small in size, lying flat on your back. Was that the same as you who are now grown up ? '

' No. That child was one, I am another.'

' If you are not that child, it will follow that you have had neither mother nor father, no ! nor teacher. You cannot have been taught either learning, or behaviour, or wisdom. What, great king ! is the mother of the embryo in the first stage different from the mother of the embryo in the second stage, or the third, or the fourth ¹ ? Is the mother of the baby a different person from the mother of the grown-up man ? Is the person who goes to school one, and the same when he has finished his schooling another ? Is it one who commits a crime, another who is punished by having his hands or feet cut off ² ? '

' Certainly not. But what would you, Sir, say to that ? '

The Elder replied : ' I should say that I am the same person, now I am grown up, as I was when I was a tender tiny baby, flat on my back. For all these states are included in one by means of this body.'

' Give me an illustration.'

¹ On these four stages see Gâtaka IV, 496, and Samyutta X, 1, 3.

² Hardy makes sad nonsense of all this.

‘Suppose a man, O king, were to light a lamp, would it burn the night through?’

‘Yes, it might do so.’

‘Now, is it the same flame that burns in the first watch of the night, Sir, and in the second?’

‘No.’

‘Or the same that burns in the second watch and in the third?’

‘No.’

‘Then is there one lamp in the first watch, and another in the second, and another in the third?’

‘No. The light comes from the same lamp all the night through.’

‘Just so, O king, is the continuity of a person or thing maintained. One comes into being, another passes away; and the rebirth is, as it were, simultaneous. Thus neither as the same nor as another does a man go on to the last phase of his self-consciousness¹.’

‘Give me a further illustration.’

¹ Hardy (p. 429) renders this as follows: ‘In the same way, great king, one being is conceived, another is born, another dies; when comprehended by the mind, it is like a thing that has no before, and no after; no preceding, no succeeding existence. Thus the being who is born does not continue the same, nor does he become another; the last winyâna, or consciousness, is thus united with the rest.’ (I) He confesses himself in doubt as to the last few words, but is quite unconscious of having completely misinterpreted the whole paragraph.

The meaning is really quite plain in both the Pâli and the Sinhalese. A man, at any one moment, is precisely all that he is then conscious of. The phase of his self-consciousness, the totality of that of which he is conscious, is always changing; and is so different at death from what it was at birth that, in a certain sense, he is not the same at the one time as he was at the other. But there is a continuity in the whole series;—a continuity dependent

‘ It is like milk, [41] which when once taken from the cow, turns, after a lapse of time, first to curds, and then from curds to butter, and then from butter to ghee. Now would it be right to say that the milk was the same thing as the curds, or the butter, or the ghee?’

‘ Certainly not ; but they are produced out of it.’

‘ Just so, O king, is the continuity of a person or thing maintained. One comes into being, another passes away ; and the rebirth is, as it were, simultaneous. Thus neither as the same nor as another does a man go on to the last phase of his self-consciousness.’

‘ Well put, Nâgasena !’

2¹. The king said : ‘ Is a man, Nâgasena, who will not be reborn, aware of the fact ?’

‘ Yes, O king.’

‘ And how does he know it ?’

‘ By the cessation of all that is cause, proximate or remote ², of rebirth.’

‘ Give me an illustration.’

‘ Suppose a farmer, great king, had ploughed and sown and filled his granary ; and then for a period should neither plough nor sow, but live on the

on the whole body. And this fits the simile, in which the lamp is the body, and the flame the changing self-consciousness ; whereas it is impossible to make the simile fit the conclusion as rendered by Hardy.

On the phrase apubbam akariyam see Dr. Morris’s note at p. 101 of the Pâli Text Society’s Journal, 1887, and the passages he there quotes.

¹ Omitted in Hardy. The correlative question is discussed below, III, 5, 8, p. 112.

² That is to say, Tañhâ and Upâdâna.

stored-up grain, or dispose of it in barter, or deal with it as he had need. Would the farmer be aware, great king, that his granary was not getting filled ?'

'Yes, he ought to know it.'

'But how ?'

'He would know that the cause, proximate and remote, of the filling of the granary had ceased.'

'Just so with the man you spoke of. By the cessation of all that leads to rebirth, he would be conscious of having escaped his liability to it.'

'Well explained, Nâgasena !'

3¹. The king said: 'He who has intelligence, Nâgasena, has he also wisdom² ?'

'Yes, great king.' [42]

'What ; are they both the same ?'

'Yes.'

'Then would he, with his intelligence — which, you say, is the same as wisdom — be still in bewilderment or not ?'

'In regard to some things, yes ; in regard to others, no.'

'What would he be in bewilderment about ?'

'He would still be in bewilderment as to those parts of learning he had not learnt, as to those countries he had not seen, and as to those names or terms he had not heard.'

'And wherein would he not be in bewilderment ?'

'As regards that which has been accomplished by insight — (the perception, that is,) of the imper-

¹ Summarised in Hardy's 'Manual,' p. 414.

² Ñâna and paññâ.

manence of all beings, of the suffering inherent in individuality, and of the non-existence of any soul¹.

‘Then what would have become of his delusions on those points.’

‘When intelligence has once arisen, that moment delusion has died away.’

‘Give me an illustration.’

‘It is like the lamp, which when a man has brought into a darkened room, then the darkness would vanish away, and light would appear.’

‘And what, Nāgasena, on the other hand, has then become of his wisdom?’

‘When the reasoning wisdom has effected that which it has to do, then the reasoning ceases to go on. But that which has been acquired by means of it remains—the knowledge, to wit, of the impermanence of every being, of the suffering inherent in individuality, and of the absence of any soul.’

‘Give me an illustration, reverend Sir, of what you have last said.’

‘It is as when a man wants, during the night, to send a letter, and after having his clerk called, has a lamp lit, and gets the letter written. Then, when that has been done, he extinguishes the lamp. But though the lamp had been put out the writing would still be there. Thus does reasoning cease, and knowledge remain.’

‘Give me a further illustration.’

‘In Eastern districts [43] the peasants have a custom of arranging five pots full of water behind each hut with the object of putting out at once any spark of fire that may be kindled. Suppose now the house had caught fire, and they had thrown those five potfulls of water over the hut, and the fire had gone out, would those peasants then think of still going on using the water-pots ?'

¹ That is, he might still be wrong on matters of mere worldly knowledge, but would be clear in his mind as to the fundamental truths of religion. Compare the analogous distinctions often drawn as to the inspiration of Scripture, or the infallibility of the Pope.

'No, Sir, the water-pots would be done with. What would be the use of them (on that occasion) any more ?'

'The five water-pots are the five organs of moral sense—faith, to wit, and perseverance in effort, and mindfulness, and meditation, and the reasoning wisdom. The peasantry are the recluse, who is devoted in effort¹; the fire is sinfulness. As the fire is put out by the water in the five pots, so is sinfulness extinguished by the five organs of moral sense, and when once extinguished it does not again arise².'

'Give me a further illustration.'

'It is like a physician who goes to the sick man with the five kinds of drugs made from medicinal roots¹, and grinding them up, gives him to drink, and thereby his sickness passes away. Would the physician in that case think of making any further use of the medicine?’

¹ Yogāvaśaro; one of the technical terms in constant use by our author, but not found in the Pāli Piṭakas. Hardy renders it, 'who is seeking Nirvāṇa;' but though this may be suggested by the term, it is not its meaning. Literally it is 'he whose sphere, whose constant resort, is Yoga.' Now yoga is 'diligence, devotion, mental concentration;' and there is nothing to show that our author is using the word as an epithet of Arahatsip. It seems to me, therefore, that the whole compound merely means one of those 'religious,' in the technical sense, who were also religious in the higher, more usual sense. It would thus be analogous to the phrase saṃgāmāvaśaro, 'at home in war,' used of a war elephant in the Samgāmāvaśara Gāṭaka (Fausböll, II, 95), and of a soldier below, Mil. 44.

² This must, I think, be understood in a modified sense, for the first of the four Great Exertions (Sammappadhānas) is the effort to prevent sinful conditions arising.

‘Certainly not, the medicine has done its work. What would be the use of any more?’

‘Just so, O king, when sinfulness is destroyed by the five moral powers, then reasoning ceases, but knowledge remains.’

[44] ‘Give me a further illustration.’

‘It is like a warrior, at home in war, who takes five javelins and goes down to battle to conquer the foe. And when he has cast them the enemy is broken. There is no need for him to go on casting javelins any more.’

‘Well put, Nāgasena!’

4. The king said: ‘He who will not be reborn, Nāgasena, does he still feel any painful sensation?’

The Elder replied: ‘Some he feels and some not.’

‘Which are they?’

‘He may feel bodily pain, O king; but mental pain he would not.’

‘How would that be so?’

‘Because the causes, proximate or remote, of bodily pain still continue, he would be liable to it. But the causes, proximate or remote, of mental agony having ceased, he could not feel it. For it has been said by the Blessed One: “One kind of pain he suffers, bodily pain: but not mental.”’

‘Then why, Sir, does he not die?’

‘The Arahāt, O king, has need neither to curry favour nor to bear malice. He shakes not down the unripe fruit, but awaits the full time of its maturity. For it has been said, O king, by the Elder, Sâriputta, the Commander of the faith [45]:

¹ Pañka mūla bhessaggāni: not the five principal sorts of medicine mentioned by Childers.

“It is not death, it is not life I welcome;
As the hireling his wage, so do I bide my time.
It is not death, it is not life I want;
Mindful and thoughtful do I bide my time¹.”

‘Well put, Nâgasena!’

5. The king said: ‘Is a pleasant sensation, Nâgasena, good or evil or indifferent?’

‘It may be any one of the three.’

‘But surely, Sir, if good conditions are not painful, and painful ones not good, then there can arise no good condition that is at the same time painful?’

‘Now, what do you think, great king? Suppose a man were to hold in one hand a red-hot ball of iron, and in the other a lump of icy snow, would they both hurt him?’

‘Yes; they both would.’

‘But are they both hot?’

‘Certainly not.’

‘But are they both cold?’

‘No.’

‘Then acknowledge yourself put in the wrong! If the heat hurts, and they are not both hot, the pain cannot come from the heat. If the cold hurts, and they are not both cold, the pain cannot come from the cold. How then, O king, can they both hurt you, since they are not both hot, nor both cold, and (as one is hot and the other cold) the pain comes neither from the hot nor from the cold?’

¹ These verses are nearly the same as those put in reverse order into Sâriputta’s mouth in the Theri Gâthâ, 1003, 1002. And the first two lines, as Dr. Rost was good enough to point out to me, are identical (except as to a slight grammatical variation) with Manu VI, 45.

² And the same, therefore, of pleasant sensations that are evil.

‘I am not equal to argument with you. Be so good, Sir, as to explain how the matter stands.’

Then the Elder reasoned with king Milinda, persuading him by talk on the subject drawn from the Abhidhamma, such as : ‘There are these six pleasures, O king, connected with life in the world, and these other six with renunciation. There are six griefs connected with life in the world, and six with renunciation. There are six kinds of indifference to pleasure and to grief connected with life in the world, and six with renunciation. [46] Altogether there are thus six series of six, that is to say, thirty-six kinds of sensations in the present, and the like number in the past, and the like in the future. And adding all these up in one total we arrive at one hundred and eight kinds of sensation.’

‘Well put, Nâgasena !’

6¹. The king said : ‘What is it, Nâgasena, that is reborn?’

‘Name-and-form is reborn.’

‘What, is it this same name-and-form that is reborn?’

‘No : but by this name-and-form deeds are done, good or evil, and by these deeds (this Karma) another name-and-form is reborn.’

¹ This dialogue is in Hardy, p. 429 (No. 7).

‘If that be so, Sir, would not the new being be released from its evil Karma¹?’

The Elder replied: ‘Yes, if it were not reborn. But just because it is reborn, O king, it is therefore not released from its evil Karma.’

‘Give me an illustration.’

‘Suppose, O king, some man were to steal a mango from another man, and the owner of the mango were to seize him and bring him before the king, and charge him with the crime. And the thief were to say: “Your Majesty! I have not taken away this man’s mangoes. Those that he put in the ground are different from the ones I took. I do not deserve to be punished.” How then? would he be guilty?’

‘Certainly, Sir. He would deserve to be punished.’

‘But on what ground?’

‘Because, in spite of whatever he may say, he would be guilty in respect of the last mango which resulted from the first one (the owner set in the ground).’

‘Just so, great king, deeds good or evil are done by this name-and-form and another is reborn. But that other is not thereby released from its deeds (its Karma).’

‘Give me a further illustration.’

‘It is like rice or sugar so stolen, of which the same might be said as of the mango. [47] Or it is like the fire which a man, in the cold season, might kindle, and when he had warmed himself, leave still burning, and go away. Then if that fire were to set another man's field on fire, and the owner of the field were to seize him, and bring him before the king, and charge him with the injury, and he were to say: "Your Majesty! It was not I who set this man's field on fire. The fire I left burning was a different one from that which burnt his field. I am not guilty." Now would the man, O king, be guilty?'

¹ Repeated below, III, 5, 7, p. 112.

'Certainly, Sir.'

'But why?'

'Because, in spite of whatever he might say, he would be guilty in respect of the subsequent fire that resulted from the previous one.'

'Just so, great king, deeds good or evil are done by this name-and-form and another is reborn. But that other is not thereby released from its deeds (its Karma).'

'Give me a further illustration.'

'Suppose, O king, a man were to take a lamp and go up into the top storey of his house, and there eat his meal. And the lamp blazing up were to set the thatch on fire, and from that the house should catch fire, and that house having caught fire the whole village should be burnt. And they should seize him and ask: "What, you fellow, did you set our village on fire for?" And he should reply: "I've not set your village on fire! The flame of the lamp, by the light of which I was eating, was one thing; the fire which burnt your village was another thing." Now if they, thus disputing, should go to law before you, O king, in whose favour would you decide the case?'

'In the villagers' favour.'

'But why?'

‘Because, Sir, in spite of whatever the man might say, the one fire was produced from the other.’

‘Just so, great king, it is one name-and-form which has its end in death, and another name-and-form which is reborn. But the second is the result of the first, and is therefore not set free from its evil deeds.’

‘Give me a further illustration.’

‘Suppose, O king, a man were to choose a young girl in marriage, and give a price¹ for her and go away. [48] And she in due course should grow up to full age, and then another man were to pay a price for her and marry her. And when the first one had come back he should say: “Why, you fellow, have you carried off my wife?” And the other were to reply: “It’s not your wife I have carried off! The little girl, the mere child, whom you chose in marriage and paid a price for is one; the girl grown up to full age whom I chose in marriage and paid a price for, is another.” Now if they, thus disputing, were to go to law about it before you, O king, in whose favour would you decide the case?’

‘In favour of the first.’

‘But why?’

‘Because, in spite of whatever the second might say, the grown-up girl would have been derived from the other girl.’

‘Just so, great king, it is one name-and-form which has its end in death, and another name-and-form which is reborn. But the second is the result of the first, and is therefore not set free from its evil deeds.'

¹ Suṅkaṃ datvā. Literally ‘paying a tax.’ So early were early marriages! Compare Therī Gāthā, 402. Hinaṇi-kumburē, p. 58, has wœ/up dī, ‘having provided her with means of subsistence.’ But, of course, the Suṅka must have been a price paid to the parents.

'Give me a further illustration.'

'Suppose a man, O king, were to buy of a herdsman a vessel of milk, and go away leaving it in his charge, saying: "I will come for it to-morrow;" and the next day it were to become curds. And when the man should come and ask for it, then suppose the other were to offer him the curds, and he should say: "It was not curds I bought of you; give me my vessel of milk." And the other were to reply: "Without any fault of mine¹ your milk has turned to curds." Now if they, thus disputing, were to go to law about it before you, O king, in whose favour would you decide the case?'

'In favour of the herdsman.'

'But why?'

'Because, in spite of whatever the other might say, the curds were derived from the milk.'

'Just so, great king, it is one name-and-form that finds its end in death, and another that is reborn. But that other is the result of the first, and is therefore not thereby released from its evil deeds (its bad Karma).'

'Very good, Nâgasena!'

7². The king said: 'Will you, Nâgasena, be reborn?'

¹ Agânato: there is an ambiguity here, as the word may mean 'to me not knowing it,' or 'to you not knowing it.' Hinañ-kumburê takes the latter interpretation, and renders: 'O come! Do you not know that your milk has become curds?' (Embala, tâge kiri mawû bawa no dannehi dœyi.)

² Not in Hardy.

‘Nay, great king, what is the use of asking that question again? Have I not already told you that if, when I die, [49] I die with craving in my heart, I shall; but if not, not¹?’

‘Give me an illustration.’

‘Suppose, O king, a man were to render service to the king²: and the king, pleased with him, were to bestow an office upon him. And then that he, while living through that appointment, in the full possession and enjoyment of all the pleasures of sense, should publicly declare that the king had repaid him naught. Now would that man, O king, be acting rightly?’

‘Most certainly not.’

‘Just so, great king, what is the use of asking that question again? Have I not already told you that if, when I die, I die with craving in my heart, I shall; and if not, not?’

‘You are ready, Nāgasena, in reply.’

8. The king said: ‘You were talking just now of name-and-form. What does “name” mean in that expression, and what “form”?’

‘Whatever is gross therein, that is “form”: whatever is subtle, mental, that is “name.”’

‘Why is it, Nāgasena, that name is not reborn separately, or form separately?’

‘These conditions, great king, are connected one with the other; and spring into being together.’

‘Give me an illustration.’

‘As a hen, great king, would not get a yoke or an egg-shell separately, but both would arise in one, they two being intimately dependent one on the other; just so, if there were no name there would be no form. What is meant by name in that expression being intimately dependent on what is meant by form, they spring up together. And this is, through time immemorial, their nature¹.

¹ See above, Chapter I, § 6, p. 50.

² This simile, with a different conclusion, recurs below, II, 3, 10 (p. 93).

‘You are ready, Nāgasena, in reply.’

9. The king said: ‘You speak, Nāgasena, of time immemorial. What does this word “time” mean?’

‘Past time, O king, and present, and future.’

‘But what? is there such a thing as time?’

‘There is time which exists, and time which does not.’

‘Which then exists, and which not?’

[50] ‘There are Confections (constituent potentialities of being)², O king, which are past in the sense of having passed away, and ceased to be, or of having been dissolved, or altogether changed. To them time is not. But there are conditions of heart which are now producing their effect, or still have in them the inherent possibility of producing effect, or which will otherwise lead to reindividualisation. To them time is. Where there are beings who, when dead, will be reborn, there time is. Where there are beings who, when dead, will not be reborn, there time is not; and where there are beings who are altogether set free (who, having attained Nirvâṇa in their present life, have come to the end of that life), there time is not—because of their having been quite set free¹.

¹ Evam etam dīgham addhānam sambhāvitam: which Hardy, p. 141, renders: ‘They accompany each other (as to the species, but not as to the individual) during infinitude.’ But even the Sinhalese text cannot be made to mean this.

² Samkhârâ. See the full list in my ‘Buddhism,’ pp. 91, 92 (a list, indeed, not found as yet in the Piṭakas, and probably later, but yet founded on the older divisions, and explanatory of them). They are all those divisions into which existence (or the process of becoming and ceasing to be as Buddhism looks at it) should be divided, and are practically so many sorts of action (Karma). For the older divisions see the note at the passages quoted in ‘Vinaya Texts,’ I, 76.

‘You are ready, Nâgasena, in reply.’

Here ends the Second Chapter.

¹ Parinibbutattâ. Hardy renders this whole clause (the last lines): ‘Nirvâṇa is attained, time is no longer.’ But this is one of the endless confusions arising out of not knowing the distinction between Nirvâṇa and Parinirvâṇa. To a man who had ‘attained Nirvâṇa’ there would still be time as long as he was in the enjoyment of it, that is as long as he continued in his present (and last) existence. The Sinhalese is perfectly clear.

BOOK II. CHAPTER 3.

1. The king said : 'What is the root, Nâgasena, of past time, and what of present, and what of future time ?'

'Ignorance. By reason of Ignorance came the Confections, by reason of the Confections consciousness, by reason of consciousness name-and-form, by reason of name-and-form the six organs of sense ¹, by reason of them contact, by reason of contact sensation, by reason of sensation thirst, by reason of thirst craving, by reason of craving becoming, by reason of becoming birth, by reason of birth old age and death, grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, and despair. Thus is it that the ultimate point in the past of all this time is not apparent.'

'You are ready, Nâgasena, in reply.'

2. The king said : 'You say that the ultimate point of time is not apparent. Give me an illustration of that.'

'Suppose, O king, a man were to plant in the ground a tiny seed, and that it were to come up as a shoot, and in due course grow, develope, and mature until it produced a fruit. [51] And then the man, taking a seed from that fruit, were again to plant it in the ground, and all should happen as before. Now would there be any end to this series ?'

'Certainly not, Sir.'

¹ Sa/âyatanaⁿⁱ, that is the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body (as the organ of touch), and mind (or, as we should say, brain).

‘Just so, O king, the ultimate point in the past of the whole of this time is not apparent.’

‘Give me a further illustration.’

‘The hen lays an egg. From the egg comes a hen. From the hen an egg. Is there any end to this series?’

‘No.’

‘Just so, O king, the ultimate point in the past of the whole of this time is not apparent.’

‘Give me a further illustration.’

Then the Elder drew a circle on the ground and asked the king: ‘Is there any end to this circle?’

‘No, it has no end.’

‘Well, that is like those circles spoken of by the Blessed One¹. “By reason of the eye and of forms there arises sight², when these three come together there is touch, by reason of touch sensation, by reason of sensation a longing (Tanhâ, thirst), by reason of the longing action (Karma), and from action eye is once more produced³.” Now is there any end to this series?’

‘No.’

¹ Hīnaśi-kumburê applies this to the previous words (the circles of the chain of life quoted in § 1 from the Mahāvagga I, 1, 2), and he is followed by Hardy, p. 434. Trenckner makes it apply to the following words, giving the reference to No. 18 in the Magghima Nikāya, and I think he is right. Whichever way it is taken, the result is much the same.

² Kakkhu-viññāna. It is not clear from the terse phraseology of this passage whether this is supposed to be a subjective stage preliminary to the ‘touch’ (phasso), or whether it is inclusive of it. (Compare Dhamma Saṅgani, 589, 599, 620.) I am inclined to think it is the former. But if the latter be meant it might be rendered ‘there arises that consciousness (of existence) which is dependent upon the eye.’ See below, § 4.

³ That is, another eye in another birth.

Then setting out a precisely corresponding circle of each of the other organs of sense (of the ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind¹), he in each case put the same question. And the reply being always the same, he concluded :

‘Just so, O king, the ultimate point of time in the past is not apparent.’

‘You are ready, Nâgasena, in reply.’

3. The king said : ‘When you say that the ultimate point is not apparent, what do you mean by “ultimate point”?’

‘Of whatsoever time is past. It is the ultimate point of that, O king, that I speak of.’

‘But, if so, when you say that it is not apparent, do you mean to say that of everything? Is the ultimate point of everything unknown?’

‘Partly so, and partly not.’

‘Then which is so, and which not?’

‘Formerly, O king, everything in every form, everything in every mode, was ignorance. It is to us as if it were not. In reference to that the ultimate beginning is unknown. But that, which has not been, becomes; as soon as it has begun to become it dissolves away again. In reference to that the ultimate beginning is known². [52]

‘But, reverend Sir, if that which was not, becomes, and as soon as it has begun to become passes again

¹ In the text the whole sentence is repeated of each.

² That is, ‘the beginning of each link in the chain—the beginning of each individuality—can be traced, but not the beginning of each chain. Each life is a link in a chain of lives, bound together by cause and effect, different, yet the same. There are an infinite number of such chains; and there is no reference in the discussion to any greater unity, or to any “ultimate point” of all the chains.’

away, then surely, being thus cut off at both ends, it must be entirely destroyed¹?’

‘Nay, surely, O king, if it be thus cut off at both ends, can it not at both ends be made to grow again²?’

‘Yes, it might. But that is not my question. Could it grow again from the point at which it was cut off?’

‘Certainly.’

‘Give me an illustration.’

Then the Elder repeated the simile of the tree and the seed, and said that the Skandhas (the constituent elements of all life, organic and inorganic) were so many seeds, and the king confessed himself satisfied.

4. The king said: ‘Are there any Confections³ which are produced?’

‘Certainly.’

‘Which are they?’

‘Where there is an eye, and also forms, there is sight⁴, where there is sight there is a contact through the eye, where there is contact through the eye there is a sensation, where there is sensation there is a longing⁵, where there is longing there is a grasping⁶, where there is grasping there is a becoming,

¹ That is, ‘each individuality must be separate. The supposed chain does not really exist.’

² There is an odd change of gender here. Possibly the word ‘ignorance’ has been dropped out. Trenckner says the passage is corrupt, and the Sinhalese is so involved as to be unintelligible.

³ Saṅkhârâ, potentialities, possible forms, of sentient existence.

⁴ Kakkhu-viññâṇa. See note 2 above, p. 80.

⁵ Tanhâ, thirst.

⁶ Upâdâna, a stretching out towards a satisfaction of the longing, and therefore a craving for life, time, in which to satisfy it.

where there is becoming there is birth, and at birth old age and death, grief, lamentation, pain, sorrow, and despair begin to be. Thus is the rise of the whole of this class of pain.—Where there is neither eye nor form there is no sight, where there is not sight there is no contact through the eye, where there is not contact there is no sensation, where there is not sensation there is no longing, where there is not longing there is no grasping, where there is not grasping there is no becoming, where there is not becoming there is no birth, and where there is not birth there is neither old age nor death nor grief, lamentation, pain, sorrow, and despair. Thus is the ending of all this class of pain.'

'Very good, Nâgasena!'

5. The king said: 'Are there any Confections (qualities) which spring into being without a gradual becoming?'

'No. They all have a gradual becoming.'

'Give me an illustration.'

'Now what do you think, great king? Did this house in which you are sitting spring suddenly into being?'

[53] 'Certainly not, Sir. There is nothing here which arose in that way. Each portion of it has had its gradual becoming—these beams had their becoming in the forest, and this clay in the earth, and by the moil and toil of women and of men¹ was this house produced.'

¹ It is a small matter, but noteworthy, that the Buddhist texts always put the women first.

‘Just so, great king, there is no Confection which has sprung into being without a gradual becoming. It is by a process of evolution that Confections come to be!’

‘Give me a further illustration.’

‘They are like all kinds of trees and plants which, when set in the ground, grow, develope, and mature, and then yield their fruits and flowers. The trees do not spring into being without a becoming. It is by a process of evolution that they become what they are. Just so, great king, there is no Confection which has sprung into being without a gradual becoming. It is by a process of evolution that Confections come to be!’

‘Give me a further illustration.’

‘They are like the pots of various kinds which a potter might form when he has dug up the clay out of the earth. The pots do not spring into being without a becoming. It is by a process of evolution that they become what they are. Just so, great king, there is no Confection which has sprung into being without a gradual becoming. It is by a process of evolution that Confections come to be!’

‘Give me a further illustration.’

‘Suppose, O king, there were no bridge of metal on a mandolin¹, no leather, no hollow space, no frame, no neck, no strings, no bow, and no human effort or exertion, would there be music?’

‘Certainly not, Sir.’

‘But if all these things were there, would not there be a sound?’

¹ Vînâya pattam. I don't know what this is. The Simhalese merely repeats the words.

‘Of course there would.’

‘Just so, great king, there is no Confection which has sprung into being without a gradual becoming. It is by a process of evolution that Confections come to be!’

‘Give me a further illustration.’

‘Suppose, O king, there were no fire-stick apparatus¹, no twirling-stick¹, and no cord for the twirling-stick, and no matrix¹, and no burnt rag for tinder, and no human effort and exertion, could there be fire by attrition?’

‘Certainly not.’

‘But if all these conditions were present, then might not fire appear?’

‘Yes, certainly.’

[54] ‘Just so, great king, there is no Confection which has sprung into being without a gradual becoming. It is by a process of evolution that Confections come to be!’

‘Give me one more illustration.’

‘Suppose, O king, there were no burning glass, and no heat of the sun, and no dried cow-dung for tinder, could there be fire?’

‘Certainly not.’

‘But where these things are present there fire might be struck, might it not?’

‘Yes.’

‘Just so, great king, there is no Confection which has sprung into being without a gradual becoming. It is by a process of evolution that Confections come to be !'

¹ Arani, arani-potako, and uttarârani. The exact differentiation of these parts of the fire-stick apparatus is uncertain. The Sim-halese throws no real light on them, as it translates them respectively ya/a liya, ‘under wood,’ matu liya, ‘upper wood,’ and uturu liya, also ‘upper wood.’ This method of ignition was probably quite as strange to Hinafi-kumburê as it is to us.

'Give me another illustration.'

'Suppose, O king, there were no looking-glass, and no light, and no face in front of it, would there appear an image ?'

'No.'

'But given these things, there might be a reflection ?'

'Yes, Sir, there might.'

'Just so, great king, there is no Confection which has sprung into being without a gradual becoming. It is by a process of evolution that Confections come to be !'

'Very good, Nâgasena !'

6. The king said : 'Is there, Nâgasena, such a thing as the soul¹ ?'

'What is this, O king, the soul (Vedagu) ?'

'The living principle within² which sees forms through the eye, hears sounds through the ear, experiences tastes through the tongue, smells odours through the nose, feels touch through the body, and discerns things (conditions, "dhammâ") through the mind—just as we, sitting here in the palace, can look out of any window out of which we wish to look, the east window or the west, or the north or the south.'

The Elder replied : 'I will tell you about the five ¹ Vedagû, see below, III, 5, 6, p. 111, not found in this meaning in the Piṭakas.

² Abbhantare gîvo, also not found in this sense in the Piṭakas. Attâ, rendered just above 'image' or 'reflection,' is the word used in them for soul. Hînañ-kumburê renders this here by prâṇa gîwa, 'breath-soul.' See below, III, 7, 15, p. 132 ; and above, II, 4, p. 48 ; and II, 2, 6, p. 71.

doors¹, great king. Listen, and give heed attentively. If the living principle within sees forms through the eye in the manner that you mention, [55] choosing its window as it likes, can it not then see forms not only through the eye, but also through each of the other five organs of sense? And in like manner can it not then as well hear sounds, and experience taste, and smell odours, and feel touch, and discern conditions through each of the other five organs of sense, besides the one you have in each case specified?’

‘No, Sir.’

‘Then these powers are not united one to another indiscriminately, the latter sense to the former organ, and so on. Now we, as we are seated here in the palace, with these windows all thrown open, and in full daylight, if we only stretch forth our heads, see all kinds of objects plainly. Can the living principle do the same when the doors of the eyes are thrown open? When the doors of the ear are thrown open, can it do so? Can it then not only hear sounds, but see sights, experience tastes, smell odours, feel touch, and discern conditions? And so with each of its windows?’

‘No, Sir.’

[56] ‘Then these powers are not united one to another indiscriminately. Now again, great king, if Dinna here were to go outside and stand in the gateway, would you be aware that he had done so?’

‘Yes, I should know it.’

‘And if the same Dinna were to come back again, and stand before you, would you be aware of his having done so?’

¹ It is odd he does not say six.

‘Yes, I should know it.’

‘Well, great king, would the living principle within discern, in like manner, if anything possessing flavour were laid upon the tongue, its sourness, or its saltness, or its acidity, or its pungency, or its astringency, or its sweetness¹?’

‘Yes, it would know it.’

‘But when the flavour had passed into the stomach would it still discern these things?’

‘Certainly not.’

‘Then these powers are not united one to the other indiscriminately. Now suppose, O king, a man were to have a hundred vessels of honey brought and poured into one trough, and then, having had another man’s mouth closed over and tied up, were to have him cast into the trough full of honey. Would he know whether that into which he had been thrown was sweet or whether it was not?’

‘No, Sir.’

‘But why not?’

‘Because the honey could not get into his mouth.’

‘Then, great king, these powers are not united one to another indiscriminately².’

‘I am not capable of discussing with such a reasoner. Be pleased, Sir, to explain to me how the matter stands.’

Then the Elder convinced Milinda the king with discourse drawn from the Abhidhamma, saying: ‘It is by reason, O king, of the eye and of forms that sight arises, and those other conditions—contact, sensation, idea, thought, abstraction, sense of vitality, and attention¹—arise each simultaneously with its predecessor. And a similar succession of cause and effect arises when each of the other five organs of sense is brought into play. [57] And so herein there is no such thing as soul (Vedagu)².

¹ This list recurs below, II, 4, 1.

² That is: ‘Your “living principle within” cannot make use of whichever of its windows it pleases. And the simile of a man inside a house does not hold good of the soul.’ See the end of II, 3, 16.

7. The king said: 'Does thought-perception³ arise wherever sight arises⁴?'

'Yes, O king, where the one is there is the other.'

'And which of the two arises first?'

'First sight, then thought.'

'Then does the sight issue, as it were, a command to thought, saying: "Do you spring up there where I have?" or does thought issue command to sight, saying: "Where you spring up there will I."'

'It is not so, great king. There is no intercourse between the one and the other.'

'Then how is it, Sir, that thought arises wherever sight does?'

'Because of there being a sloping down, and because of there being a door, and because of there being a habit⁵, and because of there being an association.'

'How is that? Give me an illustration of mind arising where sight arises because of there being a sloping down.'

'Now what do you think, great king? When it rains⁶, where will the water go to?'

¹ The last four are ketanâ, ekaggatâ, gîvitindriyam, and manasikâro; and in the Sinhalese are simply repeated in their Sinhalese form.

² This conclusion is all wrong in Hardy, pp. 457, 458.

³ Mano-viññânam.

⁴ Kakkhu-viññânam.

⁵ Kinnattâ, which Hînañi-kumburê renders purudu bæwin.

⁶ Deve vassante: 'when the god rains.'

‘It will follow the slope of the ground.’

‘And if it were to rain again, where would the water go to?’

‘It would go the same way as the first water had gone.’

‘What then? Does the first water issue, as it were, command to the second, saying: “Do you go where I have?” Or does the second issue command to the first, saying: “Whithersoever you go, thither will I?”’

‘It is not so, Sir. There is no intercourse between the two. Each goes its way because of the slope of the ground.’

‘Just so, great king, [58] is it by reason of the natural slope that where sight has arisen there also does thought arise. And neither does the sight-perception issue command to the mind-perception, saying: “Where I have arisen, there do thou also spring up;” nor does the mind-perception inform the sight-perception, saying: “Where thou hast arisen, there will I also spring up.” There is no conversation, as it were, between them. All that happens, happens through natural slope.’

‘Now give me an illustration of there being a door.’

‘What do you think, great king? Suppose a king had a frontier city, and it was strongly defended with towers and bulwarks, and had only one gateway. If a man wanted to leave the city, how would he go out?’

‘By the gate, certainly.’

‘And if another man wanted to leave it, how would he go out?’

‘The same way as the first.’

‘What then? Would the first man tell the second:

“Mind you go out the same way as I do”? Or would the second tell the first: “The way you go out, I shall go out too”?’

‘Certainly not, Sir. There would be no communication between them. They would go that way because that was the gate.’

‘Just so, great king, with thought and sight.’

‘Now give me an illustration of thought arising where sight is because of habit.’

‘What do you think, great king? If one cart went ahead, which way would a second cart go?’

‘The same as the first.’

‘But would the first tell the second to go where it went, [59] or the second tell the first that it would go where it (the first) had gone?’

‘No, Sir. There would be no communication between the two. The second would follow the first out of habit.’

‘Just so, great king, with sight and thought.’

‘Now give me an illustration of how thought arises, where sight has arisen, through association.’

‘In the art of calculating by using the joints of the fingers as signs or marks¹, in the art of arithmetic pure and simple², in the art of estimating the probable

¹ Muddâ. Hīnaśi-kumburê is here a little fuller than Buddha-ghosa at vol. i, p. 95 of the Sumaṅgala. He says: yam se ceṅgili purukhi alwâ gena saññâ koṭa kiyana hasta mudra sâstraya, ‘the finger-ring art, so called from seizing on the joints of the fingers, and using them as signs.’

² Gaṇanâ. Hīnaśi-kumburê says: akkhiḍra wu gaṇam sâstraya, ‘the art of unbroken counting,’ which is precisely Buddha-ghosa’s explanation (confirming the reading we have there adopted), and probably means arithmetic without the aids involved in the last phrase. We have here in that case an interesting peep into the yield of growing crops ¹, and in the art of writing, O king, the beginner is clumsy. But after a certain time with attention and practice he becomes expert. Just so is it that, where sight has arisen, thought too by association springs up.'

And in response to similar questions, the Elder declared that in the same way thought sprang up wherever there was hearing, or taste, or smell, or touch : that in each case it was subsequent to the other, but arose without communication from [80] the natural causes above set out.

8. The king said : 'Where thought (mental perception ²) is, Nāgasena, is there always sensation ?'

'Yes, where thought arises there is contact, and there is sensation, and there is idea, and there is conceived intention, and there is reflection, and there is investigation ³.'

9. 'Reverend Sir, what is the distinguishing characteristic of contact (Phassa)?'

'Touch ⁴, O king.'

'But give me an illustration.'

'It is as when two rams are butting together, O progress of arithmetical knowledge. When our author wrote, the old way of counting on the fingers was still in vogue, but the modern system was coming into general use.

¹ Saṅkhā, literally 'calculation,' but which Hardy amplifies into Kshetraya vṛksha vilokaya koṭa phala pramāṇaya kiyannāwū saṃkhyā sâstraya.

² Mano-viññāṇa as all through the last section. The reader must not forget that mano is here strictly an organ of sense, on an exact level with eye, ear, tongue, &c.

³ K'etanā, vitakko, and viññāro. See fuller further on, §§ 11, 13, 14.

⁴ Phusana. So also Buddhaghosa at p. 63 of the Sumāṅgala.

king. The eye should be regarded as one of those two, the form (object) as the other, and the contact as the union of the two.'

'Give me a further illustration.'

'It is as when two cymbals¹ are clashed together. The one is as the eye, the other as the object, and the junction of the two is like contact.'

'Very good, Nâgasena!'

10. 'Reverend Sir, what is the characteristic mark of sensation (Vedanâ)?'

'The being experienced, great king, and enjoyed².'

'Give me an illustration.'

'It is like the case of the man³ on whom the king, pleased with a service he has rendered him, should bestow an office. He while living, through that appointment, in the full possession and enjoyment of all the pleasures of sense, would think: "Formerly I did the king a service. For that the king, pleased with me, gave me this office. It is on that account that I now experience such sensations."—And it is like the case of the man [61] who having done good deeds is re-born, on the dissolution of the body after death, into some happy conditions of bliss in heaven. He, while living there in the full possession and enjoyment of all the pleasures of sense, would think: "Formerly I must have done good deeds. It is on that account that I now experience such sensations." Thus is it, great king, that the being experienced and enjoyed is the characteristic mark of sensation.'

'Very good, Nâgasena!'

¹ Sammâ, compare Theri Gâthâ, 893, 911.

² Buddhaghosa, loc. cit., only gives the first of these.

³ See for a similar illustration above, II, 2, 7, p. 76.

11. 'What is the distinguishing characteristic, Nāgasena, of idea (Saññā)?'

'Recognition, O king¹. And what does he recognise?—blueness and yellowness and redness and whiteness and brownness.'

'Give me an illustration.'

'It is like the king's treasurer, O king, who when he sees, on entering the treasure, objects the property of the king of all those colours, recognises (that they have such). Thus it is, great king, that recognition is the mark of idea.'

'Very good, Nāgasena!'

'What is the distinguishing characteristic, Nāgasena, of the conceived purpose (Ketanā)?'

'The being conceived, O king, and the being prepared².'

'Give me an illustration.'

'It is like the case of a man, O king, who should prepare poison, and both drink of it himself, and give of it to others to drink. He himself would suffer pain, and so would they. In the same way some individual, having thought out with intention some evil deed, on the dissolution of the body after death, would be reborn into some unhappy state of woe in purgatory, and so also would those who followed his advice.—And it is like the case of a man, O king, who should prepare a mixture of ghee, butter, oil, honey and molasses, and should both drink thereof himself and give of it to others to drink. He himself would have pleasure, and so would they. [62] In the same way some individual, having thought out with intention some good deed, will be reborn, on the dissolution of the body after death, into some happy state of bliss in heaven, and so also would those who follow his advice. Thus is it, great king, that the being conceived, and the being prepared, are marks of the conceived purpose.'

¹ So also Buddhaghosa, Sumaṅgala, p. 63.

² Buddhaghosa, loc. cit., gives no mark of Ketanā, but he gives both it and 'the being prepared' as the marks of the Confections. It is not clear from the Milinda alone how to render the term Ketanā, but I follow Anguttara III, 77 (where it is placed on a level with aspiration), and Dhamma Saṅgani 5 (where it is said to be born of the contact of mind, perception, and exertion).

'Very good, Nāgasena!'

12. 'What, Nāgasena, is the distinguishing characteristic of perception (Viññāna)?'

'Recognition¹, great king.'

'Give me an illustration.'

'It is like the case of the guardian of a city who, when seated at the cross roads in the middle of the city, could see a man coming from the East, or the South, or the West, or the North. In the same way, O king, he knows an object which he sees with his eye, or a sound which he hears with his ear, or an odour which he smells by his nose, or a taste which he experiences with his tongue, or a touchable thing which he touches with his body, or a quality that he recognises by his mind. Thus is it, great king, that knowing is the mark of perception.'

'Very good, Nāgasena!'

13. 'What is the distinguishing characteristic, Nāgasena, of reflection (Vitakka).'

¹ Vigānana. So also Buddhaghosa, loc. cit., and below, III, 7, 15, p. 131.

‘The effecting of an aim¹.’

‘Give me an illustration.’

‘It is like the case of a carpenter, great king, who fixes in a joint a well-fashioned piece of wood. Thus is it that the effecting of an aim is the mark of reflection.’

‘Very good, Nâgasena!’

14. ‘What is the distinguishing characteristic, Nâgasena, of investigation (Viññâra)?’

‘Threshing out again and again².’

‘Give me an illustration.’

‘It is like the case of the copper vessel, which, when it is being beaten into shape [63], makes a sound again and again as it gradually gathers shape³. The beating into shape is to be regarded as reflection, and the sounding again and again as investigation. Thus is it, great king, that threshing out again and again is the mark of investigation.’

‘Very good, Nâgasena!’

Here ends the Third Chapter⁴.

¹ Appanâ, which Hînañi-kumburê renders pihi/ana. Buddhaghosa, p. 63, gives abhiniropana as its mark, which comes to much the same thing.

² Anumaggana. So also Buddhaghosa, loc. cit. p. 63. The word is not in Childers, but see Morris in the Journal of the Pali Text Society, 1886, p. 118.

³ Anuravati anusandahati. Not in Childers. Hînañi-kumburê says pasuwa anurâwanâ kere da anuwa pihi/â da.

⁴ The following two sections form an appendix to this chapter corresponding to that formed by the last three sections of Book III, Chapter 7. The numbering of the sections is therefore carried on in both cases.

BOOK II. CHAPTER 3.

15. The king said : ' When those conditions (whose marks you have just specified) have run together, is it possible, by bending them apart one to one side and one to the other¹, to make the distinction between them clear, so that one can say : " This is contact, and this sensation, and this idea, and this intention, and this perception, and this reflection, and this investigation² " ? ' "

' No : that cannot be done.'

' Give me an illustration.'

' Suppose, O king, the cook in the royal household were to make a syrup or a sauce, and were to put into it curds, and salt, and ginger, and cummin seed³, and pepper, and other ingredients. And suppose the king were to say to him : " Pick out for me the flavour of the curds, and of the salt, and of the ginger, and of the cummin seed, and of the pepper, and of all the things you have put into it." Now would it be possible, great king, separating off one from another those flavours that had thus run together, to pick out each one, so that one could say : " Here is the sourness, and here the saltiness, and here the pungency, and here the acidity, and here the astringency, and here the sweetness⁴ " ? ' "

¹ Vinibbhugitvâ vinibbhugitvâ. This question is identical with the one asked of the Buddha at Magghima Nikâya 43, p. 293. Compare also p. 233 and Tela Kaṭṭha Gāthā 59.

² This list differs from that in II, 3, 8, by the addition of viññāṇa.

³ Gīraka. Compare Gātaka I, 244; II, 181, 363. Hīnaṣikumburē translates it by duru, and Hardy by 'onions' (p. 439).

⁴ This is the same list as is found above, II, 3, 6; and below, III, 4, 2, and the items are not intended to correspond with the condiments in the list above.

‘No, that would not be possible [64]. But each flavour would nevertheless be distinctly present by its characteristic sign.’

‘And just so, great king, with respect to those conditions we were discussing.’

‘Very good, Nâgasena !’

16. The Elder said: ‘Is salt, O king, recognisable by the eye ?’

‘Yes, Sir, it is.’

‘But be careful, O king.’

‘Well then, Sir, is it perceptible by the tongue ?’

‘Yes, that is right.’

‘But, Sir, is it only by the tongue that every kind of salt is distinguished ?’

‘Yes, every kind.’

‘If that be so, Sir, why do bullocks bring whole cart-loads of it ? Is it not salt and nothing else that ought to be so brought ?’

‘It is impossible to bring salt by itself. But all these conditions¹ have run together into one, and produced the distinctive thing called salt². (For instance) : salt is heavy, too. But is it possible, O king, to weigh salt ?’

¹ Not saltiness only, but white colour, &c. &c.

² He means the king to draw the conclusion that that distinct thing is only recognisable by the tongue ; so the senses are not interchangeable. In other words it is true that salt seems to be recognised by the sight, as when people load it into carts they do not stop to taste it. But what they see is not salt, what they weigh is not salt, it is whiteness and weight. And the fact of its being salt is an inference they draw. So, great king, your simile of the soul being inside the body, and using the five senses, as a man inside a house uses windows, does not hold good. See the conclusion above of II, 3, 6, p. 88.

‘Certainly, Sir.’

‘Nay, great king, it is not the salt you weigh, it is the weight.’

‘You are ready, Nâgasena, in argument.’

Here ends the questioning of Nâgasena by Milinda¹.

¹ This is again most odd. One would expect, ‘Here ends the questioning as to characteristic signs.’ See the note at the end of last chapter.

BOOK III.

VIMATI-KKhedana-pañho.

THE REMOVAL OF DIFFICULTIES.

CHAPTER 4¹.

1. [65] The king said: 'Are the five Āyatanas, Nāgasena, (eye, ear, nose, tongue, and body,) produced by various actions, or by one action?' (that is, the result of various Karmas, or of one Karma.)

'By various actions, not by one.'

'Give me an illustration.'

'Now, what do you think, O king? If I were to sow in one field five kinds of seed, would the produce of those various seeds be of different kinds?'

'Yes, certainly.'

'Well, just so with respect to the production of Āyatanas.'

'Very good, Nāgasena ²!'

2. The king said: 'Why is it, Nāgasena, that all men are not alike, but some are short-lived and some long-lived, some sickly and some healthy, some ugly and some beautiful, some without influence and some of great power, some poor and some wealthy, some low born and some high born, some stupid and some wise?'

¹ The chapters go straight on because Books II and III are really only parts of one Book. See above, p. 4.

² The meaning here is not easy to follow, as the word Āyatana is used either for the organs of sense, or for the objects of sense; and there is nothing in the context to show which is meant. Probably the idea is that good sight, hearing, &c. in one birth are each the result of a separate Karma in the last birth. But I am by no means sure of this, and the Simhalese (p. 76) is just as ambiguous as the Pāli.

The Elder replied : 'Why is it that all vegetables are not alike, but some sour, and some salt, and some pungent, and some acid, and some astringent, and some sweet ?'

'I fancy, Sir, it is because they come from different kinds of seeds.'

'And just so, great king, are the differences you have mentioned among men to be explained. For it has been said by the Blessed One : "Beings, O brahmin, have each their own Karma, are inheritors of Karma, belong to the tribe of their Karma, are relatives by Karma, have each their Karma as their protecting overlord. It is Karma that divides them up into low and high and the like divisions¹."

'Very good, Nâgasena !'

3. The king said : 'You told me, Nâgasena, that your renunciation was to the end that this sorrow might perish away, and no further sorrow might spring up².'

[66] 'Yes, that is so.'

'But is that renunciation brought about by previous effort, or to be striven after now, in this present time ?'

The Elder replied : 'Effort is now concerned with what still remains to be done, former effort has accomplished what it had to do.'

'Give me an illustration³.'

¹ Mr. Trenckner points out that this quotation is from the Magghima, No. 135. The doctrine is laid down frequently elsewhere also in the Piṭakas. See, for instance, Āṅguttara IV, 197 (pp. 202-203 of Dr. Morris's edition for the Pāli Text Society).

² Above, II, 1, 5, p. 50, and compare I, 38.

³ These three illustrations recur (nearly) below, III, 7, 3, pp. 125-126.

‘ Now what do you think, O king ? Is it when you feel thirst that you would set to work to have a well or an artificial lake dug out, with the intention of getting some water to drink ? ’

‘ Certainly not, Sir. ’

‘ Just so, great king, is effort concerned now with what still remains to be done, former effort has accomplished what it had to do. ’

‘ Give me a further illustration. ’

‘ Now what do you think, O king ? Is it when you feel hungry that you set to work to have fields ploughed and seed planted and crops reaped with the intention of getting some food to eat ? ’

‘ Certainly not, Sir. ’

‘ Just so, great king, is effort concerned now with what still remains to be done, former effort has accomplished what it had to do. ’

‘ Give me a further illustration. ’

‘ Now what do you think, O king ? Is it when the battle is set in array against you that you set to work to have a moat dug, and a rampart put up, and a watch tower built, and a stronghold formed, and stores of food collected ? Is it then that you would have yourself taught the management of elephants, or horsemanship, or the use of the chariot and the bow, or the art of fencing ? ’

‘ Certainly not, Sir. ’

‘ Just so, great king, is effort concerned now with what still remains to be done, former effort has accomplished what it had to do. For it has been thus said, O king, by the Blessed One :

“ Betimes let each wise man work out

That which he sees to be his weal !

Not with the carter’s mode of thought, but firm

Let him, with resolution, step right out.
 As a carter who has left the smooth high road,
 And turned to byways rough, broods ill at ease ¹—
 (Like him who hazards all at dice, and fails)—
 So the weak mind who still neglects the good,
 And follows after evil, grieves at heart,
 When fallen into the power of death, as he,
 The ruined gamester, in his hour of need ².”
 [67] ‘Very good, Nāgasena!’

4. The king said: ‘You (Buddhists³) say thus: “The fire of purgatory is very much more fierce than an ordinary fire. A small stone cast into an ordinary fire may smoke for a day without being destroyed; but a rock as big as an upper chamber cast into the furnace of purgatory would be that moment destroyed.” That is a statement I cannot believe. Now, on the other hand you say thus: “Whatsoever beings are there reborn, though they burn for hundreds of thousands of years in purgatory, yet are they not destroyed." That too is a statement I don't believe.'

¹ Ghâyati. It is an odd coincidence that this word, which means either to burn or to meditate, according to the root from which it is derived, can be rendered here either ‘burn’ or ‘brood’ in English. In fact it is the second, not the first, root that is here intended, as is plain from such passages as Gâtaka III, 354, where the compound pagghâyati means ‘to brood over a thing.’

² Quoted from the Samyutta Nikâya II, 3, 2 (p. 57 in M. Feer’s edition, published by the Pâli Text Society). The readings there differ slightly from those of our text here, and the verses are put into the mouth of Khema, the god, instead of being ascribed to the Buddha. Hīnaśi-kumburê (p. 79) agrees with M. Léon Feer in reading mando for mano in the last line; and I have followed them in my translation. There are several stanzas in the Gâtaka book of carters lost in the desert, but there is nothing to identify any one of them with the story referred to.

³ ‘You’ in the plural: that is, ‘you Bhikkhus.’ So also above, pp. 30, 50.

The Elder said: 'Now what do you think, O king? Do not the females of sharks¹ and crocodiles and tortoises and peacocks and pigeons eat hard bits of stone and gravel?'

'Yes, Sir. They do.'

'What then? Are these hard things, when they have got into the stomach, into the interior of the abdomen, destroyed?'

'Yes, they are destroyed.'

'And the embryo that may be inside the same animals,—is that too destroyed?'

'Certainly not.'

'But why not.'

'I suppose, Sir, it escapes destruction by the influence of Karma.'

'Just so, great king, it is through the influence of Karma that beings, though they have been for thousands of years in purgatory, are not destroyed. If they are reborn there, there do they grow up, and there do they die. For this, O king, has been declared by the Blessed One: "He does not die until that evil Karma is exhausted²."'

'Give me a further illustration.'

¹ It may be noticed that the particular feminine forms chosen are in each case unusual, being in inî instead of the simple f. The first animal, the Makariniî, is said by Childers to be a mythical animal, but it is clear from Buddhaghosa on Kullavagga V, 1, 4, that an ordinary animal is meant, and that is so I think here, though the translation 'shark' is conjectural.

² From Anguttara III, 35, 4 (p. 141 of Dr. Morris's edition for the Pâli Text Society).

‘Now what do you think, O king? Do not the females of lions and tigers and panthers and dogs eat hard bits of bone and flesh?’

‘Yes, they eat such things.’

‘What then? are such hard things, [68] when they have got into the stomach, into the interior of the abdomen, destroyed?’

‘Yes, they are destroyed.’

‘And the embryo that may be inside the same animals,—is that too destroyed?’

‘Certainly not.’

‘But why not?’

‘I suppose, Sir, it escapes destruction by the influence of Karma.’

‘Just so, great king, it is by the influence of Karma that beings in purgatory, though they burn for thousands of years, are not destroyed.’

‘Give me a further illustration.’

‘Now what do you think, O king? Do not the tender women—wives of the Yonakas, and nobles, and brahmins, and householders—eat hard cakes and meat?’

‘Yes, they eat such hard things.’

‘And when those hard things have got into the stomach, into the interior of the abdomen, are not they destroyed?’

‘Yes, they are.’

‘But the children in their womb,—are they destroyed?’

‘Certainly not.’

‘And why not?’

‘I suppose, Sir, they escape destruction by the influence of Karma?’

‘Just so, great king, it is through the influence of Karma that beings in purgatory, though they burn for thousands of years, yet are they not destroyed. If they are reborn there, there do they grow up, and there do they die. For this, O king, has been declared by the Blessed One : " He does not die until that evil Karma is exhausted." "

‘ Very good, Nâgasena ! ’

5. The king said : ‘ Venerable Nâgasena, your people say that the world rests on water, the water on air, the air on space¹. This saying also I cannot believe.’

Then the Elder brought water in a regulation water-pot², and convinced king Milinda, saying : ‘ As this water is supported by the atmosphere, so is that water supported by air.’

‘ Very good, Nâgasena ! ’

6. The king said : ‘ Is cessation Nirvâṇa³? ’

‘ Yes, your Majesty’ [69].

‘ How is that, Nâgasena ? ’

‘ All foolish individuals, O king, take pleasure in the senses and in the objects of sense, find delight in them, continue to cleave to them¹. Hence are they carried down by that flood (of human passions), they are not set free from birth, old age, and death, from grief, lamentation, pain, sorrow, and despair,—they are not set free, I say, from suffering. But the wise, O king, the disciple of the noble ones, neither takes pleasure in those things, nor finds delight in them, nor continues cleaving to them. And inasmuch as he does not, in him craving² ceases, and by the cessation of craving grasping² ceases, and by the cessation of grasping becoming² ceases, and when becoming has ceased birth ceases, and with its cessation birth, old age, and death, grief, lamentation, pain, sorrow, and despair cease to exist. Thus is the cessation brought about the end of all that aggregation of pain. Thus is it that cessation is Nirvâna.'

¹ This is not a distinctively Buddhist belief. It was commonly held at the time by other teachers. Compare ‘ Book of the Great Decease,’ III, 13 (in ‘ Buddhist Suttas,’ Sacred Books of the East, vol. xi, p. 45).

² Dhamma-karakena. The passages show that this was a pot so made, that no water could pass from it except through a filtering medium. When not being actually used the water was no doubt kept at a certain height in it by the pressure of the atmosphere. I do not know of any specimen preserved in our modern museums or figured on ancient bas-reliefs, and the exact shape is unknown. It must be different from the one represented in plate xlvi of Cunningham’s ‘ Bhilsa Tope.’ See Kullavagga V, 13, 1 (note); VI, 21, 3; XII, 2, 1; Mahāvamsa, p. 60.

³ Nirodho nibbānan ti.

'Very good, Nâgasena !'

7. The king said : 'Venerable Nâgasena, do all men receive Nirvâna ?'

'Not all, O king. But he who walks righteously, who admits those conditions which ought to be admitted, perceives clearly those conditions which ought to be clearly perceived, abandons those conditions which ought to be abandoned, practises himself in those conditions which ought to be practised, realises those conditions which ought to be realised—he receives Nirvâna.'

'Very good, Nâgasena !'

¹ Agghosâya tittḥanti. Compare Ânguttara II, 4, 6, and Therî Gâthâ, 794.

² Taṇhâ, Upâdâna, Bhava.

8. The king said : ' Venerable Nâgasena, does he who does not receive Nirvâna know how happy a state Nirvâna is ¹ ?'

' Yes, he knows it.'

' But how can he know that without his receiving Nirvâna ?'

' Now what do you think, O king ? Do those whose hands and feet have not been cut off know how sad a thing it is to have them cut off ?'

' Yes, Sir, that they know.'

' But how do they know it ?'

' Well, by hearing the sound of the lamentation of those whose hands and feet have been cut off, they know it.'

[70] ' Just so, great king, it is by hearing the glad words of those who have seen Nirvâna, that they who have not received it know how happy a state it is.'

' Very good, Nâgasena !'

Here ends the Fourth Chapter.

¹ The opposite point (whether he who has Nirvâna, knows that he has it) is discussed above, II, 2.

BOOK III. CHAPTER 5.

1. The king said: 'Have you, Nāgasena, seen the Buddha?'

'No, Sire.'

'Then have your teachers seen the Buddha?'

'No, Sire.'

'Then, venerable Nāgasena, there is no Buddha¹!'

'But, great king, have you seen the river Ūhā in the Himālaya mountains?'

'No, Sir.'

'Or has your father seen it?'

'No, Sir.'

'Then, your Majesty, is there therefore no such river?'

'It is there. Though neither I nor my father has seen it, it is nevertheless there.'

'Just so, great king, though neither I nor my teachers have seen the Blessed One, nevertheless there was such a person.'

'Very good, Nāgasena!'

2. The king said: 'Is the Buddha, Nāgasena, pre-eminent?'

'Yes, he is incomparable.'

'But how do you know of one you have never seen that he is pre-eminent.'

'Now what do you think, O king? They who have never seen the ocean would they know concerning it: "Deep, unmeasurable, unfathomable is the mighty ocean. Into it do the five great rivers flow—the Ganges, the Jumna, the Akiravati, the Sarabhû, and the Maht—and yet is there in it no appearance of being more empty or more full!"?

¹ This dialogue is so far identical with VI, 1, 1. It is a kind of parody on Gotama's own argument about the Brahmins and Brahma ('Have they seen God,' &c.) in the Tevigga Sutta I, 12-15, translated in my 'Buddhist Suttas,' pp. 172-174.

'Yes, they would know that.'

'Just so, great king, when I think of the mighty disciples who have passed away then do I know that the Buddha is incomparable.' [71]

'Very good, Nâgasena!'

3. The king said: 'Is it possible, Nâgasena, for others to know how incomparable the Buddha is?'

'Yes, they may know it.'

'But how can they?'

'Long, long ago, O king, there was a master of writing, by name Tissa the Elder, and many are the years gone by since he has died. How can people know of him?'

'By his writing, Sir.'

'Just so, great king, whosoever sees what the Truth¹ is, he sees what the Blessed One was, for the Truth was preached by the Blessed One.'

'Very good, Nâgasena!'

4. The king said: 'Have you, Nâgasena, seen what the Truth is?'

'Have not we disciples, O king, to conduct ourselves our lives long as under the eye of the Buddha, and under his command²?'

'Very good, Nâgasena!'

¹ Dhammam, here nearly=Buddhism. See below, III, 5, 10.

² Mr. Trenckner thinks there is a lacuna here; and Hīnaś-kumburê's version perhaps supports this. He renders the passage, 'How can a man use a path he does not know? And have not we

5. The king said : 'Where there is no transmigration, Nâgasena, can there be rebirth ?'

'Yes, there can.'

'But how can that be ? Give me an illustration.'

'Suppose a man, O king, were to light a lamp from another lamp, can it be said that the one transmigrates from, or to, the other ?'

'Certainly not.'

'Just so, great king, is rebirth without transmigration.'

'Give me a further illustration.'

'Do you recollect, great king, having learnt, when you were a boy, some verse or other from your teacher ?'

'Yes, I recollect that.'

'Well then, did that verse transmigrate from your teacher ?'

'Certainly not.'

'Just so, great king, is rebirth without transmigration.'

'Very good, Nâgasena !'

6. The king said : 'Is there such a thing, Nâgasena, as the soul¹ ?'

'In the highest sense, O king, there is no such thing².'

our lives long to conduct ourselves according to the Vinaya (the rules of the Order), which the Buddha preached, and which are called the eye of the Buddha, and according to the Sikkhâpada (ethics) which he laid down, and which are called his command ?' But there are other passages, no less amplified in the Siṃhalese, where there is evidently no lacuna in the Pâli ; and the passage may well have been meant as a kind of riddle, to which the Siṃhalese supplies the solution.

¹ Vedagât. See above, II, 3, 6, p. 86 (note).

² Mr. Trenckner thinks there is a lacuna here. The Siṃhalese follows the Pâli word for word.

‘Very good, Nâgasena!’

7. [72] The king said: ‘Is there any being, Nâgasena, who transmigrates from this body to another?’

‘No, there is not.’

‘But if so, would it not get free from its evil deeds.’

‘Yes, if it were not reborn; but if it were, no¹.’

‘Give me an illustration.’

‘Suppose, O king, a man were to steal another man’s mangoes, would the thief deserve punishment?’

‘Yes.’

‘But he would not have stolen the mangoes the other set in the ground. Why would he deserve punishment?’

‘Because those he stole were the result of those that were planted.’

‘Just so, great king, this name-and-form commits deeds, either pure or impure, and by that Karma another name-and-form is reborn. And therefore is it not set free from its evil deeds?’

‘Very good, Nâgasena!’

8. The king said: ‘When deeds are committed, Nâgasena, by one name-and-form, what becomes of those deeds?’

‘The deeds would follow it, O king, like a shadow that never leaves it².’

‘Can any one point out those deeds, saying: “Here are those deeds, or there”?’

‘No.’

¹ This is an exact repetition of what we had above, II, 2, 6.

² These last words are a quotation of those that recur at Samyutta III, 2, 10, 10, and Dhammapada, verse 2.

‘Give me an illustration.’

‘Now what do you think, O king? Can any one point out the fruits which a tree has not yet produced, saying: “Here they are, or there”?’

‘Certainly not, Sir.’

‘Just so, great king, so long as the continuity of life is not cut off, it is impossible to point out the deeds that are done.’

‘Very good, Nāgasena!’

9. [73] The king said: ‘Does he, Nāgasena, who is about to be reborn know that he will be born?’

‘Yes, he knows it, O king.’

‘Give me an illustration.’

‘Suppose a farmer, O king, a householder, were to put seed in the ground, and it were to rain well, would he know that a crop would be produced.’

‘Yes, he would know that.’

‘Just so, great king, does he who is about to be reborn know¹ that he will be born.’

‘Very good, Nāgasena²!’

10. The king said: ‘Is there such a person as the Buddha, Nāgasena?’

‘Yes.’

‘Can he then, Nāgasena, be pointed out as being here or there?’

‘The Blessed One, O king, has passed away by that kind of passing away in which nothing remains which could tend to the formation of another indi-

¹ That is before he is born.

² This is all very parallel to II, 2, 2.

vidual¹. It is not possible to point out the Blessed One as being here or there.'

'Give me an illustration.'

'Now what do you think, O king? When there is a great body of fire blazing, is it possible to point out any one flame that has gone out, that it is here or there?'

'No, Sir. That flame has ceased, it has vanished.'

'Just so, great king, has the Blessed One passed away by that kind of passing away in which no root remains for the formation of another individual. The Blessed One has come to an end, and it cannot be pointed out of him, that he is here or there. But in the body of his doctrine he can, O king, be pointed out. For the doctrine² was preached by the Blessed One?'

'Very good, Nâgasena!'

Here ends the Fifth Chapter.

¹ Anupâdisesâya nibbânadhâtuyâ.

² Dhamma. See above, III, 5, 3.

BOOK III. CHAPTER 6.

1. The king said: 'Is the body, Nâgasena, dear to you recluses?'

'No, they love not the body.'

'Then why do you nourish it and lavish attention upon it?'

'In all the times and places, O king, that you have gone down to battle, did you never get wounded by an arrow?'

'Yes, that has happened to me.'

'In such cases, O king, [74] is not the wound anointed with salve, and smeared with oil, and bound up in a bandage.'

'Yes, such things are done to it.'

'What then? Is the wound dear to you that you treat it so tenderly, and lavish such attention upon it?'

'No, it is not dear to me in spite of all that, which is only done that the flesh may grow again.'

'Just so, great king, with the recluses and the body. Without cleaving to it do they bear about the body for the sake of righteousness of life. The body, O king, has been declared by the Blessed One to be like a wound. And therefore merely as a sore, and without cleaving to it, do the recluses bear about the body. For it has been said by the Blessed One:

"Covered with clammy skin, an impure thing and foul, Nine-apertured, it oozes, like a sore¹."

'Well answered, Nâgasena!'

¹ I have not been able to trace this couplet. On the sentiment compare the eloquent words of the young wife at vol. i, p. 200 of my 'Buddhist Birth Stories,' and Sutta Nipâta I, 11.

2. The king said: 'Did the Buddha, Nâgasena, the omniscient one, foresee all things?'

'Yes. The Blessed One was not only omniscient. He foresaw all things.'

'Then why was it that he was in the habit only from time to time, and as occasion arose, of laying down rules for the members of the Order?'

'Is there any physician, O king, who knows all the medicinal drugs to be found on the earth?'

'Yes, there may be such a man.'

'Well, O king, does he give his decoctions to the patient to drink at a time when illness has already set in, or before that?'

'When the malady has arisen.'

'Just so, great king, the Blessed One, though he was omniscient and foresaw all things, laid down no rule at an unseasonable time, but only when need arose did he establish a regulation which his disciples were not to transgress as long as they lived.'

'Well answered, Nâgasena!'

3. [75] The king said: 'Is it true, Nâgasena, that the Buddha was endowed with the thirty-two bodily marks of a great man, and graced with the eighty subsidiary characteristics; that he was golden in colour with a skin like gold, and that there spread around him a glorious halo of a fathom's length?'

'Such, O king, was the Blessed One.'

'But were his parents like that?'

'No, they were not.'

'In that case you must say that he was born so. But surely a son is either like his mother, or those on the mother's side, or he is like his father, or those on the father's side !'

¹ This is how Hînaï-kumburê understands the passage.

The Elder replied : ' Is there such a thing, O king, as a lotus flower with a hundred petals ?'

' Yes, there is.'

' Where does it grow up ?'

' It is produced in mud, and in water it comes to perfection ¹.'

' But does the lotus resemble the mud of the lake, whence it springs up, either in colour, or in smell, or in taste ?'

' Certainly not.'

' Then does it resemble the water ?'

' Nor that either.'

' Just so, great king, is it that the Blessed One had the bodily signs and marks you have mentioned, though his parents had them not.'

' Well answered, Nâgasena !'

4. The king said : ' Was the Buddha, Nâgasena, pure in conduct (was he a Brahma-kârin) ?'

' Yes, the Blessed One was pure.'

' Then, Nâgasena, it follows that he was a follower of Brahmâ ².'

¹ Âsîyati. See Dr. Morris in the ' Journal of the Pâli Text Society,' 1884, p. 72.

² There is an untranslatable play here upon the name of the god, which is used in its sense of ' pure, best,' in the expression ' pure in conduct.' The first question really amounts to : Was the Buddha's conduct ' Brahma,' that is, ' best,' which has come to have the meaning ' pure' for the same reason that our expression ' a moral man' has often that particular connotation ? It is quite true that the etymological meaning of the word is neither ' best' nor ' pure' ; but when our author wrote the secondary sense had completely, in Pâli, driven out the etymological sense.

‘Have you a state elephant, O king?’

‘Certainly.’ [76]

‘Well now, does that elephant ever trumpet (literally “cry the heron’s cry”)?’

‘Oh, yes.’

‘But is he, then, on that account a follower of the herons?’

‘Of course not.’

‘Now tell me, great king, has Brahmâ wisdom (Buddhi), or has he not?’

‘He is a being with wisdom.’

‘Then (on your argument) he is surely a follower of Buddha².’

‘Well answered, Nâgasena!’

5. The king said: ‘Is ordination³ a good thing?’

‘Yes, a good thing and a beautiful.’

‘But did the Buddha obtain it, or not?’

‘Great king, when the Blessed One attained omniscience at the foot of the tree of Knowledge, that was to him an ordination. There was no conferring of ordination upon him at the hands of others—in the way that the Blessed One laid down regulations for his disciples, never to be transgressed by them their lives long⁴!’

‘Very true, Nâgasena!’

¹ This technical term for an elephant’s trumpeting is not infrequent. See, for instance, Gâtaka I, 50.

² As a matter of fact Brahmâ, the nearest approach in the Indian thought of that time to our idea of God, is always represented, in Buddhism, as a good Buddhist. See, for instance, ‘Buddhist Suttas,’ p. 116, and my note at p. 117.

³ Upasampadâ. Admission to the higher grade in the Order.

⁴ Mr. Trenckner again suspects something dropped out in this reply. But the connection of ideas seems to me quite sufficient.

6. The king said: 'To which of these two, Nâgasena,—the man who weeps at the death of his mother, and the man who weeps out of love for the Truth (Dhamma),—are his tears a cure?'

'The tears of the one, O king, are stained and hot with the three fires of passion. The tears of the other are stainless and cool. Now there is cure in coolness and calm, but in heat and passion there can be no cure¹.'

'Very good, Nâgasena!'

7. The king said: 'What is the distinction, Nâgasena, between him who is full of passion, and him who is void of passion?'

'The one is overpowered by craving, O king, and the other not.'

'But what does that mean?'

'The one is in want, O king, and the other not.'

'I look at it, Sir, in this way. He who has passion and he who has not—both of them alike—desire what is good to eat, either hard or soft. And neither of them desires what is wrong.'

'The lustful man, O king, in eating his food enjoys both the taste and the lust that arises from taste, [77] but the man free from lusts experiences the taste only, and not the lust arising therefrom.'

'Well answered, Nâgasena!'

The Sinhalese follows the Pâli, but that of course only shows that the text before the translator was here the same as in Mr. Trenckner's edition.

¹ The point of this lies in the allusion to the coolness and calm of Nirvâna, or Arahatsip, which is the dying out of the three fires of lust, ill-will, and delusion. The word used for coolness, Sitala, is one of the many epithets of Arahatsip.

8. The king said : ' Venerable Nâgasena, where does wisdom dwell ?'

' Nowhere, O king.'

' Then, Sir, there is no such thing as wisdom.'

' Where does the wind dwell, O king ?'

' Not anywhere, Sir.'

' So there is no such thing as wind.'

' Well answered, Nâgasena !'

9. The king said : ' When you speak of transmigration¹, Nâgasena, what does that mean ?'

' A being born here, O king, dies here. Having died here, it springs up elsewhere. Having been born there, there it dies. Having died there, it springs up elsewhere. That is what is meant by transmigration.'

' Give me an illustration.'

' It is like the case of a man who, after eating a mango, should set the seed in the ground. From that a great tree would be produced and give fruit. And there would be no end to the succession, in that way, of mango trees.'

' Very good, Nâgasena !'

10. The king said : ' By what, Nâgasena, does one recollect what is past and done long ago ?'

' By memory.'

' But is it not by the mind², not by the memory², that we recollect ?'

' Do you recollect any business, O king, that you have done and then forgotten ?'

' Yes.'

' What then ? Were you then without a mind ?'

¹ Samsâra.

² Kittena, no satiyâ.

‘No. But my memory failed me.’

‘Then why do you say that it is by the mind, not by the memory, that we recollect?’

‘Very good, Nâgasena!’

11. The king said: ‘Does memory, Nâgasena, always arise subjectively, [78] or is it stirred up by suggestion from outside¹?’

‘Both the one and the other.’

‘But does not that amount to all memory being subjective in origin, and never artificial?’

‘If, O king, there were no artificial (imparted) memory, then artisans would have no need of practice, or art, or schooling, and teachers would be useless. But the contrary is the case.’

‘Very good, Nâgasena!’

Here ends the Sixth Chapter.

¹ I follow Hîna/i-kumburê’s interpretation of the difficult words in the text, which Mr. Trenckner says is corrupt. Ka/umika is ‘artificial,’ like the Sanskrit krîtrima. It has only been found as yet in our author.

BOOK III. CHAPTER 7.

1. The king said : ' In how many ways, Nâgasena, does memory spring up ? '

' In sixteen ways, O king. That is to say : by personal experience ¹, as when the venerable Ananda, or the devoted woman Khugguttarâ, or any others who had that power, called to mind their previous births—[79] or by outward aid ², as when others continue to remind one who is by nature forgetful—or by the impression made by the greatness of some occasion ³, as kings remember their coronation day, or as we remember the day of our conversion—by the impression made by joy ⁴, as when one remembers that which gave him pleasure—or by the impression made by sorrow ⁵, as when one remembers that which pained him—or from similarity of appearance ⁶, as on seeing one like them we call to mind the mother or father or sister or brother, or on seeing a camel or an ox or an ass we call to mind others like them—or by difference of appearance ⁷, as when we remember that such and such a colour, sound, smell, taste, or touch belong to such and such a thing—or by the knowledge of speech ⁸, as when one who is by nature forgetful is reminded by others and then himself remembers—or by a sign ⁹, as when we recognise a draught bullock by a brand mark or some other sign—or from effort to recollect ¹⁰, as when one by

¹ Abhigâñato. ² Ka/umikâya. ³ O/ârika-viññâñato.

⁴ Hita-viññâñato.

⁵ Ahita-viññâñato.

⁶ Sabhâga-nimittato.

⁷ Visabhâga-nimittato.

⁸ Kathâbhiññâñato.

⁹ Lakkhanato.

¹⁰ Saranato.

nature forgetful is made to recollect by being urged again and again : "try and think of it"—or by calculation¹¹, as when one knows by the training he has received in writing that such and such a letter ought to follow after such and such a one—or by arithmetic¹², as when accountants do big sums by their knowledge of figures—or by learning by heart¹³, as the repeaters of the scriptures by their skill in learning by heart recollect so much—[80] or by meditation¹⁴, as when a Bhikkhu calls to mind his temporary states in days gone by—by reference to a book¹⁵, as when kings calling to mind a previous regulation, say : "Bring the book here," and remind themselves out of that—or by a pledge¹⁶, as when at the sight of goods deposited a man recollects (the circumstances under which they were pledged)—or by association¹⁷, as when one remembers a thing because one has seen it, or a sound because one has heard it, or an odour because one has smelt it, or a touch because one has felt it, or a concept because one has perceived it.'

'Very good, Nâgasena!'

2. The king said : 'Your people say, Nâgasena, that though a man should have lived a hundred ¹¹ Muddâto (see above, p. 6).

¹² Gananâto.

¹³ Dharanato. The noun dhâranakâ is only found here (where I follow the Sinhalese interpretation) and at Gâtaka II, 203 (where it means 'debtor,' as in Sanskrit).

¹⁴ Bhâvanato. For a translation of the full text, here abridged in the text, see 'Buddhist Suttas,' pp. 215, 216 (§ 17).

¹⁵ Potthaka-nibandhanato.

¹⁶ Upanikkhepato.

¹⁷ Anubhûtato, perhaps 'experience.' There are really seventeen, not sixteen, so some two must have been regarded by the author as forming one between them. These may be Nos. 1 and 14, or more likely Nos. 4 and 5.

years an evil life, yet if, at the moment of death, thoughts of the Buddha should enter his mind, he will be reborn among the gods. This I don't believe. And thus do they also say: "By one case of destruction of life a man may be reborn in purgatory." That, too, I cannot believe.'

'But tell me, O king. Would even a tiny stone float on the water without a boat?'

'Certainly not.'

'Very well; but would not a hundred cart-loads of stones float on the water if they were loaded in a boat?'

'Yes, they would float right enough.'

'Well, good deeds are like the boat.'

'Very good, Nâgasena!'

3. The king said: 'Do you (recluses), Nâgasena, strive after the removal of past sorrow?'

'No.'

'What then? Is it future sorrow you strive to remove?'

'No.'

'Present sorrow, then?' [81]

'Not that either.'

'Then if it be neither past, nor future, nor present sorrow that you strive to remove, whereunto is it that you strive?'

'What are you asking, O king? That this sorrow should cease and no other sorrow should arise—that is what we strive after.'

'But, Nâgasena, is there (now) such a thing as future sorrow?'

'No. I grant that.'

'Then you are mighty clever people to strive after the removal of that which does not exist!'

‘Has it ever happened to you, O king, that rival kings rose up against you as enemies and opponents?’

‘Yes, certainly.’

‘Then you set to work, I suppose, to have moats dug, and ramparts thrown up, and watch towers erected, and strongholds built, and stores of food collected¹?’

‘Not at all. All that had been prepared beforehand.’

‘Or you had yourself trained in the management of war elephants, and in horsemanship, and in the use of the war chariot, and in archery and fencing?’

‘Not at all. I had learnt all that before.’

‘But why?’

‘With the object of warding off future danger.’

‘How so? Is there such a thing (now) as future danger?’

‘No. I must grant that.’

‘Then you kings are mighty clever people to trouble yourselves about the warding off of that which does not exist!’

‘Give me a further illustration.’

‘Tell me, O king. Is it when you are athirst that you set to work to have wells dug, or ponds hollowed out, or reservoirs formed, with the object of getting something to drink?’

‘Certainly not. All that has been prepared beforehand.’

‘But to what end?’

‘With the object of preventing future thirst.’

‘How so? Is there such a thing as future thirst?’

¹ All that follows only differs by slight additions from III, 4, 3 above, pp. 100-102.

‘No, Sir.’

‘So you are mighty clever people, O king, [82] to take all that trouble to prevent the future thirst which all the time does not exist!’

‘Give me a further illustration.’

[Then the Elder referred, as before, to the means people always took of warding against future hunger, and the king expressed his pleasure at the way in which the puzzle had been solved.]

4. The king said: ‘How far is it, Nāgasena, from here to the Brahma world¹?’

‘Very far is it, O king. If a rock, the size of an upper chamber, were to fall from there, it would take four months to reach the earth, though it came down eight-and-forty thousand leagues² each day and night.’

‘Good, Nāgasena! Now do not your people say that a Bhikkhu, who has the power of Iddhi and the mastery over his mind³, can vanish from Gambu-dīpa, and appear in the Brahma world, as quickly as a strong man could stretch forth his bent up arm, or bend it in again if it were stretched out? That is a saying I cannot believe. How is it possible that he could traverse so quickly so many hundreds of leagues?’

The Elder replied: ‘In what district, O king, were you born?’

¹ One of the highest heavens.

² Yogana, a league of seven miles.

³ Ketovasippatto, which Hīnaṣi-kumburē renders mano vasi prāpta wū. I know of no passage in the Piṭakas where the phrase occurs in connection with Iddhi; but it is often used by our author. See, for instance, just below, III, 7, 9.

‘There is an island called Alasanda¹. It was there I was born.’

‘And how far is Alasanda from here?’

‘About two hundred leagues.’

‘Do you know for certain of any business you once did there and now recollect?’

‘Oh, yes.’

‘So quickly, great king, have you gone about two hundred leagues.’

‘Very good, Nāgasena!’

5. The king said : ‘If one man, Nāgasena, were to die here and be reborn in the Brahma world, and another were to die here and be reborn in Kashmīr, which of the two would arrive first?’

‘Both together, O king.’

‘Give me an illustration.’

‘In what town [83], O king, were you born?’

‘There is a village called Kalasi. It was there I was born.’

‘And how far is Kalasi from here?’

‘About two hundred leagues.’

‘How far is Kashmīr from here?’

‘Twelve leagues.’

‘Now, great king, think of Kalasi.’

‘I have done so.’

‘And now, think of Kashmīr.’

‘I have done so.’

‘Well, which did you think of quickest?’

‘Of each in the same time.’

‘Just so, great king, would it take no longer to be reborn in the Brahma world than to be reborn in Kashmīr. And tell me, O king. Suppose two birds were flying, and one were to alight on a tall tree, and the other on a small shrub. If they settled both at the same moment, whose shadow would first fall to the ground ?'

¹ Alexandria (in Baktria) built on an island in the Indus.

'The two shadows would fall together.'

'Just so, great king, in the case you put.'

'Very good, Nâgasena !'

6. The king said : 'Venerable Nâgasena, how many kinds of wisdom are there ?'

'Seven, O king.'

'And by how many kinds of wisdom does one become wise ?'

'By one : that is to say by the kind of wisdom called "the investigation of the Truth¹."'

'Then why is it said there are seven ?'

'Tell me, O king. Suppose a sword were lying in its sheath and not taken in the hand, could it cut off anything you wanted to cut off with it ?'

'Certainly not.'

'Just so, great king, by the other kinds of wisdom can nothing be understood without investigation of the Truth.'

'Very good, Nâgasena !'

7. The king said : 'Which, Nâgasena, is there more of, merit or demerit ?'

'Merit.' [84]

'But why ?'

'He who does wrong, O king, comes to feel remorse, and acknowledges his evil-doing. So demerit does not increase. But he who does well feels no remorse, and feeling no remorse gladness will spring up within him, and joy will arise to him thus gladdened, and so rejoicing all his frame will be at peace, and being thus at peace he will experience a blissful feeling of content, and in that bliss his heart will be at rest, and he whose heart is thus at rest knows things as they really are¹. For that reason merit increases. A man, for example, though his hands and feet are cut off, if he gave to the Blessed One merely a handful of lotuses, would not enter purgatory for ninety-one Kalpas. That is why I said, O king, that there is more merit than demerit.'

¹ Dhamma-vikaya-samboggaṅgena.

'Very good, Nâgasena !'

8. The king said : 'Whose, Nâgasena, is the greater demerit—his who sins consciously, or his who sins inadvertently ?'

'He who sins inadvertently, O king, has the greater demerit.'

'In that case, reverend Sir, we shall punish doubly any of our family or our court who do wrong unintentionally.'

'But what do you think, O king ? If one man were to seize hold intentionally of a fiery mass of metal glowing with heat, and another were to seize hold of it unintentionally, which would be more burnt ?'

'The one who did not know what he was doing.'

'Well, it is just the same with the man who does wrong.'

'Very good, Nâgasena !'

9. The king said : 'Is there any one, Nâgasena,

¹ The above is a paragraph constantly recurring in the Pâli Piṭakas. See, for instance, Dīgha II, 75 ; Aṅguttara III, 104 ; and Mahāvagga VIII, 15, 13 (where I have annotated the details).

who can go with this bodily frame to Uttara-kuru or to the Brahma world, or to any other of the four great continents (into which the world is divided)?'

'Yes, there are such people.'

'But how can they?' [85]

'Do you recollect, O king, having ever jumped a foot or two feet across the ground?'

'Yes, Nâgasena, I can jump twelve feet.'

'But how?'

'I fix my mind on the idea of alighting there, and at the moment of my determination my body comes to seem light to me.'

'Just so, O king, can the Bhikkhu, who has the power of Iddhi, and has the mastery over his mind, when he has made his mind rise up to the occasion, travel through the sky by means of his mind.'

'Very good, Nâgasena!'

10. The king said: 'Your people say there are bones even a hundred leagues long. Now there is no tree even one hundred leagues in length, how then can there be bones so long?'

'But tell me, O king. Have you not heard of fishes in the sea five hundred leagues in length?'

'Yes. I have heard of such.'

'If so, could they not have bones a hundred leagues long?'

'Very good, Nâgasena!'

11. The king said: 'Your people, Nâgasena, say that it is possible to suppress the inhaling and exhaling (of one's breath).'

'Yes, that can be done.'

'But how?'

‘Tell me, O king. Have you ever heard of a man snoring¹?’

‘Yes.’

‘Well, would not that sound stop if he bent his body?’

‘Yes.’

‘Then surely if that sound would stop at the mere bending of the body of one who is untrained alike in body, in conduct, in mind, and in wisdom—why should it not be possible for the breathing of one trained in all these respects, and who has besides reached up to the fourth stage of the ecstatic contemplation², to be suppressed?’

‘Very good, Nâgasena!’

12. The king said: ‘There is the expression ocean, Nâgasena. Why is the water called ocean?’

The Elder replied [86]: ‘Because there is just as much salt as water, O king, and just as much water as salt, therefore is it called ocean³.’

‘Very good, Nâgasena!’

13. The king said: ‘Why, Nâgasena, is the ocean all of one taste, the taste of salt?’

¹ Kâkakkhamâno. See Gâtaka I, 60, 24; 160, 18. Hînaikumburê renders it ‘sleeping with a snore (gorawamin) like the sound of crows (kâka).’

² Ghâna.

³ Samudda. The answer (to give opportunity for which the question is invented) is a kind of punning etymology of this Pâli word for ocean. Our author seems to take it as meaning ‘equal water-ness,’ from sama and ud(aka). The real derivation is very different. It is from the root ud, which is allied to our ‘wet’ and the Greek ύδρς, and the prefix sam in the sense of completeness. It is difficult to reconcile the reply to this. There is a kind of conversation condemned in the Digha I, 1, 17, and elsewhere as samuddakkhâyika, which is explained in the Sumaṅgala, p. 91, as deriving samudda from sa, ‘with,’ and muddâ, ‘a seal ring.’

‘Because the water in it has stood so long, therefore it is all of one taste, the taste of salt¹.’

‘Very good, Nâgasena!’

14. The king said: ‘Can even the most minute thing, Nâgasena, be divided?’

‘Yes, it can.’

‘And what, Sir, is the most minute of all things.’

‘Truth (Dhamma), O king, is the most minute and subtle. But this is not true of all qualities (Dhammâ). Subtleness or the reverse are epithets of qualities. But whatever can be divided that can wisdom (Paññâ) divide, and there is no other quality which can divide wisdom.’

‘Very good, Nâgasena!’

15. The king said: ‘These three, Nâgasena,—perception, and reason, and the soul in a being,—are they all different both in letter and in essence, or the same in essence differing only in the letter?’

‘Recognition, O king, is the mark of perception, and discrimination of reason², and there is no such thing as a soul in beings³.’

¹ In the same way the Buddhist religion (the Dhamma-Vinaya) is said in the Kullavagga IX, 1, 4, to be ‘all of one taste, the taste of salvation, emancipation’ (Vimutti).

² So also above, II, 3, 12. Here the words are Vigânanalakkhanam viññânam, pagânanâ-lakkhana paññâ, which the Ceylon translator amplifies into ‘As a peasant, on seeing grains of gold, would recognise them as valuable, so is it the characteristic of viññâna to recognise aramunu (objects of sense) when it sees them. As a goldsmith, on seeing grains of gold, would not only know they were valuable, but also discriminate their value (as large or small), so is it the characteristic of paññâ, not only to recognise, but also to discriminate between the objects of sense.’

³ See above, II, 3, 6, and II, 3, 16. Hînaî-kumburê here renders

‘But if there be no such thing as a soul, what is it then which sees forms with the eye, and hears sounds with the ear, and smells odours with the nose, and tastes tastes with the tongue, and feels touch with the body, or perceives qualities with the mind?’

The Elder replied: ‘If there be a soul (distinct from the body) which does all this, then if the door of the eye were thrown down (if the eye were plucked out) could it stretch out its head, as it were, through the larger aperture and (with greater range) see forms much more clearly than before? Could one hear sounds better if the ears were torn away, or smell better if the nose were cut off, or taste better if the tongue were pulled out, or feel touch better if the body were destroyed?’

[87] ‘Certainly not, Sir.’

‘Then there can be no soul inside the body.’

‘Very good, Nāgasena!’

16. The Elder said: ‘A hard thing there is, O king, which the Blessed One has done.’

‘And what is that?’

‘The fixing of all those mental conditions which depend on one organ of sense, telling us that such is contact, and such sensation, and such idea, and such intention, and such thought¹.’

‘Give me an illustration.’

‘Suppose, O king, a man were to wade down into the sea, and taking some water in the palm of his hand, were to taste it with his tongue. Would he gīvo by the ‘life (or perhaps living principle, gīvitā) inside the forms produced out of the four elements.’

¹ Phasso, vedanā, saññā, ketaṇā, kittaṃ.

distinguish whether it were water from the Ganges, or from the Jumna, or from the Aśiravatī, or from the Sarabhū, or from the Mahtī?

‘Impossible, Sir.’

‘More difficult than that, great king, is it to have distinguished between the mental conditions which follow on the exercise of any one of the organs of sense!’

‘Very good, Nāgasena!’

Here ends the Seventh Chapter ¹.

17. The Elder said: ‘Do you know, O king, what time it is now?’

‘Yes, Sir, I know. The first watch of the night is now passed. The middle watch is now going on. The torches are lit. The four banners are ordered to be raised, and appropriate gifts to be issued to you from the treasury.’

The Yonakas said: ‘Very good, great king. Most able is the Bhikkhu.’

‘Yes, my men. Most able is the Bhikkhu. Were the master like him and the pupil like me, [88] a clever scholar would not take long in getting at the truth.’

Then the king, pleased with the explanations given of the questions he had put, had Nāgasena robed in an embroidered cloak worth a hundred thousand ², and said to him: ‘Venerable Nāgasena, I hereby order that you shall be provided with your daily meal for eight hundred days, and give you the choice of anything in the palace that it is lawful for you to take.' And when the Elder refused, saying he had enough to live on, the king rejoined : ' I know, Sir, you have enough to live on. But you should both protect me and protect yourself—yourself from the possibility of a public rumour to the effect that you convinced me but received nothing from me, and me from the possibility of a public rumour that though I was convinced I would give nothing in acknowledgement.'

¹ See the note at the end of Book II, Chapter 3, § 14.

² That is kaḥāpaṇas, ‘half-pennies.’

' Let it be as you wish, great king,' was the reply.

Then the king said : ' As the lion, the king of beasts, when put into a cage, though it were of gold, would turn his face longingly to the outside ; even so do I, though I dwell in the world, turn my thoughts longingly to the higher life of you recluses. But, Sir, if I were to give up the household life and renounce the world it would not be long I should have to live, so many are my foes.'

Then the venerable Nāgasena, having thus solved the questions put by Milinda the king, arose from his seat and departed to the hermitage.

18. Not long after Nāgasena had gone, Milinda the king thought over to himself whether he had propounded his questions rightly, and whether the replies had been properly made. And he came to the conclusion that to questions well put replies had been well given. And Nāgasena likewise, when he reached the hermitage, thought the matter over to himself, and concluded that to questions well put right replies had been given.

Now Nāgasena robed himself early in the morning, and went with his bowl in his hand to the palace, and sat down on the seat prepared for him. And Milinda saluted the venerable Nâgasena, [89] and sat down respectfully at his side, and said to him : ' Pray do not think, Sir, that I was kept awake all the rest of the night exulting in the thought of having questioned you. I was debating with myself as to whether I had asked aright, and had been rightly answered. And I concluded that I had.'

And the Elder on his part said : ' Pray do not suppose, great king, that I passed the rest of the night rejoicing at having answered all you asked. I too was thinking over what had been said by us both. And I came to the result that you had questioned well, and that I had rightly answered.'

Thus did these two great men congratulate each the other on what he had spoken well.

Here ends the answering of the problems of the questions of Milinda.

BOOK IV.

MENDAKA-PAÑHO.

THE SOLVING OF DILEMMAS.

CHAPTER 1. [90]

1. Master of words and sophistry, clever and wise
 Milinda tried to test great Nāgasena's skill.
 Leaving him not ¹, again and yet again,
 He questioned and cross-questioned him, until
 His own skill was proved foolishness.
 Then he became a student of the Holy Writ.
 All night, in secrecy, he pondered o'er
 The ninefold Scriptures, and therein he found
 Dilemmas hard to solve, and full of snares.
 And thus he thought: 'The conquering Buddha's words
 Are many-sided, some explanatory,
 Some spoken as occasion rose to speak,
 Some dealing fully with essential points.
 Through ignorance of what, each time, was meant
 There will be strife hereafter as to what
 The King of Righteousness has thus laid down
 In these diverse and subtle utterances.
 Let me now gain great Nāgasena's ear,
 And putting to him that which seems so strange
 And hard—yea contradictory—get him
 To solve it. So in future times, when men
 Begin to doubt, the light of his solutions
 Shall guide them, too, along the path of Truth.'

¹ Vasanto tassa kkhâyâya, literally 'abiding under his shadow.'
 Compare Gâtaka I, 91.

2. Now Milinda the king, when the night was turning into day, and the sun had risen, bathed, and with hands clasped and raised to his forehead, called to mind the Buddhas of the past, the present, and the future, and solemnly undertook the observance of the eightfold vow, saying to himself : ' For seven days from now will I do penance by taking upon myself the observance of the eight rules, and when my vow is accomplished will I go to the teacher and put to him, as questions, these dilemmas.' So Milinda the king laid aside his usual dress, and put off his ornaments ; and clad in yellow robes, with only a recluse's turban¹ on his head, in appearance like a hermit, did he carry out the eightfold abstinence, keeping in mind the vow—' For this seven days I am to decide no case at law. I am to harbour no lustful thought, no thought of ill-will, no thought tending to delusion. Towards all slaves, servants, and dependents I am to show a meek and lowly disposition. [91] I am to watch carefully over every bodily act, and over my six organs of sense. And I am to fill my heart with thoughts of love towards all beings.' Keeping this eightfold vow, establishing his heart in this eightfold moral law, for seven days he went not forth. But as the night was passing into day, at sunrise of the eighth day, he took his breakfast early, and then with downcast eyes and measured words, gentle in manner, collected in thought, glad and pleased and rejoicing in heart, did he go to Nâgasena. And bowing down at his feet, he stood respectfully on one side, and said :

3. ' There is a certain matter, venerable Nâgasena, that I desire to talk over with you alone. I wish no third person to be present. In some deserted spot, some secluded place in the forest, fit in all the eight respects for a recluse, there should this point of mine be put. And therein let there be nothing hid from me, nothing kept secret. I am now in a fit state to hear secret things when we are deep in consultation. And the meaning of what I say can be made clear by illustration. As it is to the broad earth, O Nāgasena, that it is right to entrust treasure when occasion arises for laying treasure by, so is it to me that it is right to entrust secret things when we are deep in consultation.'

¹ Pa/isîsakam. See Gâtaka II, 197.

4. Then having gone with the master to a secluded spot he further said: 'There are eight kinds of places, Nāgasena, which ought to be altogether avoided by a man who wants to consult. No wise man will talk a matter over in such places, or the matter falls to the ground and is brought to no conclusion. And what are the eight? Uneven ground, spots unsafe by fear of men, windy places, hiding spots, sacred places, high roads, light bambû bridges, and public bathing places.'

The Elder asked: 'What is the objection to each of these?'

The king replied: 'On uneven ground, Nāgasena, [92] the matter discussed becomes jerky, verbose, and diffuse, and comes to nothing. In unsafe places the mind is disturbed, and being disturbed does not follow the point clearly. In windy spots the voice is indistinct. In hiding places there are eavesdroppers. In sacred places the question discussed is apt to be diverted to the serious surroundings. On a high road it is apt to become frivolous, on a bridge unsteady and wavering, at a public bathing place the discussion would be matter of common talk. Therefore is it said¹:

“ Uneven ground, unsafe and windy spots,
And hiding places, and god-haunted shrines,
High roads, and bridges, and all bathing ghâts—
These eight avoid when talking of high things.”

5. ‘ There are eight kinds of people, Nâgasena, who when talking a matter over, spoil the discussion. And who are the eight ? He who walks in lust, he who walks in ill-will, he who walks in delusion, he who walks in pride, the greedy man, the sluggard, the man of one idea, and the fool.’

‘ What is the objection to each of these ? ’ asked the Elder.

‘ The first spoils the discussion by his lust, the next by his ill-will, the third by his delusions, the fourth by his pride, the fifth by his greed, the sixth by his sloth, the seventh by his narrowness, and the last by his folly. Therefore is it said :

“ The lustful, angry, or bewildered man,
The proud, the greedy, or the slothful man,
The man of one idea, and the poor fool—
These eight are spoilers of high argument.”

6. ‘ There are nine kinds of people, Nâgasena, who let out a secret that has been talked over with them, and treasure it not up in their hearts. And who are the nine ? The lustful man reveals it in obedience to some lust, the ill-tempered man in consequence of some ill-will, the deluded man under some mistake. [93] The timid man reveals it through fear, and the man greedy for gain to get something out of it. A woman reveals it through infirmity, a drunkard in his eagerness for drink, a eunuch because of his imperfection, and a child through fickleness. Therefore is it said :

¹ It is not known where the verses here (or the others quoted in these two pages) are taken from.

“The lustful, angry, or bewildered man,
The timid man, and he who seeks for gain,
A woman, drunkard, eunuch, or a child—
These nine are fickle, wavering, and mean.
When secret things are talked over to them
They straightway become public property.”

7. ‘There are eight causes, Nāgasena, of the advance, the ripening of insight. And what are the eight? The advance of years, the growth of reputation, frequent questioning, association with teachers, one’s own reflection, converse with the wise, cultivation of the loveable, and dwelling in a pleasant land. Therefore is it said :

“By growth in reputation, and in years,
By questioning, and by the master’s aid,
By thoughtfulness, and converse with the wise,
By intercourse with men worthy of love,
By residence within a pleasant spot—
By these nine is one’s insight purified.
They who have these, their wisdom grows¹.”

8. ‘This spot, Nāgasena, is free from the objections to talking matters over. And I am a model companion for any one desiring to do so. I can keep a secret, and will keep yours as long as I live. In all the eight ways just described my insight has grown ripe. It would be hard to find such a pupil as you may have in me.

¹ Pabhiggati in the text appears not to be an old error. The Sinhalese repeats it, but leaves it untranslated.

[94] 'Now towards a pupil who conducts himself thus aright the teacher ought to conduct himself in accordance with the twenty-five virtues of a teacher. And what are the twenty-five? He must always and without fail keep guard over his pupil. He must let him know what to cultivate, and what to avoid; about what he should be earnest, and what he may neglect. He must instruct him as to sleep, and as to keeping himself in health, and as to what food he may take, and what reject. He should teach him discrimination¹ (in food), and share with him all that is put, as alms, into his own bowl. He should encourage him, saying: "Be not afraid. You will gain advantage (from what is here taught you)." He should advise him as to the people whose company he should keep, and as to the villages and Vihâras he should frequent. He should never indulge in (foolish) talk² with him. When he sees any defect in him he should easily pardon it. He should be zealous, he should teach nothing partially, keep nothing secret, and hold nothing back³. He should look upon him in his heart as a son, saying to himself: "I have begotten him in learning¹." He should strive to bring him forward, saying to himself: "How can I keep him from going back?" He should determine in himself to make him strong in knowledge, saying to himself: "I will make him mighty." He should love him, never desert him in necessity, never neglect him in anything he ought to do for him, always befriend him—so far as he can rightly do so²—when he does wrong. These, Sir, are the twenty-five good qualities in a teacher. Treat me altogether in accordance therewith. Doubt, Lord, has overcome me. There are apparent contradictions in the word of the Conqueror. About them strife will hereafter arise; and in future times it will be hard to find a teacher with insight such as yours. Throw light for me on these dilemmas, to the downfall of the adversaries.'

¹ Viseso. It does not say in what, and the Simhalese simply repeats the word.

² Sallâpo na kâtabbo. The Simhalese merely repeats the word, which is often used without any bad connotation. See, for instance, Gâtaka I, 112.

³ So that, in the author's opinion, there is no 'Esoteric Doctrine' in true Buddhism. See the note, below, on IV, 4, 8.

9. Then the Elder agreed to what he had said, and in his turn set out the ten good qualities which ought to be found in a lay disciple: 'These ten, O king, are the virtues of a lay disciple. He suffers like pain and feels like joy as the Order does. He takes the Doctrine (Dhamma) as his master. He delights in giving so far as he is able to give. On seeing the religion (Dhamma) of the Conqueror decay, he does his best to revive it. He holds right views. Having no passion for excitement³, he runs

¹ So also in the Vinaya (Mahāvagga I, 25, 6).

² In the well-known passage in the Vinaya in which the mutual duties of pupils and teachers are set out in full (Mahāvagga I, 25, 26, translated in the 'Vinaya Texts,' vol. i, pp. 154 and foll.) there is a similar injunction (25, 22 = 26, 10) which throws light on the meaning of dhammena here.

³ Apagata-ko/ūhala-maṅgaliko. 'Laying aside the erroneous views and discipline called ko/ūhala and maṅgalika,' says the Sinhalese.

not after any other teacher his life long. He keeps guard over himself in thought and deed. He delights in peace, is a lover of peace. He feels no jealousy, [95] and walks not in religion in a quarrelsome spirit. He takes his refuge in the Buddha, he takes his refuge in the Doctrine, he takes his refuge in the Order. These, great king, are the ten good qualities of a lay disciple. They exist all of them in you. Hence is it fit, and right, and becoming in you that, seeing the decay of the religion of the Conqueror, you desire its prosperity. I give you leave. Ask of me whatever you will.'

[Here ends the introduction to the solving of dilemmas.]

THE DILEMMAS.

[ON HONOURS PAID TO THE BUDDHA.]

10. Then Milinda the king, having thus been granted leave, fell at the feet of the teacher, and raising his clasped hands to his forehead, said: 'Venerable Nāgasena, these leaders of other sects say thus: "If the Buddha accepts gifts he cannot have passed entirely away. He must be still in union with the world, having his being somewhere in it, in the world, a shareholder in the things of the world; and therefore any honour paid to him becomes empty and vain¹. On the other hand if he be entirely passed away (from life), unattached to the world, escaped from all existence, then honours would not be offered to him. For he who is entirely set free accepts no honour, and any act done to him who accepts it not becomes empty and vain." This is a dilemma which has two horns. It is not a matter within the scope of those who have no mind ¹, it is a question fit for the great. Tear asunder this net of heresy, put it on one side. To you has this puzzle been put. Give to the future sons of the Conqueror eyes wherewith to see the riddle to the confusion of their adversaries.'

¹ 'Because honours should be paid, in the way of worship, to those who have so passed away, and to them only,' is the implied suggestion, as if it were common ground to the Buddhists and their opponents. But there is no such doctrine in the Pāli Piṭakas, and could not be. The whole discussion breathes the spirit of a later time.

'The Blessed One, O king,' replied the Elder, 'is entirely set free. And the Blessed One accepts no gift. Even at the foot of the Tree of Wisdom he abandoned all accepting of gifts, how much more then now when he has passed entirely away by that kind of passing away which leaves no root over (for the formation of a new existence). For this, O king, has been said by Sâriputta, the commander of the faith ² :

"Though worshipped, these Unequalled Ones, alike
By gods and men, unlike them all they heed
Neither a gift nor worship. They accept
It not, neither refuse it. Through the ages
All Buddhas were so, so wil. ever be ³!"'

¹ Apatta-mânâsanam. 'Of those who have not attained to the insight of the Arahats,' says the Si halese by way of gloss.

² This verse is not found in our printed texts. The Thera Gâthâ (981-1017) has preserved thirty-seven of the verses attributed to Sâriputta, but this is not one of them.

³ Hīnaśī-kumbhūrē, who quotes the Pāli verses, reads pūga-yantā, and sādiyanti.

11. The king said: 'Venerable Nâgasena, a father may speak in praise of his son, or a son of his father. But that is no ground for putting the adversaries to shame. It is only an expression of their own belief. Come now! Explain this matter to me fully to the establishing of your own doctrine, [96] and to the unravelling of the net of the heretics.'

The Elder replied: 'The Blessed One, O king, is entirely set free (from life). And the Blessed One accepts no gift. If gods or men put up a building to contain the jewel treasure of the relics of a Tathâgata who does not accept their gift, still by that homage paid to the attainment of the supreme good under the form of the jewel treasure of his wisdom do they themselves attain to one or other of the three glorious states¹. Suppose, O king, that though a great and glorious fire had been kindled, it should die out, would it then again accept any supply of dried grass or sticks?'

'Even as it burned, Sir, it could not be said to accept fuel, how much less when it had died away, and ceased to burn, could it, an unconscious thing, accept it?'

'And when that one mighty fire had ceased, and gone out, would the world be bereft of fire?'

'Certainly not. Dry wood is the seat, the basis of fire, and any men who want fire can, by the exertion of their own strength and power, such as resides in individual men, once more, by twirling the fire-stick, produce fire, and with that fire do any work for which fire is required.'

¹ Tisso sampattiyo. That is, to another life as a man, or as a god, or to Arahatsip here, on earth, in this birth.

'Then that saying of the sectarians that "an act done to him who accepts it not is empty and vain" turns out to be false. As that great and glorious fire was set alight, even so, great king, was the Blessed One set alight in the glory of his Buddhahood over the ten thousand world systems. As it went out, so has he passed away into that kind of passing away in which no root remains. As the fire, when gone out, accepted no supply of fuel, just so, and for the good of the world, has his accepting of gifts ceased and determined. As men, when the fire is out, and has no further means of burning, then by their own strength and effort, such as resides in individual men, twirl the fire-stick and produce fire, and do any work for which fire is required—so do gods and men, though a Tathâgata has passed away and no longer accepts their gifts, yet put up a house for the jewel treasure of his relics, and doing homage to the attainment of supreme good under the form of the jewel treasure of his wisdom, they attain to one or other of the three glorious states. [97] Therefore is it, great king, that acts done to the Tathâgata, notwithstanding his having passed away and not accepting them, are nevertheless of value and bear fruit.'

12. 'Now hear, too, another reason for the same thing. Suppose, O king, there were to arise a great and mighty wind, and that then it were to die away. Would that wind acquiesce in being produced again?'

'A wind that has died away can have no thought or idea of being reproduced. And why? Because the element wind is an unconscious thing.'

'Or even, O king, would the word "wind" be still applicable to that wind, when it had so died away ?'

'Certainly not, Sir. But fans and punkahs are means for the production of wind. Any men who are oppressed by heat, or tormented by fever, can by means of fans and punkahs, and by the exertion of their own strength and power, such as resides in individual men, produce a breeze, and by that wind allay their heat, or assuage their fever.'

'Then that saying of the sectarians that "an act done to him who accepts it not is empty and vain" turns out to be false. As the great and mighty wind which blew, even so, great king, has the Blessed One blown over the ten thousand world systems with the wind of his love, so cool, so sweet, so calm, so delicate. As it first blew, and then died away, so has the Blessed One, who once blew with the wind so cool, so sweet, so calm, so delicate, of his love, now passed away with that kind of passing away in which no root remains. As those men were oppressed by heat and tormented with fever, even so are gods and men tormented and oppressed with threefold fire and heat¹. As fans and punkahs are means of producing wind, so the relics and the jewel treasure of the wisdom of a Tathâgata are means of producing the threefold attainment. [98] And as men oppressed by heat and tormented by fever can by fans and punkahs produce a breeze, and thus allay the heat and assuage the fever, so can gods and men by offering reverence to the relics, and the jewel treasure of the wisdom of a Tathâgata, though he has died away and accepts it not, cause goodness to arise within them, and by that goodness can assuage and can allay the fever and the torment of the threefold fire. Therefore is it, great king, that acts done to the Tathâgata, notwithstanding his having passed away and not accepting them, are nevertheless of value and bear fruit.'

¹ That is, the three fires of lust, ill-will, and delusion, the going out of which is the state called, par excellence, 'the going out' (Nirvâṇa).

13. 'Now hear another reason for the same thing. Suppose, O king, a man were to make a drum sound, and then that sound were to die away. Would that sound acquiesce in being produced again?'

'Certainly not, Sir. The sound has vanished. It can have no thought or idea of being reproduced. The sound of a drum when it has once been produced and died away, is altogether cut off. But, Sir, a drum is a means of producing sound. And any man, as need arises, can by the effort of power residing in himself, beat on that drum, and so produce a sound.'

'Just so, great king, has the Blessed One—except the teacher and the instruction he has left in his doctrine and discipline, and the jewel treasure of his relics whose value is derived from his righteousness, and contemplation, and wisdom, and emancipation, and insight given by the knowledge of emancipation—just so has he passed away by that kind of passing away in which no root remains. But the possibility of receiving the three attainments is not cut off because the Blessed One has passed away. Beings oppressed by the sorrow of becoming can, when they desire the attainments, still receive them by means of the jewel treasure of his relics and of his doctrine and discipline and teaching. Therefore is it, great king, that all acts done to the Tathâgata, notwithstanding his having passed away and not accepting, are nevertheless of value and bear fruit. And this future possibility, great king, has been foreseen by the Blessed One, and spoken of, and declared, and made known, when he said: "It may be, Ânanda, that in some of you the thought may arise: [99] 'The word of the Master is ended. We have no Teacher more!' But it is not thus, Ânanda, that you should regard it. The Truth which I have preached to you, the Rules which I have laid down for the Order, let them, when I am gone, be the Teacher to you ¹." So that because the Tathâgata has passed away and consents not thereto, that therefore any act done to him is empty and vain—this saying of the enemy is proved false. It is untrue, unjust, not according to fact, wrong, and perverse. It is the cause of sorrow, has sorrow as its fruit, and leads down the road to perdition!

14. 'Now hear another reason for the same thing. Does the broad earth acquiesce, O king, in all kinds of seeds being planted all over it?'

'Certainly not, Sir.'

'Then how is it those seeds, planted without the earth's consent, do yet stand fast and firmly rooted, and expand into trees with great trunks and sap and branches, and bearing fruits and flowers?'

'Though the earth, Sir, gives no consent, yet it acts as a site for those seeds, as a means of their development. Planted on that site they grow, by its means, into such great trees with branches, flowers, and fruit.'

¹ Book of the Great Decease, VI, 1, translated in 'Buddhist Suttas,' p. 112.

'Then, great king, the sectaries are destroyed, defeated, proved wrong by their own words when they say that "an act done to him who accepts it not is empty and vain." As the broad earth, O king, is the Tathâgata, the Arahata, the Buddha supreme. Like it he accepts nothing. Like the seeds which through it attain to such developments are the gods and men who, through the jewel treasures of the relics and the wisdom of the Tathâgata—though he have passed away and consent not to it—being firmly rooted by the roots of merit, become like unto trees casting a goodly shade by means of the trunk of contemplation, the sap of true doctrine, and the branches of righteousness, and bearing the flowers of emancipation, and the fruits of Samanaship. [100] Therefore is it, great king, that acts done to the Tathâgata, notwithstanding his having passed away and not accepting them, are still of value and bear fruit.'

15. 'Now hear another and further reason for the same thing. Do camels, buffaloes, asses, goats, oxen, or men acquiesce in the birth of worms inside them?'

'Certainly not, Sir.'

'Then how is it then, that without their consent worms are so born, and spread by rapid reproduction of sons and grandsons?'

'By the power of evil Karma, Sir.'

'Just so, great king, is it by the power of the relics and the wisdom of the Tathâgata, who has passed away and acquiesces in nothing, that an act done to him is of value and bears fruit.'

16. 'Now hear another and further reason for the same thing. Do men consent, O king, that the ninety-eight diseases should be produced in their bodies?'

'Certainly not, Sir.'

'Then how is it the diseases come?'

'By evil deeds done in former births.'

'But, great king, if evil deeds done in a former birth have to be suffered here and now, then both good and evil done here or done before has weight and bears fruit. Therefore is it that acts done to the Tathâgata, notwithstanding his having passed away and not consenting, are nevertheless of value and bear fruit.'

17. 'Now hear another and further reason for the same thing. Did you ever hear, O king, of the ogre named Nandaka, who, having laid hands upon the Elder Sâriputta, was swallowed up by the earth?'

'Yes, Sir, that is matter of common talk among men.'

'Well, did Sâriputta acquiesce in that?'

[101] 'Though the world of gods and men, Sir, were to be destroyed, though the sun and moon were to fall upon the earth, though Sineru the king of mountains were to be dissolved, yet would not Sâriputta the Elder have consented to any pain being inflicted on a fellow creature. And why not? Because every condition of heart which could cause him to be angry or offended has been in him destroyed and rooted out. And as all cause thereof had thus been removed, Sir, therefore could not Sâriputta be angered even with those who sought to deprive him of his life.'

‘But if Sâriputta, O king, did not consent to it, how was it that Nandaka was so swallowed up?’

‘By the power of his evil deeds.’

‘Then if so, great king, an act done to him who consents not is still of power and bears fruit. And if this is so of an evil deed, how much more of a good one? Therefore is it, O king, that acts done to the Tathâgata, notwithstanding his having passed away and not accepting them, are nevertheless of value and bear fruit.’

18. ‘Now how many, O king, are those men who, in this life, have been swallowed up by the earth? Have you heard anything on that point?’

‘Yes, Sir, I have heard how many there are.’

‘Then tell me.’

‘Kiñka the Brahmin woman, and Suppabuddha the Sâkyan, and Devadatta the Elder, and Nandaka the ogre, and Nanda the Brahman—these are the five people who were swallowed up by the earth.’

‘And whom, O king, had they wronged?’

‘The Blessed One and his disciples.’

‘Then did the Blessed One or his disciples consent to their being so swallowed up?’

‘Certainly not, Sir.’

‘Therefore is it, O king, that an act done to the Tathâgata, notwithstanding his having passed away and not consenting thereto, is nevertheless of value and bears fruit.’

‘Well has this deep question been explained by you, venerable Nâgasena, and made clear. You have made the secret thing [102] plain, you have loosed the knot, you have made in the jungle an open space, the adversaries are overthrown, the wrong opinion has been proved false, the sectaries have been covered with darkness when they met you, O best of all the leaders of schools !'

[Here ends the question as to not consenting to honours paid¹.]

[THE OMNISCIENCE OF THE BUDDHA.]

19. 'Venerable Nāgasena, was the Buddha omniscient ?'

'Yes, O king, he was. But the insight of knowledge was not always and continually (consciously) present with him. The omniscience of the Blessed One was dependent on reflection.' But if he did reflect he knew whatever he wanted to know².

'Then, Sir, the Buddha cannot have been omniscient, if his all-embracing knowledge was reached through investigation.'

'[If so, great king, our Buddha's knowledge must have been less in degree of fineness than that of the other Buddhas. And that is a conclusion hard to draw. But let me explain a little further.] Suppose, O king, you had a hundred cart-loads of rice in the husk, and each cart-load was of seven ammanas³ and a half. Would a man without consideration be able to tell you in a moment how many laks of grains there were in the whole⁴ ?'

¹ This title and the subsequent ones to the various questions are added from the Sinhalese. They are probably the same titles as those referred to by Mr. Trenckner in his preface as being in his Burmese MS.

² So again below, § 27.

³ An ammana is about four bushels.

⁴ Mr. Trenckner has marked this passage as corrupt, and I do not pretend to understand it either. The Sinhalese is also very

20. 'Now there are these seven classes of minds. Those, great king, who are full of lust, ill-will, delusion, or wrong doing, who are untrained in the management of their body, or in conduct, or in thought, or in wisdom,—their thinking powers are brought into play with difficulty, and act slowly. And why is it so? Because of the untrained condition of their minds. It is like the slow and heavy movements of a giant bambū—when it is being dragged along with its wide-spreading, extensive, overgrown, and interlaced vegetation, and with its branches intricately entangled one with the other. So slow and heavy are the movements of the minds of those men, O king. And why? Because of the intricate entanglements of wrong dispositions. This is the first class of minds.'

21. 'From it the second class is to be distinguished. Those, O king, who have been converted, for whom the gates of purgatory are closed, who have attained to right views, who have grasped the doctrine of the Master—their thinking powers, so far as the three lower stages¹ are concerned, are brought quickly involved and confused. I have added the words in brackets from the Simhalese, and translated the rest according to the general sense of the Simhalese and the figures of the Pāli. Hardy gives his 'version' at p. 386 of the 'Manual of Buddhism.' It says, 'In one load of rice there are 63,660,000 grains. Each of these grains can be separately considered by Buddha in a moment of time. In that moment the seven-times gifted mind exercises this power.' The last sentence is a misunderstanding of the opening words of our next section (IV, 1, 20).

¹ That is, of the Excellent Way. They are the three Fetters—Delusion of self, Doubt, and Dependence on rites and ceremonies and outward morality—which the Sotâpanno has conquered, broken.

into play, [103] and act with ease. But as regards the higher regions they are brought into play with difficulty, and act slowly. And why is this so? Because of their minds having been made clear as regards those three stages, and because of the failings (to be vanquished in the higher stages) still existing within them. It is like the movement of a giant bambû which has a clean trunk as far as the third knot, but above that has its branches intricately entangled. So far as regards the smooth trunk it would travel easily when dragged along, but it would stick obstinately as regards its upper branches. This is the second class of minds.'

22. 'From these the third class is to be distinguished. Those, O king, who are Sakad Âgâmins¹, in whom lust, ill-will, and delusion are reduced to a minimum,—their thinking powers, so far as the five lower stages are concerned, are brought quickly into play, and act with ease. But as regards the higher regions they are brought into play with difficulty, and act slowly. And why is this so? Because of their minds having been made clear as regards those five stages, and because of the failings (to be vanquished in the higher stages) still existing within them. It is like the movement of a giant bambû which has a clean trunk as far as the fifth knot, but above that has its branches intricately entangled. So far as regards the smooth trunk it would travel easily when dragged along, but it would be moved with difficulty as far as its upper branches are concerned. This is the third class of minds.'

¹ Disciples who will return only once to this world, there attain Arahatsip, and therefore pass away.

23. 'From these the fourth class is to be distinguished. Those, O king, who are Anâgâmins¹, who have completely got rid of the five lower fetters, —their thinking powers, so far as the ten stages² are concerned, are brought quickly into play, and act with ease. [104] But as regards the higher regions they are brought into play with difficulty, and act slowly. And why is this so? Because of their minds having been made clear as regards those ten stages, and because of the failings (to be vanquished in the higher stages) still existing within them. It is like the movement of a giant bambû which has a smooth trunk as far as the tenth knot, but above that has its branches intricately entangled. This is the fourth class of minds.'

24. 'From these the fifth class is to be distinguished. Those, O king, who are Arahats, in whom the four Great Evils³ have ceased, whose stains have been washed away, whose predispositions to evil⁴ have been put aside, who have lived the life, and accomplished the task, and laid aside every burden, and reached up to that which is good, for whom the Fetter of the craving after any kind of future life has been broken to pieces⁵, who have reached the higher insight⁶, who are purified as regards all those conditions of heart in which a

¹ Who will not return even once to this world, but attain Arahatship in heaven.

² This is noteworthy, for their mind is not yet quite clear as regards the higher five stages. But it is on all fours with the last section.

³ Lust, becoming, delusion, and ignorance.

⁴ Kilesâ.

⁵ Parikkîna-bhava-samyoganâ.

⁶ Patta-paśisambhidâ.

hearer can be pure,—their thinking powers, as regards all that a disciple can be or do, are brought quickly into play, and act with ease. But as to those things which are within the reach of the Paṭṭeka-Buddhas (of those who are Buddhas, but for themselves alone) they are brought into play with difficulty, and act slowly. And why is this so? Because of their having been made pure as regards all within the province of a hearer, but not as regards that within the reach of those who are Buddhas (though for themselves alone). It is like the movement of a giant bambū which has been pruned of the branches arising out of all its knots—and which, therefore, when dragged along moves quickly and with ease, because of its smoothness all along, and because of its being unencumbered with the jungly growth of vegetation. This is the fifth class of minds.'

25. [105] 'From these the sixth class is to be distinguished. Those, O king, who are Paṭṭeka-Buddhas, dependent on themselves alone, wanting no teacher, dwellers alone like the solitary horn of the rhinoceros, who so far as their own higher life is concerned, have pure hearts free from stain,—their thinking powers, so far as their own province is concerned, are brought quickly into play, and act with ease. But as regards all that is specially within the province of a perfect Buddha (one who is not only Buddha, that is enlightened, himself, but can lead others to the light) they are brought with difficulty into play, and move slowly. And why is this so? Because of their purity as regards all within their own province, and because of the immensity of the province of the omniscient Buddhas. It is like a man, O king, who would fearlessly cross, and at will, by day or night, a shallow brook on his own property. But when he comes in sight of the mighty ocean, deep and wide and ever-moving, and sees no further shore to it, then would he stand hesitating and afraid, and make no effort even to get over it. And why? Because of his familiarity with his own, and because of the immensity of the sea. This is the sixth class of minds.'

26. 'From these the seventh class is to be distinguished. Those, O king, who are complete Buddhas¹, having all knowledge, bearing about in themselves the tenfold power (of the ten kinds of insight), confident in the four modes of just self-confidence, endowed with the eighteen characteristics of a Buddha, whose mastery knows no limit, from whose grasp nothing is hid,—their thinking powers are on every point brought quickly into play, and act with ease. Suppose, O king, a dart well burnished, free from rust, perfectly smooth, with a fine edge, straight, without a crook or a flaw in it, were to be set on a powerful crossbow. Would there be any clumsiness in its action, any retarding in its movement, if it were discharged by a powerful man against a piece of fine linen, or cotton stuff, or delicate woolwork?'

'Certainly not, Sir. And why? Because the stuff is so fine, and the dart so highly tempered, and the discharge so powerful.'

[106] 'And just in the same way, great king, are the thinking powers of the Buddhas I have described brought quickly into play, and act with ease.

¹ That is as distinguished from the last—not only themselves enlightened, but able to teach, leaders of men.

And why? Because of their being purified in every respect. This is the seventh class of minds.'

27. 'Now of these, O king, the last—the thinking powers of the omniscient Buddhas—altogether outclasses the other six, and is clear and active in its high quality that is beyond our ken. It is because the mind of the Blessed One is so clear and active that the Blessed One, great king, displays the double miracle. From that we may get to know, O king, how clear and active His mental powers are. And for those wonders there is no further reason that can be alleged. (Yet) those wonders, O king, [caused by means of the mind (alone) of the omniscient Buddhas¹] cannot be counted, or calculated, or divided, or separated, (For) the knowledge of the Blessed One, O king, is dependent upon reflection², and it is on reflection that he knows whatever he wishes to know. (But) it is as when a man passes something he already has in one hand to the other, or utters a sound when his mouth is open, or swallows some food that he has already in his mouth, or opens his eyes when they are shut, or shuts them when open, or stretches forth his arm when it is bent in, or bends it in when stretched out—more rapid than that, great king, and more easy in its action, is the all-embracing knowledge of the Blessed One, more rapid than that his reflection. And although it is by reflection that they know whatever they want to know, yet even when they are not reflecting the Blessed Buddhas are not, even then, anything other than omniscient.'

¹ There is surely something wrong here; either in the Pāli, or in my interpretation of it, which follows the Siṃhalese (p. 130).

² Here the opening argument of § 17 is again taken up.

'But, venerable Nāgasena, reflection is carried on for the purpose of seeking (that which is not clear when the reflection begins). Come now. Convince me in this matter by some reason.'

'Suppose, O king, there were a rich man, great in wealth and property—one who had stores of gold and silver and valuables, and stores of all kinds of wheat, one who had rice, and paddy, and barley, and dry grain, and oilseed, and beans, and peas, and every other edible seed, who had ghee, and oil, and butter, and milk, and curds, and honey, and sugar, and molasses, [107] all put away in store-rooms in jars, and pots, and pans, and every sort of vessel. Now if a traveller were to arrive, one worthy of hospitality, and expecting to be entertained; and all the prepared food in the house had been finished, and they were to get out of the jar some rice ready for cooking, and prepare a meal for him. Would that wealthy man merely by reason of the deficiency in eatable stuff at that unusual time be rightly called poor or needy?'

'Certainly not, Sir. Even in the palace of a mighty king of kings there might be no food ready out of time, how much less in the house of an ordinary man.'

'Just so, great king, with the all-embracing knowledge of a Tathâgata when reflection only is wanting; but which on reflection grasps whatever he wants. Now suppose, O king, there were a tree in full fruit, with its branches bending this way and that by the weight of the burden of the bunches of its fruit, but no single fruit had fallen from it.

Could that tree rightly, under the circumstances of the case, be called barren, merely because of the want of a fallen fruit ?'

'No, Sir. For though the falling of the fruit is a condition precedent to its enjoyment, yet when it has fallen one can take as much as one likes.'

'Just so, great king, though reflection is a necessary condition of the knowledge of the Tathâgata, yet on reflection it perceives whatever he wants to know.'

'Does that happen always, Nâgasena, at the moment of reflection ?'

'Yes, O king. Just as when the mighty king of kings (the Kakkavatti) calling to mind his glorious wheel of victory wishes it to appear, and no sooner is it thought of than it appears—so does the knowledge of the Tathâgata follow continually on reflection.'

'Strong is the reason you give, Nâgasena, for the omniscience of the Buddha. I am convinced that that is so.'

[Here ends the question as to the omniscience of the Buddha being dependent on reflection¹.]

[WHY DEVADATTA WAS ADMITTED TO THE ORDER.]

28. 'Venerable Nâgasena, who was it that admitted Devadatta² to the Order ?'

¹ At III, 6, 2 there is another problem raised as to the omniscience of the Buddha.

² He is the Judas of the Buddhist story, who tried to have the Buddha killed, and to seduce his disciples from him.

‘Those six young nobles, O king, Bhaddiya and Anuruddha and Ānanda and Bhagu and Kimbila and Devadatta, [108] together with Upāli the barber as a seventh—they all, when the Master had attained to Buddhahood, left the Sākya home out of the delight they felt in him, and following the Blessed One renounced the world¹. So the Blessed One admitted them all to the Order.’

‘But was it not Devadatta who, after he had entered the Order, raised up a schism within it?’

‘Yes. No layman can create a schism, nor a sister of the Order, nor one under preparatory instruction, nor a novice of either sex. It must be a Bhikkhu, under no disability, who is in full communion, and a co-resident².’

‘And what Karma does a schismatical person gain?’

‘A Karma that continues to act for a Kalpa (a very long period of time).’

‘What then, Nāgasena! Was the Buddha aware that Devadatta after being admitted to the Order would raise up a schism, and having done so would suffer torment in purgatory for a Kalpa?’

‘Yes, the Tathāgata knew that.’

‘But, Nāgasena, if that be so, then the statement that the Buddha was kind and pitiful, that he sought after the good of others, that he was the remover of that which works harm, the provider of that which works well to all beings—that statement must be wrong. If it be not so—if he knew not that Devadatta after he had been admitted to the Order would stir up a schism—then he cannot have been omniscient. This other double-pointed dilemma is put to you. Unravel this tough skein, break up the argument of the adversaries. In future times it will be hard to find Bhikkhus like to you in wisdom. Herein then show your skill !’

¹ Hīnaśī-kumburê takes kulâ as an ablative.

² These are all termini technici in Buddhist canon law. The meaning is that other divisions in the Order do not amount technically to schism. See the Kullavagga VII, 1, 27, &c.

29. ‘The Blessed One, O king, was both full of mercy and had all knowledge. It was when the Blessed One in his mercy and wisdom considered the life history of Devadatta that he perceived how, having heaped up Karma on Karma, he would pass for an endless series of Kalpas from torment to torment, and from perdition to perdition. And the Blessed One knew also that the infinite Karma of that man would, because he had entered the Order, become finite, and the sorrow caused by the previous Karma would also therefore become limited. [109] But that if that foolish person were not to enter the Order then he would continue to heap up Karma which would endure for a Kalpa. And it was because he knew that that, in his mercy, he admitted him to the Order.’

‘Then, Nāgasena, the Buddha first wounds a man and then pours oil on the wound, first throws a man down a precipice and then reaches out to him an assisting hand, first kills him and then seeks to give him life, first gives pain and then adds a subsequent joy to the pain he gave.’

‘The Tathāgata, O king, wounds people but to their good, he casts people down but to their profit, he kills people but to their advantage. Just as mothers and fathers, O king, hurt their children and even knock them down, thinking the while of their good ; so by whatsoever method an increase in the virtue of living things can be brought about, by that method does he contribute to their good. If Devadatta, O king, had not entered the Order, then as a layman he would have laid up much Karma leading to states of woe, and so passing for hundreds of thousands of Kalpas from torment to misery, and from one state of perdition to another, he would have suffered constant pain. It was knowing that, that in his mercy, the Blessed One admitted Devadatta to the Order. It was at the thought that by renouncing the world according to His doctrine Devadatta's sorrow would become finite that, in his mercy, he adopted that means of making his heavy sorrow light.

30. 'As a man of influence, O king, by the power of his wealth or reputation or prosperity or birth, when a grievous penalty has been imposed by the king on some friend or relative of his, would get it made light by the ability arising from the trust reposed in him ; [110] just so did the Blessed One, by admitting him to the Order, and by the efficacy of the influence of righteousness and meditation and wisdom and emancipation of heart, make light the heavy sorrow of Devadatta, who would have had to suffer many hundreds of thousands of Kalpas. As a clever physician and surgeon, O king, would make a grievous sickness light by the aid of a powerful medicinal drug, just so did the Blessed One, in his knowledge of the right means to an end, admit Devadatta to the Order and thus make his grievous pain light by the aid of the medicine of the Dhamma, strong by the power of mercy¹. Was then, O king, the Blessed One guilty of any wrong in that he turned Devadatta from being a man of much sorrow into being a man of less sorrow ?'

¹ Kâruṇṇabalopatthaddha. Compare Gâtaka, vol. i, verse 267, and Sutta Vibhaṅga I, 10, 7.

'No indeed, Sir. He committed no wrong, not even in the smallest degree¹.'

'Then accept this, great king, to the full as the reason for which the Blessed One admitted Devadatta to the Order.'

31. 'Hear another and further reason, O king, for the Blessed One's having admitted Devadatta. Suppose men were to seize and hurry before the king some wicked robber, saying : " This is the wicked robber, your Majesty. Inflict upon him such punishment as you think fit ! " And thereupon the king were to say to them : " Take this robber then, my men, outside the town, and there on the place of execution cut off his head." And they in obedience to his orders were to take that man accordingly towards the place of execution. And some man who was high in office near the king, and of great reputation and wealth and property, whose word was held of weight², and whose influence was great, should see him. And he were to have pity on him, and were to say to those men : " Stay, good fellows. What good will cutting off his head do to you ? Save him alive, and cut off only a hand or a foot. I will speak on his behalf to the king." And they at the word of that influential person were to do so. Now would the officer who had acted so towards him have been a benefactor to that robber ?'

¹ Gaddûhanam pi. It is the Sanskrit dadrûghna.

² Âdeyya-vakano. See my note, Kullavagga VI, 4, 8, and also Puggala Paññatti III, 12, and Pañña Gati Dîpana, 98.

‘He would have saved his life, Sir. And having done that, what would he not have done?’

‘But would he have done no wrong on account of the pain the man suffered [111] when his hand or foot was cut off?’

‘The pain the thief suffered, Sir, was his own fault. But the man who saved his life did him no harm.’

‘Just so, great king, was it in his mercy that the Blessed One admitted Devadatta, with the knowledge that by that his sorrow would be mitigated.’

32. ‘And Devadatta’s sorrow, O king, was mitigated. For Devadatta at the moment of his death took refuge in Him for the rest of his existences when he said :

“In him, who of the best is far the best¹,
The god of gods, the guide of gods and men,
Who see’th all, and bears the hundred marks
Of goodness,—’tis in him I refuge take Through all the lives that I may have to live.”

2 ‘If you divide this Kalpa, O king, into six parts, it was at the end of the first part that Devadatta created schism in the Order. After he has suffered the other five in purgatory he will be released, and will become a *Pakkaka-Buddha*³ under the name of Atthissara.’

‘Great is the gift bestowed, Nāgasena, by the Blessed One on Devadatta. In that the Tathāgata has caused him to attain to the state of a Pakkeka-Buddha, what has he not done for him ?'

¹ Literally, ‘is the best of these eight’—the eight being those walking in the Excellent Way, the four magga-samaṅgino and the four phala-samaṅgino. See Puggala Paññatti VIII, 1.

² The Siṃhalese inserts a paragraph here not found in Mr. Trenckner’s text.

³ See above, p. 158.

'But inasmuch as Devadatta, O king, having made a schism in the Order, suffers pain in purgatory, has not therefore the Blessed One done him wrong?'

'No, Sir. That is Devadatta's own fault ; and the Blessed One who mitigated his suffering has done him no harm.'

'Then accept this, O king, to the full as the reason for the Blessed One admitting Devadatta to the Order.

33. 'Hear another and further reason, O king, for his having done so. [112] Suppose in treating a wound full of matter and blood, in whose grievous hollow the weapon which caused it remained, which stank of putrid flesh, and was made worse by the pain that varied with constantly changing symptoms, by variations in temperature, and by the union of the three humours,—windy, bilious, and phlegmatic¹,—an able physician and surgeon were to anoint it with a rough, sharp, bitter, stinging ointment, to the end that the inflammation should be allayed. And when the inflammation had gone down, and the wound had become sweet, suppose he were then to cut into it with a lancet, and burn it with caustic. And when he had cauterised it, suppose he were to prescribe an alkaline wash, and anoint it with some drug to the end that the wound might heal up, and the sick man recover his health—now tell me, O king, would it be out of cruelty that the surgeon thus smeared with ointment, and cut with the lancet, and cauterised with the stick of caustic, and administered a salty wash ?'

¹ The interpretation of some of the medical terms in this paragraph is very uncertain. See pp. 134, 252, 304 of the text.

'Certainly not, Sir ; it would be with kindness in his heart, and intent on the man's weal, that he would do all those things.'

'And the feelings of pain produced by his efforts to heal—would not the surgeon be guilty of any wrong in respect of them ?'

'How so ? Acting with kind intent and for the man's weal, how could he therein incur a wrong ? It is of heavenly bliss rather that that kindly surgeon would be worthy.'

'Just so, great king, was it in his mercy that the Blessed One admitted Devadatta, to the end to release him from pain.'

34. 'Hear another and further reason, O king, why the Blessed One did so. Suppose a man had been pierced by a thorn. And another man with kindly intent and for his good were to cut round the place with another sharp thorn or with a lancet, and the blood flowing the while, were to extract that thorn. Now would it be out of cruelty that he acted so ?'

'Certainly not, Sir. For he acted with kindly intent, and for the man's good. And if he had not done so the man might have died, or might have suffered such pain that he would have been nigh to death.'

'Just even so, great king, was it of his mercy that the Tathâgata admitted Devadatta, to the end to release him of his pain. If he had not done so [113] Devadatta would have suffered torment in purgatory through a succession of existences, through hundreds of thousands of Kalpas.'

‘ Yes, Nāgasena, the Tathāgata turned Devadatta, who was being carried down with the flood, with his head against the stream ; he again pointed out the road to Devadatta when he was lost in the jungle ; he gave a firm foothold to Devadatta when he was falling down the precipice : he restored Devadatta to peace when he was swallowed up of desolation. But the reason and the meaning of these things could no one have pointed out, Nāgasena, unless he were wise as you !’

[Here ends the dilemma about Devadatta.]

[VESSANTARA’S EARTHQUAKE.]

35. ‘ Venerable Nāgasena, the Blessed One said thus : “ There are these eight causes, O Bhikkhus, proximate or remote, for a mighty earthquake ¹. ” This is an inclusive statement, a statement which leaves no room for anything to be supplemented, a statement to which no gloss can be added. There can be no ninth reason for an earthquake. If there were, the Blessed One would have mentioned it. It is because there is no other, that he left it unnoticed. But we find another, and a ninth reason, when we are told that on Vessantara’s giving his mighty largesse the earth shook seven times ². If, Nāgasena, there are eight causes for an earthquake, then what we hear of the earthquake at Vessantara’s largesse is false. And if that is true, then the statement as to the eight causes of earthquakes is false. This double-headed question, too, is subtle, hard to unravel, dark, and profound. It is now put to you. [114] No one of less knowledge can solve it, only one wise as you.'

¹ From the Book of the Great Decease, III, 13, translated at p. 45 of my ‘ Buddhist Suttas,’ vol. xi in this series.

² See the Vessantara Gâtaka, and compare Gâtaka I, p. 74.

36. 'The Blessed One made the statement you refer to, O king, and yet the earth shook seven times at Vessantara's largesse. But that was out of season, it was an isolated occurrence, it was not included in the eight usual causes, and was not therefore reckoned as one of them. Just, O king, as there are three kinds of well-known rains reckoned in the world—that of the rainy season, that of the winter months, and that of the two months Âsâ/ha and Sâvana. If, besides these, any other rain falls, that is not reckoned among the usual rains, but is called "a rain out of season." And again, O king, just as there are five hundred rivers which flow down from the Himâlayas, but of these ten only are reckoned in enumerations of rivers—the Ganges, the Jumna, the Akîravatî, the Sarabhû, the Mahtî, the Indus, the Sarasvatî, the Vetravatî, the Vitamsâ, and the Kandabhâgâ—the others not being included in the catalogue because of their intermittent flow of water. And again, O king, just as there are a hundred or two of officers under the king, but only six of them are reckoned as officers of state—the commander-in-chief, the prime minister, and the chief judge, and the high treasurer, and the bearer of the sunshade of state, and the state sword-bearer. And why? Because of their royal prerogatives. The rest are not reckoned, they are all called simply officers. [115] Just as in all these cases, great king, the seven times repeated earthquake at the largesse of Vessantara was, as an isolated and extraordinary occurrence, and distinct from the eight usual ones, not reckoned among those eight causes.'

37. 'Now have you heard, O king, in the history of our faith of any act of devotion being done so as to receive its recompense even in this present life, the fame of which has reached up to the gods?'

'Yes, Lord, I have heard of such. There are seven cases of such actions.'

'Who were the people who did those things?'

'Sumana the garland maker, and Eka-sâtaka the brahman, and Punna the hired servant, and Mallikâ the queen, and the queen known as the mother of Gopâla, and Suppiyâ the devoted woman, and Punna the slave-girl. It was these seven who did acts of devotion which bore fruit even in this life, and the fame of which reached even to the gods.'

'And have you heard of others, O king, who, even in their human body, mounted up to the blessed abode of the great Thirty-three?'

'Yes, I have heard, too, of them.'

'And who were they?'

'Guttila the musician, and Sâdhîna the king, and king Nimi, and king Mandhâtâ—these four. Long ago was it done, this glorious deed and difficult.'

'But have you ever heard, O king, of the earth shaking, either now or in the past, and either once or twice or thrice, when a gift had been given?'

'No, Sir, that I have not heard of.'

'And I too, O king—though I have received the traditions, and been devoted to study, and to hearing the law, and to learning by heart, and to the acquirements of discipleship, and though I have been ready to learn, and to ask and to answer questions, and to sit at the feet of teachers—I too have never heard of such a thing, except only in the case of the splendid gift of Vessantara the glorious king. And between the times of Kassapa the Blessed One, and of the Blessed One the Sâkya sage, there have rolled by hundreds of thousands of years, but in all that period I have heard of no such case. [116] It is at no common effort, O king, at no ordinary struggle, that the great earth is moved. It is when overborne by the weight of righteousness, overpowered by the burden of the goodness of acts which testify of absolute purity, that, unable to support it, the broad earth quakes and trembles and is moved. Then it is as when a wagon is overladen with a too heavy weight, and the nave and the spokes are split, and the axletree is broken in twain. Then it is as when the heavens, overspread with the waters of the tempest driven by the wind, and overweighted with the burden of the heaped-up rain-clouds, roar and creak and rage at the onset of the whirlwind. Thus was it, great king, that the broad earth, unable to support the unwonted burden of the heaped-up and wide-reaching force of king Vessantara's largesse, quaked and trembled and was moved. For the heart of king Vessantara was not turned in the way of lust, nor of ill-will, nor of dullness, nor of pride, nor of delusion, nor of sin, nor of disputation, nor of discontent, but it was turned mightily to generosity. And thinking: "Let all those who want, and who have not yet come, now arrive! Let all who come receive whate'er they want, and be filled with satisfaction!" it was on giving, ever and without end, that his mind was set. And on these ten conditions of heart, O king, was his mind too fixed—on self-control, and on inward calm, and on long-suffering, and on self-restraint, and on temperance, and on voluntary subjugation to meritorious vows, and on freedom from all forms of wrath and cruelty, and on truthfulness, and on purity of heart. He had abandoned, O king, all seeking after the satisfaction of his animal lusts, he had overcome all craving after a future life, his strenuous effort was set only towards the higher life. He had given up, O king, the caring for himself, and devoted himself thenceforth to caring for others alone. His mind was fixed immovably on the thought: "How can I make all beings to be at peace, healthy, and wealthy, and long lived?" [117] And when, O king, he was giving things away, he gave not for the sake of rebirth in any glorious state, he gave not for the sake of wealth, nor of receiving gifts in return, nor of flattery, nor of long life for himself, nor of high birth, nor of happiness, nor of power, nor of fame, nor of offspring either of daughters or of sons—but it was for the sake of supreme wisdom and of the treasure thereof that he gave gifts so immense, so immeasurable, so unsurpassed. It was when he had attained to that supreme wisdom that he uttered the verse:

"Gāli, my son, and the Black Antelope,
My daughter, and my queen, my wife, Maddī,
I gave them all away without a thought—
And 'twas for Buddhahood I did this thing¹."

38. 'The angry man, O king, did the great king Vessantara conquer by mildness, and the wicked man by goodness, and the covetous by generosity, and the speaker of falsehood by truth, and all evil did he overcome by righteousness¹. When he was thus giving away—he who was seeking after righteousness, who had made righteousness his aim—then were the great winds, on which the earth rests below, agitated by the full force of the power of the influence that resulted from his generosity, and little by little, one by one, the great winds began to blow confusedly, and up and down and towards each side the earth swayed, and the mighty trees rooted in the soil² began to totter, and masses of cloud were heaped together in the sky, and terrible winds arose laden with dust, and the heavens rushed together, and hurricanes blew with violent blasts, and a great and terrible mighty noise was given forth. And at the raging of those winds, the waters little by little began to move, and at the movement of the waters the great fish and the scaly creatures were disturbed, and the waves began to roll in double breakers, and the beings that dwell in the waters were seized with fear and as the breakers rushed together in pairs the roar of the ocean grew loud, and the spray was lashed into fury, and garlands of foam arose, and the great ocean opened to its depths, and the waters rushed hither and thither, the furious crests of their waves meeting this way and that; and the Asuras, and Garuḥas, and Yakkhas, and Nāgas³ shook with fear, and thought in their alarm: “What now! How now! is the great ocean being turned upside down?”

¹ From the Kariyā Piṭaka I, ix, 52. See Dr. Morris's edition for the Pāli Text Society, p. 81.

¹ On this sentiment Mr. Trenckner calls attention to the analogous phrases at Dhammapada, verse 223.

² Sīnapattā: which the Sinhalese renders poḷo talehi kal gewī patra wæḥṣmaṭa pæminiyāwu wrīkshayo.

³ Fabulous beings supposed to occupy these fabulous waters.

and sought, with terrified hearts, for a way of escape. And as the water on which it rests¹ was troubled and agitated, then the broad earth began to shake, and with it the mountain ranges and the ocean depths, [118] and Sineru began to revolve, and its rocky mountain crest became twisted. And at the trembling of the earth, the serpents, and mungoes, and cats, and jackals, and boars, and deer, and birds became greatly distressed, and the Yakkhas of inferior power wept, while those of greater power were merry.'

39. 'Just, O king, as when a huge and mighty cauldron² is placed in an oven full of water, and crowded with grains of rice, then the fire burning beneath heats first of all the cauldron, and when that has become hot the water begins to boil, and as the water boils the grains of rice are heated and dive hither and thither in the water, and a mass of bubbles arises, and a garland of foam is formed—just so, O king, king Vessantara gave away whatsoever is in the world considered most difficult to bestow, and by reason of the nature of his generosity the great winds beneath were unable to refrain from being agitated throughout, and on the great winds being thrown into confusion the waters were shaken, and on the waters being disturbed the broad earth trembled, and so then the winds and the waters and the earth became all three, as it were, of one accord by the immense and powerful influence that

¹ This conception of the earth resting on water and the water on air is Indian, and forms no part of distinctively Buddhist teaching.

² Mahati-mahâ-pariyogo; not in Childers nor in the Sanskrit Petersburg Dictionary. Hînaśi-kumburê renders it itâ mahatwu mahâ bhâganayak, resulted from that mighty giving. And there was never another giving, O king, which had such power as that generosity of the great king Vessantara.

40. 'And just, O king, as there are many gems of value found in the earth—the sapphire, and the great sapphire, and the wish-conferring gem, and the cat's eye, and the flax gem¹, and the Acacia gem², and the entrancing gem, and the favourite of the sun³, and the favourite of the moon⁴, and the crystal, and the kaggopakkamaka⁵, and the topaz, and the ruby, and the Masâra stone⁶—but the glorious gem of the king of kings is acknowledged to be the chief of all these and surpassing all, for the sheen of that jewel, O king, spreads round about for a league on every side⁷—just so, O king, of all the gifts that

¹ Ummâ-puppha; rendered diya-mendiri-pushpa in the Simhalese. Clough gives diyameneri as a plant 'commelina cucullata.'

² Sirîsa-puppha; rendered mârâ-pushpa in the Simhalese, mârâ being the seed of the 'adenanthera pavonia.'

³ Suriya-kanto, which the Simhalese merely repeats.

⁴ Kanda-kanta; and so also in the Simhalese. These are mythic gems, supposed to be formed out of the rays of the sun and moon respectively, and visible only when they shine.

⁵ The Simhalese has kaggopakramaya, which is not in Clough.

⁶ Masâra-galla, which the Simhalese renders by masâra-galya, which Böhlingk-Roth think is sapphire or smaragd, and Clough renders 'emerald,' and the commentary on the Abhidhâna Padîpikâ, quoted by Childers, says is a stone produced in the hill of Masâra (otherwise unknown).

On similar lists of gems elsewhere see the Kullavagga IX, 1, 3, and my note at pp. 249, 250 of the 'Buddhist Suttas' (vol. xi of the 'Sacred Books of the East').

⁷ So also in the Mahâ-Sudassana Sutta I, 32, translated in the 'Buddhist Suttas,' p. 256. Compare above, p. 35 of the text.

have ever been given upon earth, even the greatest and the most unsurpassed, that giving of the good king Vessantara is acknowledged to surpass them all. And it was on the giving of that gift, O king, that the broad earth shook seven times¹.

41. 'A marvellous thing is it, Nāgasena, of the Buddhas, and a most wonderful, that the Tathāgata even when a Bodisat (in the course of becoming a Buddha) [119] was so unequalled in the world, so mild, so kind, and held before him aims so high, and endeavours so grand. You have made evident, Nāgasena, the might of the Bodisats, a most clear light have you cast upon the perfection of the Conquerors, you have shown how, in the whole world of gods and men, a Tathāgata, as he continues the practice of his noble life, is the highest and the best. Well spoken, venerable Nāgasena. The doctrine of the Conqueror has been exalted, the perfection of the Conqueror has been glorified, the knot of the arguments of the adversaries has been unravelled, the jar of the theories of the opponents has been broken in pieces, the dilemma so profound has been made clear, the jungle has been turned into open country, the children of the Conqueror have received the desire of their hearts². It is so, as you say, O best of the leaders of schools, and I accept that which you have said!'

[Here ends the dilemma as to the earthquake at Vessantara's gift.]

¹ There is here a long paragraph in the Simhalese omitted in the Pāli.

² Nibbāhana; rendered abhiwarddhiya in the Simhalese.

[KING SIVI¹.]

42. 'Venerable Nāgasena, your people say thus : " King Sivi gave his eyes to the man who begged them of him, and when he had thus become blind, new eyes were given to him from heaven²." This statement is unpalatable³, it lays its speaker open to rebuke, it is faulty. For it is said in the Sutta : " When the cause has been utterly destroyed, when there is no longer any cause, any basis left, then the divine eye cannot arise⁴." So if he gave his eyes away, the statement that he received new (divine) ones must be false : and if divine eyes arose to him, then the statement that he gave his eyes away must be false. This dilemma too is a double-pointed one, more knotty than a knot, more piercing than an arrow, more confusing than a jungle. It is now put to you. Rouse up in yourself the desire to accomplish the task that is set to you, to the refutation of the adversaries !'

¹ The story is given at length in the Sivi Gātaka, No. 499 (vol. iv, pp. 401-412 of Professor Fausböll's edition).

² There is nothing in the text of the Gātaka (p. 410) of the new eyes being 'divine' or 'from heaven.' There new, ordinary eyes arose to him as the result of his virtue.

³ Sa-kasa/a $\bar{m}$. Kasa/a cannot mean simply 'insipid' as Dr. Edward Müller suggests at p. 43 of his 'Pāli Grammar,' for it is opposed to dullness, insipidity (manda) at Aṅguttara II, 5, 5. It must mean there 'wrong, not only by omission, but by commission.' Compare its use in the Dhammapada Commentary, p. 275; Gātaka I, 108, II, 97; and in the commentary on the Puggala IV, 24. Mr. Trenckner points out in his note that it is often written saka/a, and is no doubt the same as the Sanskrit word so spelt, and given by Wilson. (It is not in Böhlingk-Roth.)

⁴ I don't know which Sutta is referred to.

‘King Sivi gave his eyes away, O king. Harbour no doubt on that point. And in stead thereof divine eyes were produced for him. Neither on that point should you harbour doubt.’

‘But then, Nāgasena, can the divine eye arise when the cause of it has been utterly destroyed, when no cause for it, no basis, remains?’

‘Certainly not, O king.’

‘What then is the reason [120] by which in this case it arose, notwithstanding that its cause had been utterly destroyed, and no cause for it, no basis, remained. Come now. Convince me of the reason of this thing.’

43. ‘What then, O king? Is there in the world such a thing as Truth, by the asseveration of which true believers can perform the Act of Truth¹?’

‘Yes, Lord, there is. And by it true believers make the rain to fall, and fire to go out², and ward off the effects of poison, and accomplish many other things they want to do.’

‘Then, great king, that fits the case, that meets it on all fours. It was by the power of Truth that those divine eyes were produced for Sivi the king. By the power of the Truth the divine eye arose when no other cause was present, for the Truth itself was, in that case, the cause of its production. Suppose, O king, any Siddha (accomplished one¹) on intoning a charm², and saying: "Let a mighty rain now fall!" were to bring about a heavy rainfall by the intoning of his charm—would there in that case be any cause for rain accumulated in the sky by which the rain could be brought about?

¹ This paragraph is very different in the Simhalese, and much longer than the Pāli.

² See the beautiful story of the Holy Quail (translated in my ‘Buddhist Birth Stories,’ p. 302), where even so weak a creature as a baby quail is able, by such a mystic Act of Truth, to drive back the great and powerful Agni, the god of fire, whom the Brahmins so much feared and worshipped.

'No, Sir. The charm itself would be the cause.'

'Just so, great king, in the case put. There would be no ordinary cause. The Truth itself would be sufficient reason for the growth of the divine eye!'

44. 'Now suppose, O king, a Siddha were to intone a charm, and say: "Now let the mighty blazing, raging mass of fire go back!" and the moment the charm were repeated it were to retreat—would there be any cause laid by which would work that result?'

'No, Sir. The charm itself would be the cause.'

'Just so, great king, would there in our case be no ordinary cause. The power of the Truth would be sufficient cause in itself!'

45. 'Now suppose, O king, one of those Siddhas were to intone a charm, [121] and were then to say: "Let this malignant poison become as a healing drug!" and the moment the charm were repeated that would be so—would there be any cause in reserve for that effect to be produced?'

'Certainly not, Sir. The charm itself would cause the warding off of that malignant poison.'

'Just so, great king, without any ordinary cause the Truth itself was, in king Sivi's case, a sufficient reason for the reproduction of his eyes.'

¹ 'One who knows a powerful charm (or perhaps Vedic verse, mantra),' says Hīna/i-kumburê.

² Saṅkṣa, literally truth. (Satya-gāyanā in the Simhalese.)

46. 'Now there is no other cause, O king, for the attainment of the four Noble Truths. It is only by means of an Act of Truth that they are attained. In the land of China, O king, there is a king of China, who when he wants to charm the great ocean, performs at intervals of four months a solemn Act of Truth, and then on his royal chariot drawn by lions, he enters a league's distance into the great ocean. Then in front of the head of his chariot the mighty waves roll back, and when he returns they flow once more over the spot. But could the ocean be so drawn back by the ordinary bodily power of all gods and men combined?'

'Sir, even the water in a small tank could not be so made to retire, how much less the waters of the great ocean!'

'By this know then the force of Truth. There is no place to which it does not reach.'

47. 'When Asoka the righteous ruler, O king, as he stood one day at the city of Pâtaliputta in the midst of the townsfolk and the country people, of his officers and his servants, and his ministers of state, beheld the Ganges river as it rolled along filled up by freshets from the hills, full to the brim and overflowing—that mighty stream five hundred leagues in length, and a league in breadth—he said to his officers: "Is there any one, my good friends, who is able to make this great Ganges flow backwards and up stream?"'

"Nay, Sire, impossible," said they.

'Now a certain courtesan, Bindumati by name, was in the crowd there at the river side, [122] and she heard people repeat the question that the king had asked. Then she said to herself: "Here am I, a harlot, in this city of Pāṭaliputta, by the sale of my body do I gain my livelihood, I follow the meanest of vocations. Let the king behold the power of an Act of Truth performed even by such as I." And she performed an Act of Truth¹. And that moment the mighty Ganges, roaring and raging, rolled back, up stream, in the sight of all the people !

'Then when the king heard the din and the noise of the movement of the waves of the whirlpools of the mighty Ganges, amazed, and struck with awe and wonder, he said to his officers : "How is this, that the great Ganges is flowing backwards?"'

'And they told him what had happened. Then filled with emotion the king went himself in haste and asked the courtesan : "Is it true what they say, that it is by your Act of Truth that this Ganges has been forced to flow backwards?"'

"Yes, Sire," said she.

'And the king asked : "How have you such power in the matter? Or who is it who takes your words to heart (and carries them out)? By what authority is it that you, insignificant as you are², have been able to make this mighty river flow backwards?"'

'And she replied : "It is by the power of Truth, great king."

'But the king said : "How can that power be in you—you, a woman of wicked and loose life, devoid of virtue, under no restraint¹, sinful, who have overstepped all limits, and are full of transgression, and live on the plunder of fools?"

¹ That is to say, in the words of the Quail story (loc. cit. p. 305), she 'called to mind the attributes of the Buddhas who had passed away, and made a solemn asseveration of the faith' that she had in the truth they had taught.

² Anummatto, which the Sinhalese translates as a feminine.

"It is true, O king, what you say. That is just the kind of creature I am. But even in such a one as I so great is the power of the Act of Truth that I could turn the whole world of gods and men upside down by it."

'Then the king said: "What is this Act of Truth? Come now, let me hear about it."

"Whosoever, O king, gives me gold—be he a noble or a brahman or a tradesman or a servant—I regard them all alike. When I see he is a noble I make no distinction in his favour. If I know him to be a slave I despise him not. Free alike from fawning and from dislike do I do service to him who has bought me. This, your Majesty, is the basis of the Act of Truth by the force of which I turned the Ganges back."

48. 'Thus, O king, is it that there is nothing which those who are steadfast to the truth may not enjoy. And so king Sivi gave his eyes away to him who begged them of him, [123] and he received eyes from heaven, and that happened by his Act of Truth. But what is said in the Sutta that when the eye of flesh is destroyed, and the cause of it, the basis of it, is removed, then can no divine eye arise, that is only said of the eye, the insight, that arises out of contemplation. And thus, O king, should you take it.'

'Well said, Nāgasena! You have admirably

¹ Khinnikāya. Compare Gâtaka II, 114, and the Sutta Vibhanga on Pâkittiya 26.

solved the dilemma I put to you; you have rightly explained the point in which I tried to prove you wrong; you have thoroughly overcome the adversary. The thing is so, and I accept it thus¹’

[Here ends the dilemma as to king Sivi’s Act of Truth.]

[THE DILEMMA AS TO CONCEPTION.]

49. This dilemma goes into details which can be best consulted in the Pāli.]

[THE DURATION OF THE FAITH.]

55. ‘Venerable Nāgasena, it has been said by the Blessed One: “But now the good law, Ānanda, will only stand fast for five hundred years².” But on the other hand the Blessed One declared, just before his death, in response to the question put by Subhadda the recluse : "But if in this system the brethren live the perfect life, then the world would not be bereft of Arahats¹." This last phrase is absolute, inclusive ; it cannot be explained away. If the first of these statements be correct, the second is misleading, if the second be right the first must be false. [131] This too is a double-pointed question, more confused than the jungle, more powerful than a strong man, more knotty than a knot. It is now put to you. Show the extent of the power of your knowledge, like a leviathan in the midst of the sea.'

¹ This idea of the power of an Act of Truth which Nāgasena here relies on is most interesting and curious. The exact time at which it was introduced into Buddhism is as yet unknown. It has not been found in the Piṭakas themselves, and is probably an incorporation of an older, pre-Buddhistic, belief. The person carrying it out is supposed to have some goodness, to call that virtue (and perhaps, as in the case of the quail, the goodness of the Buddhas also) to mind, and then to wish something, and that thing, however difficult, and provided there is nothing cruel in it, then comes to pass. It is analogous to the mystic power supposed to reside in names. Childers very properly points out that we have a very remarkable instance of an Act of Truth (though a very un-Buddhistic one) in the Hebrew book of the Kings II. i. 10: ‘And Elijah answered and said to the captain of fifty: “If I be a man of God, then let fire come down from heaven, and consume thee and thy fifty!” And there came down fire from heaven, and consumed him and his fifty.’ A great point, both in this legend and in the story of the quail, is that the power of nature to be overcome is one looked upon by the Brahmans as divine.

² Kullavagga X, 1, 6, translated in ‘Vinaya Texts,’ vol. iii, p. 325.

56. 'The Blessed One, O king, did make both those statements you have quoted. But they are different one from the other both in the spirit and in the letter. The one deals with the limit of the duration of the doctrine², the other with the practice of a religious life—two things widely distinct, as far removed one from the other as the zenith is from the surface of the earth, as heaven is from purgatory, as good is from evil, and as pleasure is from pain. But though that be so, yet lest your enquiry should be vain, I will expound the matter further in its essential connection.'

57. 'When the Blessed One said that the good law³ would only endure for five hundred years, he said so declaring the time of its destruction, limiting the remainder of its existence. For he said : "The good law, Ânanda, would endure for a thousand years if no women had been admitted to the

¹ Book of the Great Decease, V, 62, translated in 'Buddhist Suttas,' p. 108.

² Sâsana.

³ Saddhammo.

Order. But now, Ânanda, it will only last five hundred years." But in so saying, O king, did the Blessed One either foretell the disappearance of the good law, or throw blame on the clear understanding thereof ?'

'Certainly not, Sir.'

'Just so. It was a declaration of injury done, an announcement of the limit of what remained. As when a man whose income had been diminished might announce publicly, making sure of what remained: "So much property have I lost; so much is still left"—[132] so did the Blessed One make known to gods and men what remained when he announced what had been lost by saying: "The good law will now, Ânanda, endure for five hundred years." In so saying he was fixing a limit to religion. But when in speaking to Subhadda, and by way of proclaiming who were the true Samanas, he said: "But if, in this system, the brethren live the perfect life, then the world would not be bereft of Arahats"—in so saying he was declaring in what religion consisted. You have confounded the limitation of a thing with the statement of what it is. But if you like I will tell you what the real connection between the two is. Listen carefully, and attend trustfully to what I say.'

58. 'Suppose, O king, there were a reservoir quite full of fresh cool water, overflowing at the brim, but limited in size and with an embankment running all round it. Now if, when the water had not abated in that tank, a mighty cloud were to rain down rain continually, and in addition, on to the water already in it, would the amount of water in the tank decrease or come to an end ?'

‘Certainly not, Sir.’

‘But why not, O king?’

‘Because of the continual downpour of the rain.’

‘Just so, O king, is the glorious reservoir of the good law of the teaching of the Conqueror ever full of the clear fresh cool water of the practice of duty and virtue and morality and purity of life, and continues overflowing all limits even to the very highest heaven of heavens. And if the children of the Buddha rain down into it continuously, and in addition, the rainfall of still further practice of duty and virtue and morality and purity of life, then will it endure for long, and the world will not be bereft of Arahats. This was the meaning of the Master’s words when he said: “But if, Subhadda, in this system the brethren continue in perfectness of life, then will the world not be bereft of Arahats.”’

59. ‘Now suppose again, O king, that people were to continually supply a mighty fiery furnace with dried cow-dung, and dry sticks, and dry leaves—would that fire go out?’

[133] ‘No indeed, Sir. Rather would it blaze more fiercely, and burn more brightly.’

‘Just so, O king, does the glorious teaching of the Conqueror blaze and shine over the ten thousand world systems by the practice of duty and virtue and morality and purity of life. And if, O king, in addition to that, the children of the Buddha, devoting themselves to the five¹ kinds of spiritual exertion, continue zealous in effort—if cultivating a longing for the threefold discipline, they train themselves therein—

¹ Pañka-padhānaṅgani. This is curious. In the Piṭakas there are four kinds only.

if without ceasing they carry out to the full the conduct that is right, and absolutely avoid all that is wrong, and practise righteousness of life—then will this glorious doctrine of the Conqueror stand more and more steadfast as the years roll on, and the world will not be bereft of Arahats. It was in reference to this, O king, that the Master spake when he said: “But if, Subhadda, in this system the brethren continue in perfectness of life, then will the world not be bereft of Arahats.”’

60. ‘Again, O king, suppose people were to continually polish with fine soft red powder a stainless mirror that was already bright and shining, well polished, smooth, and glossy, would dirt and dust and mud arise on its surface?’

‘No indeed, Sir. Rather would it become to a certainty even more stainless than before.’

‘Just so, O king, is the glorious doctrine of the Conqueror stainless by nature, and altogether free from the dust and dirt of evil. And if the children of the Buddha cleanse it by the virtue arising from the shaking off, the eradication of evil, from the practice of duty and virtue and morality and purity of life, then will this glorious doctrine endure for long, and the world will not be bereft of Arahats. It was in reference to this that the Blessed One spake when he said: “But if, Subhadda, in this system the brethren continue in righteousness of life, then will not the world be bereft of Arahats.” For the teaching of the Master, O king, has its root in conduct, has conduct as its essence, and stands fast so long as conduct does not decline¹.’

¹ There is a paragraph here in the Sinhalese not found in the Pāli.

61. 'Venerable Nāgasena, when you speak of the disappearance of the good law, what do you mean by its disappearance?'

'There are three modes of the disappearance, O king, of a system of doctrine. And what are the three? The decline of attainment to an intellectual grasp of it, the decline of conduct in accordance with it, and the decline of its outward form¹. [134] When the attainment of it ceases, then even the man who conducts himself aright in it has no clear understanding of it. By the decline of conduct the promulgation of the rules of discipline ceases, only the outward form of the religion remains. When the outward form has ceased, the succession of the tradition is cut off. These are the three forms of the disappearance of a system of doctrine.'

'You have well explained, venerable Nāgasena, this dilemma so profound, and have made it plain. You have loosed the knot; you have destroyed the arguments of the adversary, broken them in pieces, proved them wrong—you, O best of the leaders of schools!'

[Here ends the dilemma as to the duration of the faith.]

[THE BUDDHA'S SINLESSNESS.]

62. 'Venerable Nāgasena, had the Blessed One, when he became a Buddha, burnt out all evil in himself, or was there still some evil remaining in him?'

¹ Linga, possibly 'uniform.' Either the Order or the yellow robe, for instance, if the system were Buddhism. See below, IV, 3, 2.

‘He had burnt out all evil. There was none left.’

‘But how, Sir? Did not the Tathâgata get hurt in his body?’

‘Yes, O king. At Râgagaha a splinter of rock pierced his foot¹, and once he suffered from dysentery², and once when the humours of his body were disturbed a purge was administered to him³, and once when he was troubled with wind the Elder who waited on him (that is Ânanda) gave him hot water⁴.’

‘Then, Sir, if the Tathâgata, on his becoming a Buddha, has destroyed all evil in himself—this other statement that his foot was pierced by a splinter, that he had dysentery, and so on, must be false. But if they are true, then he cannot have been free from evil, for there is no pain without Karma. All pain has its root in Karma, it is on account of Karma that suffering arises⁵. This double-headed dilemma is put to you, and you have to solve it.’

63. ‘No, O king. It is not all suffering that has its root in Karma. There are eight causes by which sufferings arise, by which many beings suffer pain. And what are the eight? Superabundance of wind, [135] and of bile, and of phlegm, the union of these humours, variations in temperature, the avoiding of

¹ See Kullavagga VII, 3, 9.

² See Mahâparinibbâna Sutta IV, 21.

³ Mahâvagga VIII, 1, 30–33.

⁴ This is, no doubt, the occurrence recounted in the Mahâvagga VI, 17, 1–4. Childers translates vâtâbâdha by ‘rheumatism,’ but I adhere here to the translation adopted there. It is said in the Mahâvagga that Ânanda gave him, not hot water, but gruel. But the two are very similar, and in the Theri Gâthâ 185, referring to the same event, it is hot water that is mentioned.

⁵ That is, there can be no suffering without sin. Compare the discussion in St. John’s Gospel, ch. ix.

dissimilarities, external agency, and Karma. From each of these there are some sufferings that arise, and these are the eight causes by which many beings suffer pain. And therein whosoever maintains that it is Karma that injures beings, and besides it there is no other reason for pain, his proposition is false.'

'But, Sir, all the other seven kinds of pain have each of them also Karma as its origin, for they are all produced by Karma.'

'If, O king, all diseases were really derived from Karma then there would be no characteristic marks by which they could be distinguished one from the other. When the wind is disturbed, it is so in one or other of ten ways—by cold, or by heat, or by hunger, or by thirst, or by over eating, or by standing too long, or by over exertion, or by walking too fast, or by medical treatment, or as the result of Karma. Of these ten, nine do not act in a past life or in a future life, but in one's present existence. Therefore it is not right to say that all pain is due to Karma. When the bile, O king, is deranged it is so in one or other of three ways—by cold, or by heat, or by improper food. When the phlegm is disturbed it is so by cold, or by heat, or by food and drink. When either of these three humours are disturbed or mixed, it brings about its own special, distinctive pain. Then there are the special pains arising from variations in temperature, avoidance of dissimilarities, and external agency¹. And there is the act that has Karma as its fruit, and the pain so brought about arising from the act done. So what arises as the fruit of Karma is much less than that which arises from other causes. And the ignorant go too far [136] when they say that every pain is produced as the fruit of Karma. No one without a Buddha's insight can fix the extent of the action of Karma.'

¹ As was pointed out above, IV, 1, 33, many of these medical terms are very doubtful.

64. 'Now when the Blessed One's foot was torn by a splinter of rock, the pain that followed was not produced by any other of the eight causes I have mentioned, but only by external agency. For Devadatta, O king, had harboured hatred against the Tathâgata during a succession of hundreds of thousands of births¹. It was in his hatred that he seized hold of a mighty mass of rock, and pushed it over with the hope that it would fall upon his head. But two other rocks came together, and intercepted it before it had reached the Tathâgata; and by the force of their impact a splinter was torn off, and fell upon the Blessed One's foot, and made it bleed. Now this pain must have been produced in the Blessed One either as the result of his own Karma, or of some one else's act. For beyond these two there can be no other kind of pain. It is as when a seed does not germinate—that must be due either to the badness of the soil, or to a defect in the seed. Or it is as when food is not digested—that must be due either to a defect in the stomach, or to the badness of the food.'

65. 'But although the Blessed One never suffered pain which was the result of his own Karma, or brought about the avoidance of dissimilarity², yet he suffered pain from each of the other six causes. And by the pain he could suffer it was not possible to deprive him of life. There come to this body of ours, O king, compounded of the four elements¹, sensations desirable and the reverse, pleasant and unpleasant. Suppose, O king, a clod of earth were to be thrown into the air, and to fall again on to the ground. Would it be in consequence of any act it had previously done that it would so fall ?'

¹ So below, IV, 3, 28.

² Visama-parihâra-gâ both in the Sinhalese and the Pâli.

'No, Sir. There is no reason in the broad earth by which it could experience the result of an act either good or evil. It would be by reason of a present cause [137] independent of Karma that the clod would fall to earth again.'

'Well, O king, the Tathâgata should be regarded as the broad earth. And as the clod would fall on it irrespective of any act done by it, so also was it irrespective of any act done by him that that splinter of rock fell upon his foot.'

66. 'Again, O king, men tear up and plough the earth. But is that a result of any act previously done ?'

'Certainly not, Sir.'

'Just so with the falling of that splinter. And the dysentery which attacked him was in the same way the result of no previous act, it arose from the union of the three humours. And whatsoever bodily disease fell upon him, that had its origin, not in Karma, but in one or other of the six causes referred to. For it has been said, O king, by the Blessed One, by him who is above all gods, in the glorious collection called the Samyutta Nikâya in the prose Sutta, called after Moliya Sīvaka : “ There are certain pains which arise in the world, Sīvaka, from bilious humour. And you ought to know for a certainty which those are, for it is a matter of common knowledge in the world which they are. But those Samanas and Brahmans, Sīvaka, who are of the opinion and proclaim the view that whatsoever pleasure, or pain, or indifferent sensation, any man experiences, is always due to a previous act—they go beyond certainty, they go beyond knowledge, and therein do I say they are wrong. And so also of those pains which arise from the phlegmatic humour, or from the windy humour, or from the union of the three, or from variation in temperature, or from avoidance of dissimilarity, [138] or from external action, or as the result of Karma. In each case you should know for a certainty which those are, for it is a matter of common knowledge which they are. But those Samanas or Brahmans who are of the opinion or the view that whatsoever pleasure, or pain, or indifferent sensation, any man may experience, that is always due to a previous act—they go beyond certainty, they go beyond common knowledge. And therein do I say they are wrong.” So, O king, it is not all pain that is the result of Karma. And you should accept as a fact that when the Blessed One became a Buddha he had burnt out all evil from within him.’

¹ Water, fire, air, and earth (âpo, tego, vayo, paṭhavi).

‘ Very good, Nāgasena ! It is so ; and I accept it as you say.’

[Here ends the dilemma as to the Buddha’s sinlessness]

[ON THE ADVANTAGES OF MEDITATION¹.]

67. 'Venerable Nāgasena, your people say that everything which a Tathāgata has to accomplish that had the Blessed One already carried out when he sat at the foot of the Tree of Wisdom². There was then nothing that he had yet to do, nothing that he had to add to what he had already done. But then there is also talk of his having immediately afterwards remained plunged for three months in ecstatic contemplation³. If the first statement be correct, then the second must be false. And if the second be right, then the first must be wrong. There is no need of any contemplation to him who has already accomplished his task. It is the man who still has something left to do, who has to think about it. [139] It is the sick man who has need of medicine, not the healthy; the hungry man who has need of food, not the man whose hunger is quenched. This too is a double-headed dilemma, and you have to solve it!'

68. 'Both statements, O king, are true. Con-

¹ Paṭisallāna (not samādhi), rendered throughout in the Simhalese by wiweka.

² I have not been able to find this statement in any of the Piṭaka texts.

³ Here again our author seems to be referring to a tradition later than the Piṭakas. In the Mahāvagga (see our version in the 'Vinaya Texts,' vol. i, pp. 74-81) there is mention only of four periods of seven days, and even during these not of paṭisallāna, but of samādhi. The former of these two terms only occurs at the conclusion of the twenty-eight days (Mahāvagga I, 5, 2). Even in the later orthodox literature the period of meditation is still not three months, but only seven times seven days. See the passages quoted in Professor Oldenberg's note at p. 75 of the 'Vinaya Texts,' vol. i.

temple has many virtues. All the Tathâgatas attained, in contemplation, to Buddhahood, and practised it in the recollection of its good qualities. And they did so in the same way as a man who had received high office from a king would, in the recollection of its advantages, of the prosperity he enjoyed by means of it, remain constantly in attendance on that king—in the same way as a man who, having been afflicted and pained with a dire disease, and having recovered his health by the use of medicine, would use the same medicine again and again, calling to mind its virtue.'

69. 'And there are, O king, these twenty and eight good qualities of meditation in the perception of which the Tathâgatas devoted themselves to it. And which are they? Meditation preserves him who meditates, it gives him long life, and endows him with power, it cleanses him from faults, it removes from him any bad reputation giving him a good name, it destroys discontent in him filling him with content, it releases him from all fear endowing him with confidence, it removes sloth far from him filling him with zeal, it takes away lust and ill-will and dullness, it puts an end to pride, it breaks down all doubt, it makes his heart to be at peace, it softens his mind, [140] it makes him glad, it makes him grave, it gains him much advantage, it makes him worthy of reverence, it fills him with joy, it fills him with delight, it shows him the transitory nature of all compounded things, it puts an end to rebirth, it obtains for him all the benefits of renunciation. These, O king, are the twenty and eight virtues of meditation on the perception of which the Tathâgatas devote themselves to it. But it is because the Tathâgatas, O king, long for the enjoyment of the bliss of attainment, of the joy of the tranquil state of Nirvâna, that they devote themselves to meditation, with their minds fixed on the end they aim at.

70. 'And there are four reasons for which the Tathâgatas, O king, devote themselves to meditation. And what are the four? That they may dwell at ease, O king—and on account of the abundance of the advantages of meditation, advantages without drawback—and on account of its being the road to all noble things without exception—and because it has been praised and lauded and exalted and magnified by all the Buddhas. These are the reasons for which the Tathâgatas devote themselves to it. So it is not, great king, because they have anything left to do, or anything to add to what they have already accomplished, but because they have perceived how diversified are the advantages it possesses, that they devote themselves to meditation.'

'Very good, Nâgasena ! That is so, and I accept it as you say.'

[Here ends the dilemma as to meditation.]

[THE LIMIT OF THREE MONTHS.]

71. 'Venerable Nâgasena, it has been said by the Blessed One: "The Tathâgata, Ânanda, has thought out and thoroughly practised, developed, accumulated, and ascended to the very height of the four paths to saintship¹, and so mastered them as to be able to use them as a means of mental advancement, and as a basis for edification—and he therefore, Ânanda, should he desire it, might remain alive for a Kalpa, or for that portion of a Kalpa which has yet to run¹." And again he said: "At the end of three months from this time the Tathâgata will die²." If the first of these statements were true, then the limit of three months must have been false. If the second were true, [141] then the first must have been false. For the Tathâgatas boast not without an occasion, the Blessed Buddhas speak no misleading words, but they utter truth, and speak sincerely. This too is a double-headed dilemma, profound, subtle, hard to expound. It is now put to you. Tear in sunder this net of heresy, put it on one side, break in pieces the arguments of the adversary!

¹ Kattâro iddhi-pâdâ.

72. 'Both these statements, O king, were made by the Blessed One. But Kalpa in that connection means the duration of a man's life. And the Blessed One, O king, was not exalting his own power when he said so, but he was exalting the power of saintship. It was as if a king were possessed of a horse most swift of foot, who could run like the wind. And in order to exalt the power of his speed the king were to say in the presence of all his court—townsfolk and country folk, hired servants and men of war, brahmins, nobles, and officers: "If he wished it this noble steed of mine could cross the earth to its ocean boundary, and be back here again, in a moment³!"

¹ Mahâparinibbâna Sutta III, 60, translated in my 'Buddhist Suttas,' pp. 57, 58.

² Ibid. III, 63, translated loc. cit. p. 59.

³ So it is said of the 'Horse-treasure' of the Great King of Glory in the Mahâsudassana Sutta I, 29 (translated in my 'Buddhist Suttas,' p. 256), that 'it passed over along the broad earth to its very ocean boundary, and then returned again, in time for the

Now though he did not try to test the horse's speed in the presence of the court, yet it had that speed, and was really able to go along over the earth to its ocean boundary in a moment. Just so, O king, the Blessed One spake as he did in praise of the power of saintship, and so spake seated in the midst of gods and men, and of the men of the threefold wisdom and the sixfold insight—the Arahats pure and free from stain—when he said: "The Tathâgata, Ânanda, has thought out and practised, developed, accumulated, and ascended to the very height of the four powers of saintship, and so mastered them as to be able to use them as a means of mental advancement, as a basis for edification. And he therefore, Ânanda, should he desire it, might remain alive for a Kalpa, or the part of a Kalpa that has yet to run." And there was that power, O king, in the Tathâgata, he could have remained alive for that time: and yet he did not show that power in the midst [142] of that assembly. The Blessed One, O king, is free from desire as respects all conditions of future life, and has condemned them all. For it has been said, O king, by the Blessed One: "Just, O Bhikkhus, as a very small quantity of excrement is of evil smell, so do I find no beauty in the very smallest degree of future life, not even in such for the time of the snapping of the fingers¹." Now would the Blessed One, O king, who thus looked upon all sorts and conditions of future life morning meal, to the royal city of Kusâvatî.' It is, of course, the sun horse which is meant.

¹ I have not traced this quotation in the Piṭakas, but it is probably there.

as dung have nevertheless, simply because of his power of Iddhi, harboured a craving desire for future life ?'

'Certainly not, Sir.'

'Then it must have been to exalt the power of Iddhi that he gave utterance to such a boast.'

'Very good, Nāgasena ! It is so, and I accept it as you say.'

[Here ends the dilemma as to the three months.]

Here ends the First Chapter.

BOOK IV. CHAPTER 2.

[THE ABOLITION OF REGULATIONS.]

1. 'Venerable Nāgasena, it has been said by the Blessed One: "It is by insight, O Bhikkhus, that I preach the law, not without insight¹." On the other hand he said of the regulations of the Vinaya: "When I am gone, Ānanda, let the Order, if it should so wish, abolish all the lesser and minor precepts²." Were then these lesser and minor precepts wrongly laid down, or established in ignorance and without due cause, that the Blessed One allowed them to be revoked after his death? If the first statement had been true, the second would have been wrong. If the second statement were really made, [143] then the first was false. This too is a double-headed problem, fine, subtle, abstruse, deep, profound, and hard to expound. It is now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

2. 'In both cases, O king, the Blessed One said as you have declared. But in the second case it was to test the Bhikkhus that he said it, to try whether, if leave were granted them, they would, after his death, revoke the lesser and minor regulations, or still adhere to them. It runs as if a king of kings were to say to his sons : " This great country, my children, reaches to the sea on every side. It is a hard thing to maintain it with the forces we have at our disposal. So when I am gone you had better, my children, abandon the outlying districts along the border." Now would the princes, O king, on the death of their father, give up those outlying districts, provinces already in their power ?'

¹ Not traced as yet.

² Mahāparinibbāna Sutta VI, 3 (translated in my 'Buddhist Suttas,' p. 112). The incident is referred to in the Kullavagga XI, 1, 9, 10, and in his commentary on that passage Buddhaghosa mentions the discussion between Milinda and Nāgasena, and quotes it as an authority in support of his interpretation.

'No indeed, Sir. Kings are grasping. The princes might, in the lust of power, subjugate an extent of country twice or thrice the size of what they had, but they would never give up what they already possessed.'

'Just so was it, O king, that the Tathâgata to test the Bhikkhus said : " When I am gone, Ānanda, let the Order, if it should so wish, abolish all the lesser and minor precepts." But the sons of the Buddha, O king, in their lust after the law, and for emancipation from sorrow, might keep two hundred and fifty regulations¹, but would never give up any one that had been laid down in ordinary course.'

3. 'Venerable Nâgasena, when the Blessed One referred to " lesser and minor precepts," this people might therein [144] be bewildered, and fall into doubt, and find matter for discussion, and be lost in hesitation, as to which were the lesser, and which the minor precepts.'

'The lesser errors in conduct², O king, are the lesser precepts, and the lesser errors in speech³ are the minor precepts: and these two together make up therefore " the lesser and minor precepts." The leading Elders too of old, O king, were in doubt about this matter, and they were not unanimous on the point at the Council held for the fixing of the text of the Scriptures¹. And the Blessed One foresaw that this problem would arise.'

¹ The regulations in the Pâtimokkha, which include all the most important ones, are only 220 in number.

² Dukkaṭṭam.

³ Dubbhâsitaṃ.

'Then this dark saying of the Conquerors, Nāgasena, which has lain hid so long, has been now to-day uncovered in the face of the world, and made clear to all.'

[Here ends the problem as to the revocation of rules.]

[ESOTERIC TEACHING.]

4. 'Venerable Nāgasena, it was said by the Blessed One: "In respect of the truths, Ānanda, the Tathāgata has no such thing as the closed fist of a teacher who keeps something back²." But on the other hand he made no reply to the question put by the son of the Mālunkya woman³. This problem, Nāgasena, will be one of two ends, on one of which it must rest, for he must have refrained from answering either out of ignorance, or out of wish to conceal something. If the first statement be true it must have been out of ignorance. But if he knew, and still did not reply, then the first statement must be false. This too is a double-pointed dilemma. It is now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

¹ In the Kullavagga XI, 1, 10, it is one of the faults laid to Ānanda's charge, at the Council of Rāgagaha, that he had not asked for a definition of these terms.

² Mahāparinibbāna Sutta II, 32 (another passage from the same speech is quoted below, IV, 2, 29).

³ See the two Mālunkya Suttantas in the Magghima Nikāya (vol. i, pp. 426-437 of Mr. Trenckner's edition for the Pāli Text Society). With regard to the spelling of the name, which is doubtful, it may be noticed that Hīnaśi-kumburē has Mālunka throughout.

5. 'The Blessed One, O king, made that first statement to Ânanda, and he did not reply to Mâluṅkyâ-putta's question. But that was neither out of ignorance, nor for the sake of concealing anything. There are four kinds of ways in which a problem may be explained. And which are the four? There is the problem to which an explanation can be given that shall be direct and final. There is the problem which can be answered by going into details. There is the problem which can be answered by asking another. And there is the problem which can be put on one side.

'And which, O king, is the problem to which a direct and final solution can be given? It is such as this—"Is form impermanent?" [145] "Is sensation impermanent?" "Is idea impermanent?" "Are the Confections impermanent?" "Is consciousness impermanent?"

'And which is the problem which can be answered by going into details? It is such as this—"Is form thus impermanent?" and so on.

'And which is the problem which can be answered by asking another? It is such as this—"What then? Can the eye perceive all things?"

'And which is the problem which can be put on one side? It is such as this—"Is the universe everlasting?" "Is it not everlasting?" "Has it an end?" "Has it no end?" "Is it both endless and unending?" "Is it neither the one nor the other?" "Are the soul and the body the same thing?" "Is the soul distinct from the body?" "Does a Tathâgata exist after death?" "Does he not exist after death?" "Does he both exist and not exist after death?" "Does he neither exist nor not exist after death?"

'Now it was to such a question, one that ought to be put on one side, that the Blessed One gave no reply to Mâlunkya-putta. And why ought such a question to be put on one side? Because there is no reason or object for answering it. That is why it should be put aside. For the Blessed Buddhas lift not up their voice without a reason and without an object.'

'Very good, Nâgasena! Thus it is, and I accept it as you say.'

[Here ends the dilemma as to keeping some things back¹.]

[DEATH.]

6. 'Venerable Nâgasena, this too was said by the Blessed One: "All men tremble at punishment, all are afraid of death²." But again he said: "The Arahât has passed beyond all fear³." How then, Nâgasena? does the Arahât tremble with the fear of punishment? [146] Or are the beings in purgatory, when they are being burnt and boiled and scorched and tormented, afraid of that death which would release them from the burning fiery pit of that awful place of woe⁴? If the Blessed One, Nâgasena, ¹ See my note below on IV, 4, 8. ² Dhammapada 129.

³ Not traced in these words, but identical in meaning with Dhammapada 39.

⁴ Maha-nirayâ kavamânâ, 'when they are on the point of passing away from it.' For in Buddhism the time comes to each really said that all men tremble at punishment, and all are afraid of death, then the statement that the Arahats has passed beyond fear must be false. But if that last statement is really by him, then the other must be false. This double-headed problem is now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

7. 'It was not with regard to Arahats, O king, that the Blessed One spake when he said: "All men tremble at punishment, all are afraid of death." The Arahats is an exception to that statement, for all cause for fear has been removed from the Arahats¹. He spoke of those beings in whom evil still existed, who are still infatuated with the delusion of self, who are still lifted up and cast down by pleasures and pains. To the Arahats, O king, rebirth in every state has been cut off, all the four kinds of future existence have been destroyed, every re-incarnation has been put an end to, the rafters² of the house of life have broken, and the whole house completely pulled down, the Confections have altogether lost their roots, good and evil have ceased, ignorance has been demolished, consciousness has no longer any seed (from which it could be renewed), all sin has been burnt away³, and all worldly conditions have been overcome⁴. Therefore is it that the Arahats is not made to tremble by any fear.'

being in Niraya (often translated 'hell') when he will pass away from it.

¹ That is from him who attained Nirvâṇa in this life. Compare 1 John iv. 18.

² Phâsû for Phâsukâ. Compare Dhammapada 154, Manu VI, 79-81, and Sumaṅgala, p. 16.

³ Hīnaśi-kumburê adds 'by the fire of tapas.'

⁴ Eight are meant—gain, loss, fame, dishonour, praise, blame, pleasures, pains.

8. 'Suppose, O king, a king had four chief ministers, faithful, famous, trustworthy, placed in high positions of authority. And the king, on some emergency arising, were to issue to them an order touching all the people in his realm, saying: "Let all now pay up a tax, and do you, as my four officers, carry out what is necessary in this emergency." Now tell me, O king, would the tremor which comes from fear of taxation arise in the hearts of those ministers?'

'No, Sir, it would not.'

'But why not?'

'They have been appointed by the king to high office. Taxation does not affect them, they are beyond taxation. It was the rest that the king referred to when he gave the order: [147] "Let all pay tax."'

'Just so, O king, is it with the statement that all men tremble at punishment, all are afraid of death. In that way is it that the Arahāt is removed from every fear.'

9. 'But, Nāgasena, the word "all" is inclusive, none are left out when it is used. Give me a further reason to establish the point.'

'Suppose, O king, that in some village the lord of the village were to order the crier, saying: "Go, crier, bring all the villagers quickly together before me." And he in obedience to that order were to stand in the midst of the village and were thrice to call out: "Let all the villagers assemble at once in the presence of the lord!" And they should assemble in haste, and have an announcement made to the lord, saying: "All the villagers, Sire, have assembled. Do now whatsoever you require." Now when the lord, O king, is thus summoning all the heads of houses, he issues his order to all the villagers, but it is not they who assemble in obedience to the order; it is the heads of houses. And the lord is satisfied therewith, knowing that such is the number of his villagers. There are many others who do not come—women and men, slave girls and slaves, hired workmen, servants, peasantry, sick people, oxen, buffaloes, sheep, and goats, and dogs—but all those do not count. It was with reference to the heads of houses that the order was issued in the words: "Let all assemble." Just so, O king, it is not of Arahats that it was said that all are afraid of death. [148] The Arahata is not included in that statement, for the Arahata is one in whom there is no longer any cause that could give rise to fear.'

10. 'There is the non-inclusive expression, O king, whose meaning is non-inclusive, and the non-inclusive expression whose meaning is inclusive; there is the inclusive expression whose meaning is non-inclusive, and the inclusive expression whose meaning is inclusive. And the meaning, in each case, should be accepted accordingly. And there are five ways in which the meaning should be ascertained—by the connection, and by taste, and by the tradition of the teachers, and by the meaning, and by abundance of reasons. And herein "connection" means the meaning as seen in the Sutta itself, "taste" means that it is in accordance with other Suttas, "the tradition of the teachers" means what they hold, "the meaning" means what they think, and "abundance of reasons" means all these four combined¹.'

¹ This is much more obscure in Pāli than in English. In the Pāli the names of each of the five methods are ambiguous. 'Connection,' for instance, is in Pāli âhaṅkā-pada, which is only

11. 'Very well, Nâgasena ! I accept it as you say. The Arahat is an exception in this phrase, and it is the rest of beings who are full of fear. But those beings in purgatory, of whom I spoke, who are suffering painful, sharp, and severe agonies, who are tormented with burnings all over their bodies and limbs, whose mouths are full of lamentation, and cries for pity, and cries of weeping and wailing and woe, who are overcome with pains too sharp to be borne, who find no refuge nor protection nor help, who are afflicted beyond measure, who in the worst and lowest of conditions are still destined to a certainty to further pain, who are being burnt with hot, sharp, fierce, and cruel flames, who are giving utterance to mighty shouts and groans born of horror and fear, who are embraced by the garlands of flame which intertwine around them from all the six directions, and flash in fiery speed through a hundred leagues on every side—can those poor burning wretches be afraid of death ?'

'Yes, they can.'

'But, venerable Nâgasena, is not purgatory a place of certain pain ? And, if so, why should the beings in it be afraid of death, which would release them from that certain pain ? What ! Are they fond of purgatory ?'

'No, indeed. They like it not. They long to be released from it. It is the power of death of which they are afraid.'

'Now this, Nâgasena, I cannot believe, that they, who want to be released, should be afraid of rebirth.'

found elsewhere (see Kullavagga VI, 4, 3, and my note there) as the name of a kind of chair. And there is similar ambiguity in the other words.

[149] They must surely, Nāgasena, rejoice at the prospect of the very condition that they long for. Convince me by some further reason¹.'

12. 'Death, great king, is a condition which those who have not seen the truth² are afraid of. About it this people is anxious and full of dread. Whosoever is afraid of a black snake, or an elephant or lion or tiger or leopard or bear or hyena or wild buffalo or gayal, or of fire or water, or of thorns or spikes or arrows, it is in each case of death that he is really in dread, and therefore afraid of them. This, O king, is the majesty of the essential nature of death. And all being not free from sin are in dread and quake before its majesty. In this sense it is that even the beings in purgatory, who long to be released from it, are afraid of death.'

13. 'Suppose, O king, a boil were to arise, full of matter, on a man's body, and he, in pain from that disease, and wanting to escape from the danger of it, were to call in a physician and surgeon. And the surgeon, accepting the call, were to make ready some means or other for the removal of his disease—were to have a lancet sharpened, or to have sticks put into the fire to be used as cauterisers, or to have something ground on a grindstone to be mixed in a salt lotion. Now would the patient begin to be in dread of the cutting of the sharp lancet, or of the burning of the pair of caustic sticks, or of the application of the stinging lotion?'

'Yes, he would.'

¹ Kāraṇena, perhaps he means 'by an example.'

² Adiṣṣa-sakkāṇam. It may also mean 'who have not perceived the (Four Noble) Truths.'

‘But if the sick man, who wants to be free from his ailment, can fall into dread by the fear of pain, just so can the beings in purgatory, though they long to be released from it, fall into dread by the fear of death.’

14. ‘And suppose, O king, a man who had committed an offence against the crown, when bound with a chain, and cast into a dungeon, were to long for release. And the ruler, wishing to release him, were to send for him. Now would not that man, who had thus offended, and knew it, be in dread [150] of the interview with the king?’

‘Yes, Sir.’

‘But if so, then can also the beings in purgatory, though they long to be released from it, yet be afraid of death.’

‘Give me another illustration by which I may be able to harmonise¹ (this apparent discrepancy).’

‘Suppose, O king, a man bitten by a poisonous snake should be afraid, and by the action of the poison should fall and struggle, and roll this way and that. And then that another man, by the repetition of a powerful charm, should compel that poisonous snake to approach to suck the poison back again². Now when the bitten man saw the poisonous snake coming to him, though for the object of curing him, would he not still be in dread of it?’

‘Yes, Sir.’

‘Well, it is just so with the beings in purgatory.’

¹ Okappeyyam. See the Old Commentary at Pâkittiya I, 2, 6.

² On this belief the 69th Gâtaka is founded. See Fausböll, vol. i, pp. 310, 311 (where, as Mr. Trenckner points out, we must read in the verse the same word paṭṭhākam as we have here).

Death is a thing disliked by all beings. And therefore are they in dread of it though they want to be released from purgatory.'

'Very good, Nâgasena ! That is so, and I accept it as you say.'

[Here ends the dilemma as to the fear of death.]

[PIRIT.]

15. 'Venerable Nâgasena, it was said by the Blessed One :

"Not in the sky, not in the ocean's midst,
Not in the most secluded mountain cleft,
Not in the whole wide world is found the spot
Where standing one could 'scape the snare of death¹."

But on the other hand the Pirit service was promulgated by the Blessed One²—that is to say, the Ratana Sutta and the Khanda-parittâ and the Mora-parittâ and the Dhagagga-parittâ [151] and the Âñânâ/iya-parittâ and the Aṅguli-mala-parittâ. If, Nâgasena, a man can escape death's snare neither by going to heaven, nor by going into the midst of the sea, nor by going to the summits of lofty palaces, ¹ Either Dhammapada 127, which is the same except the last word (there 'an evil deed'), or Dhammapada 128, except the last line (which is there 'where standing death would not overtake one').

² This is a service used for the sick. Its use so far as the Piṭakas are known has been nowhere laid down by the Buddha, or by words placed in his mouth. This is the oldest text in which the use of the service is referred to. But the word Parittâ (Pirit) is used in Kullavagga V, 6, of an asseveration of love for snakes, to be used as what is practically a charm against snake bite, and that is attributed to the Buddha. The particular Suttas and passages here referred to are all in the Piṭakas.

nor to the caves or grottoes or declivities or clefts or holes in the mountains, then is the Pirit ceremony useless. But if by it there is a way of escape from death, then the statement in the verse I quoted is false. This too is a double-headed problem, more knotty than a knot. It is now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

16. 'The Blessed One, O king, said the verse you have quoted, and he sanctioned Pirit¹. But that is only meant for those who have some portion of their life yet to run, who are of full age, and restrain themselves from the evils of Karma. And there is no ceremony or artificial means² for prolonging the life of one whose allotted span of existence has come to an end. Just, O king, as with a dry and dead log of wood, dull³, and sapless, out of which all life has departed, which has reached the end of its allotted period of life,—you might have thousands of pots of water poured over it, but it would never become fresh again or put forth sprouts or leaves. Just so there is no ceremony or artificial means, no medicine and no Pirit, which can prolong the life of one whose allotted period has come to an end. All the medicines in the world are useless, O king, to such a one, but Pirit is a protection and assistance to those who have a period yet to live, who are full of life, and restrain themselves from the evil of Karma. And it is for that use that Pirit was appointed by the

¹ See last note. Hīna/i-kumburē renders 'preached Pirit,' which is quite in accordance with the Pi/akas, as the Suttas of which it is composed are placed in his mouth.

² Upakkamo. Compare the use of the word at Kullavagga VII, 3, 10; Sumaṅgala 69, 71. Utpatti-kramayek says the Siṃhalese.

³ Ko/āpa. See Gātaka III, 495, and the commentary there.

Blessed One. Just, O king, as a husbandman guards the grain when it is ripe and dead and ready for harvesting from the influx of water, but makes it grow by giving it water when it is young, and dark in colour like a cloud, and full of life—just so, O king, should the Pirit ceremony be put aside and neglected in the case of one who has reached his allotted term of life, [152] but for those who have a period yet to run and are full of vigour, for them the medicine of Pirit may be repeated, and they will profit by its use.'

17. 'But, Nâgasena, if he who has a term of life yet to run will live, and he who has none will die, then medicine and Pirit are alike useless.'

'Have you ever seen, O king, a case of a disease being turned back by medicine?'

'Yes, several hundred times.'

'Then, O king, your statement as to the inefficiency of Pirit and medicine must be wrong.'

'I have seen, Nâgasena, doctors administer medicines by way of draughts or outward applications, and by that means the disease has been assuaged.'

'And when, O king, the voice of those who are repeating Pirit is heard, the tongue may be dried up, and the heart beat but faintly, and the throat be hoarse, but by that repetition all diseases are allayed, all calamities depart. Again, have you ever seen, O king, a man who has been bitten by a snake having the poison resorbed under a spell (by the snake who gave the bite¹) or destroyed (by an antidote) or having a lotion applied above or below the spot²?'

¹ See above, IV, 2, 14.

² All this sentence is doubtful. Dr. Morris has a learned note on the difficult words used (which only occur here) in the 'Journal

‘Yes, that is common custom to this day in the world.’

‘Then what you said that Pirit and medicine are alike useless is wrong. And when Pirit has been said over a man, a snake, ready to bite, will not bite him, but close his jaws—the club which robbers hold aloft to strike him with will never strike; they will let it drop, and treat him kindly—the enraged elephant rushing at him will suddenly stop—the burning fiery conflagration surging towards him will die out—the malignant poison he has eaten will become harmless, and turn to food—assassins who have come to slay him will become as the slaves who wait upon him—and the trap into which he has trodden will hold him not.

18. ‘Again, have you never heard, O king, of that hunter who during seven hundred years failed to throw his net over the peacock who had taken Pirit, but snared him the very day [153] he omitted to do so¹?’

‘Yes, I have heard of it. The fame of it has gone through all the world.’

‘Then what you said about Pirit and medicine being alike useless must be wrong. And have you never heard of the Dānava² who, to guard his wife, of the Pāli Text Society’ for 1884, p. 87. Hīnañ-kumburê, p. 191, translates as follows: Mahā ragāneni, wisha wināsa karannāwû mantra padayakin wishaya baswana laddāwû, wisha sanhinduwana laddāwû, ûrddhādho bhāgayehi awushadha galayen temana laddāwû, nayaku wisin dash/a karana laddāwû kisiwek topa wisin daknâ ladde dœyi wiññāla seka.

¹ This is the Mora-Gâtaka, Nos. 159, 491, or (which is the same thing) the Mora-Parittā.

² An Asura, enemy of the gods, a Titan. Rakshasa says the Simhalese.

put her into a box, and swallowing it, carried her about in his stomach. And how a Vidyâdhara¹ entered his mouth, and played games with his wife. And how the Dânaava when he became aware of it, vomited up the box, and opened it, and the moment he did so the Vidyâdhara escaped whither he would²?’

‘Yes, I have heard that. The fame of it too has gone throughout the world.’

‘Well, did not the Vidyâdhara escape capture by the power of Pirit?’

‘Yes, that was so.’

‘Then there must be power in Pirit. And have you heard of that other Vidyâdhara who got into the harem of the king of Benares, and committed adultery with the chief queen, and was caught, and then became invisible, and got away³?’

‘Yes, I heard that story.’

‘Well, did not he too escape capture by the power of Pirit?’

‘Yes, Sir.’

‘Then, O king, there must be power in Pirit.’

19. ‘Venerable Nâgasena, is Pirit a protection to everybody?’

¹ They are a kind of genii, with magical powers, who are attendants on the god Siva (and therefore, of course, enemies of the Dânavas). They are not mentioned in the Piṭakas.

² I don't know where this story comes from. It is not in the Piṭakas anywhere. But Hīnaśi-kumburē gives the fairy tale at full length, and in the course of it calls the Vidyâdharas by name Wāyassa-putra, ‘Son of the Wind.’ He quotes also a gāthā which he places, not in the mouth of the Bodisat, but of Buddha himself. I cannot find the tale either in the Gâtaka book, as far as published by Professor Fausböll, or in the Kathâ Sarit Sâgara, though I have looked all through both.

³ See last note.

‘To some, not to others.’

‘Then it is not always of use?’

‘Does food keep all people alive?’

‘Only some, not others.’

‘But why not?’

‘Inasmuch as some, eating too much of that same food, die of cholera.’

‘So it does not keep all men alive?’

‘There are two reasons which make it destroy life—over-indulgence in it, and weakness of digestion. And even life-giving food may be made poisonous by an evil spell.’

‘Just so, O king, is Pirit a protection to some and not to others. And there are three reasons [154] for its failure—the obstruction of Karma, and of sin, and of unbelief. That Pirit which is a protection to beings loses its protecting power by acts done by those beings themselves. Just, O king, as a mother lovingly nourishes the son who has entered her womb, and brings him forth with care¹. And after his birth she keeps him clean from dirt and stains and mucus, and anoints him with the best and most costly perfumes, and when others abuse or strike him she seizes them and, full of excitement, drags them before the lord of the place. But when her son is naughty, or comes in late, she strikes him with rods or clubs on her knee or with her hands. Now, that being so, would she get seized and dragged along, and have to appear before the lord?’

‘No, Sir.’

‘But why not?’

¹ Upakârena, which the Sinhalese repeats and construes with poseti.

‘Because the boy was in fault.’

‘Just in the same way, O king, will Pirit which is a protection to beings, yet, by their own fault, turn against them.’

‘Very good, Nâgasena! The problem has been solved, the jungle made clear, the darkness made light, the net of heresy unravelled—and by you, O best of the leaders of schools!’

[Here ends the dilemma as to Pirit.]

[MÂRA, THE EVIL ONE.]

20. ‘Venerable Nâgasena, your people say thus: “The Tathâgata was in the constant receipt of the things necessary for a recluse—robes, food, lodging, and the requisites for the sick.” And again they say: “When the Tathâgata entered the Brahman village called the Five Sâla trees he received nothing, and had to return with his bowl as clean as before.” If the first passage is true the second is false, and if the second passage is true [155] the first is false. This too is a double-headed problem, a mighty crux hard to unravel. It is now put to you. It is for you to solve it.’

21. ‘Both statements are true, but when he received nothing that day, that was the work of Mâra, the evil one.’

‘Then, Nâgasena, how was it that the merit laid up by the Blessed One through countless æons of time came to end that day? How was it that Mâra, who had only just been produced, could overcome the strength and influence of that merit? In that case, Nâgasena, the blame must fall in one of two ways—either demerit must be more powerful than merit, or the power of Māra be greater than that of the Buddha. The root of the tree must be heavier than the top of it, or the sinner stronger than he who has heaped up virtue.'

22. 'Great king, that is not enough to prove either the one or the other of your alternatives. Still a reason is certainly desirable in this matter. Suppose, O king, a man were to bring a complimentary present to a king of kings—honey or honeycomb or something of that kind. And the king's doorkeeper were to say to him: "This is the wrong time for visiting the king. So, my good fellow, take your present as quickly as ever you can, and go back before the king inflicts a fine upon you." And then that man, in dread and awe, should pick up his present, and return in great haste. Now would the king of kings, merely from the fact that the man brought his gift at the wrong time, be less powerful than the doorkeeper, or never receive a complimentary present any more?'

'No, Sir. The doorkeeper turned back the giver of that present out of the surliness of his nature, and one a hundred thousand times as valuable [156] might be brought in by some other device.'

'Just so, O king, it was out of the jealousy of his nature that Māra, the evil one, possessed the Brahmans and householders at the Five Sāla trees. And hundreds of thousands of other deities came up to offer the Buddha the strength-giving ambrosia from heaven, and stood reverencing him with clasped hands and thinking to themselves that they would thus imbue him with vigour.'

23. 'That may be so, Nāgasena. The Blessed

One found it easy to get the four requisites of a recluse—he, the best in the world—and at the request of gods and men he enjoyed all the requisites. But still Mâra's intention to stop the supply of food to the Blessed One was so far carried out. Herein, Sir, my doubt is not removed. I am still in perplexity and hesitation about this. My mind is not clear how the Tathâgata, the Arahata, the supreme Buddha, the best of all the best in the world of gods and men, he who had so glorious a treasure of the merit of virtue, the unequalled one, unrivalled and peerless,—how so vile, mean, insignificant, sinful, and ignoble a being as Mâra could put any obstacle in the way of gifts to Him.'

24. 'There are four kinds, O king, of obstacles—the obstacle to a gift not intended for any particular person, to a gift set apart for some one, to the gift got ready, and to the enjoyment of a gift. And the first is when any one puts an obstacle in the way of the actual gift of a thing put ready to be given away, but not with a view to or having seen any particular donee,—an obstacle raised, for instance, by saying: "What is the good of giving it away to any one else?" The second is when any one puts an obstacle in the way of the actual gift of food intended to be prepared to be given to a person specified. The third is when any one puts an obstacle in the way when such a gift has been got ready, but not yet accepted. And the fourth is when any one puts an obstacle in the way of the enjoyment of a gift already given (and so the property of the donee).'

25. 'Now when Mâra, the evil one, possessed the Brahmans and householders at the Five Sâla trees, the food in that case was neither the property of, nor got ready for, nor intended to be prepared specially for the Blessed One. [157] The obstacle was put in the way of some one who was yet to come, who had not arrived, and for whom no gift was intended. That was not against the Blessed One alone. But all who had gone out that day, and were coming to the village, failed to receive an alms. I know no one, O king, in the world of men and gods, no one among Mâras or Brahmas, no one of the class of Brahmans or recluses, who could put any obstacle in the way of an alms intended for, or got ready for, or already given to the Blessed One. And if any one, out of jealousy, were to raise up any obstacle in that case, then would his head split into a hundred or into a thousand pieces.'

26. 'There are four things, O king, connected with the Tathâgatas, to which no one can do any harm. And what are the four? To the alms intended for, and got ready for the Blessed One—to the halo of a fathom's length when it has once spread out from him—to the treasure of the knowledge of his omniscience—and to his life. All these things, O king, are one in essence—they are free from defect, immovable, unassailable by other beings, unchangeable by other circumstances¹. And Mâra, the evil one, lay in ambush, out of sight, when he possessed the Brahmans and householders at the Five Sâla trees. It was as when robbers, O king, hiding out of sight in the inaccessible country over the border, beset the highways. But if the king caught sight of them, do you think those robbers would be safe ?'

¹ Aphasâni kiriyâni, which I do not pretend to understand, and Mr. Trenckner says is unintelligible to him. Hînañ-kumburê has: Anya kriyâwak no wœdagannâ bæwin apusana (sic) kriyâyo ya.

'No, Sir, he might have them cut into a hundred or a thousand pieces with an axe.'

'Well, just so it was, hiding out of sight, that Mâra possessed them. It was as when a married woman, in ambush, and out of sight, frequents the company of her paramour. [158] But if, O king, she were to carry on her intrigues in her husband's presence, do you think she would be safe ?'

'No, Sir, he might slay her, or wound her, or put her in bonds, or reduce her to slavery.'

'Well. It was like that, hiding out of sight, that Mâra possessed them. But if, O king, he had raised any obstacle in the case of an alms intended for, got ready for, or in possession of the Blessed One, then his head would have split into a hundred or a thousand pieces.'

'That is so, Nâgasena. Mâra, the evil one, acted after the manner of robbers, he lay in ambush, possessing the Brahmans and householders of the Five Sâla trees. But if the same Mâra, the evil one, had interfered with any alms intended for, or made ready for the Blessed One, or with his partaking thereof, then would his head have been split into a hundred or a thousand pieces, or his bodily frame have been dissipated like a handful of chaff.'

'Very good, Nâgasena ! That is so, and I accept it as you say.'

[Here ends the dilemma as to Mâra's interference with alms.]

[UNCONSCIOUS CRIME.]

27. 'Venerable Nāgasena, your people say: "Who-soever deprives a living being of life, without knowing that he does so, he accumulates very serious demerit¹." But on the other hand it was laid down by the Blessed One in the Vinaya: "There is no offence to him who acts in ignorance²." If the first passage is correct, the other must be false; and if the second is right, the first must be wrong. This too is a double-pointed problem, hard to master, hard to overcome. It is now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

28. 'Both the passages you quote, O king, were spoken by the Blessed One. But there is a difference between the sense of the two. And what is that difference? [159] There is a kind of offence which is committed without the co-operation of the mind³, and there is another kind which has that co-operation. It was with respect to the first of the two that the Blessed One said: "There is no offence to him who acts in ignorance¹."

¹ Not traced as yet, in so many words. And though there are several injunctions in the Vinaya against acts which might haply, though unknown to the doer, destroy life (such, for instance, as drinking water without the use of a strainer), when these are all subjects of special rule, and in each case there is an exception in favour of the Bhikkhu who acts in ignorance of there being living things which could be killed. (See, for instance, Pāṭittiya 62, on the drinking of water.)

² Agānantassa nāpatti. Pāṭittiya LXI, 2, 3 (in the Old Commentary, not ascribed to the Buddha).

³ Saññā-vimokkhā. I am not sure of the exact meaning of this difficult compound, which has only been found in this passage. Hīna-kumburē (p. 199) has: Mahā ragāneni, kīttāngayen abhāwayen midena bœwin saññā-wimoksha-namwā āpattit atteya, &c. (mid = muk).

'Very good, Nâgasena! That is so, and I accept it as you say.'

[Here ends the dilemma as to sins in ignorance.]

[THE BUDDHA AND HIS FOLLOWERS.]

29. 'Venerable Nâgasena, it was said by the Blessed One: "Now the Tathâgata thinks not, Ânanda, that is he who should lead the brotherhood, or that the Order is dependent upon him²." But on the other hand when describing the virtues and the nature of Metteyya, the Blessed One, he said thus: "He will be the leader of a brotherhood several thousands in number, as I am now the leader of a brotherhood several hundreds in number³." If the first statement be right, then the second is wrong. If the second passage is right, the first must be false. This too is a double-pointed problem now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

30. 'You quote both passages correctly, O king. But in the dilemma that you put the sense in the one passage is inclusive, in the other it is not. It is not the Tathâgata, O king, who seeks after a following, but the followers who seek after him.

¹ The Sinhalese has here a further page, giving examples of the two kinds of offences referred to, and drawing the conclusion for each.

² Book of the Great Decease, II, 32 (translated in my 'Buddhist Suttas,' p. 37), just after the passage quoted above, IV, 2, 4.

³ Not in any of the published texts. Metteyya is, of course, the Buddha to come, the expected messiah.

[160] It is a mere commonly received opinion, O king, that "This is I," or "This is mine," it is not a transcendental truth¹. Attachment is a frame of mind put away by the Tathâgata, he has put away clinging, he is free from the delusion that "This is mine," he lives only to be a help to others². Just as the earth, O king, is a support to the beings in the world, and an asylum to them, and they depend upon it, but the broad earth has no longing after them in the idea that "These belong to me"—just so is the Tathâgata a support and an asylum to all beings, but has no longing after them in the idea that "These belong to me." And just as a mighty rain cloud, O king, pours out its rain, and gives nourishment to grass and trees, to cattle and to men, and maintains the lineage thereof, and all these creatures depend for their livelihood upon its rain, but the cloud has no feelings of longing in the idea that "These are mine"—just so does the Tathâgata give all beings to know what are good qualities and maintains them in goodness, and all beings have their life in him, but the Tathâgata has no feelings of longing in the idea that "These are mine." And why is it so? Because of his having abandoned all self-regard³.

'Very good, Nâgasena! The problem has been well solved by variety of examples. The jungle has been made open, the darkness has been turned to light, the arguments of the adversaries have been broken down, insight has been awakened in the sons of the Conqueror.'

¹ Sammuti . . . na paramattho.

² Upâdâya avassayo hoti.

³ Attânudi//hiyâ pahînattâ. See the passages quoted by Dr. Morris in the 'Journal of the Pâli Text Society,' 1886, pp. 113, 114.

[Here ends the dilemma as to the Buddha and his following.]

[SCHISM.]

31. 'Venerable Nâgasena, your people say: "The Tathâgata is a person whose following can never be broken up." And again they say: "At one stroke Devadatta seduced five hundred of the brethren¹." If the first be true the second is false, but if the second be correct then the first is wrong. [161] This too is a double-pointed problem, profound, hard to unravel, more knotty than a knot. By it these people are veiled, obstructed, hindered, shut in, and enveloped. Herein show your skill as against the arguments of the adversaries.'

32. 'Both statements, O king, are correct. But the latter is owing to the power of the breach maker. Where there is one to make the breach, a mother will be separated from her son, and the son will break with the mother, or the father with the son and the son with the father, or the brother from the sister and the sister from the brother, or friend from friend. A ship pieced together with timber of all sorts is broken up by the force of the violence of the waves, and a tree in full bearing and full of sap is broken down by the force of the violence of the wind, and gold of the finest sort is divided by bronze. But it is not the intention of the wise, it is not the will of the Buddhas, it is not the desire of those who are learned that the following of the Tathâgata should be broken up. And there is a special sense in which it is said that that cannot be. It is an unheard-of thing, so far as I know, that his following could be broken up by anything done or taken, any unkindly word, any wrong action, any injustice, in all the conduct, wheresoever or whatsoever, of the Tathâgata himself. In that sense his following is invulnerable. And you yourself, do you know of any instance in all the ninefold word of the Buddha of anything done by a Bodisat which broke up the following of the Tathâgata ?'

¹ Neither of these phrases is to be found in the published texts in these words. But the latter sums up the episode related in the Kullavagga VII, 4, 1.

'No, Sir. Such a thing has never been seen or heard in the world. It is very good, Nâgasena, what you say : and I accept it so.'

[Here ends the dilemma as to schism.]

Here ends the Second Chapter.

BOOK IV. CHAPTER 3.

[PRECEDENCE OF THE DHARMA.]

1. 'Venerable Nāgasena, it was said by the Blessed One: "For it is the Dhamma, O Vāsettha, which is 'the best in the world'¹, as regards both what we now see, and what is yet to come²." But again (according to your people) the devout layman who has entered the Excellent Way, for whom the possibility of rebirth in any place of woe has passed away, who has attained to insight, and to whom the doctrine is known, even such a one ought to salute and to rise from his seat in token of respect for, and to revere, any member of the Order, though a novice, and though he be unconverted³. Now if the Dhamma be the best that rule of conduct is wrong, but if that be right then the first statement must be wrong.

¹ This is a quotation from a celebrated verse, which is, as it were, the national anthem of those who, in the struggle for religious and ceremonial supremacy between the Brahmans and the nobles, took the side of the nobles (the Khattiyas). As might be expected it is not seldom found in the Buddhist Suttas, and is often put in the mouth of the Buddha, the most distinguished of these Khattiyas who were transcendental rather than military. It runs: 'The Khattiya is the best in the world of those who observe the rules of exogamous marriage, but of the whole race of men and gods he who has wisdom and righteousness is the best.' See, for instance, the Ambaṭṭha Sutta, in the Dīgha Nikāya, and the Sumaṅgala Vilāsinī on that passage. By 'best in the world' is meant 'entitled to take precedence before all others,' not best in the moral sense.

² From the Aggañña Sutta in the Dīgha Nikāya.

³ I cannot give any authority for this, but it is no doubt correct Buddhism according to the spirit of the Piṭakas.

This too is a double-pointed problem. It is now put to you, and you have to solve it.' [162]

2. 'The Blessed One said what you have quoted, and you have rightly described the rule of conduct. But there is a reason for that rule, and that is this. There are these twenty personal qualities, making up the Samanaship of a Samana, and these two outward signs¹, by reason of which the Samana is worthy of salutation, and of respect, and of reverence. And what are they? The best form of self-restraint, the highest kind of self-control², right conduct, calm manners³, mastery over (his deeds and words⁴), subjugation (of his senses⁵), long-suffering⁶, sympathy⁷,

¹ Liṅgāni. See above, IV, 1, 61.

² Aggo niyamo. Hīnaśi-kumburē takes agga in the sense of Arahātship: 'Niwan dena pratipattiyeṇ yukta bawa.' Niyama is a self-imposed vow.

³ Vihāra, which the Sinhalese glosses by: 'Sansun iriyā-patha viharanayeṇ yukta bawa,' ('because he continues in the practice of tranquil deportment.')

⁴ Samyama. 'Kāya wāk samyamayeṇ yukta bawa.'

⁵ Samvaro. 'Indriya samvarayeṇ yukta bawa.'

⁶ Khanti, which the Sinhalese repeats.

⁷ Soraṭṭam. 'Because he is docile and pleasant of speech,' says the Sinhalese: 'Suwaṭṭa kīkaru bhāwayeṇ yukta bawa.' It is an abstract noun formed from surata, and does not occur in Sanskrit, though Böhtlingk-Roth give one authority for it (under sauratya) from a Buddhist work, the Vyutpatti. It is one of the many instances in which the Buddhist ethics has put new and higher meaning into current phrases, for in Sanskrit literature surata (literally 'high pleasure') is used frequently enough, but almost without exception in an obscene sense. The commentary on Gāṭaka III, 442 only repeats the word. It is there, as here, and in the Vyutpatti, and at Aṅguttara II, 15, 3, always allied with khanti. My translation follows Childers (who probably follows Böhtlingk-Roth); but the Sinhalese gloss here makes me very doubtful as to the exact connotation which the early Buddhists associated with 'high pleasure.'

the practice of solitude¹, love of solitude², meditation³, modesty and fear of doing wrong⁴, zeal⁵, earnestness⁶, the taking upon himself of the precepts⁷, recitation (of the Scriptures)⁸, asking questions (of those wise in the Dhamma and Vinaya), rejoicing in the Sīlas and other (rules of morality), freedom from attachment (to the things of the world), fulfilment of the precepts—and the wearing of the yellow robe, and the being shaven. [163] In the practice of all these things does the member of the Order live. By being deficient in none of them, by being perfect in all, accomplished in all, endowed with all of them does he reach forward to the condition of Arahātship, to the condition of those who have nothing left to learn; he is marching towards the highest of all lands⁹. Thus it is because he sees him to be in the company of the Worthy Ones (the Arahats) that the layman who has already entered on the Excellent Way thinks it worthy in him¹⁰ to

¹ Ekatta-kariyâ = 'Ekalâwa hoesirimen yukta bawa.'

² Ekattâbhirati.

³ Paṭisallanaṃ, not samâdhi. Kittékâgratâ says the Sinhalese.

⁴ Hiri-otappaṃ.

⁵ Viriyam, 'the zeal of the fourfold effort (pradhâna) towards the making of Arahātship,' is the Sinhalese gloss.

⁶ Appamâdo, 'in the search for Arahātship,' says Hinaṭi-kumburê.

⁷ Sikkhâ-samâdanam. 'Learning them, investigating their meaning, love of the virtuous law laid down in them,' expands Hinaṭi-kumburê.

⁸ Uddero. There is a lacuna here in the Sinhalese. It has nothing more till we come to the shaven head.

⁹ Amṛita mahâ avakâsa bhûmiyaṭa says the Sinhalese (p. 205).

¹⁰ Arahati. I have endeavoured to imitate the play upon the words.

reverence and to show respect to the Bhikkhu, though he may be, as yet, unconverted. It is because he sees him to be in the company of those in whom all evil has been destroyed, because he feels that he is not in such society¹, that the converted layman thinks it worthy of him to do reverence and to show respect to the unconverted Bhikkhu. It is because he knows that he has joined the noblest brotherhood, and that he himself has reached no such state, that the converted layman holds it right to do reverence and to show respect to the unconverted Bhikkhu—because he knows that he listens to the recitation of the Pâtimokkha, while he himself can not—because he knows that he receives men into the Order, and thus extends the teaching of the Conqueror, which he himself is incapable of doing—because he knows that he carries out innumerable precepts, which he himself cannot observe—because he knows that he wears the outward signs of Samanaship, and carries out the intention of the Buddha, while he himself is gone away far from that—because he knows that he, though he has given up his hair and beard, and is unanointed and wears no ornaments, yet is anointed with the perfume of righteousness, while he is himself addicted to jewelry and fine apparel—that the converted layman thinks it right to do reverence, and to show respect to the unconverted Bhikkhu.'

3. 'And moreover, O king, it is because he knows that not only are all these twenty personal qualities which go to make a Samana, and the two outward signs, found in the Bhikkhu, but that he carries them on, and trains others in them, that the converted layman, realising that he has no part in that tradition¹, in that maintenance of the faith, thinks it right to reverence and to show respect to the converted Bhikkhu. [164] Just, O king, as a royal prince who learns his knowledge, and is taught the duties of a Khattiya, at the feet of the Brahman who acts as family chaplain², when after a time he is anointed king, pays reverence and respect to his master in the thought of his being the teacher, and the carrier on of the traditions of the family, so is it right for the converted Bhikkhu to do reverence and to pay respect to the unconverted Bhikkhu.'

¹ N'atthi me so samayo ti: E sâmagrî lâbhaya ma/a nœtœyi sitâ.

4. 'And moreover, O king, you may know by this fact the greatness and the peerless glory of the condition of the Bhikkhus—that if a layman, a disciple of the faith, who has entered upon the Excellent Way, should attain to the realisation of Arahatsip, one of two results must happen to him, and there is no other—he must either die away on that very day, or take upon himself the condition of a Bhikkhu. For immovable, O king, is that state of renunciation, glorious, and most exalted—I mean the condition of being a member of the Order!'

'Venerable Nâgasena, this subtle problem has been thoroughly unravelled by your powerful and great wisdom. No one else could solve it so unless he were wise as you.'

[Here ends the problem as to the precedence of the Dharma.]

¹ Âgamo, which the Sinhalese repeats.

² Purohita, which the Sinhalese repeats.

[THE HARM OF PREACHING.]

5. 'Venerable Nāgasena, you Bhikkhus say that the Tathāgata averts harm from all beings, and does them good¹. And again you say that when he was preaching the discourse based on the simile of the burning fire² hot blood was ejected from the mouths of about sixty Bhikkhus. By his delivery of that discourse he did those Bhikkhus harm and not good. So if the first statement is correct, the second is false; and if the second is correct, the first [165] is false. This too is a double-pointed problem put to you, which you have to solve.'

6. 'Both are true. What happened to them was not the Tathāgata's doing, but their own.'

'But, Nāgasena, if the Tathāgata had not delivered that discourse, then would they have vomited up hot blood?'

'No. When they took wrongly what he said, then was there a burning kindled within them, and hot blood was ejected from their mouths.'

'Then that must have happened, Nāgasena, through the act of the Tathāgata, it must have been the Tathāgata who was the chief cause³ to destroy them. Suppose a serpent, Nāgasena, had crept into an anthill, and a man in want of earth were to break into the anthill, and take the earth of it away. And by his doing so the entrance-hole to the anthill were closed up, and the snake were to die in consequence from want of air. Would not the serpent have been killed by that man's action ?'

¹ I cannot give chapter and verse for the words, but the sentiment is common enough.

² This is not the Āditta-pariyāya given in the Mahāvagga I, 21, and the Aggikkhandūpama Sutta in the 7th Book of the Aṅguttara.

³ Adhikāra. Pradhāna is the Sinhalese translation.

'Yes, O king.'

'Just so, Nâgasena, was the Tathâgata the prime cause of their destruction.'

7. 'When the Tathâgata delivered a discourse, O king, he never did so either in flattery or in malice. In freedom both from the one and from the other did he speak. And they who received it aright were made wise¹, but they who received it wrongly, fell. Just, O king, as when a man shakes a mango tree or a jambu tree or a mee tree², such of the fruits on it as are full of sap and strongly fastened to it remain undisturbed, but such as have rotten stalks, and are loosely attached, fall to the ground—[166] so was it with his preaching. It was, O king, as when a husbandman, wanting to grow a crop of wheat, ploughs the field, but by that ploughing many hundreds and thousands of blades of grass are killed—or it was as when men, for the sake of sweetness, crush sugar-cane in a mill, and by their doing so such small creatures as pass into the mouth of the mill are crushed also—so was it that the Tathâgata making wise those whose minds were prepared, preached the Dhamma without flattery and without malice. And they who received it aright were made wise, but they who received it wrongly, fell.'

8. 'Then did not those Bhikkhus fall, Nâgasena, just because of that discourse ?'

¹ Bugg'hanti: unto Arahatship adds Hina/i-kumburê.

² Madhuka. See Gâtaka IV, 434. The Sinhalese (p. 208) has mîgahak (Bassia Latifolia).

‘How, then, could a carpenter by doing nothing to a piece of timber, and simply laying it by¹, make it straight and fit for use?’

‘No, Sir. He would have to get rid of the bends out of it, if he wanted it straight and ready for use.’

‘Just so, O king, the Tathâgata could not, by merely watching over his disciples, have opened the eyes of those who were ready to see. But by getting rid of those who took the word wrongly he saved those prepared to be saved. And it was by their own act and deed, O king, that the evil-minded fell; just as a plantain tree, or a bambû, or a she-mule are destroyed by that to which they themselves give birth². And just, O king, as it is by their own acts that robbers come to have their eyes plucked out, or to impalement, or to the scaffold, just so were the evil-minded destroyed by their own act, and fell from the teaching of the Conqueror.’

9. ‘And so [167] with those sixty Bhikkhus, they fell neither by the act of the Tathâgata nor of any one else, but solely by their own deed³. Suppose, O king, a man were to give ambrosia⁴ to all the people, and they, eating of it, were to become healthy and long-lived and free from every bodily ill. But one man, on eating it, were by his own bad digestion, to

¹ Rakkhanto, which Hîna/i-kumburê expands in the sense adopted above.

² Plantains and bambûs die when they flower. And it was popular belief in India that she-mules always died if they foaled. See Kullavagga VI, 4, 3; VII, 2, 5; Vimâna Vatthu 43, 8; Samyutta Nikâya VI, 2, 2.

³ Hîna/i-kumburê here inserts a translation of the whole of the Sutta referred to.

⁴ Amatam, with reference, no doubt, to Arahatsip, of which this is also an epithet.

die. Would then, O king, the man who gave away the ambrosia be guilty therein of any offence ?'

'No, Sir.'

'Just so, O king, does the Tathâgata present the gift of his ambrosia to the men and gods in the ten thousand world systems ; and those beings who are capable of doing so are made wise by the nectar of his law, while they who are not are destroyed and fall. Food, O king, preserves the lives of all beings. But some who eat of it die of cholera¹. Is the man who feeds the hungry guilty therein of any offence ?'

'No, Sir.'

'Just so, O king, does the Tathâgata present the gift of his ambrosia to the men and gods in the ten thousand world systems ; and those beings who are capable of doing so are made wise by the nectar of his law, while they who are not are destroyed and fall.'

'Very good, Nâgasena ! That is so, and I accept it as you say.'

[Here ends the dilemma on the harm resulting from preaching.]

[THE SECRETS OF A TATHÂGATA.]

11. [This dilemma treats of one of the thirty bodily signs of a 'great man' (Mahâpurusha) supposed to be possessed by every Tathâgata, but as it deals with matters not usually spoken of in this century, it is best read in the original.]

[THE FOOLISH FELLOW.]

15. [170] 'Venerable Nâgasena, it was said by the Elder Sâriputta, the commander of the faith : "The

¹ Visûkikâya, which Hîna'i-kumburê renders: Agîrṇa wa wiwekâbâdhayen. So above, IV, 2, 18.

Tathâgata, brethren, is perfect in courtesy of speech. There is no fault of speech in the Tathâgata concerning which he should have to take care that no one else should know it¹." And on the other hand the Tathâgata, when promulgating the first Pârâgika on the occasion of the offence of Sudinna the Kalanda², addressed him with harsh words, calling him a useless fellow³. And that Elder, on being so called, terrified with the fear of his teacher⁴, and overcome with remorse, was unable to comprehend the Excellent Way⁵. Now if the first statement be correct, the allegation that the Tathâgata called Sudinna the Kalanda a useless fellow must be false. But if that be true, then the first statement must be false. [171] This too is a double-pointed problem now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

16. 'What Sâriputta the Elder said is true, O king. And the Blessed One called Sudinna a useless fellow on that occasion. But that was not out of rudeness of disposition⁶, it was merely pointing out the real nature (of his conduct) in a way that would do him no harm⁷. And what herein is meant by ¹ I don't know where such a phrase is put into Sâriputta's mouth: but a similar one, as Mr. Trenckner points out, is ascribed to the Buddha at Âṅguttara VII, 6, 5.

² Kalanda-putto, where Kalanda (or Kalandaka as some MSS. of the Vinaya spell it) is the name of the clan (see Pârâgika I, 5, 1), not of the father.

³ See the whole speech at Pârâgika I, 5, 11.

⁴ Garuttâsena. Tâso is not in Childers, but occurs Gâtaka III, 177, 202.

⁵ There is nothing in the Vinaya account of this result.

⁶ Duṭṭha-kittena, which Hīnaṣi-kumburē repeats.

⁷ Asârambhena yâthâva-lakkhaṇena. For yâthâva, which is not in Childers, see Buddhaghosa in the Sumaṅgala Vilâsini, p. 65, and Dhammapâla on Theri Gâthâ, 387. Hīnaṣi-kumburē

“pointing out the real nature.” If any man, O king, in this birth does not attain to the perception of the Four Truths, then is his manhood (his being born as a man) in vain¹, but if he acts differently he will become different. Therefore is it that he is called a useless fellow². And so the Blessed One addressed Sudinna the Kalandā with words of truth, and not with words apart from the facts.’

17. ‘But, Nāgasena, though a man in abusing another speaks the truth, still we should inflict a small³ fine upon him. For he is guilty of an offence, inasmuch as he, although for something real, abused him by the use of words that might lead to a breach (of the peace)⁴.’

‘Have you ever heard, O king, of a people bowing down before, or rising up from their seats in respect for, or showing honour to, or bringing the complimentary presents (usually given to officials) to a criminal?’

‘No, if a man have committed a crime of whatever sort or kind, if he be really worthy of reproof and punishment, they would rather behead him, or tor-translates: Upadra karaṇa sitakin ut no wanneya, swabhāwa lakṣaṇayen maya ehi wadāla kisiwek æt nam, ē swabhāwa lakṣaṇaya maya.

¹ Mogham. So at Gâtaka III, 24.

² Mogha-puriso, the same word as I have translated elsewhere ‘foolish fellow,’ following Childers. But I never think that the word means always and only ‘in vain, useless.’ See Gâtaka I, 14; III, 24, 25; Sutta Nipâta III, 7, 20; Mahāvagga VIII, 1, 5; Kullavagga V, 11, 3; Anguttara II, 5, 10; Sumaṅgala Vilâsini, p. 55.

³ Literally, ‘a fine of a kaḥâṇa,’ a copper coin worth in our money about a penny. See my ‘Ancient Coins and Measures,’ p. 3.

⁴ Visum vohāram ākaranto. The Sinhalese (p. 224) has Wen wû wakana wû wyawahārayekin hœsiremin.

ture him¹, or bind him with bonds, or put him to death, or deprive him of his goods².'

'Did then the Blessed One, O king, act with justice or not?'

'With justice, Sir, and in a most fit and proper way. And when, Nâgasena, they hear of it the world of men and gods will be made tender of conscience, and afraid of falling into sin, struck with awe at the sight of it, and still more so when they themselves associate with wrong-doers, or do wrong.'

18. [172] 'Now would a physician, O king, administer pleasant things as a medicine in a case where all the humours of the body were affected, and the whole frame was disorganised and full of disease?'

'No. Wishing to put an end to the disease he would give sharp and scarifying drugs.'

'In the same way, O king, the Tathâgata bestows admonition for the sake of suppressing all the diseases of sin. And the words of the Tathâgata, even when stern, soften men and make them tender. Just as hot water, O king, softens and makes tender anything capable of being softened, so are the words of the Tathâgata, even when stern, yet as full of benefit, and as full of pity as the words of a father would be to his children. Just, O king, as the drinking of evil-smelling decoctions, the swallowing of nasty drugs, destroys the weaknesses of men's bodies, so are the words of the Tathâgata, even when stern, bringers of advantage and laden with pity. And just, O king, as a ball of cotton falling on a man raises no bruise, so do the words of the Tathâgata, even when stern, do no harm.'

¹ Hananti. But himsât kereti says the Siṃhalese.

² Gâpentī. Dr. Edward Müller thinks this a misprint for gâhâpentī (Pâli Grammar, p. 37). Dhanaya hânayen nirdhanika kereti is the Siṃhalese version.

'Well have you made this problem clear by many a simile. Very good, Nâgasena! That is so, and I accept it as you say.'

[End of the dilemma as to the Buddha's harsh words to Sudinna.]

[THE TREE TALKING.]

19. 'Venerable Nâgasena, the Tathâgata said :
 "Brahman! why do you ask an unconscious thing,
 Which cannot hear you, how it does to-day?
 Active, intelligent, and full of life,
 How can you speak to this so senseless thing—
 This wild Palâsa tree¹?"

[173] And on the other hand he said :

"And thus the Aspen tree then made reply :

'I, Bhâradvâga, can speak too. Listen to me².'

'Now if, Nâgasena, a tree is an unconscious thing, it must be false that the Aspen tree spoke to Bhâradvâga. But if that is true, it must be false to say that a tree is unconscious. This too is a double-edged problem now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

20. 'The Master said, Nâgasena, that a tree is unconscious. And the Aspen tree conversed with Bhâradvâga. But that last is said, O king, by a common form of speech. For though a tree being unconscious cannot talk, yet the word "tree" is used as a designation of the dryad who dwells therein, and in that sense that "the tree talks" is a well-known expression. Just, O king, as a waggon laden with corn is called a corn-waggon. But it is not made of corn, it is made of wood, yet because of the corn being heaped up in it the people use the expression "corn-waggon." Or just, O king, as when a man is churning sour milk the common expression is that he is churning butter. But it is not butter that he is churning, but milk. Or just, O king, as when a man is making something that does not exist the common expression is that he is making that thing which all the while as yet is not, [174] but people talk of the work as accomplished before it is done. And the Tathâgata, when expounding the Dhamma, does so by means of the phraseology which is in common use among the people.'

¹ Gâtaka III, 24. It is not the Tathâgata, but the Bodisat, who speaks.

² Gâtaka IV, 210, where the verses are ascribed to the Buddha.

'Very good, Nâgasena! That is so, and I accept it as you say.'

[Here ends the dilemma as to the talking tree.]

[THE BUDDHA'S LAST ILLNESS.]

21. 'Venerable Nâgasena, it was said by the Elders who held the Recitation¹:

"When he had eaten Kunda's alms,
The coppersmith's,—thus have I heard,—
The Buddha felt that sickness dire,
That sharp pain even unto death²."

¹ The Council of Râgagaha is meant, at which the Pi^ṭakas were recited. All the so-called Councils are exclusively 'Recitations' (Samg^ātīyo) in Buddhist phraseology. But 'Council' is the best rendering of the word, as Recitation implies so much that would be unintelligible to the ordinary reader.

² Book of the Great Decease, IV, 23.

And afterwards the Blessed One said : " These two offerings of food, Ānanda, equal, of equal fruit, and of equal result, are of much greater fruit and much greater result than any others¹." Now if sharp sickness fell upon the Blessed One, Nāgasena, after he had partaken of Kunda's alms, and sharp pains arose within him even unto death, then that other statement must be wrong. But if that is right then the first must be wrong. How could that alms, Nāgasena, be of great fruit when it turned to poison, gave rise to disease, [175] put an end to the period of his then existence, took away his life ? Explain this to me to the refutation of the adversaries. The people are in bewilderment about this, thinking that the dysentery must have been caused by his eating too much, out of greediness.'

22. ' The Blessed One said, O king, that there were two almsgivings equal, of equal fruit, and equal result, and of much greater fruit, and much greater result than any others,—that which, when a Tathāgata has partaken of it, he attains to supreme and perfect Buddhahood (Enlightenment), and that when he has partaken of which, he passes away by that utter passing away in which nothing whatever remains behind². For that alms is full of virtue, full of advantage. The gods, O king, shouted in joy and gladness at the thought : " This is the last meal the Tathāgata will take," and communicated a divine power of nourishment to that tender pork¹. And that was itself in good condition, light, pleasant, full of flavour, and good for digestion². It was not because of it that any sickness fell upon the Blessed One, but it was because of the extreme weakness of his body, and because of the period of life he had to live having been exhausted, that the disease arose, and grew worse and worse—just as when, O king, an ordinary fire is burning, if fresh fuel be supplied, it will burn up still more—or [176] as when a stream is flowing along as usual, if a heavy rain falls, it will become a mighty river with a great rush of water—or as when the body is of its ordinary girth, if more food be eaten, it becomes broader than before. So this was not, O king, the fault of the food that was presented, and you can not impute any harm to it.'

¹ Book of the Great Decease, IV, 57, but with a slightly different reading.

² Book of the Great Decease, loc. cit. The Sinhalese gives the whole context in full.

¹ Sûkara-maddava. There is great doubt as to the exact meaning of this name of the last dish the Buddha partook of. Maddati is 'to rub,' or 'to press,' or 'to trample,' and just as 'pressed beef' is ambiguous, so is 'boar-pressed' or 'pork-tender' capable of various interpretations. The exegetical gloss as handed down in the Mahâ Vihâra in Anurâdhapure, Ceylon, in the now lost body of tradition called the Mahâ Aññakathâ, has been preserved by Dhammapâla in his comment on Udâna VIII, 5 (p. 81 of Dr. Steinthal's edition for the Pâli Text Society). It means, I think, 'Meat pervaded by the tenderness and niceness of boar's (flesh).' But that is itself ambiguous, and Dhammapâla adds that others say the word means not pork or meat at all, but 'the tender top sprout of the bambû plant after it has been trampled upon by swine'—others again that it means a kind of mushroom that grows in ground trodden under foot by swine—others again that it means only a particular kind of flavouring, or sauce. As Maddana is rendered by Childers 'withered,' I have translated it in my 'Buddhist Suttas' (pp. 71–73) 'dried boar's flesh.' But the fact is that the exact sense is not known. (Maddavâni pupphâni at Dhammapada 377 is 'withered flowers,' according to Fausbøll. But it may be just as well 'tender flowers,' especially as Mârdava in Sanskrit always means 'tender, pitiful,' &c. This is the only passage where the word is known to occur in Pâli apart from those in which sûkara-maddava is mentioned.) The Siṃhalese here (p. 230) repeats the word and adds the gloss: E tarunu wû ūru mamsayehi.

² Gatharaggi-tegassa hitam. On this curious old belief in an internal fire see my 'Buddhist Suttas,' p. 260.

23. 'But, venerable Nâgasena, why is it that those two gifts of food are so specially meritorious?'

'Because of the attainment of the exalted conditions which resulted from them¹.'

'Of what conditions, Nâgasena, are you speaking?'

'Of the attainment of the nine successive states which were passed through at first in one order, and then in the reverse order².'

'It was on two days, was it not, Nâgasena, that the Tathâgata attained to those conditions in the highest degree?'

'Yes, O king³.'

'It is a most wonderful thing, Nâgasena, and a most strange, that of all the great and glorious gifts which were bestowed upon our Blessed One⁴ not one can be compared with these two alms-givings. Most marvellous is it, that even as those

¹ Dhammânumaggana-samâpatti-varena: which the Simhalese merely repeats. For Anumagganâ see the text above, p. 62, and Sumaṅgala Vilâsinî, p. 65.

² See the full description in the Book of the Great Decease, VI, 11-13. ('Buddhist Suttas,' pp. 115, 116.) The Simhalese is here greatly expanded (pp. 230-233).

³ So our author must have thought that the nine Anupubba-vihâras occurred also after the alms given to Gotama before he sat under the Bo Tree, but I know of no passage in the Piṭakas which would support this belief. Compare the note 2 in vol. i, p. 74 of the 'Vinaya Texts,' and the passages there quoted.

⁴ Buddha-khette dânam, 'gifts which had the Buddha as the field in which they were bestowed, or sown.'

nine successive conditions are glorious, even so are those gifts made, by their glory, [177] of greater fruit, and of greater advantage than any others. Very good, Nāgasena! That is so, and I accept it as you say.'

[Here ends the dilemma as to the Buddha's last illness.]

[ADORATION OF RELICS.]

24. 'Venerable Nāgasena, the Tathāgata said: "Hinder not yourselves, Ānanda, by honouring the remains of the Tathāgata¹." And on the other hand he said:

"Honour that relic of him who is worthy of honour, Acting in that way you go from this world to heaven²."

'Now if the first injunction was right the second must be wrong, and if the second is right the first must be wrong. This too is a double-edged problem now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

25. 'Both the passages you quote were spoken by the Blessed One. But it was not to all men, it was to the sons of the Conqueror³ that it was said: "Hinder not yourselves, Ānanda, by honouring the remains of the Tathāgata⁴." Paying reverence is not the work of the sons of the Conqueror, [178] but rather the grasping of the true nature of all

¹ Book of the Great Decease, V, 24.

² Not found in any of the Pīṭaka texts as yet published.

³ Gīṇa-puttāṇam. That is, the members of the Order.

⁴ Here again Hīnaśī-kumburē goes into a long account of the attendant circumstances (pp. 233, 234).

compounded things, the practice of thought, contemplation in accordance with the rules of Satipatthâna, the seizing of the real essence of all objects of thought, the struggle against evil, and devotion to their own (spiritual) good. These are things which the sons of the Conqueror ought to do, leaving to others, whether gods or men, the paying of reverence ¹.

26. 'And that is so, O king, just as it is the business of the princes of the earth to learn all about elephants, and horses, and chariots, and bows, and rapiers, and documents, and the law of property ², to carry on the traditions of the Khattiya clans, and to fight themselves and to lead others in war, while husbandry, merchandise, and the care of cattle are the business of other folk, ordinary Vessas and Suddas.—Or just as the business of Brahmins and their sons is concerned with the Rig-veda, the Yagur-veda, the Sâma-veda, the Atharva-veda, with the knowledge of lucky marks (on the body), of legends ³, Purâṇas, lexicography ⁴, prosody, phonology, verses, grammar, etymology, astrology, interpretation of omens, and of dreams, and of signs, study of the six Vedāṅgas, of eclipses of the sun and moon, of the prognostications to be drawn from the flight of comets, the thunderings of the gods, the junctions of planets, the fall of meteors, earthquakes, conflagrations, and signs in the heavens and on the earth, the study of arithmetic, of cas-

¹ This is really only an expansion and a modernisation of the context of the passage quoted.

² Lekha-muddâ. See the note above on I, 1, 10.

³ Itihâsa, 'the Bhârata and the Râmâyana,' says the Simhalese.

⁴ 'Of names of trees and so on,' says Hīnaśi-kumburê.

uistry, of the interpretation of the omens to be drawn from dogs, and deer, and rats, and mixtures of liquids, and the sounds and cries of birds—while husbandry, merchandise, and the care of cattle are the business of other folk, ordinary Vessas and Suddas. So it was, O king, in the sense of “Devote not yourselves to such things as are not your business, but to such things as are so” that the Tathâgata was speaking [179] when he said: “Hinder not yourselves, Ânanda, by honouring the remains of the Tathâgata.” And if, O king, he had not said so, then would the Bhikkhus have taken his bowl and his robe, and occupied themselves with paying reverence to the Buddha through them¹!

‘Very good, Nâgasena! That is so, and I accept it as you say.’

[Here ends the dilemma as to reverence to relics.]

[THE SPLINTER OF ROCK.]

27. ‘Venerable Nâgasena, you Bhikkhus say that: “When the Blessed One walked along, the earth, unconscious though it is, filled up its deep places, and made its steep places plain².” And on the other hand you say that a splinter of rock grazed his foot¹. When that splinter was falling on his foot why did it not, then, turn aside? If it be true that the unconscious earth makes its deep places full and its steep places plain for him, then it must be untrue that the splinter of rock hurt his foot. But if the latter statement be true, then the first must be false. This too is a double-edged problem now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

¹ This certainly looks as if our author did not know anything of the worship paid to the supposed bowl of the Buddha, or of the feast, the Patta-maha, held in its honour. The passage may therefore be used as an argument for the date of the book. Fâ-Hien saw this bowl-worship in full force at Peshawar about 400 A. D. See Chapter xii of his travels (Dr. Legge’s translation, pp. 35-37).

² Not found as yet in the Piṭakas.

28. 'Both statements, O king, are true. But that splinter of rock did not fall of itself², it was cast down through the act of Devadatta. Through hundreds of thousands of existences, O king, had Devadatta borne a grudge against the Blessed One³. It was through that hatred that he seized hold of a mighty mass of rock, and pushed it over with the hope that it would fall upon the Buddha's head. But two other rocks came together, and intercepted it before it reached the Tathâgata, and by the force of their impact a splinter was torn off, and fell in such a direction that it struck [180] the Blessed One's foot.'

29. 'But, Nâgasena, just as two rocks intercepted that mighty mass, so could the splinter have been intercepted.'

'But a thing intercepted, O king, can escape, slip through, or be lost—as water does, through the fingers, when it is taken into the hand—or milk, or buttermilk, or honey, or ghee, or oil, or fish curry, or gravy—or as fine, subtle, minute, dusty grains of sand do, through the fingers, if you close your fist on them—or as rice will escape sometimes when you have taken it into your fingers, and are putting it into your mouth.’

¹ Kullavagga VII, 3, 9. Compare the Samyutta Nikâya I, 4, 8; IV, 2, 3 (pp. 27 and 110 of M. Léon Feer's edition for the Pâli Text Society).

² Attaro dhammatâya.

³ So above, IV, 2, 64, and below, IV, 4, 41.

30. ‘Well, let that be so, Nāgasena. I admit that the rock was intercepted. But the splinter ought at least to have paid as much respect to the Buddha as the earth did.’

‘There are these twelve kinds of persons, O king, who pay no respect—the lustful man in his lust, and the angry man in his malice, and the dull man in his stupidity, and the puffed-up man in his pride, and the bad man in his want of discrimination, and the obstinate man in his want of docility, and the mean man in his littleness, and the talkative man in his vanity, and the wicked man in his cruelty, and the wretched man in his misery, and the gambler [181] because he is overpowered by greed, and the busy man in his search after gain. But that splinter, just as it was broken off by the impact of the rocks, fell by chance¹ in such a direction that it struck against the foot of the Blessed One—just as fine, subtle, and minute grains of sand, when carried away by the force of the wind, are sprinkled down by chance in any direction they may happen to take. If the splinter, O king, had not been separated from the rock of which it formed a part, it too would have been intercepted by their meeting together. But, as it was, it was neither fixed on the earth, nor did it remain stationary in the air, but fell whithersoever chance directed it, and happened to strike against the Blessed One's foot—just as dried leaves might fall if caught up in a whirlwind. And the real cause of its so striking against his foot was the sorrow-working deed¹ of that ungrateful, wicked, Devadatta.'

¹ Animitta-kata-disâ, which the Siṃhalese (p. 238) merely repeats.

'Very good, Nāgasena! That is so, and I accept it as you say.'

[Here ends the dilemma as to the splinter grazing the Buddha's foot.]

[THE SAMANA.]

31. 'Venerable Nāgasena, the Blessed One said: "A man becomes a Samana by the destruction of the Āsavas²." But on the other hand he said:

"The man who has these dispositions four

Is he whom the world knows as Samana³."

And in that passage these are the four dispositions referred to—long-suffering, temperance in food, renunciation⁴, and the being without the attachments⁵ (arising from lust, ill-will, and dulness). Now these four dispositions are equally found in those who are still defective, in whom [182] the ¹ Dukkhanubhāvanā—the sorrow being Devadatta's subsequent existence in purgatory.

² That is 'of sensuality, individuality, delusion, and ignorance.' I don't know which is the passage referred to.

³ Also not traced as yet in the texts.

⁴ Vipphānā, not in Childers, but see Sutta Nipāta V, 14, 4, 5. Hīna-kumburē (p. 239) renders it ālaya hōrfma.

⁵ Ākinkaṇṇa, not having the three kiṇkanas mentioned. Hīna-kumburē (p. 239) takes it to mean the practice of the Ākiṇṇāyatana meditation. But if so that would surely have been the word used.

Âsavas have not yet been completely destroyed. So that if the first statement be correct, the second is wrong, and if the second be right the first must be wrong. This too is a double-edged problem now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

32. 'Both statements, O king, were made by the Blessed One. But the second was said of the characteristics of such and such men; the first is an inclusive statement—that all in whom the Âsavas are destroyed are Samanas. And moreover, of all those who are made perfect by the suppression of evil, if you take them in regular order one after the other, then the Samana in whom the Âsavas are destroyed is acknowledged to be the chief—just, O king, as of all flowers produced in the water or on the land, the double jasmine¹ is acknowledged to be the chief, all other kinds of flowers of whatever sort are merely flowers, and taking them in order it is the double jasmine that people most desire and like. Or just, O king, as of all kinds of grain, rice is acknowledged to be the chief, all other kinds of grain, of whatever sort, [183] are useful for food and for the support of the body, but if you take them in order, rice is acknowledged as the best.'

'Very good, Nâgasena! That is so, and I accept it as you say.'

[Here ends the dilemma as to what constitutes a Samana.]

¹ Varsikâ (Dâsaman mal, jasminum zambac).

[THE BUDDHA'S EXULTATION.]

33. 'Venerable Nâgasena, the Blessed One said : " If, O Bhikkhus, any one should speak in praise of me, or of our religion (Dhamma), or of the Order, you should not thereupon indulge in joy, or delight, or exultation of mind¹". And on the other hand the Tathâgata was so delighted, and pleased, and exultant at the deserved praise bestowed on him by Sela the Brahman, that he still further magnified his own goodness in that he said :

" A king am I, Sela, the king supreme
Of righteousness. The royal chariot wheel
In righteousness do I set rolling on—

That wheel that no one can turn back again²!"
Now if the passage first quoted be right then must the second be wrong, but if that be right then must the first be wrong. This too is a double-edged problem now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

34. [184] 'Both your quotations, O king, are correct. But the first passage was spoken by the Blessed One with the intention of setting forth truthfully, exactly, in accordance with reality, and fact, and sense, the real nature, and essence, and characteristic marks of the Dhamma. And the second passage was not spoken for the sake of gain or fame, nor out of party spirit, nor in the lust of winning over men to become his followers. But it was in mercy and love, and with the welfare of others in view, conscious that thereby three hundred young Brahmans would attain to the knowledge of the truth, that he said: "A king am I, Sela, the king supreme of righteousness."

¹ From the Brahma-gâla Sutta in the Dîgha Nikâya (I, 1, 5).

² From the Sela Sutta in the Sutta Nipâta (III, 7, 7). Professor Fausbøll in his translation of this stanza (at vol. x, p. 102 of the 'Sacred Books of the East') draws attention to the parallel at John xviii. 37. 'Thou sayest that I am a king. To this end was I born. And for this cause came I into the world that I should bear witness unto the truth'—where 'truth,' if one translated the verse into Pâli, would be correctly rendered by Dhamma, 'righteousness, religion, truth, essential quality.' Professor Fausbøll's version of the stanza runs : 'I am a king, O Sela, an incomparable religious (Dhamma-râga) king, with justice (Dhamma). I turn the wheel, a wheel that is irresistible.'

'Very good, Nâgasena! That is so, and I accept it as you say.'

[Here ends the problem as to exultation of mind.]

[KINDNESS AND PUNISHMENT.]

35. 'Venerable Nâgasena, the Blessed One said: "Doing no injury to any one Dwell full of love and kindness in the world¹."

And on the other hand he said: "Punish him who deserves punishment², favour him who is worthy of favour." [185] Now punishment, Nâgasena, means the cutting off of hands or feet, flogging³, casting into bonds, torture⁴, execution, degradation in rank⁵.

¹ From the 521st Gâtaka.

² The crux lies in the ambiguity of this phrase as will be seen below.

³ Vadha, which is ambiguous, and means also 'killing.' The Sinhalese repeats the word.

⁴ Kâraṇā, which Hīnaśī-kumburê renders tœlîmaya, 'flogging.'

⁵ Santati-vikopanam, literally 'breach of continuity.' Hīnaśī-kumburê explains it to mean 'injury to the duration of life,' and this may be the author's meaning, as he is fond of heaping together a string of words, some of which mean the same thing. But as

Such a saying is therefore not worthy of the Blessed One, and he ought not to have made use of it. For if the first injunction be right then this must be wrong, and if this be right then the injunction to do no injury to any one, but to dwell full of love and kindness in the world, must be wrong. This too is a double-edged problem now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

36. 'The Blessed One, great king, gave both the commands you quote. As to the first, to do no injury to any one, but to live full of love and kindness in the world—that is a doctrine approved by all the Buddhas. And that verse is an injunction, an unfolding of the Dhamma, for the Dhamma has as its characteristic that it works no ill. And the saying is thus in thorough accord with it. But as to the second command you quote that is a special use of terms [which you have misunderstood. The real meaning of them is: "Subdue that which ought to be subdued, strive after, cultivate, favour what is worthy of effort, cultivation, and approval"]. The proud heart, great king, is to be subdued, and the lowly heart cultivated—the wicked heart to be subdued, and the good heart to be cultivated—carelessness of thought is to be subdued, and exactness of thought to be cultivated—[186] he who is given over to wrong views is to be subdued, and he who has attained to right views is to be cultivated—he who is not noble¹ is to be subdued, and the noble one is santati means also 'lineage, descent,' the phrase may equally well refer to the sort of punishment I have ventured to put into the text.

¹ Ariyo and anariyo used technically in the sense of one who has not, and one who has, entered upon the Noble Eightfold Path.

to be cultivated—the robber¹ is to be subdued, and the honest brother is to be cultivated.’

37. ‘Let that be so, Nāgasena. But now, in that last word of yours, you have put yourself into my power, you have come round to the sense in which I put my question. For how, venerable Nāgasena, is the robber to be subdued by him who sets to work to subdue him?’

‘Thus, great king—if deserving of rebuke let him be rebuked, if of a fine let him be fined, if of banishment let him be banished, if of death let him be put to death.’

‘Is then, Nāgasena, the execution of robbers part of the doctrine laid down by the Tathāgatas?’

‘Certainly not, O king.’

‘Then why have the Tathāgatas laid down that the robber is to be taught better?’

‘Whosoever, great king, may be put to death, he does not suffer execution by reason of the opinion put forth by the Tathāgatas. He suffers by reason of what he himself has done. But notwithstanding that the doctrine of the Dhamma has been taught (by the Buddhas)², would it be possible, great king, for a man who had done nothing wrong, and was walking innocently along the streets, to be seized and put to death by any wise person?’

‘Certainly not.’

¹ Coro probably here used figuratively of a member of the Order who is unworthy of it, and injures believing laymen. So the word is used, for instance, in the introductory story (in the Sutta Vibhaṅga) to the fourth Pārāgikā—where four sorts of such religious ‘robbers’ are distinguished (compare our ‘wolf in sheep’s clothing’). But the king takes it literally.

² The three words in brackets are Hīnaśī-kumburē’s gloss.

‘But why?’

‘Because of his innocence.’

‘Just so, great king, since the thief is not put to death through the word of the Tathâgata, but only through his own act, how can any fault be rightly found on that account with the Teacher?’

‘It could not be, Sir.’

‘So you see the teaching of the Tathâgatas is a righteous teaching.’

‘Very good, Nâgasena! That is so, and I accept it as you say.’

[Here ends the problem as to kindness and punishment.]

[THE DISMISSAL OF THE ELDERS.]

38. ‘Venerable Nâgasena, it was said by the Blessed One :

“Anger I harbour not, nor sulkiness¹.”

But on the other hand the Tathâgata dismissed the Elders Sâriputta and Moggallâna, together with the brethren who formed their company of disciples².

¹ From the Dhaniya Sutta in the Sutta Nipâta (I, 2, 2).

² The episode here referred to will be found in the Magghima Nikâya, No. 67. Hînaśi-kumburê gives it in full. The Buddha was staying at the Âmalakî garden near the Sâkya town called Kâtumâ. There the two elders with their attendant 500 disciples came to call upon him. The resident Bhikkhus received them with applause, and a great hubbub arose. The Buddha enquired what that noise was, like the chattering of fishermen when a net full of fishes was drawn to shore. Ânanda told him. Thereupon the Buddha called the brethren together, made a discourse to them on the advantages of quiet, and ‘sent away’ the visitors. They went to the public rest-house in the town. The town’s folk enquired why, and

How now, Nāgasena, [187] was it in anger that the Tathāgata sent away¹ the disciples, or was it in pleasure? Be so good as to explain to me how this was². For if, Nāgasena, he dismissed them in anger, then had the Tathāgata not subdued all liability to anger in himself. But if it was in pleasure, then he did so ignorantly, and without due cause. This too is a double-edged problem now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

39. 'The Blessed One did say, O king :

" Anger I harbour not, nor sulkiness."

And he did dismiss the Elders with their disciples. But that was not in anger. Suppose, O king, that a man were to stumble against some root, or stake, or stone, or potsherd, or on uneven ground, and fall upon the broad earth. Would it be that the broad earth, angry with him, had made him fall ?'

' No, indeed, Sir. The broad earth feels neither anger against any man nor delight. It is altogether when they heard the reason, went to the Buddha, and obtained his forgiveness for the offending brethren. The incident is the basis of another question below, IV, 4, 41.

¹ Paṇāmesi means, in the technical legal phraseology of the Buddhist canon law, 'formally dismissed, sent away, did not allow them any more to be his disciples.' On this technical meaning of the term, compare Mahāvagga I, 2, 27, and Kullavagga XII, 2, 3. (Childers does not give this use of the word.) But it is difficult to imagine the circumstances under which the Buddha could so have dismissed his two principal disciples. So I think we must take the word in a less formal sense—such, for instance, as we find in Thera Gāthā 511, 557.

² Etam tāva gānāhi imam nāmāti. I follow Hīnaś-kumburē's rendering (p. 244) of this difficult phrase, according to which there ought to be a full stop in the text after paṇāmesi, and these words are supposed to be addressed to Nāgasena by Milinda. But I am not at all satisfied that he is right, and the text may be corrupt.

free from ill-will, neither needs it to fawn on any one. It would be by reason of his own carelessness that that man stumbled and fell.'

'Just so, great king, do the Tathâgatas experience neither anger against, nor pride in any man. Altogether free are the Tathâgatas, the Arahât-Buddhas, alike from ill-will, and from the need to fawn on any one. And those disciples were sent away by reason of what they themselves had done. So also the great ocean endures not association with any corpse. Any dead body there may be in it that does it promptly cast up, and leave high and dry on the shore¹. But is it in anger that it casts it up?'

'Certainly not, Sir. The broad ocean feels neither anger against any, nor does it take delight in any. It seeks not in the least to please any, and is altogether free from the desire to harm.'

'Just so, great king, do the Tathâgatas feel neither anger against any man, nor do they place their faith in any man. The Tathâgatas, the Arahât-Buddhas, are quite set free from the desire either to gain the goodwill of any man, or to do him harm. And it was by reason of what they themselves had done that those disciples were sent away. Just as a man, great king, who stumbles against the ground is made to fall, so is he who stumbles in the excellent teaching of the Conqueror made to go away. Just as a corpse in the great ocean is cast up, [188] so is he who stumbles in the excellent teaching of the Conqueror sent away. And when the Tathâgata sent those disciples away it was for their good, and their gain, their happiness, and their purification, and in order that in that way they should be delivered from birth, old age, disease, and death.'

¹ This supposed fact is already the ground of a comparison in the Kullavagga IX, 1, 3, 4 ('Vinaya Texts,' III, 303).

'Very good, Nāgasena! That is so, and I accept it as you say.'

[Here ends the problem as to the dismissal of the Elders.]

Here ends the Third Chapter.

BOOK IV. CHAPTER 4.

[THE MURDER OF MOGGALLÂNA.]

1. 'Venerable Nâgasena, it has been said by the Blessed One: "This is the chief, O Bhikkhus, of those of my disciples in the Order who are possessed of the power of Iddhi, I mean Moggallâna¹." But on the other hand they say his death took place by his being beaten to death with clubs, so that his skull was broken, and his bones ground to powder, and all his flesh and nerves bruised and pounded together². Now, Nâgasena, if the Elder, the great Moggallâna, had really attained to supremacy in the magical power of Iddhi, then it cannot be true that he was beaten to death with clubs³. But if his death was on that wise, then the saying that he was chief of those possessed of Iddhi must be wrong. How could he who was not even able, by his power of Iddhi, to prevent his own murder, be worthy nevertheless to stand as succour to the world of gods and men? This too is a double-edged problem now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

2. 'The Blessed One did declare, O king, that Moggallâna was chief among the disciples in power of Iddhi. And he was nevertheless beaten to death by clubs. But that was through his being then possessed by the still greater power of Karma¹.

¹ From the Aṅguttara Nikāya I, xiv, 1 (page 23 of Dr. Morris's edition for the Pāli Text Society).

² Parikatto, which the Siṃhalese version renders garhâ wemin.

³ 'By robbers,' adds Hīnaśi-kumburê, so there is no question of martyrdom.

3. 'But, venerable Nāgasena, [189] are not both of these things appurtenant to him who has the power of Iddhi—that is the extent of his power, and the result of his Karma—both alike unthinkable? And cannot the unthinkable be held back by the unthinkable? Just, Sir, as those who want the fruits will knock a wood apple² down with a wood apple, or a mango with a mango, so ought not the unthinkable in like manner to be subject to restraint by the unthinkable?'

'Even among things beyond the reach of the imagination, great king, still one is in excess above the other, one more powerful than the other. Just, O king, as the monarchs of the world are alike in kind, but among them, so alike in kind, one may overcome the rest, and bring them under his command—just so among things beyond the grasp of the imagination is the productive effect of Karma by far the most powerful. It is precisely the effect of Karma which overcomes all the rest, and has them under its rule; and no other influence is of any avail to the man in whom Karma is working out its inevitable end³. It is as when, O king, any man has committed an offence against the law⁴.

¹ Kammādhigahitenāpi, which the Siṃhalese merely repeats. Compare the use of adhigāṇhāti at Āṅguttara Nikāya V, 31 (adhigāṇhāti taṃ tena, 'surpasses him in that'), and see below.

² Kapittham (Feronia Elephantum), which the Siṃhalese renders Diwul gedī.

³ 'No good action has an opportunity at the time when evil Karma is in possession of a man,' says Hīnaśi-kumburē (p. 250).

⁴ Pakarane aparaggāṭi, literally 'against the book,' the book

Neither his mother nor his father, neither his sisters nor his brother, neither his friends nor his intimate associates can protect him then. He has fallen therein under the power of the king who will issue his command respecting him. And why is that so? Because of the wrong that he has done. So is it precisely the effect of Karma which overcomes all other influences, and has them under its command, and no other influence can avail the man in whom Karma is working out its inevitable end. It is as when a jungle fire has arisen on the earth, then can not even a thousand pots of water avail to put it out, but the conflagration overpowers all, and brings it under its control. And why is that so? Because of the fierceness of its heat. So is it precisely the effect of Karma which overcomes all other influences, and has them under its command; and no other influence can avail the man in whom Karma is working out its inevitable end. That is why the venerable one, great king, the great Moggallāna, when, at a time when he was possessed by Karma, he was being beaten to death with clubs, was yet unable to make use of his power of Iddhi¹.

‘Very good, Nāgasena! That is so, and I accept it as you say.’

[Here ends the problem as to the murder of Moggallāna.]

of the law being, no doubt, understood. But the Siṃhalese has ‘against any one.’

¹ Iddhiyā samannāhāro nāho si. See the use of this word, which is not in Childers, at p. 123 of the Sumaṅgala (on Dīgha I, 3, 24). The Siṃhalese goes on to much greater length than the Pāli, giving the full religious life history of the famous disciple (pp. 250, 251).

[ON SECRET DOCTRINE.]

4. [190] 'Venerable Nāgasena, it was said by the Blessed One: "The Dhamma and the Vinaya (Doctrine and Canon Law) proclaimed by the Tathāgata shine forth when they are displayed, and not when they are concealed¹." But on the other hand the recitation of the Pātimokkha and the whole of the Vinaya Piṭaka are closed and kept secret². So that if, Nāgasena, you (members of the Order) carried out what is just, and right, and held of faith in the teaching of the Conqueror then would the Vinaya shine forth as an open thing. And why would that be so? Because all the instruction therein, the discipline, the self-control, the regulations as to moral and virtuous conduct, are in their essence full of truth and righteousness, and redounding to emancipation of heart. But if the Blessed One really said that the Dhamma and Vinaya proclaimed by the Tathāgata shine forth when displayed and not when kept secret, then the saying that the recitation of the Pātimokkha and the whole of the Vinaya must be kept secret must be wrong. And if that be right, then the saying of the Blessed One must be wrong. This too is a double-edged problem now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

5. 'It was said, O king, by the Blessed One that the Dhamma and Vinaya proclaimed by the Tathā-

¹ From the Āṅguttara Nikāya III, 124 (vol. i, p. 283 of Dr. Morris's edition for the Pāli Text Society).

² In the Vinaya (Mahāvagga II, 16, 8) it is laid down that the Pātimokkha (the rules of the Order) is not to be recited before laymen. I know of no passage in the Piṭakas which says that it, or the Vinaya, is to be kept secret.

gata shine forth when displayed, and not when kept secret. And on the other hand the recitation of the Pâtimokkha and the whole of the Vinaya Piṭṭaka are kept close and secret¹. But this last is not the case as regards all men. They are only kept secret up to a certain limit. And the recitation of the Pâtimokkha is kept secret up to that certain limit on three grounds—firstly because that is the traditional custom² of previous Tathâgatas, secondly out of respect for the Truth (Dhamma), and thirdly out of respect for the position of a member of the Order³.

6. 'And as to the first it was the universal custom, O king, of previous Tathâgatas for the recitation of the Pâtimokkha to take place in the midst of the members of the Order only, to the exclusion of all others. Just, O king, as the Kshatriya secret formulas (of the nobles) are handed down among the nobles alone, and that this or that is so is common tradition among the nobles⁴ of the world and kept secret from all others—[191] so was this the universal custom of previous Tathâgatas, that the recitation of the Pâtimokkha should take place among the ¹ This is, so far as I know, the earliest mention of this being the case. There is nothing in the Pâtimokkha itself (see my translation of this list of offences against the rules of the Order in vol. i of the 'Vinaya Texts' in the S.B.E.) as to its recitation taking place in secret, and nothing in the Vinaya as to its being kept secret. But the regulations in the Vinaya as to the recitation of the Pâtimokkha forbade the actual presence of any one not a member of the Order, and as a matter of fact any one not such a member is excluded in practice during its recitation now in Ceylon. But it would be no offence in a layman to read the Vinaya, and learned laymen who have left the Order still do so.

² Vamsa (repeated in the Siṃhalese).

³ Bhikkhu-bhūmiyâ (also repeated in the Siṃhalese, p. 252).

⁴ Khaṇḍiyyânam (but the Siṃhalese has Sakyayangê).

members of the Order only, and be kept secret from all others. And again, just as there are several classes of people, O king, known as distinct in the world—such as wrestlers, tumblers, jugglers, actors, ballet-dancers, and followers of the mystic cult of the sun and moon, of the goddess of fortune and other gods¹. And the secrets of each of these sects are handed on in the sect itself, and kept hidden from all others. Just so with the universal custom of all the Tathâgatas that the recitation of the Pâtimokkha should take place before the members of the Order only, and be kept secret from all others. This is why the recitation of the Pâtimokkha is, up to that extent, kept secret in accordance with the habit of previous Tathâgatas.'

7. 'And how is it that the Pâtimokkha is kept secret, up to that extent, out of reverence for the Dhamma? The Dhamma, great king, is venerable and weighty. He who has attained to proficiency in it may exhort another in this wise: "Let not this Dhamma so full of truth, so excellent, fall into the hands of those unversed in it, where it would be despised and contemned, treated shamefully, made a game of, and found fault with. Nor let it fall into the hands of the wicked who would deal with it in all respects as badly as they." It is thus, O king, that the recitation of the Pâtimokkha is, up to that extent, kept secret out of reverence for the Dhamma. For if not, then it would be like the best, most costly, and most rare red sandal wood of the finest kind, which when brought to Savara (that city of the outcast *Kandâlas*¹) is despised and contemned, treated shamefully, made game of, and found fault with.'

¹ There are twenty classes of these people mentioned in the text, and the meaning of most of the names is obscure. The Simhalese simply repeats them all, adding only the word bhaktiyo, 'believers in,' to the names of the various divinities. The classing together of jugglers, ballet-dancers, and followers of the numerous mystic cults, so numerous in India, is thoroughly Buddhistic, and quite in the vein of Gotama himself—as, for instance, in the Mahâ Sîla (see my 'Buddhist Suttas,' p. 196).

8. [192] 'And how is it that the Pâtimokkha is kept secret, up to that extent, out of reverence for the position of a member of the Order? The condition of a Bhikkhu, great king, is in glory beyond the reach of calculation by weight, or measure, or price. None can value it, weigh it, measure it. And the recitation of the Pâtimokkha is carried on before the Bhikkhus alone, lest any one who has occupied that position should be brought down to a level with the men of the world. Just, O king, as if there be any priceless thing, in vesture or floor covering, in elephants, chargers, or chariots, in gold or silver or jewels or pearls or women, or in unsurpassable strong drink², all such things are the appanage of kings—just so, O king, whatever is most priceless in the way of training, of the traditions of the Blessed One, of learning, of conduct, and of the virtues of righteousness and self-control—all these are the appanages of the Order of Bhikkhus. This is why the recitation of the Pâtimokkha is, to that extent, kept secret³.'

¹ Added from the Simhalese.

² Niggita-kamma-surâ, rendered in the Simhalese (p. 254), gaya-grîhita-kṛtya-surâ-pânayen.

³ It will be noticed that there is no mention here (in a connection where, if it had then existed, it would almost certainly have been referred to) of any Esoteric Buddhism. So above, at

‘Very good, Nâgasena! That is so, and I accept it as you say.’

[Here ends the problem as to the secrecy in which the Vinaya is kept.]

[THE TWO KINDS OF FALSEHOOD.]

9. ‘Venerable Nâgasena, it has been said by the Blessed One that a deliberate lie is an offence of the greatest kind (involving exclusion from the Order ¹).

IV, 1, 8, it is stated that a good Buddhist teacher should keep nothing secret from his pupil. And even in so old a text as the ‘Book of the Great Decease’ (Chap. II, § 32, p. 36 of my translation in the ‘Buddhist Suttas’), it is said of the Buddha himself that he had ‘no such thing as the closed fist of a teacher who keeps some things back.’ This passage is itself quoted above at IV, 2, 4, as the basis of one of Milinda’s questions; and is entirely accepted by Nâgasena, that is, by our author. The fact is that there has never been any such thing as esoteric teaching in Buddhism, and that the modern so called esoteric Buddhism is neither esoteric nor Buddhism. Its tenets, so far as they are Indian at all, are perfectly accessible, are well known to all those who choose to study the books of Indian mysticism, and are Hindu, not Buddhist. They are, indeed, quite contradictory to Buddhism, of which the authors of what they ignorantly call Esoteric Buddhism know but very little—that little being only a portion of those beliefs which have been common ground to all religious teachers in India. If one doctrine—more than any other—is distinctive of Buddhism, it is the ignoring, in ethics, of the time-honoured belief in a soul—that is, in the old sense, in a separate creature inside the body, which flies out of it, like a bird out of a cage, when the body dies. Yet the Theosophists, who believe, I am told, in seven souls inside each human body (which would be worse according to true Buddhism than seven devils), still venture to call themselves Buddhists, and do not see the absurdity of their position!

¹ Sampagâna-musâvâda pâragikâ. This is curious as according to the Pâtimokkha it is Pâṭittiya, not Pâragikâ. Compare Pâragikâ 4 with Pâṭittiya 1. (‘Vinaya Texts,’ S. B. E., vol. iii, pp. 5 and 32.)

And again he said: "By a deliberate lie a Bhikkhu commits a minor offence, one that ought to be the subject of confession made before another (member of the Order)¹." Now, venerable Nāgasena, what is herein the distinction, what the reason, that by one lie a Bhikkhu is cast out of the Order, and by another he is guilty only of an offence that can be atoned for. If the first decision be right, then the second must be wrong; but if the second be right, then the first must be wrong. This too is a double-edged problem now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

10. [193]² 'Both your quotations, O king, are correct³. But a falsehood is a light or heavy offence according to the subject matter. For what do you think, great king? Suppose a man were to give another a slap with his hand, what punishment would you inflict upon him?'

'If the other refused to overlook the matter, then neither should we be able to pardon his assailant⁴, but should mulct him in a penny or so⁵.'

'But on the other hand, suppose it had been you

¹ I cannot trace these identical words in the Piṭaka texts. But the general sense of them is exactly in agreement with the first Pāṭiṭiya rule.

² Hīnaśi-kumburê here inserts a summary of the Introductory Story (in the Sutta Vibhaṅga) to the 4th Pārāgikā. All this (pp. 254-256) stands in his version for lines 1-3 on p. 193 of the Pāli text.

³ The Pāli repeats them word for word. As I have pointed out above, they are not really correct.

⁴ So Hīnaśi-kumburê, who must have had a different reading, and I think a better one, before him.

⁵ A kaḥāpaṇa. See the discussion of the value of this coin in my 'Ancient Coins and Measures,' pp. 3, 4.

yourself that he had given the blow to, what would then be the punishment ?'

'We should condemn him to have his hands cut off, and his feet cut off, and to be skinned alive¹, and we should confiscate all the goods in his house, and put to death all his family to the seventh generation on both sides.'

'But, great king, what is the distinction? Why is it that for one slap of the hand there should be a gentle fine of a penny, while for a slap given to you there should be so fearful a retribution ?'

'Because of the difference in the person (assaulted).'

'Well! just so, great king, is a falsehood a light or a heavy offence according to the attendant circumstances.'

'Very good, Nâgasena! That is so, and I accept it as you say.'

[Here ends the problem as to the degree of offence in falsehood.]

[THE BODISAT'S CONSIDERATION.]

11. 'Venerable Nâgasena, it has been said by the Blessed One in the discourse on the essential conditions²: "Long ago have his parents been destined for each Bodisat, and the kind of tree he is to select for his Bo tree, and the

¹ Yâva sîsam kalîrakkheggam khedâpeyyâma, which the Sinhalese merely repeats. It is literally 'We should have him "bambû-sprout-cut" up to his head.' What this technical term may mean is not exactly known—possibly having slits the shape of a bambû sprout cut all over his body.

² Dhammatâ-dhamma-pariyâye. I don't know where this is to be found.

Bhikkhus who are to be his two chief disciples, and the lad who is to be his son, and the member of the Order who is to be his special attendant." But on the other hand he said: "When yet in the condition of a god in the Tusita heaven the Bodisat makes the eight Great Investigations—he investigates the time (whether the right moment had come at which he ought to be re-born as a man), and the continent (in which his birth is to take place), and the country (where he is to be re-born), and the family (to which he is to belong), and the mother (who is to bear him), and the period (during which he was to remain in the womb), and the month (in which his birthday shall come), and his renunciation (when it shall be)¹. [194] Now, Nāgasena, before knowledge is ripe there is no understanding, but when it has reached its summit there is no longer any need to wait for thinking a matter over¹, for there is nothing outside the ken of the omniscient mind. Why then should the Bodisat investigate the time, thinking to himself: "In what moment shall I be born²?" And for the same reason why should he investigate the family, thinking to himself: "In what family shall I be born?" And if, Nāgasena, it is a settled matter who shall be the parents of the Bodisat, then it must be false that he "investigated the family." But if that be true, then must the other saying be wrong. This too is a double-edged problem now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

¹ These eight Investigations (Vilokanāni) have not yet been found in the Piṭaka texts. But, when relating the birth of the historical Buddha, the Gāṭaka commentary (vol. i, p. 48, of Professor Fausböll's edition) mentions the first six of them (substituting okāsa for desa), and calls them, oddly enough, the Five Great Investigations. In the corresponding passage in the Lalita Vistara only the first four are mentioned. The last two of the above eight seem very forced.

² Nimesantaram na āgameti, for which Hinañ-kumburê (p. 256 at the end) has nivesantara. Neither word occurs elsewhere.

12. 'It was both a settled matter, O king, who should be the parents of the Bodisat, and he did investigate into the question as to which family he was to be born into. But how did he do so? He thought over the matter as to whether his parents should be nobles or Brahmans. With respect to eight things, O king, should the future be investigated before it comes to pass. A merchant, O king, should investigate goods before he buys them—an elephant should try with its trunk a path it has not yet trod—a cartman should try a ford he has not yet crossed over—a pilot should test a shore he has not yet arrived at, and so guide the ship—a physician should find out the period of life which his patient has lasted¹ before he treats his disease—a traveller should test the stability of a bambû bridge² before he mounts on to it—a Bhikkhu should find out how much time has yet to run before sun turn before he begins to eat his meal—and Bodisats, before they are born, should investigate the question whether it would be right for them to be born in the family of a noble or of a Brahman.

¹ Âyum oloketvâ, which the Sinhalese (p. 257) repeats. This implied meaning is doubtful.

² Uttara-setu, a word which does not occur elsewhere. Hīnaṣikumburê renders it He-danda, which Clough explains as a foot-bridge usually made of a single tree.

These are the eight occasions on which investigation ought to precede action.'

'Very good, Nâgasena! That is so, and I accept it as you say.'

[Here ends the problem as to the Bodisat's consideration.]

[ON SUICIDE.]

13. [195] 'Venerable Nâgasena, it has been said by the Blessed One : "A brother is not, O Bhikkhus, to commit suicide. Whosoever does so shall be dealt with according to the law¹." And on the other hand you (members of the Order) say : "On whatsoever subject the Blessed One was addressing the disciples, he always, and with various similes, preached to them in order to bring about the destruction of birth, of old age, of disease, and of death. And whosoever overcame birth, old age, disease, and death, him did he honour with the highest praise²." Now if the Blessed One forbade suicide that saying of yours must be wrong, but if not then the prohibition of suicide must be wrong. This too is a double-edged problem now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

14. 'The regulation you quote, O king, was laid down by the Blessed One, and yet is our saying you refer to true. And there is a reason for this, a reason for which the Blessed One both prohibited (the destruction of life), and also (in another sense) instigated us to it.'

¹ Literally 'is not to throw himself down,' and I think 'from a precipice' is to be understood, especially as the nearest approach to the words quoted, that is the passage in the Sutta Vibhaṅga on the 3rd Pârâgika (III, 5, 13), has that meaning.

² Here again the passage referred to is not known.

'What, Nâgasena, may that reason be?'

'The good man, O king, perfect in uprightness, is like a medicine to men¹ in being an antidote to the poison of evil, he is like water to men in laying the dust and the impurities of evil dispositions, he is like a jewel treasure to men in bestowing upon them all attainments in righteousness, he is like a boat to men inasmuch as he conveys them to the further shore of the four flooded streams (of lust, individuality, delusion, and ignorance)², he is like a caravan owner to men in that he brings them beyond the sandy desert of rebirths, he is like a mighty rain cloud to men in that he fills their hearts with satisfaction, he is like a teacher to men in that he trains them in all good, he is like a good guide to men in that he points out to them the path of peace. It was in order that so good a man as that, one whose good qualities are so many, so various, so immeasurable, [196] in order that so great a treasure mine of good things, so full of benefit to all beings, might not be done away with, that the Blessed One, O king, out of his mercy towards all beings, laid down that injunction, when he said: "A brother is not, O Bhikkhus, to commit suicide. Whosoever does so shall be dealt with according to the law." This is the reason for which the Blessed One prohibited (self-slaughter). And it was said, O king, ¹ Sattânam, in which gods are included.

² The four oghas; also called Âsavas. The former term is used of them objectively, the latter subjectively.

by the Elder Kumâra Kassapa, the eloquent, when he was describing to Pâyâsi the Râganya the other world: "So long as Samanas and Brahmans of uprightness of life, and beauty of character, continue to exist—however long that time may be—just so long do they conduct themselves to the advantage and happiness of the great masses of the people, to the good and the gain and the weal of gods and men!¹"

15. 'And what is the reason for which the Blessed One instigated us (to put an end to life)? Birth, O king, is full of pain, and so is old age, and disease, and death. Sorrow is painful, and so is lamentation, and pain, and grief, and despair. Association with the unpleasant is painful, and separation from the pleasant². The death of a mother is painful, or of a father, or a brother, or a sister, or a son, or a wife, or of any relative. Painful is the ruin of one's family, and the suffering of disease, and the loss of wealth, and decline in goodness, and the loss of insight. Painful is the fear produced by despots, or by robbers, or by enemies, or by famine, or by fire, or by flood, or by the tidal wave, or by earthquake, or by crocodiles or alligators. Painful is the fear of possible blame attaching to oneself, or to others, the fear of punishment, the fear of misfortune. Painful is the fear arising from shyness in the presence of assemblies of one's fellows, painful is anxiety as to one's means of livelihood, painful the foreboding of death. [197] Painful are (the punishments inflicted on criminals), such as being flogged with whips, or with sticks, or with split rods, having one's hands cut off, or one's feet, or one's hands and feet, or one's ears, or one's nose, or one's ears and nose. Painful are (the tortures inflicted on traitors)—being subjected to the Gruel Pot (that is, having boiling gruel poured into one's head from the top of which the skull bone has been removed¹)—or to the Chank Crown² (that is, having the scalp rubbed with gravel till it becomes smooth like a polished shell)—or to the Râhu's Mouth³ (that is, having one's mouth held open by iron pins, and oil put in it, and a wick lighted therein)—or to the Fire Garland⁴ or to the Hand Torch⁵ (that is, being made a living torch, the whole body, or the arms only, being wrapped up in oily cloths, and set on fire)—or to the Snake Strips⁶ (that is, being skinned in strips from the neck to the hips, so that the skin falls in strips round the legs)—or to the Bark Dress⁷ (that is, being skinned alive from the neck downwards, and having each strip of

¹ This Kumâra Kassapa is said at Ânguttara I, xiv, 3 to have been the most eloquent of the early disciples. Another eloquent little outburst of his is preserved for us in verses 201 and 202 of the Therâ Gâthâ. 'O for the Buddhas, and their doctrines! O for the achievements of our Master! Thereby may the disciple realise the Truth. Through countless æons of time has Selfness followed on Selfness. But this one is now the last. This aggregation (of mental and material qualities which forms me now again into an individuality) is at last the end, the end of the coming and going of births and deaths. There will be no rebirth for me!' But where the verses are so full of allusions to the deepest Buddhist psychology, it is impossible to reproduce in English the vigour of the original Pâli. Selfness (Sakkâya) is the condition of being a separate individual.

² All this is from the celebrated discourse, the 'Foundation of the Kingdom of Righteousness' (in 'Buddhist Suttas,' p. 148).

¹ Bilaṅga-thālikam.

² Saṅkha-mundikam.

³ Râhu-mukham.

⁴ Goti-mālakam.

⁵ Haṭṭha-paggotikam.

⁶ Eraka-vattikam.

⁷ Kṛaka-vāsikam.

skin as soon as removed tied to the hair, so that these strips form a veil around one)—or to the Spotted Antelope¹ (that is, having one's knees and elbows tied together, and being made to squat on a plate of iron under which a fire is lit)—or to the Flesh-hooks² (that is, being hung up on a row of iron hooks)—or to the Pennies³ (that is, having bits cut out of the flesh, all over the body, of the size of pennies)—or to the Brine Slits⁴ (that is, having cuts made all over one's body by means of knives or sharp points, and then having salt and caustic liquids poured over the wounds)—or to the Bar Turn⁵ (that is, being transfixed to the ground by a bar of iron passing through the root of the ear, and then being dragged round and round by the leg)—or to the Straw Seat⁶ (that is, being so beaten with clubs that

¹ Eneyyakam.

² Balisa-mamsikam (so the Sinhalese, Mr. Trenckner reads Balisa).

³ Kahâpanakam.

⁴ Khârâpatikkhakam.

⁵ Paligha-parivattikam.

⁶ Palâla-pîthakam. I follow throughout Hînañi-kumburê's interpretation (pp. 260, 261) of these pretty names, which could be well matched in the West. That some Indian kings were cruel in the extreme is no doubt true. But it must not be supposed that this list gives the names of well-known punishments. It is merely a string of technical terms which is repeated by rote whenever tortures have to be specified. And the meaning of its terms was most likely unknown to the very people who so used them. For the whole list (which is taken by our author from the Pâli Piṭakas) is explained by Buddhaghosa in his commentary, the Manoratha Pîṭakā, on Āṅguttara II, 1, 1, as edited by Dr. Morris at pp. 113, 114 of the first edition of his Āṅguttara for the Pâli Text Society, 1884. But Buddhaghosa's explanations differ from Hînañi-kumburê's in several details; and to nearly half the names he gives alternative meanings, quite contradictory to those that he gives first. So the list had its origin some centuries (say 400–500) B.C., and was certainly the bones are broken, and the body becomes like a heap of straw)—or to be anointed with boiling oil, or to be eaten by dogs, or to be impaled alive, or to be beheaded. Such and such, O king, are the manifold and various pains which a being caught in the whirlpool of births and rebirths has to endure. Just, O king, as the water rained down upon the Himālaya mountain flows, in its course along the Ganges, through and over rocks and pebbles and gravel, whirlpools and eddies and rapids¹, and the stumps and branches of trees which obstruct and oppose its passage,—just so has each being caught in the succession of births and rebirths to endure such and such manifold and various pains. Full of pain, then, is the continual succession of rebirths, a joy is it when that succession ends. And it was in pointing out the advantage of that end, the disaster involved in that succession, that the Blessed One, great king, instigated us to get beyond birth, and old age, and disease, and death by the realisation of the final end of that succession of rebirths. This is the sense, O king, which led the Blessed One to instigate us (to put an end to life).'

‘Very good, Nâgasena ! Well solved is the puzzle (I put), well set forth are the reasons (you alleged). That is so, and I accept it as you say.’

[Here ends the problem as to suicide.]

not understood in the fifth century A. D. ; and was probably therefore unintelligible also, at least in part, to our author.

¹ Ūmika-vaṅka-kaḍḍika. I don't pretend to understand this last word. Dr. Morris, at p. 92 of the 'Pāli Text Society's Journal' for 1884, suggests velika. Perhaps it was simply adika after all, with or without m euphonic.

[A LOVING DISPOSITION.]

16. [198] 'Venerable Nāgasena, it has been said by the Blessed One: "Eleven advantages, O brethren, may be anticipated from practising, making a habit of, enlarging within one, using as a means of advancement, and as a basis of conduct, pursuing after, accumulating, and rising well up to the very heights of the emancipation of heart, arising from a feeling of love (towards all beings)¹. And what are these eleven? He who does so sleeps in peace, and in peace does he awake. He dreams no sinful dreams. He becomes dear to men, and to the beings who are not men². The gods watch over him. Neither fire, nor poison, nor sword works any harm to him. Quickly and easily does he become tranquillised. The aspect of his countenance is calm. Undismayed does he meet death, and should he not press through to the Supreme Condition (of Arahātship), then is he sure of rebirth in the Brahma world³." But on the other hand you (members of the Order) say that "Sâma the Prince, while dwelling in the cultivation of a loving disposition toward all beings, and when he was (in consequence thereof) wandering in the forest followed by a herd of deer, was hit by a poisoned arrow shot by Piliyakkha the king, and there, on the spot, fainted and fell¹." Now, venerable Nâgasena, if the passage I have quoted from the words of the Blessed One be right, then this statement of yours must be wrong. But if the story of Prince Sâma be right, then it cannot be true that neither fire, nor poison, nor sword can work harm to him who cultivates the habit of love to all beings. This too is a double-edged problem, so subtle, so abstruse, so delicate, and so profound, that the thought of having to solve it might well bring out sweat over the body even of the most subtle-minded of mortals. This problem is now put to you. Unravel this mighty knot². Throw light upon this matter³ to the accomplishment of the desire of those sons of the Conqueror who shall arise hereafter⁴.

¹ This same string of words, except the first, is used of the Iddhi-pādas in the Book of the Great Decease, III, 3 (p. 40 of vol. xi of the S. B. E.). The words 'towards all beings' are not in the text. But this is the meaning of the phrase used, and not love to men only, as would be understood if they were not inserted in the translation.

² Amanussa. This means, not the gods, but the various spirits on the earth, nayads, dryads, fairies, &c. &c. As here, so again below, IV, 4, 41, the amanussā are opposed to the devatā, mentioned in the next clause here. In older texts the devatā include the amanussā.

³ From the Aṅguttara Nikāya, Ekādasā Nipāta; quoted in full, with the context, in the Introductory Story to the 169th Gāṭaka (vol. ii, pp. 60, 61 of Professor Fausböll's edition).

'The Blessed One spake, O king, as you have quoted. And Prince Sâma dwelling in the cultivation of love, and thus followed by a herd of deer when he was wandering in the forest, was hit by the poisoned arrow shot by king Piliyakkha, and then and there fainted and fell. But there is a reason for that. [199] And what is the reason? Simply that those virtues (said in the passage you quoted

¹ Mr. Trenckner points out that this story is given in the 540th Gâtaka.

² See p. 105 of the text.

³ Kakkhum dehi. So also p. 95 of the text.

⁴ Nibbâhana; not in Childers, but see p. 119 of the text.

to be in the habit of love) are virtues not attached to the personality of the one who loves, but to the actual presence of the love that he has called up in his heart¹. And when Prince Sâma was upsetting the water-pot, that moment he lapsed from the actual feeling of love. At the moment, O king, in which an individual has realised the sense of love, that moment neither fire, nor poison, nor sword can do him harm. If any men bent on doing him an injury come up, they will not see him, neither will they have a chance of hurting him. But these virtues, O king, are not inherent in the individual, they are in the actual felt presence of the love that he is calling up in his heart.'

'Suppose, O king, a man were to take into his hand a Vanishing Root of supernatural power; and that, so long as it was actually in his hand, no other ordinary person would be able to see him. The virtue, then, would not be in the man. It would be in the root that such virtue would reside that an object in the very line of sight of ordinary mortals could, nevertheless, not be seen. Just so, O king, is it with the virtue inherent in the felt presence of love that a man has called up in his heart.'

'Or it is like the case of a man [200] who has entered into a well-formed mighty cave. No storm of rain, however mightily it might pour down, would be able to wet him. But that would be by no virtue inherent in the man. It would be a virtue inherent in the cave that so mighty a downpour of rain could not wet the man. And just so, O king, is it with the virtue inherent in the felt presence of love that a man has called up in his heart¹.

¹ Bhânanâ is really more than 'cultivation.' It is the actual, present, felt sense of the particular moral state that is being cultivated (in this case, of love). I have elsewhere rendered it 'meditation': but as the ethical doctrine, and practice, are alike unknown to us, we have no word that exactly reproduces the connotation of the Pâli phrase.

¹ This is no quibble. The early Buddhists did believe in the power of a subjective love over external circumstances. It is true that the best known instances in which this power is represented as having been actually exercised, are instances of the power of love over the hearts of other beings, and hence, indirectly, over their actions. Thus when Devadatta had had the fierce, manslaying elephant Nālāgiri let loose against the Buddha (Kullavagga VII, 3, 11, 12), Gotama is said to have permeated him with his love, and the elephant then went up to him only to salute him, and allowed himself to be stroked, and did no harm. And when the five disciples had intended, when he went to Benares, to show him no respect, the Buddha, in like manner, is said to have 'concentrated that feeling of his love which was able to pervade generally all beings in earth and heaven,' and to have 'directed it specially towards them.' Then 'the sense of his love diffused itself through their hearts. And as he came nearer and nearer, unable any longer to adhere to their resolve, they rose from their seats, and bowed down before him, and welcomed him with every mark of reverence and of respect' ('Buddhist Birth Stories,' vol. i, p. 112).

And when he wished to convert Roga the Mallian, the Buddha is said, in like manner, to have 'suffused him with the feeling of his love.' And then Roga, 'overcome by the Blessed One by the sense of his love—just as a young calf follows the kine, so did he go from apartment to apartment' seeking the Blessed One (Mahāvagga VI, 36, 4).

And again, when the Bhikkhus told the Buddha of a brother having been killed by a snake-bite, he is represented (in the Kullavagga V, 6) to have said: 'Now surely that brother had not let his love flow out over the four royal kinds of serpents. Had he done so, he would not have died of the bite of a snake.' And then he is said to have enjoined the use of a poem of love to snakes (set out in the text quoted) as a safeguard against snake-bite. This goes really much further than the other instances, but no case is given of that safeguard having been actually used successfully. And I know of no case in the Pāli Piṭakas of the felt presence

‘Most wonderful is it, Nâgasena, and most strange how the felt presence of love has the power of warding off all evil states of mind ¹.’

‘Yes! The practice of love is productive of all virtuous conditions of mind both in good (beings) and in evil ones. To all beings whatsoever, who are in the bonds of conscious existence ², is this practice of love of great advantage, and therefore ought it to be sedulously cultivated.’

[Here ends the problem as to the power of love.]

[DEVADATTA.]

17. ‘Venerable Nâgasena, is the consequence the same to him who does good and to him who does evil, or is there any difference in the two cases?’

‘There is a difference, O king, between good and evil. Good works have a happy result, and lead to Sagga ³, and evil works have an unhappy result, and lead to Niraya ⁴.’

of the feeling of love being said to have actually counteracted either fire, or poison, or sword.

It is noteworthy that the Simhalese inserts here six pages (265-271) of matter not found in the Pâli. But as it gives at length the story of Prince Sâma, it is taken, I presume, from the Gâtaka book.

¹ This is something quite different from what was said before.

² Ye viññâna-baddhâ, sabbesam, which the Simhalese takes as a gloss on ‘good and evil ones,’ and renders viññâna prati wû da. But I prefer Mr. Trenckner’s punctuation.

³ That is to a temporary life in heaven.

⁴ That is to life in a temporary hell (or purgatory).

‘But, venerable Nâgasena, your people say that Devadatta was altogether wicked, full of wicked dispositions, and that the Bodisat¹ was altogether pure, full of pure dispositions². And yet Devadatta, through successive existences³, was not only quite equal to the Bodisat, but even sometimes superior to him, both in reputation and in the number of his adherents.

18. ‘Thus, Nâgasena, when Devadatta became the Purohita (family Brâhman, royal chaplain) of Brahmadatta, the king, in the city of Benares, then the Bodisat was a wretched Kandâla (outcast)⁴ who knew by heart a magic spell. And by repeating his spell he produced mango fruits out of season⁵. This

¹ Bodhi-satto (Wisdom-Child). The individual who (through virtue practised in successive lives) was becoming the Buddha.

² ‘Wicked’ and ‘pure’ are in the Pâli kañhe and sukka, literally, ‘dark’ and ‘light.’ The only other passage I recollect where these names of colours are used in an ethical sense is the 87th verse of the Dhammapada. Professor Max Müller there renders: ‘A wise man should leave the dark state (of ordinary life), and follow the bright state (of the Bhikshu),’ (S. B. E., vol. x, p. 26.) But the words should certainly be translated: ‘A wise man should put away wicked dispositions, and cultivate purity of heart.’ Bhâvetha could never refer to adopting or following any outward profession. It is exclusively used of the practice, cultivation, of inward feelings. And the commentary, which is quoted by Professor Fausböll, takes the passage in the Dhammapada in that sense, just as Hīnañi-kumburê (p. 271) does here.

³ Bhavê bhavê, which would be more accurately rendered ‘in the course of his gradual becoming.’

⁴ Kavaka-kandâla. The Kandâlas are a well-known caste still existing in India—if indeed that can rightly be called a caste which is beneath all others. Khavaka is not in Childers, but is applied below (p. 256 of our text) to Mâra, the Buddhist Satan. See also the next note.

⁵ This is not a summary of the 309th Gâtaka, for it differs from that story as published by Professor Fausböll (vol. iii, pp.

is one case in which the Bodisat was inferior to Devadatta in birth, [201] inferior to him in reputation.'

19. 'And again, when Devadatta became a king, a mighty monarch of the earth¹, living in the enjoyment of all the pleasures of sense, then the Bodisat was an elephant, decked with all manner of ornaments that the king might make use of them. And the king, being put out of temper at the sight of his graceful and pleasant style of pace and motion, said to the elephant trainer with the hope of bringing about the death of the elephant: "Trainer, this elephant has not been properly trained, make him perform the trick called 'Sky walking.'" In that case too the Bodisat was inferior to Devadatta,—was a mere foolish animal².'

20. 'And again, when Devadatta became a man who gained his living by winnowing grain³, then 217-30), and also from the older and shorter version contained in the Old Commentary on the Pâtimokkha (on the 69th Sakhiya, Vinaya IV, pp. 203, 204). [The name of that story in Professor Fausböll's edition is Khavaka-Gâtaka, but throughout the story itself the word Kandâla is used in the passages corresponding to those in which Professor Fausböll has Khapaka (sic),—a coincidence which throws light on our author, Khavaka-kandâla.] The story here referred to is the Amba Gâtaka (No. 474) in which the word Khavaka does not occur.

¹ 'Of Magadha,' says Hînañ-kumburê (p. 272).

² This is the 122nd Gâtaka, there called the Dummedha Gâtaka. The king has the elephant taken to the top of the Vepulla mountain outside Râgagaha. Then having made him stand first on three feet, then on two, then on one, he demands of the trainer to make him stand in the air. Then the elephant flies away to Benares!

³ Pavane naññâyiko. But as Hînañ-kumburê renders all this: 'a farmer in Benares who gained his living by husbandry,' I would suggest pavanena ññâyiko as the right reading.

the Bodisat was a monkey called "the broad earth." Here again we have the difference between an animal and a man, and the Bodisat was inferior in birth to Devadatta ¹.'

21. 'And again, when Devadatta became a man, by name Sonuttara, a Nesâda (one of an outcast tribe of aborigines, who lived by hunting), and was of great strength and bodily power, like an elephant, then the Bodisat was the king of elephants under the name of the "Six-tusked." And in that birth, the hunter slew the elephant. In that case too Devadatta was the superior ².'

22. 'And again, when Devadatta became a man, a wanderer in the woods, without a home, then the Bodisat was a bird, a partridge who knew the Vedic hymns. And in that birth too the woodman killed the bird. So in that case also Devadatta was the superior by birth ³.'

23. 'And again, when Devadatta became the king of Benares, by name Kalâbu, then the Bodisat was an ascetic who preached kindness to animals. And the king (who was fond of sport), enraged with the ascetic, had his hands and feet cut off like so many bambû sprouts ⁴. In that birth, too, Deva-

¹ I cannot unfortunately trace this story among the Gâtakas.

² I do not know which Gâtaka is here referred to.

³ This must be the 438th Gâtaka, there called the Tittira Gâtaka. In the summary Devadatta is identified with the hypocritical ascetic who killed and ate the wise partridge.

⁴ This is the 313th Gâtaka, there called the Khanti-vadi Gâtaka. The royal sportsman has first the skin, and then the hands and feet of the sage cut off, to alter his opinions. But the sage simply says that his love to animals is not in his skin, or in his limbs, but in his heart. Then the earth swallows up the cruel monarch, and the citizens bury the body of the sage with all honour. In the summary Kalâbu, the king, is identified with Devadatta.

datta was the superior, both in birth and in reputation among men.'

24. 'And again, when Devadatta became a man, a woodman, then the Bodisat was Nandiya the monkey king. And in that birth too the man killed the monkey, and his mother besides, and his younger brother. So in that case also it was Devadatta who was the superior in birth ¹.'

25. 'And again, when Devadatta became a man, a naked ascetic, by name Kârambhiya, then the Bodisat was a snake king called "the Yellow one." So in that case too it was Devadatta [202] who was the superior in birth ².'

26. 'And again, when Devadatta became a man, a crafty ascetic with long matted hair, then the Bodisat was a famous pig, by name "the Carpenter." So in that case too it was Devadatta who was the superior in birth ³.'

27. 'And again, when Devadatta became a king among the Ketas, by name Sura Parikara ⁴, who had the power of travelling through the air at a level above men's heads ⁵, then the Bodisat was a Brah-

¹ This is the 222nd Gâtaka, there called the K'ûla Nandiya Gâtaka.

² This is probably the 518th Gâtaka. See Mr. Trenckner's note.

³ This must be the 492nd Gâtaka, the Takkha-sûkara Gâtaka, in which the hero is a learned pig who helps the carpenter in his work, and the villain of the story is a hypocrite ascetic with matted hair. But it should be added that though in the summary (Fausbøll, vol. iv, p. 350) Devadatta is identified with the ascetic, the Bodisat is identified, not with the learned pig, but with the dryad.

⁴ He is called Upakara both in the 422nd Gâtaka (of which this is a summary) and in the Sumaṅgala (p. 258). The Gâtaka (III, 454) also gives a third variation, Apaṭara.

⁵ Purisamatto gagane vehâsaṅgamo. The Gâtaka says simply uparikaro, which must mean about the same.

man named Kapila. So in that case too it was Devadatta who was the superior in birth and in reputation.'

28. 'And again, when Devadatta became a man, by name Sâma, then the Bodisat was a king among the deer, by name Ruru. So in that case too it was Devadatta who was the superior in birth ¹.'

29. 'And again, when Devadatta became a man, a hunter wandering in the woods, then the Bodisat was a male elephant, and that hunter seven times broke off and took away the teeth of the elephant. So in that case too it was Devadatta who was the superior in respect of the class of beings into which he was born ².'

30. 'And again, when Devadatta became a jackal who wanted to conquer the world ³, and brought the kings of all the countries in India under his control, then the Bodisat was a wise man, by name Vidhura. So in that case too it was Devadatta who was the superior in glory.'

31. 'And again, when Devadatta became the elephant who destroyed the young of the Chinese partridge, then the Bodisat was also an elephant, the leader of his herd. So in that case they were both on a par¹.

¹ This must be the 482nd Gâtaka. It is true that the man is there called Mahâ Dhanaka (Fausböll, vol. iii, p. 255), and the Bodisat is not specially named Ruru, nor is he a king of the herd, but is only a stag of the kind of deer called Ruru, who lives alone. But a comparison of the poetical version of the same story in the Kariyâ Piṭaka II, 6 (p. 87 of Dr. Morris's edition for the Pâli Text Society) shows that the same story is here referred to.

² This is the 72nd Gâtaka, the Silava Nâga Gâtaka. (Fausböll, vol. i, p. 319.)

³ Khattiya-dhammo; literally, 'who had the nature of a Kshatriya.' This expression is not found in the Gâtaka referred to, No. 241 (vol. ii, p. 242 and foll. in Professor Fausböll's edition), and the Bodisat is there called purdhita not pandita, and his name is not given as Vidhura. The jackal also came to grief in his attempt to conquer Benares. But there is no doubt as to that story, the Sabba Dâṭṭha Gâtaka being the one here quoted.

32. 'And again, when Devadatta became a yak-kha, by name Unrighteous, then the Bodisat too was a yak-kha, by name Righteous. So in that case too they were both on a par².'

33. 'And again, when Devadatta became a sailor, the chief of five hundred families, then the Bodisat too was a sailor, the chief of five hundred families. So in that case too they were both on a par³.'

34. 'And again, when Devadatta became a caravan leader, the lord of five hundred waggons, then the Bodisat too was a caravan leader, the lord of five hundred waggons. So in that case too they were both on a par⁴.'

35. [203] 'And again, when Devadatta became a king of deer, by name Sâkha, then the Bodisat was a king of deer, by name Nigrodha. So in that case too they were both on a par⁵.'

36. 'And again, when Devadatta became a commander-in-chief, by name Sâkha, then the Bodisat

¹ This is the 357th Gâtaka (Fausböll, vol. iii, pp. 174) and which is one of those illustrated on the Bharhut Tope (Cunningham, Plate 109).

² In the Gâtaka text (No. 457, Fausböll, vol. iv, pp. 100 and foll.), there are both devaputtâ, 'gods,' not yakkhâ. This is by no means the only instance of the term yakkha being used of gods.

³ I cannot trace this story in the printed text of the Gâtakas.

⁴ This is the Apannaka Gâtaka (No. 1, vol. i, pp. 98 and foll. in Professor Fausböll's edition), translated in the 'Buddhist Birth Stories,' vol. i, pp. 138-145.

⁵ The Nigrodha Miga Gâtaka (No. 12, vol. i, pp. 145 and foll. in Fausböll), translated in 'Buddhist Birth Stories,' vol. i, pp. 198 and following.

was a king, by name Nigrodha. So in that case too they were both on a par¹.'

37. 'And again, when Devadatta became a brahman, by name Khandahâla, then the Bodisat was a prince, by name Kanda. So in that case that Khandahâla was the superior².'

38. 'And again, when Devadatta became a king, by name Brahmadatta, then the Bodisat was his son, the prince called Mahâ Paduma. In that case the king had his son cast down seven times, from the precipice from which robbers were thrown down. And inasmuch as fathers are superior to and above their sons, in that case too it was Devadatta was the superior³.'

39. 'And again, when Devadatta became a king, by name Mahâ Patâpa, then the Bodisat was his son, Prince Dhamma-pâla; and that king had the hands and feet and head of his son cut off. So in that case too Devadatta was the superior⁴.'

40. 'And now again, in this life, they were in the Sâkya clan, and the Bodisat became a Buddha, all wise, the leader of the world, and Devadatta having left the world to join the Order founded by Him who is above the god of gods, and having attained to the powers of Iddhi, was filled with lust to become himself the Buddha. Come now, most venerable Nâgasena! Is not all that I have said true, and just, and accurate?'

¹ The Nigrodha Gâtaka (No. 445, Fausböll, vol. iv, pp. 37 and foll.).

² I cannot trace this story among the published Gâtakas.

³ This is the Mahâ Paduma Gâtaka (No. 472, Fausböll, vol. iv, pp. 187-195). It was a case of Joseph and Potiphar's wife.

⁴ This tragical story is No. 358 in the Gâtaka collection (Fausböll, vol. iii, pp. 177-182).

41. 'All the many things which you, great king, have now propounded, are so, and not otherwise.'

'Then, Nāgasena, unless black and white are the same in kind, it follows that good and evil bear equal fruit.'

'Nay, not so, great king! Good and evil have not the same result. Devadatta was opposed by everybody. No one was hostile to the Bodisat. And the hostility which Devadatta felt towards the Bodisat, that came to maturity and bore fruit in each successive birth. And so also as Devadatta, when he was established in lordship over the world, [204] was a protection to the poor, put up bridges and courts of justice and rest-houses for the people, and gave gifts according to his bent to Samānas and Brahmans, to the poor and needy and the way-farers, it was by the result of that conduct that, from existence to existence, he came into the enjoyment of so much prosperity. For of whom, O king, can it be said that without generosity and self-restraint, without self-control and the observance of the Upasatha¹, he can reach prosperity?

'And when, O king, you say that Devadatta and the Bodisat accompanied one another in the passage from birth to birth, that meeting together of theirs took place not only at the end of a hundred, or a thousand, or a hundred thousand births, but was in fact constantly and frequently taking place through an immeasurable period of time². For you should regard that matter in the light of the comparison drawn by the Blessed One between the case of the purblind tortoise and the attainment of the condition of a human being. And it was not only with Devadatta that such union took place. Sâriputta the Elder also, O king, was through thousands of births the father, or the grandfather, or the uncle ¹, or the brother, or the son, or the nephew, or the friend of the Bodisat; and the Bodisat was the father, or the grandfather, or the uncle, or the brother, or the son, or the nephew, or the friend of Sâriputta the Elder.

¹ The Buddhist Sabbath, on which see my 'Manual of Buddhism,' pp. 139-141.

² So also above, IV, 2, 64, and IV, 3, 28.

‘All beings in fact, O king, who, in various forms as creatures, are carried down the stream of transmigration, meet, as they are whirled along in it, both with pleasant companions and with disagreeable ones—just as water whirled along in a stream meets with pure and impure substances, with the beautiful and with the ugly.

‘And when, O king, Devadatta as the god, had been himself Unrighteous, and had led others into unrighteousness of life, he was burnt in purgatory for an immeasurable period of time ². [205] But the Bodisat, who, as the god, had been himself Righteous, and had led others into righteousness of life, lived in all the bliss of heaven for a like immeasurable period of time. And whilst in this life, Devadatta, who had plotted injury against the Buddha, and had created a schism in the Order, was swallowed up by the earth, the Tathâgata,

¹ That is ‘father’s younger brother.’ The Pâli has no word for uncle generally, the whole scheme of relationship being different from ours, and the various sorts of uncles having, in the Pâli scheme, different and distinct names.

² ‘Fifty-seven koṭis and sixty hundreds of thousands of years,’ says the text, with touching accuracy.

knowing all that can be known, arrived at the insight of Buddhahood¹, and was completely set free (from the necessity of becoming) by the destruction of all that leads to re-existence.'

'Very good, Nāgasena! That is so, and I accept it as you say².'

[Here ends the dilemma as to Devadatta's superiority to the Bodisat in previous births.]

¹ So Hīnaṣi-kumburē, who takes sabbadhamme as accusative to buggāhitvā, and understands the phrase as above translated.

² This discussion is very interesting, both as a specimen of casuistry, and as an exposition of orthodox Buddhist belief. And it is full of suggestion if taken as a statement of the kind of reason which led the Buddhist editors of the earlier folk-lore to identify Devadatta with the characters referred to by king Milinda. But the facts are that those editors, in using the old stories and legends for their ethical purposes, always identified Devadatta with the cruel person in the story, and paid no heed to the question whether he was superior or not in birth or in the consideration of the world, to the person they identified with the Bodisat. In searching through the four volumes of the published Gātakas, and the proof-sheets of the fifth volume with which Professor Fausbøll has favoured me, for the purpose of tracing the stories referred to by our author, I find that Devadatta appears in sixty-four of them, and that in almost every one of these sixty-four he is either superior in birth, or equal to the character identified with the Bodisat. This is not surprising, for it is not unusually the superiors in birth who are guilty of the kind of cruelty and wickedness which the Buddhist editors would ascribe to Devadatta. So that our author, had he chosen to do so, might have adduced many other instances of a similar kind to those he actually quotes. I add in an appendix the full list of the Devadatta stories in the Gātakas. It is clear our author had before him a version of the Gātaka book slightly different from our own, as will be seen from the cases pointed out in the notes in which, as to names or details, the story known to him differs from the printed text. And also that here (as at III, 6, 2) he would have been able to solve his own dilemma much better if he had known more of the history of those sacred books on the words of which it is based.

[WOMEN'S WILES.]

42. 'Venerable Nāgasena, it has been said by the Blessed One :

"With opportunity, and secrecy,

And the right woo'r, all women will go wrong—

Aye, failing others, with a cripple even¹."

But on the other hand it is said: "Mahosadha's wife, Amarâ, when left behind in the village while her husband was away on a journey, remained alone and in privacy, and regarding her husband as a man would regard his sovran lord, she refused to do wrong, even when tempted with a thousand pieces²." Now if the first of these passages be correct, the second must be wrong; and if the second be right, [206] the first must be wrong. This too is a double-edged problem now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

43. 'It is so said, O king, as you have quoted, touching the conduct of Amarâ, Mahosadha's wife. But the question is would she have done wrong, on receipt of those thousand pieces, with the right man: or would she not have done so, if she had had the opportunity, and the certainty of secrecy, and a suitable wooer? Now, on considering the matter, that lady Amarâ was not certain of any of these things. Through her fear of censure in this world the opportunity seemed to her not fit, and through her fear of the sufferings of purgatory in the next world. And because she knew how bitter is the fruit of wrong-doing, and because she did not wish to lose her loved one, and because of the high esteem in which she held her husband, and because she honoured goodness, and despised ignobleness of life, and because she did not want to break with her customary mode of life—for all these reasons the opportunity seemed to her not fit.

¹ It is not meant that men would not. But that is too clear to be even worthy of mention, whereas with regard to women the question is worth discussion. Our author is mistaken in ascribing this verse to the Buddha. It is only found (as has been pointed out by Mr. Trenckner) in a Gâtaka story, No. 536, and is a specimen, not of Buddhist teaching, but of Indian folk-lore. There is a very similar sentiment in Gâtakâ, No. 62 (vol. i, p. 289).

² This story will be found in the Ummagga Gâtaka, No. 546.

‘And, further, she refused to do wrong because, on consideration, she was not sure of keeping the thing secret from the world. [207] For even could she have kept it secret from men, yet she could not have concealed it from spirits¹—even could she have kept it secret from spirits, yet she could not have concealed it from those recluses who have the power of knowing the thoughts of others—even could she have kept it secret from them, yet she could not have concealed it from those of the gods who can read the hearts of men—even could she have kept it secret from the gods, yet she could not have escaped, herself, from the knowledge of her sin—even could she have remained ignorant of it herself, yet she could not have kept it secret from (the law of the result which follows on) unrighteousness². Such were the various reasons which led her to abstain from doing wrong because she could not be sure of secrecy.

¹ Fairies, nayad, dryads, &c. &c.—not gods.

² Adhammena raho na labheyya. I am in great doubt as to the real meaning of these words, which Hīnaś-kumburê (p. 286) renders merely adharmayen rahasak no labannê. They look very much like a kind of personification of Karma. The phrase is really very parallel to the saying in Numbers xxxii. 23, ‘Be sure your sin will find you out’—namely, in its results—and is as true ethically as it is difficult grammatically.

‘And, further, she refused to do wrong because, on consideration, she found no right wooer. Mahosadha the wise, O king, was endowed with the eight and twenty qualities. And which are those twenty-eight? He was brave, O king, and full of modesty, and ashamed to do wrong, he had many adherents, and many friends, he was forgiving, he was upright in life, he was truthful, he was pure in word, and deed and heart¹, he was free from malice, he was not puffed up, he felt no jealousy², he was full of energy, he strove after all good things³, he was popular with all men, he was generous, he was friendly⁴, he was humble in disposition, he was free from guile, he was free from deceit, he was full of insight, he was of high reputation, he had much knowledge, he sought after the good of those dependent on him, his praise was in all men’s mouths, great was his wealth, and great his fame. Such were the twenty-eight qualities, O king, with which Mahosadha, the wise, was endowed. And it was because she found no wooer like unto him that she did no wrong⁵.’

¹ Soḷeyya-sampanno, which Hīnaśi-kumburē renders suvaḷa guṇayen samanwibawa: that is, ‘compliant, attentive to what is said.’ But I prefer to take the expression in the sense explained at length in Anguttara III, 119. See also Gātaka I, 214; Milinda, p. 115.

² Anusuyyako. See Gātaka II, 192, and Milinda, p. 94.

³ Āyūhako. Hīnaśi-kumburē (p. 286) renders this word, which is only found here, by Dhana piri rōs kirim cettēya, ‘one who has heaped up goods and men.’ But see Milinda, p. 181, and Dr. Morris in the Pāli Text Society’s Journals for 1885 and 1886.

⁴ Sakhilo, ‘kindly in speech,’ says the Simhalese.

⁵ This is all very well, but it does not confirm, it explains away, the supposed quotation from the Buddha’s words.

‘Very good, Nāgasena! That is so, and I accept it as you say.’

[Here ends the dilemma as to the wickedness of women¹.]

[ON THE FEARLESSNESS OF THE ARAHATS.]

44. ‘Venerable Nāgasena, it was said by the Blessed One: “The Arahats have laid aside all fear and trembling².” But on the other hand when, in the city of Rāgagaha, they saw Dhana-pālaka, the man-slaying elephant, bearing down upon the Blessed

¹ The position of women in India, at the time when Buddhism arose, was, theoretically, very low. The folk tales are full of stories turning on the wiles of women, and the Hindoo law-books seem never tired of the theme of her uncleanness, her weakness, and her wickedness. But, except in matters of property, the bark was I think worse than the bite. Among the people, in the homes of the peasantry, the philippics of the Brahmin priests were not much regarded, and the women led lives as pleasant as those of their male relations, and shared in such mental and physical advantages as their male relations enjoyed. The influence of Buddhism must have been felt in two directions. In the first place the importance attached to the celibate life must have encouraged the kind of view taken of women among Catholics in mediæval times (the Brahmin view being much akin to those that were promulgated by Luther). On the other hand the fact that women were admitted to the Order, and that the still higher aim of Arahatship was held to be attainable by them, must have helped to encourage a high esteem for women. We have many instances of women who were credited with the insight of Arahatship. A whole treatise in the Buddhist sacred books, the Theri Gāthā, is devoted to hymns and poems ascribed to them, and many of these reach a very high level of intelligent and spiritual emotion.

² I do not know the exact passage referred to, but there are many of similar tendency in the sacred books. See, for instance, Dhammapada, verses 39, 188, 214, 351, and 385; and Sutta Nipāta, verses 15, 70, 212, 621, and 965.

One, all the five hundred Arahats forsook the Conqueror and fled, one only excepted, Ānanda the Elder¹. Now how was it, Nāgasena? Did those Arahats run away from fear—or did they run away willing to let the Blessed One be destroyed, and thinking: “(Our conduct) will be clear (to him) from the way in which he himself will act²,” [208] or did they run away with the hope of watching the immense and unequalled mighty power which the Tathāgata would exhibit? If, Nāgasena, what the ¹ Here again we have a variation between our author's words and those of the Piṭakas. In the Kullavagga VII, 3, 11, 12 (translated in pp. 247–250 of vol. iii of the ‘Vinaya Texts’ in the ‘Sacred Books of the East’), we have the oldest versions of this story; and there the elephant is called, not Dhana-pālaka, but Nālāgiri, and the number of attendant disciples (who are not called Arahats) is not given as five hundred. The Buddha is simply said to have entered Rāgagaha ‘with a number of Bhikkhus.’ Nothing also is said, either of their running away, or of Ānanda's remaining behind. It is, no doubt, an easily explicable and very pretty alteration of the story, which exhibits Ānanda, the beloved disciple, as acting in this way. But it is none the less an alteration.

It should be added that Nālāgiri (it should be Nālāgiri) in the Vinaya text is a personal name of the elephant, but may be derived from its place of origin. (See the references to a famous elephant named Na/āgiri in the Megha Dūta and Naḍāgiri in the Kathā Sarit Sāgara XI, 42, XII, 10, XIII, 7, 29. But Pāṇini VI, 3, 117, gives the latter as the name of a mountain.) So while there may be a variation in the legend, it may also be that we have only two names for the same elephant, just as one might speak of the Shetland pony (named) Brownie. And the stanza quoted below (p. 410 of the Pāli text) shows that the name Dhana-pālaka was given already in older texts to the Nālāgiri elephant.

² Paññāyissati sakena kammena, ‘It will be plain to the Buddha (that is, he will be able to judge of our motives) from his own kindness and goodness,’ according to the Sinhalese (p. 287). But the expression is a very strange one, and perhaps, after all, it merely means, ‘The matter will turn out according to his Karma.’

Blessed One said as to the Arahats being devoid of fear be true, then this story must be false. But if the story be true, then the statement that the Arahats have put away fear and trembling must be false. This too is a double-edged problem now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

45. 'The Blessed One did say, O king, that Arahats have put away all fear and trembling, and five hundred Arahats, save only Ānanda, did, as you say, run away when the elephant Dhana-pālaka bore down upon the Tathâgata that day in Râga-gaha. But that was neither out of fear, nor from willingness to let the Blessed One be destroyed. For the cause by which Arahats could be made to fear or tremble has been destroyed in them, and therefore are they free from fear or trembling. Is the broad earth, O king, afraid at people digging into it, or breaking it up, or at having to bear the weight of the mighty oceans and the peaked mountain ranges?'

'Certainly not, Sir.'

'But why not?'

'Because there is no cause in the broad earth which could produce fear or trembling.'

'Just so, O king. And neither is there any such cause in Arahats. And would a mountain peak be afraid of being split up, or broken down, or made to fall, or burnt with fire?'

'Certainly not, Sir.'

'But why not?' [209]

'The cause of fear or trembling does not exist within it.'

'And just so, O king, with Arahats. If all the creatures of various outward form in the whole universe¹ were, together, to attack one Arahāt in order to put him to fear, yet would they bring about no variation in his heart. And why? Because there is neither condition nor cause for fear (in him, whence fear could arise). Rather, O king, was it these considerations that arose in the minds of those Arahats: "To-day when the best of the best of men, the hero among conquerors, has entered into the famous city, Dhana-pālaka the elephant will rush down the street. But to a certainty the brother who is his special attendant will not forsake him who is above the god of gods. But if we should not go away, then neither will the goodness of Ānanda be made manifest, nor will the elephant actually approach² the Tathāgata. Let us then withdraw. Thus will great masses of the people attain to emancipation from the bonds of evil, and the goodness of Ānanda be made manifest." It was on the realisation of the fact that those advantages would arise from their doing so, that the Arahats withdrew to every side.'

'Well, Nāgasena, have you solved the puzzle. That is so. The Arahats feared not, nor did they tremble. But for the advantages that they foresaw they withdrew on every side.'

[Here ends the problem as to the panic of the Arahats.]

¹ Literally, 'In the hundreds of thousands of world systems.'

² A//hānam-anavakāsataya, 'Because of the absence of condition and opportunity.'

[ON CAUSING THE OMNISCIENT ONE TO CHANGE HIS MIND.]

46. 'Venerable Nâgasena, your people say that the Tathâgata is all wise¹. And on the other hand they say: "When the company of the members of the Order presided over by Sâriputta and Moggallâna had been dismissed by the Blessed One², then the Sâkyas of Kâtumâ and Brahmâ Sabanipati, by means of the parables of the seed and of the calf, gained the Buddha over, and obtained his forgiveness, and made him see the thing in the right light³." Now how was that, Nâgasena? Were those two parables unknown to him that he should be [210] appeased and gained over to their side, and brought to see the matter in a new light? But if he did not already know them, then, Nâgasena, he was not all-wise. If he did know them, then he must have dismissed those brethren rudely and violently⁴ in order to try them; and therein is his unkindness made manifest. This too is a double-edged problem now put to you, and you have to solve it.'

47. 'The Tathâgata, O king, was all-wise, and yet, pleased at those parables, he was gained over by them, he granted pardon to the brethren he had sent

¹ This question is also discussed above, III, 6, 2.

² This episode has already been referred to above, and will be found set out in full in the Kâtumâ Sutta, No. 67, in the Magghima Nikâya (pp. 456-462 of Mr. Trenckner's edition for the Pâli Text Society).

³ Nigghattam akamsu. Compare Gâtaka, vol. i, p. 495.

⁴ Okassa pasayha, which the Simhalese (p. 289) renders âkaddhanaya ko'a abhibhavanaya karanâ. See Dr. Morris in the 'Journal of the Pâli Text Society,' 1887, p. 148.

away, and he saw the matter in the light (in which the intercessors on their behalf wished him to see it). For the Tathâgata, O king, is lord of the Scriptures. It was with parables that had been first preached by the Tathâgata himself¹ that they conciliated him, pleased him, gained him over, and it was on being thus gained over that he signified his approval (of what they had said). It was, O king, as when a wife conciliates, and pleases, and gains over her husband by means of things that belong to the husband himself; and the husband signifies his approval thereof. Or it was, O king, as when the royal barber conciliates and pleases and gains over the king when he dresses the king's head with the golden comb² which belongs to the king himself, and the king then signifies his approval thereof. Or it was, O king, as when an attendant novice, when he serves his teacher with the food given in alms which his teacher has himself brought home, conciliates him and pleases him and gains him over, and the teacher then signifies his approval thereof.'

'Very good, Nâgasena! That is so, and I accept it as you say.'

[Here ends the problem as to the all-wise Buddha being gained over by intercession³.]

Here ends the Fourth Chapter.

¹ This is quite correct. They are in the fourth book of the Ânguttara Sutta, No. 13.

² Panaka, a word only found in this passage. Hînafi-kumburê (p. 280 at the end) renders it ran panâwen.

³ Other cruxes arising out of the dogma of the Buddha's omniscience are discussed above, III, 6, 2.

APPENDIX.

DEVADATTA IN THE GĀTAKAS.

No. of Gātaka.	Character filled by Devadatta.	Character filled by the Bodisat.
1	Merchant	Merchant
3	"	"
11	Deer (Kāḷa)	His father
12	Deer (Sākha)	Deer (Nigrodha)
20	Water sprite	Monkey
21	Hunter	Kurunga deer
33	Quail	Quail
51	Minister	King
57	Crocodile	Monkey king
58	Monkey king	His son
72	Woodman	Elephant
73	King	King
113	Jackal	Tree god
122	King	Elephant
131	Piliya	Samkha
139	Fisherman	Tree god
141	Chameleon	Iguana
142	Drunkard	Jackal
143	Jackal	Lion
160	Vinḷaka (a crow)	King of Videha
168	Hawk	Quail
174	Monkey	Brahman
184	Groom	Minister
193	Cripple	King Paduma
194	King	Countryman
204	Crow	Crow
206	Hunter	Kurunga deer
208	Crocodile	Monkey
210	Bird	Bird
220	Unjust judge	Just judge
221	Hunter	Elephant
222	"	Nandiya (monkey king)
231	Elephant trainer	Elephant trainer

240	King Pingala	Prince
241	Jackal	Minister
243	Musician	Musician
277	Ascetic	Pigeon
294	Jackal	Tree god
295	"	" "
303	Lion	Bird
313	King Kalābu	Kundaka (a brahman)
326	Brahman	God
329	Kālabāhu (a woodman)	Parrot
335	Jackal	Lion
342	Crocodile	Monkey
353	Pingiya (a purohit)	Teacher
357	Mad elephant	Elephant king
358	King Patāpa	His son
367	Doctor	Hag
389	Crow	Brahman
397	Jackal	Lion
404	Monkey king	Monkey king
416	King of Benares	His son
422	King of Ketiya	Brahman
438	Ascetic	Partridge
445	Sākha (a minister)	Nigrodha (a king)
448	Hawk	Cock
457	Adhamma (a god)	Dhamma (a god)
466	Carpenter	Carpenter
472	King of Benares	Prince Paduma
482	Man	Ruru deer
503	Thief	Parrot
505	Ascetic	Prince Somanassa
506	Snake charmer	Snake king

64 in all.

Professor Fausbøll has kindly allowed me to look at the advance sheets of his fifth volume, so that the above list is complete down to No. 513. There may be a few more instances in the remaining 37 Gātakas not yet printed.

ADDENDA ET CORRIGENDA.

Page xiii. Srī-wardhana-pura. It should have been pointed out that this city is not (as stated by Emerson Tennant at vol. i, p. 414 of his 'Ceylon') the same as the modern town of Kandy, but was in the Kurunægalla district, and (as pointed out by Mr. K. James Pohath in the 'Ceylon Orientalist,' vol. iii, p. 218) about three and a half miles distant from the modern Damba-deniya.

P. 2, note 2. Mr. Trenckner in his 'Pāli Miscellany' (London, 1879) has translated and annotated the whole of Book I, that is, to the end of p. 39 of this translation.

P. 6, line 1, read 'to Tissa the Elder, the son of Moggali.'

P. 10, note 1. It is strange that when it occurred to me that §§ 10-14 are an early interpolation I failed to notice the most important, and indeed almost conclusive argument for my suggestion. It is this, that the closing words of § 14 are really in complete contradiction to the opening words, and that they look very much as if they had been inserted, after the interpolation, to meet the objection to it which would at once arise from the expression in § 16, that the venerable Assagutta 'heard those words of King Milinda.' As it originally stood the words he heard were those of § 10. After the interpolation these words had to be reinserted at the end of § 14, in spite of their being in contradiction to the context.

Pp. 14 foll., for 'Rohana' read 'Rohana.'

Pp. 15, 16. This whole episode as to the charge of lying is repeated by Buddhaghosa (in the Introduction to his Samanta Pāsādikā, p. 296 of vol. iii of Oldenberg's Vinaya), but as having happened to Siggava in connection with the birth of Moggali-putta Tissa. A modern author would be expected to mention his source, but Buddhaghosa makes no reference whatever to the Milinda. Perhaps the episode is common stock of Buddhist legend, and we shall find it elsewhere.

P. 32, line 1, add after 'Quietism' 'and the discourse on losses (Parābhava Suttanta).' [See p. xxix, where the reference is supplied.]

P. 53. 'Virtue's the base.' It should have been pointed out that this is the celebrated verse given by the Ceylon scholars to Buddhaghosa as the theme of the test essay he was to write as a proof of his fitness. If he succeeded in the essay they would then entrust him with all their traditions for him to recast in Pāli. The 'Path of Purity,' which opens with this verse, was the result.

P. 185, § 49. On the question discussed in this section the curious may compare what is said by Sir Thomas Brown in his 'Enquiries into Vulgar and Common Errors,' Book VII, Chapter xvi (p. 304 of the London edition of 1686). He gives several instances of supposed cases of conception without sexual connection mentioned in western writers, and comes to the conclusion, apropos of the supposed generation of the magician Merlin by Satan, that 'generations by the devil are very improbable.'

I had desired to dedicate this translation of the Milinda to Mr. Trenckner, to whose self-denying labours, spread over many years, we owe the edition of the Pāli text on which the translation is based, and without which the translation would not have been attempted. But I am now informed that any dedication of a single volume in the series of the 'Sacred Books of the East' is not allowable, as it would conflict with the dedication of the entire series. Had I known this when the Introduction was being written, a more suitable acknowledgment of the debt due to Mr. Trenckner than the few words on page xv, would have been made at the close of the Introductory remarks. I am permitted therefore to add here what was intended to appear in the dedication as an expression of the gratitude which all interested in historical research must feel to a scholar who has devoted years of labour, and of labour rendered valuable by the highest training and critical scholarship, to a field of enquiry in which the only fruit to be gathered is knowledge.

INDEX OF PROPER NAMES.

- Abhidharma Kośa Vyākhyâ, quoted, page xxvi.
- Agathokles, king of Baktria, xxii.
- Agita, the teacher, 8, 41.
- Ākesines, the river, xlv.
- Āiravatî, the river, xlv, 171.
- Ālakamandâ, city of the gods, 3.
- Alasanda (Alexandria), on the Indus, xxiii, 127.
- Amarâ, Mahosadha's wife, 294.
- Amara-sekara, Mr. C. A. M., xii.
- Amara-sekara, Mr. N. M., xii.
- Ānanda, the teacher, 163, 191, 257.
- Anantakâya, attendant on Menander, probably = Antiochos, xix, xlii, 48.
- Anuruddha, the Sâkyan, 163.
- Apollodotus, king of Baktria, xix, xlii.
- Archebios, king of Baktria, xxii.
- Ariano-pâli, legends on coins, xxi.
- Āsâlba, a month, 171.
- Asiknî, the river, xlv.
- Asipâsâ, a caste, xlv.
- Asoka, emperor of India, xxxvii, xlii, 182.
- Asokârâma, near Patna, xliii, 26.
- Assagutta of the Vattaniya hermitage, xxv, xliii.
- Āsvagupta, not the same as last, xxv.
- Ātibissara, = Devadatta, 167.
- Aviki, purgatory, xl, 9.
- Āyupâla, of the Sâṅkheyya hermitage, a Buddhist teacher, xxv, xliii, 30 foll.
- Barygaza, in Gujarat, xx.
- Benares, 31.
- Benfey, Professor, quoted, xxvi.
- Bhaddasâla, the general, xliii, 292.
- Bhaddi-(or Bhāsi-)puttâ, a caste, xlv.
- Bhaddiya, the Sâkyan, 163.
- Bhagu, the Sâkyan, 163.
- Bharukakka, men of, xliii, 331.
- Bindumati, a courtesan, xliii, 182.
- Bird, Major, quoted, xxvi.
- Brahmâ, the god, 118, 301.
- Brahma-world, heaven, 126.
- Buddhaghosa's 'Path of Purity,' xi, 306; his quotations of the Milinda, xiv-xvii.
- Budh Gâyâ, in Behar, 9.
- Burgess, Dr., quoted, xxvi.
- Burmese translations of the 'Questions of Milinda,' xi, xvi.
- Burnouf, quoted, xxvi.
- Bu-ston, a Tibetan work, quoted, xxvi.
- Ceylon, xi, xiv; its literature, xiii.
- Childers, Professor, quoted, xlv, 185, 230, 244.
- Cunningham, General, quoted, xi.
- Dâgabas, sepulchral heaps, xx.
- Dânava, Titan, 216.
- Daramisipola, a Ceylon scholar, xiii.
- Devadatta, the heresiarch, 153, 163 foll., 193, 249, 282 foll., 303.
- Devamantiya, = Demetrios, xix, xliii, 22, 24, 37, 47.
- Dhamma-kitti, author of the Saddhamma Saṅgaha, xxvii.
- Dhammakkhanda. See Madhurasatora.
- Dhammapâla, quoted, 244.
1. Dhamma-rakkhita. See Daramisipola.
2. Dhamma-rakkhita, one of Nâgasena's teachers, xxv, xliii, 16, 18.
- Dhana-phâlaka, elephant, 297.
- Dinna, attendant on king Milinda, 87.
- Divyâvadâna, quoted, xxv.
- Ekasâraka, a Brahman, 172.
- Elijah, his 'Act of Truth,' 185.
- Eukratides, king of Baktria, xxiii.
- Fâ-Hien, the traveller, 248.
- Fausböll, Professor, quoted, 244, 253.

- Gandhâra, the country, xliii, 327, 331.
 Gangâ, the Ganges river, xlv, 5, 171, 182.
 Gardiner, Professor, quoted, xxi.
 Garuḍas, snake-eating birds, 38, 175.
 Gopâla-mâtâ, queen, 172.
 Guṇânanda. See Mohorri-watte.
 Guttila, musician, 172.
- Hardy, Rev. R. Spence, quoted, xxvi, 40, 61, 64, 77.
 Himâlayas, mountains, 11, 171, 278.
 Hînarî-kumburê Sumaṅgala, translates the Milinda into Siṃha-lese, xii, xiii.
 Hydaspes, the river Bihat, xlv.
 Hypanis (the Sutelj), xix.
- Indra, the god, 37.
 Indus, river, 171.
 Isamos (the Jumna), xix.
 Itihâsas, 6, 247.
- Jains, their founder, 8.
 Jâli, Vessantara's son, 174.
 Jumna, river. See Isamos, Yamunâ.
 Justin, quoted, xix.
- Kâbul, Menander's coins found there, xx.
 Kadphises, a coin of his referred to, xxii.
 Kaṅgaṅala, in the Terai, 14, 18.
 Kâlâbu, king, 286.
 Kalanda, a clan, 238.
 Kalasi, a town on an island in the Indus, xxiii, xliii, 83, 127.
 Kali-devatâ, a sect so called, xlv.
 Kandabhâgâ, the river, xlv, 171.
 Kandaḡutta, king, xliii, 292.
 Kârambhiya, ascetic, 287.
 Karisi. See Kalasi.
 Kashmîr, Menander's coins found there, xx, xliii, 82.
 Kassapa, the Buddha, 4, 173.
 Kathâ Sarit Sâgara, quoted, 298.
 Kâtumâ, a Sâkyan town, 257, 301.
 Kern, Professor, quoted, xxvi.
 Ketumatî, a mansion in heaven, 11.
 Khugguttarâ, 122.
 Kimbila, the Sâkyan, 163.
 Kina, perhaps China, xliii, 121, 327, 331, 359.
 Kîñḍî, a Brahman woman, 153.
- Kirtti Sṛî Râga-simha, king of Ceylon, xii, xiii.
 Kola-parrana, seaport, xliii, 359.
 Kolumbara, its stuffs, 3.
 Kumâra Kassapa, 275.
 Kunda, the coppersmith, 242.
 Kuvera, the god, 37.
- Lassen, Professor, quoted, xlv.
 Legge, Professor, his version of Fâ-Hien, 248.
 Liwera, Mr. A., xiii.
 Lokâyatas, a sect so called, 7.
- Maddî, wife to Vessantara, 174.
 Madhura, the city, xliii, 331.
 Madhurasat-tora, a Buddhist scholar, xiii.
 Mahâ-bhârata, called an Itihâsa, 247.
 Mahâsena, a god, 11.
 Mahî, the river, xlv, 171.
 Mahosadha and his wife, 294.
 Makkhali (of the cowshed), 8.
 Mallikâ, queen, 172.
 Mâlunkya-putta, 204 foll.
 Manibhaddâ, a caste so called, xlvi, 191.
 Mañkura, attendant on Menander, xx, 29, 30, 48.
 Mandhâtâ, king, 172.
 Manoratha Pîrasa, quoted, xiv.
 Mâra, the Evil One, 219.
 Masâra, mountain, 177.
 Mathurâ, Menander's coins found there, xx.
 Megha Dûta, quoted, 298.
 Menander-Milinda, identity of the names, xviii; notices of in classical writers, xix; coins of, xx-xxii; date and birthplace of, xxiii; his conversion to Buddhism, xxv-xxvii.
- Mendis, Mr. L., xiii.
 Milinda, the Questions of, in Ceylon, xii, xiii; in Buddhaghosa, xiv-xvi; MSS. of, xvii; is a religious romance, xvii; the charm of its style, xviii.
 Milinda Prashnaya, xii.
 Moggallâna, his death, 261 foll.
 Mohorri-watte Guṇânanda, a Buddhist scholar, xii.
 Morris, the Rev. Dr., quoted, xiv, xv, 46, 65, 174, 278, 301.

- Müller, Prof. Ed., quoted, xlv, 179, 240.
- Nāgarguna, founder of the Mahāyāna school, xxv; identified wrongly with Nāgasena, xxvi.
- Nāgasena, xxv, xxvi, and passim.
- Nāgesa, epithet of Patañjali, xxvi.
- Nāgiri, elephant and mountain, 298.
- Nanda, the Brahman, 153.
- Nandaka, an ogre, 153.
- Nandiya, monkey king, 287.
- Nesāda, outcasts, 286.
- Nigantha Nāta-putta, founder of the Jain sect, 8.
- Nikumba, the country, xliii, 327.
- Nimi, king, 172.
- Nyāya philosophy, 6.
- Pabbatā, a caste so called, xlvii, 191.
- Pāṭittiya rules, xli.
- Pakudha Kakāyana, the teacher, 8, 42.
- Pāli Text Society, xxv, xxvii, xl, xlv, 46, 65.
- Pāṇini, quoted, 298.
- Papañka Sūdani, quoted, xv.
- Pāragika offences, xli.
- Pāraliputta, the modern Patna, 26, 182.
- Patañjali, not the same as Nāgasena, xxvi.
- Pātimokkha, xli.
- Pātimokkha, recitation of, 264 foll.
- Pāyāsi the Rāganya, 275.
- Phanin, epithet of Patañjali, xxvi.
- Piliyakkha, king, 280.
- Piris, Mr. K., xii.
- Plutarch, quoted, xix, xxii.
- Pragāpati, the god, 37.
- Punnā, slave girl, 172.
- Punna, a servant, 172.
- Pūrāna Kassapa, the teacher, 8, 9, 41.
- Purānas, 6, 247.
- Rāgagaha, 191, 298; council held at, 242.
- Rāhula, son of the Buddha, 32.
- Rakkhita-tala, in the Himālayas, xliii, 6, 12, 18.
- Rāmāyana, called an Itihāsa, 247.
- Roga, the Mallian, 282.
1. Rohana, a Buddhist teacher mentioned in the Ānguttara, xxv.
2. Rohana, Nāgasena's teacher, xxv, xliii.
- Sabba-dinna, attendant on Menander, xix, xliii, 20, 47, 56.
- Saddhamma Saṃgaha, a Pāli historical work, xxvii.
- Sādhina, king, 172.
- Sāgala, capital of Baktria, xviii, xliii, 2, 23.
- Saka, a country, xliii, 327, 331.
- Sākha, general, 291.
- Sakka, king of the gods, 12.
- Sākyan, member of the clan, 153.
- Sallet, Alfred von, quoted, xxi.
- Sāma, prince, 280 foll., 288.
- Saṅgaya, the teacher, 8.
- Saṅkheyya, a hermitage, xliii, 17, 22.
- Sāṅkhyā philosophy, 6.
- Santushita, a god, 37.
- Sarabhū, the river, xlv, 171.
- Sarasaṅkara. See Wēliwira.
- Sarassatī, the river, xlv, 171.
- Savara, city of the Kāṇḍālas, 267.
- Schiefner, Prof., quoted, xxvi.
- Siamese translations, &c., of the 'Questions of Milinda,' xi, xvi, xvii, xxiv.
- Sindhu, the Indus river, xlv.
- Sineru, king of mountains, 152, 176.
- Sivaka, 195.
- Sivi, king, 179.
1. Sonuttara, a Brahman, xliii, 14.
2. Sonuttara, an outcast, 286.
- Srī-wardhana-pura, a city in Ceylon, xliii, 305.
- Sthūpas. See Dāgabas.
- Strabo, quoted, xix.
- Strato, king of Baktria, xxii.
- Subhadda, recluse, 186.
- Sudinna, of the Kalanda clan, 238.
- Sumana, garland maker, 172.
- Sumaṅgala Vīlāsini, quoted, xiv, xv, 131, 263.
- Suppabuddha, a Sākyan, 153.
- Suppiyā, devotee, 172.
- Suratba, Surat, xliii, 331, 359.
- Sutta Nipāta, xlii.
- Suvanna-bhūmi, the country, xliii, 359.
- Suyāma, a god, 37.
- Sy-Hermaios, king of Baktria, xxii.
- Takkola, the place, xliii, xlv, 359.
- Theosophists, sect of, 268.

- Tissa, son of Moggallî, 6.
 Tissa-thera, a writer, xliii, 71.
 Trenckner, Mr., xv-xix, xxiv, xxxi, 25, 28, 32, 49, 80, 175, 179, 294, 306.
 Tusita heaven, 271.
 Ūhâ, a river, xliii, 70.
 Upâli, the barber, 163.
 Uposatha Ârâma, in Ceylon, xliii.
 Uttarakuru, 3.
 Val̥eshika philosophy, 6.
 Vaṅga, Bengal, xliii, 359.
 Varuṇa, the god, 37.
 Vattaniya, a hermitage, xliii, 10-16.
 Vedas, the four, 6, 247; the three, 17, 34.
 Vegayanta, palace of the gods, 11.
 Vessantara, the king, 170 foll.
 Vessavana, king of the fairies, 38.
 Vetravatî, the river, xliv, 171.
 Vidhura, sage, 288.
 Vigamba-vatthu, a hermitage, xliii, 12.
 Vilâta, a country, xliii, 327, 331.
 Vitamsâ, the river, xliv, 171.
 Vitandas, a sect so called, 7.
 Weber, Prof., quoted, xxv.
 Wenzel, Dr., quoted, xxv, xxvi.
 Wilson, H. H., quoted, xxi.
 Wœliwira Saranaṅkara, a Buddhist scholar, xii, xiii.
 Yakkha, ogre, 38, 176.
 Yâma, the god, 37.
 Yamunâ, the Jumna river, xliv, 171.
 Yavana, Bactria, xliii, 327, 331.
 Yoga philosophy, 6.
 Yonakas, the Greeks (Ionians) attendant on Menander, xix, xlii, 1, 4, 20, 68.
 Yugandhara, a peak of the Himâlayas, 12.
 Zoilos, king of Bactria, xxii.

INDEX OF SUBJECTS.

- Acrobats, page 53.
 'Act of Truth,' 180 foll.
 Alkaline wash, in medicine, 168.
 Alms, customs of the Buddhist Order in regard to, 14-16, 20.
 Alms-halls, 2. See Rest-houses.
 Altruism, Buddhist, 174.
 Ambrosia, 35, 236.
 Animals, their reasoning powers, 51.
 Arahat, the great, is Buddha, 8; others, 11, 12; their knowledge of others' thoughts, 18, 23; nature of their wisdom, 29; does not fear death, 70; description of, 157; have no fear, 206 foll., 297 foll.
 Arahatship, above ordinary morality, 25; its seven conditions, 52, 58; the highest of all lands, 227.
 Architects, 2, 53.
 Arithmetic, 6, 91.
 Army, its four divisions, 7, 54, 60, 62.
 Arts and sciences, the nineteen, &c., 6.
 Aspiration of reward, on doing a good act, 5; duty of, 55.
 Association of ideas, 89-92.
 Assurance of salvation, the Arahat's final, 65.
 Astrologer, the royal, 31, 247.
 Astronomy, 6.
 Atonement, 14.
 Baby, is it the same as the grown man? 63.
 Bambû, simile of the giant-, 155 foll.; dies in reproduction, 236.
 Barber, 19, 302.
 Barley reapers, simile of, 51.
 Bathing places, public, 140.
 Becoming, 83; sorrow of, 149; freedom from, 293.
 Boat, similes of, 124, 227.
 Body, the thirty-two parts of the human, 42; the love of the, 114; bodily marks, the, 32, 117, 237; made of four elements, 194.
 Bones, hundred leagues long, 130.
 Book, 123; of the law, 262.
 Brahman, works in the fields, 15; duties of a, 247.
 Brand marks, on cattle, 122.
 Breath, no soul in the, 48.
 Bridges, 140, 272, 291.
 Brooms, 4.
 Buddha, the, is incomparable, 108; is not still alive, 144 foll.; gifts to, 144 foll.; distinction between Paññaka- and Perfect-Buddhas, 158; the best of men, 178; sinlessness of, 191.
 Burning glass, 85.
 Calf, similes of, 282, 301.
 Carpenter, simile of, 236.
 Carriages, 3, 91.
 Carter, should test a ford, 272.
 Casuists, 7; casuistry no branch of education, 17.
 Cat's eye, the gem, 177.
 Cattle, brand marks on, 122.
 Cauterising a wound, 168, 211.
 Ceremonies, observed by kings on visiting Samanas, 30, 31, 37, 49.
 Character, of the ideally good layman, 296.
 Chariot, simile of, 43; parts of, 44.
 Charms, intoning of, 181.
 City, description of a wealthy, 2; foundation of, 53; with one gateway, simile of, 90.
 Clocks, want of, 7.
 Clod, thrown in the air, simile of, 194.
 Cloth goods, 3.
 Combs for the hair, 19.
 Comets, 247.
 'Confections,' 42, 83, 205, 207.
 Contact, 92.
 Conversion, what it consists in, 25.
 Conveyancing, as an art, 6.
 Copper ware, 3, 96.

- Cotton stuffs, 159.
 Counting. See Arithmetic; by the finger-joints, 91.
 Courtesan, story of, 183 foll.
 Courts of justice, 291.
 Criminal, the condemned, similes of, 165-6, 211.
 Crops, estimation of growing, 91.
 Cymbals, simile of, 93.
 Dacoits, 33.
 Dart, simile of the perfect, 159.
 Dead body, always cast up by the sea, 259.
 Death, the fear of, 206-212, 278, 279.
 Death of the Buddha, the legend of, explained, 242 foll.
 Delusion of self, 207, 226.
 Dependents, kindness to, 138.
 Dice-playing, 103.
 Digestion, 193, 236.
 Diseases, ninety-eight kinds of, 152; caused in ten ways (one of which is medical treatment), 192; cured by Pirit, 225.
 Divination, practised by Brahmans, 247.
 'Divine Ear,' the, 11.
 'Divine Eye,' the, 26, 179.
 Divining other people's thoughts, 18, 23.
 Dreams, interpretation of, 247.
 Drugs, five kinds of, 69.
 Drum, simile of, 149.
 Dryads, 242.
 Ear, the divine, 11.
 Earth, the broad, similes of, 52, 150, 194, 258, 299.
 Earthquakes, 170 foll.
 Eclipses, 247.
 Education, 17, 50, 63.
 Egoism, delusion of, 207, 226.
 Elements, the four, 194.
 Elephants, 3, 38, 126, 211, 267, 272.
 Embroidery, 134.
 Embryo, four stages of the, 63, 105.
 Esoteric teaching, none in Buddhism, 138, 142, 267.
 Estimating growing crops, 91.
 Eunuchs, cannot keep a secret, 141.
 Evil, origin of. See Pain. Conquest of, by good, 174.
 Excitement, condemned, 143.
 Exorcism, 38.
 Eye, the Divine, 26.
 'Eye of the Truth,' 25.
 Fairies, 38.
 Faith, 52, 56.
 Fans, 148.
 Finger-joints, used to count with, 91.
 Fire, similes of, 73, 146, 188, 234, 244.
 Fire-extinguishing apparatus, 68.
 Fire-stick apparatus, 85.
 Flame, simile of, 64.
 Flavours, the six, 88.
 Flood, simile of, 2, 56.
 Floor coverings, 267.
 Food, Indian idea of, 26.
 Fossil bones, 130.
 Future life, the craving after, condemned, 174, 200.
 Garlands, habit of wearing, 19.
 Gayal, kind of buffalo, 211.
 Gems, various kinds of, 177.
 Generosity, the mighty power of, 173-5.
 Gestation, period of, is ten months, 16.
 Ghee, 65, 75, 161, 249.
 Gold and silver, 3, 59, 267.
 Grammar, 17.
 Granary, 65, 161.
 Guilds of traders, 3.
 Hair, the sixteen impediments of wearing, 19; hair-dyeing and shampooing, &c., ibid.
 Head-splitting, belief as to, 222.
 Heads of houses, 209.
 Health and wealth, explained, 97.
 Hell, none in Buddhism. See Purgatory.
 Hen and eggs, similes of, 76, 77, 80.
 Highwaymen, 32, 222.
 Honey, the man in the trough of, 88; the drink of, 95; slips through the fingers, 249.
 Horripilation, 38.
 Horses, 3; the swift, simile of, 199.
 House-building, 57, 83; house of life, 207.
 Humours, the three, in medicine, 168, 191.
 Husbandry, 215, 235, 247, 285.
 Iddhi, powers of, 261.
 Ideas, mark of, 94; association of, 89-92.

- Income, simile of, 187.
 Indeterminate questions, 205.
 Individuality, 40-45, 50, 64, 67.
 Indivisibility, denied, 132.
 Insight, the eight causes of its ripening, 141, and see Conversion.
 Intoxicating drinks, 41.
 Investigation, characteristic of, 96;
 why the Buddha investigates, 272.
 Invisible, story of the magician, 217;
 root to make one, 281.
 Iron, 70.

 Jasmine, the chief of flowers, 252.
 Javelins, 69.

 Karma, 3, 12, 18, 32, 41, 71, 80, 103,
 163, 191, 214, 262-4.
 King of kings, the mythical, 162, 177,
 199.
 Kings, their manner of discussing, 46; their tyranny, 50; their greed, 203; they take the best of everything, 267.

 Lamps, 61, 64, 67, 73, 110.
 Lancet, surgeon's, 168-9, 211.
 Law, of property, 247. See Peace, breach of, and Conveyancing, and Punishments, and Book.
 Laymen, includes the gods, 32.
 Learning by heart, 17, 22, 28, 34, 123, 172.
 Letter-writing, 67.
 Leviathan, 187.
 Lexicography, 17.
 Lie, a deliberate, excludes from the Order, 268.
 Lions, 135, 211.
 Log, the dry, simile of, 214.
 Looking-glass, 86, 189.
 Lord of a village, 208.
 Lotions, medicinal, 211, 215.
 Lotus flower, simile of, 117.
 Love to all beings, 138, 279 foll.; of teacher to pupil, 142; duty of, 254.
 Lucky marks, 32, 117, 237, 247.

 Magic, 6, 181, 217.
 Mandolin and its parts, 84.
 Market places, 2, 53.
 Marks on the body, as omens of future greatness, 17.
 Marriage by purchase, 74.

 Medicine, 6, 191, 197, 214. See Physician, Surgery.
 Meditation, 13, 18, 52, 196 foll.
 Memory, 120-122.
 Merchant, should test goods, 272.
 Milk and butter, simile of, 65, 75.
 Mindfulness, 52, 58.
 Minds, seven classes of, 154.
 Ministers of state, the six, 171.
 Miracles at conception of Nāgasena,
 14.
 Money, 17, 59, 134, 267.
 Mules die in giving birth, 236.
 Music, 6.
 Muslim, of Benares, 3.
 Mutilation, of criminals, 63, 166,
 270, 276.

 Name, soul not implied in, 41.
 'Name-and-form,' 71 foll., 77.
 Nirvāṇa, a state of mind to be attained in, and which ends with, this life, 36, 41, 78, 106. See Arahatship.
 Novice, the intractable, 4; Nāga-sena becomes a, 20; his duties as, 24, 302.

 Ocean, taste of, 131, 133; always casts up a dead body, 259.
 Offences, conscious and unconscious,
 224.
 Official gratitude, 76, 93, 197.
 Ogres, 38.
 Oil, for the hair, 19.
 Ointment, for a wound, 168.
 Omens, interpretation of, 247.
 Omniscience of the Buddhas, 117,
 154-162, 271, 301 foll.

 Pain, origin of, 83, 191, 195.
 Paṭṭhaka-Buddhas, 158.
 Peace, breach of the, in law, 239.
 Perception, characteristic of, 95, 132.
 Perseverance, 52.
 Physician, 68, 69, 112, 165, 168,
 211, 40, 272.
 Pilot, should test the shore, 272.
 Pipers, 48.
 Pirit, 213.
 Pledge, deposit of, 123.
 Poison, simile of, 94; antidotes to,
 215; love counteracts, 279.
 Pork, the Buddha's last meal of, 244
 foll.

- Posthumous honours, 144 foll.
 Potter and the pots, simile of, 84.
 Precepts, abolition of the minor, 202.
 Present to a king, simile of, 220.
 Prophecy, 6, 185.
 Punishments, 63, 223, 239, 254, 269.
 Punkahs, 148.
 Pupil, his duty to his teacher, 144.
 Purgatory, 94, 101, 125, 163, 167, 206, 210, 283.
 Purity, the power of, 173.
 Purohita, family chaplain, 282.

 Rain, three seasons of, 171; produced by charms, 181.
 Rain water, similes of, 90, 226, 245, 274, 278.
 Rams, simile of two butting, 92.
 Reasoning contrasted with wisdom, 50.
 Recognition, mark of perception, 132.
 Reflection, characteristic of, 95.
 Re-incarnation, 207, and see next.
 Re-individualisation, 50, 72-75.
 Relationship, scheme of, 292.
 Relics, of the Buddha, 144 foll., 246.
 Renunciation, 31, 49, 98, 251, 271.
 Rest-houses, public, 291.
 Rhinoceros, 38.
 Rice, simile of cartload of, 154; simile of boiling, 176; is the chief of all grains, 252.
 Robber, figuratively, of a bad monk, 256.

 Sandal-wood dust, 29.
 Schism, 163, 227.
 Scholars, their manner of discussing, 46.
 Schooling, 63, and see Education.
 Season, the rainy, 7, 24.
 Secret wisdom, 139.
 Sects, 3, 7, 8, 144, 266.
 Seed-fruit-seed, succession of, 80.
 Seed, simile of, 301.
 Seeds, edible, 161.
 Sensation, results of a, 82, 83, 89, 92; characteristics of, 93; kinds of, 194.
 Shadow of a man, 45; abiding under another's, 137.
 Shampooing the hair, 19.

 Ship, simile of, 227.
 Shops, 2, 3.
 Shrines, god-haunted, 140.
 Sins, the five, 41; will find you out, 295.
 Snake-charmers, 38, 212, 215.
 Snakes, 211.
 Snoring, how to stop, 131.
 Snow, 70.
 Son in the faith, 142.
 Sophists, 7.
 Sorrow, 125, and see Pain.
 Soul, no such thing as, 40-45, 48, 67, 86-89, 111, 132.
 Spells, 6.
 Splinter of rock, incident of, 193 foll., 249 foll.
 State officials, the six, 171.
 Suffering, cause of, see Pain; various kinds of, 275.
 Sugar, 72; sugar mill, 235.
 Suggestion, as source of memory, 121.
 Suicide, 69, 273.
 Surgery, 168.
 Swallowed up by the earth, 152.
 Syrups and sweetmeats, 3.

 Tank, simile of the full, 187.
 Taxation, 208.
 Teacher, his fees, 17, 25; his duties to his pupil, 142.
 Thought-perception, 89.
 Tidal-wave, 276.
 Time, definition of, 77; root of, 79; ultimate point of, 80-82.
 To pay, 177.
 Torture, 239; various kinds of death with, 276, 277.
 Transmigration, 111, 118, 120.
 Travellers, hospitality towards, 161.
 Treasurer, the royal, 59.
 Trees, disciples compared to, 151; simile of the barren, 162; talking trees, dilemma of, 241.
 Trumpeters, 48.
 Truth, is the most minute of all things, 132; its power, 182.
 Turbans, 138.
 Tutor's fees, 17.
 Twirling-stick, 85, 146.

 Uncle, no word for in Pāli, 292.
 Unguents, for the hair, 19.

-
- Vanishing root, 281.
 Village organisation, 208-9.
 Vow, the eightfold, of a layman, 138.
 Waggon, 3, 27; parts of, 44; simile of path of, 91; of load of rice, 154; breaking up of, 173; reckoned among valuable things, 267.
 Wandering teachers, 7, 34.
 Water-clearing gem, 55.
 Water, earth rests on, 106, 175.
 Water-pot, the regular, 106.
 Weapons, 69.
 Wheel of victory, 162; of the kingdom of righteousness, 31, 253.
 Wife. See Marriage.
 Wind, simile of, 147-8; as medical term, 191.
 Wisdom, distinct from reasoning,
 50; mark of, 51, 61; of Arahats,
 29; seven kinds of, 128.
 Women, put before men, 83; their fickleness, 141; in the Order, 187; reckoned among valuable things, 267; their wives, 294;
 their management of their husbands, 302. See Marriage.
 Woollen stuffs, 3, 28, 159.
 Worms in the body, 151.
 Wound, treatment of, 168.
 Writing a letter, 67.
-

TRANSLITERATION OF ORIENTAL ALPHABETS ADOPTED FOR THE TRANSLATIONS
OF THE SACRED BOOKS OF THE EAST.

CONSONANTS.	MISSIONARY ALPHABET.			Sanskrit.	Zaid.	Pehlvi.	Persian.	Arabic.	Hebrew.	Chinese.
	I Class.	II Class.
		III Class.
Gutturales.
1 Tenuis	k	.	.	क	ک	گ	ک	ک	כ	k
2 " aspirata	kh	.	.	ख	خ	خ	خ	خ	כ	kh
3 Media	g	.	.	ग	گ	گ	گ	گ	ג	.
4 " aspirata	gh	.	.	घ	غ	غ	غ	غ	ג	.
5 Gutturo-labialis	q	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	.
6 Nasalis	h (ng)	.	.	ङ	{ 3 (ng) ङ (ṅ)	.	.	.	.	.
7 Spiritus asper	h	.	.	ह	ه (ḥ)	ه	ه	ه	ה	h, hs
8 " lenis	,	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	.
9 " asper faucalis	'h	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	.
10 " lenis faucalis	'h	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	.
11 " asper fricatus	.	'h	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	.
12 " lenis fricatus	.	'h	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	.
Gutturales modificatae (palatales, &c.)
13 Tenuis	.	k	.	क	ع	ع	ع	ع	.	k
14 " aspirata	.	kh	.	ख	.	.	.	.	.	kh
15 Media	.	g	.	ग	.	.	.	.	.	.
16 " aspirata	.	gh	.	घ	.	.	.	.	.	.
17 " Nasalis	.	ṅ	.	ङ	.	.	.	.	.	.

CONSONANTS (continued).	MISSIONARY ALPHABET.			Sanskrit	Zend.	Pehlevi.	Persian.	Arabic.	Hebrew.	Chinese.
	I Class.	II Class.	III Class.
18 Semivocalis	y			य	𐬨𐬀 𐬨𐬀 𐬨𐬀	𐬨	ي	ي	י	y
19 Spiritus asper		(y)
20 " lenis		(y)
21 " asper assibilatus		s		श	𐬨𐬀	𐬨𐬀	ش	ش	ש
22 " lenis assibilatus		z			𐬨𐬀	𐬨𐬀	ز	ز	ז	z
Dentales.
23 Tenuis	t			त	𐬥	𐬥	ت	ت	ת	t
24 " aspirata	th			थ	𐬥𐬀	𐬥𐬀	تھ	تھ	תה	th
25 " assibilata	d		TH	द	𐬥𐬀	𐬥𐬀	د	د	ד
26 Media	dh			ध	𐬥𐬀	𐬥𐬀	دھ	دھ	דח
27 " aspirata
28 " assibilata			DH
29 Nasalis	n			न	𐬥	𐬥	ن	ن	נ	n
30 Semivocalis	l			ल	𐬥𐬀	𐬥𐬀	ل	ل	ל	l
31 " mollis 1		l		ळ	𐬥𐬀	𐬥𐬀	ل	ل	ל
32 " mollis 2			L
33 Spiritus asper 1	s			स	𐬥	𐬥	س	س	ס	s
34 " asper 2			s (ʃ)
35 " lenis	z			ז	𐬥	𐬥	ز	ز	ז	z
36 " asperimus 1			z (ʒ)
37 " asperimus 2			z (ʒ)

Dentales modificatae
(linguales, &c.)

38 Tenuis	t	...	ठ	...	...	...
39 " aspirata	th	...	ठ	...	...	...
40 Media	d	...	ड	...	...	...
41 " aspirata	dh	...	ड	...	...	...
42 Nasalis	n	...	ण	...	...	...
43 Semivocalis	r	...	र	...	...	...
44 " fricata	r	...	...	...	...	...
45 " diacritica	...	R	...	...	...	...
46 Spiritus asper	sh	...	ष	...	...	...
47 " lenis	zh	...	...	...	...	...

Labiales.

48 Tenuis	p	...	प	...	...	...
49 " aspirata	ph	...	फ	...	...	...
50 Media	b	...	ब	...	...	...
51 " aspirata	bh	...	भ	...	...	...
52 Tenuissima	...	...	...	...	...	...
53 Nasalis	m	...	म	...	...	...
54 Semivocalis	w	...	...	...	...	...
55 " aspirata	hw	...	...	...	...	...
56 Spiritus asper	f	...	...	...	...	...
57 " lenis	v	...	व	...	...	...
58 Anusvāra	...	...	वं	...	...	...
59 Visarga	h	...	ः	...	...	...

VOWELS.	MISSIONARY ALPHABET.			Sanskrit.	Zend.	Pehlvi.	Persian.	Arabic.	Hebrew.	Chinese.
	I Class.	II Class.	III Class.
1 Neutralis	0									ㅅ
2 Laryngo-palatalis	ə									ㅅ
3 " labialis	ɔ									ㅅ
4 Gutturalis brevis	a			अ	𐬀	𐬀	𐬀	ا	א	ㅅ
5 " longa	ā	(a)		आ	𐬁	𐬁	𐬁	آ	א	ㅅ
6 Palatalis brevis	i			इ	𐬂	𐬂	𐬂	ي	י	ㅅ
7 " longa	ī	(i)		ई	𐬃	𐬃	𐬃	ی	י	ㅅ
8 Dentalis brevis	ɛ			ए	𐬄	𐬄	𐬄	ه	ה	ㅅ
9 " longa	ē			ऐ	𐬅	𐬅	𐬅	ه	ה	ㅅ
10 Lingualis brevis	ɹ			उ	𐬆	𐬆	𐬆	و	ו	ㅅ
11 " longa	ṛ			ऊ	𐬇	𐬇	𐬇	و	ו	ㅅ
12 Labialis brevis	u			उ	𐬈	𐬈	𐬈	و	ו	ㅅ
13 " longa	ū	(u)		ऊ	𐬉	𐬉	𐬉	و	ו	ㅅ
14 Gutturo-palatalis brevis	e			ए	𐬊	𐬊	𐬊	ه	ה	ㅅ
15 " longa	é (ai)	(e)		ऐ	𐬋	𐬋	𐬋	ه	ה	ㅅ
16 Diphthongus gutturo-palatalis	āi	(ai)		आ	𐬌	𐬌	𐬌	ه	ה	ㅅ
17 " "	ei (ēi)			इ	𐬍	𐬍	𐬍	ه	ה	ㅅ
18 " "	oi (ōu)			ई	𐬎	𐬎	𐬎	ه	ה	ㅅ
19 Gutturo-labialis brevis	o			उ	𐬏	𐬏	𐬏	و	ו	ㅅ
20 " longa	ō (au)	(o)		ऊ	𐬐	𐬐	𐬐	و	ו	ㅅ
21 Diphthongus gutturo-labialis	āu	(au)		आ	𐬑	𐬑	𐬑	ه	ה	ㅅ
22 " "	eu (ēu)			इ	𐬒	𐬒	𐬒	ه	ה	ㅅ
23 " "	ou (ōu)			ई	𐬓	𐬓	𐬓	ه	ה	ㅅ
24 Gutturalis fracta	ä			अ	𐬔	𐬔	𐬔	ه	ה	ㅅ
25 Palatalis fracta	ī			इ	𐬕	𐬕	𐬕	ه	ה	ㅅ
26 Labialis fracta	ü			उ	𐬖	𐬖	𐬖	ه	ה	ㅅ
27 Gutturo-labialis fracta	ö			ऊ	𐬗	𐬗	𐬗	ه	ה	ㅅ

Clarendon Press, Oxford.

I. LITERATURE AND PHILOLOGY.

SECTION I.

DICTIONARIES, GRAMMARS, ETC.

ANGLO-SAXON. An Anglo-Saxon Dictionary, based on the MS. Collections of the late JOSEPH BOSWORTH, D.D., Professor of Anglo-Saxon, Oxford. Edited and enlarged by Prof. T. N. TOLLER, M.A. Parts I-III. A—SAR. 4to. 15s. each. Part IV. In the Press.

ARABIC. A Practical Arabic Grammar. Part I. Compiled by A. O. GREEN, Brigade Major, Royal Engineers. Second Edition, Enlarged. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

CELTIC. Ancient Cornish Drama. Edited and translated by E. NORRIS, with a Sketch of Cornish Grammar, an Ancient Cornish Vocabulary, etc. 2 vols. 1859. 8vo. 1l. 1s.

The Sketch of Cornish Grammar separately, stitched, 2s. 6d.

CHINESE. A Handbook of the Chinese Language. By JAMES SUMMERS. 1863. 8vo. half bound, 1l. 8s.

ENGLISH. A New English Dictionary, on Historical Principles: founded mainly on the materials collected by the Philological Society. Vol. I. A and B. Imperial 4to. half morocco, 2l. 12s. 6d. .

Part IV. Section II. C—CASS (beginning of Vol. II.) 5s.

Part V. CASS—CLIVY. 12s. 6d.

Part VI. In the Press.

Edited by JAMES A. H. MURRAY, LL.D., with the assistance of many Scholars and men of Science.

Vol. III (E, F, and G). Part I. Edited by HENRY BRADLEY. In the Press.

Oxford: Clarendon Press. London: HENRY FROWDE, Amen Corner, E.C.

ENGLISH, continued.

ENGLISH. An Etymological Dictionary of the English Language. By W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D. Second Edition. 4to. 2l. 4s.

— A Concise Etymological Dictionary of the English Language. By W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D. Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 5s. 6d.

— A Concise Dictionary of Middle English, from A.D. 1150 to 1580. By A. L. MAYHEW, M.A., and W. W. SKEAT, Litt. D. Crown 8vo. half roan, 7s. 6d.

GREEK. A Greek-English Lexicon, by H. G. LIDDELL, D.D., and ROBERT SCOTT, D.D. Seventh Edition, Revised and Augmented throughout. 4to. 1l. 16s.

— An intermediate Greek-English Lexicon, abridged from LIDDELL and SCOTT's Seventh Edition. Small 4to. 12s. 6d.

— A Greek-English Lexicon, abridged from Liddell and Scott's 4to. edition, chiefly for the use of Schools. Square 12mo. 7s. 6d.

— A copious Greek-English Vocabulary, compiled from the best authorities. 1850. 24mo. 3s.

— Etymologicon Magnum. Ad Codd. mss. recensuit et notis variorum instruxit T. GAISFORD, S.T.P. 1848. fol. 1l. 12s.

— Suidæ Lexicon. Ad Codd. mss. recensuit T. GAISFORD, S.T.P. Tomi III. 1834. fol. 2l. 2s.

HEBREW. The Book of Hebrew Roots, by ABU 'L-WALID MARWÂN IBN JANÂH, otherwise called RABBÎ YÔNÂH. Now first edited, with an appendix, by Ad. NEUBAUER. 1875. 4to. 2l. 7s. 6d.

— A Treatise on the use of the Tenses in Hebrew. By S. R. DRIVER, D.D. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

ICELANDIC. An Icelandic-English Dictionary, based on the MS. collections of the late RICHARD CLEASBY. Enlarged and completed by G. VIGFÚSSON, M.A. With an Introduction, and Life of Richard Cleasby, by G. WEBBE DASENT, D.C.L. 4to. 3l. 7s.

— A List of English Words the Etymology of which is illustrated by comparison with Icelandic. Prepared in the form of an Appendix to the above. By W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D. stitched, 2s.

— An Icelandic Primer, with Grammar, Notes, and Glossary. By HENRY SWEET, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

— An Icelandic Prose Reader, with Notes, Grammar and Glossary, by Dr. GUDBRAND VIGFÚSSON and F. YORK POWELL, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

-
- LATIN. A Latin Dictionary, founded on Andrews' edition of Freund's Latin Dictionary, revised, enlarged, and in great part rewritten by CHARLTON T. LEWIS, Ph.D., and CHARLES SHORT, LL.D. 4to. 1l. 5s.
- A School Latin Dictionary. By CHARLTON T. LEWIS, Ph.D. Small 4to. 18s.
- Scheller's Dictionary of the Latin Language, revised and translated into English by J. E. RIDDLE, M.A. 1835. fol. 1l. 1s.
- Contributions to Latin Lexicography. By HENRY NETTLESHIP, M.A. 8vo. 21s.
- MELANESIAN. The Melanesian Languages. By ROBERT H. CODRINGTON, D.D., of the Melanesian Mission. 8vo. 18s.
- RUSSIAN. A Grammar of the Russian Language. By W. R. MORFILL, M.A. Crown 8vo. 6s.
- SANSKRIT. A Practical Grammar of the Sanskrit Language, arranged with reference to the Classical Languages of Europe, for the use of English Students, by Sir M. MONIER-WILLIAMS, D.C.L. Fourth Edition. 8vo. 15s.
- A Sanskrit-English Dictionary, Etymologically and Philologically arranged, with special reference to Greek, Latin, German, Anglo-Saxon, English, and other cognate Indo-European Languages. By Sir M. MONIER-WILLIAMS, D.C.L. 4to. 4l. 14s. 6d.
- Nalopákhyanam. Story of Nala, an Episode of the Mahá-Bhárata: the Sanskrit text, with a copious Vocabulary, and an improved version of Dean MILMAN's Translation, by Sir M. MONIER-WILLIAMS, D.C.L. Second Edition, Revised and Improved. 8vo. 15s.
- Sakuntalā. A Sanskrit Drama, in Seven Acts. Edited by Sir M. MONIER-WILLIAMS, D.C.L. Second Edition. 8vo. 21s.
- SYRIAC. Thesaurus Syriacus: collegerunt Quatremère, Bernstein, Lorschbach, Arnoldi, Agrell, Field, Roediger: edidit R. PAYNE SMITH, S.T.P. Vol. I, containing Fasc. I-V, sm. fol. 5l. 5s.
Fasc. VI. 1l. 1s. Fasc. VII. 1l. 11s. 6d. Fasc. VIII. 1l. 16s.
- The Book of Kalilah and Dimnah. Translated from Arabic into Syriac. Edited by W. WRIGHT, LL.D. 8vo. 21s.
-

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARIES.

- Cotton's Typographical Gazetteer. 1831. 8vo. 12s. 6d.
- Typographical Gazetteer. Second Series. 1866. 8vo. 12s. 6d.
- Ebert's Bibliographical Dictionary, translated from the German. 4 vols. 1837. 8vo. 1l. 10s.
-

London: HENRY FROWDE, Amen Corner, E.C.

SECTION II.

ANGLO-SAXON AND ENGLISH.

HELPS TO THE STUDY OF THE LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE.

A NEW ENGLISH DICTIONARY on Historical Principles, founded mainly on the materials collected by the Philological Society. Imperial 4to. Parts I-IV, price 12s. 6d. each.

Vol. I (A and B), half morocco, 2l. 12s. 6d.

Vol. II (C and D). In the Press.

Part IV, Section 2, C—CASS, beginning Vol. II, price 5s.

Part V, CASS—CLIVY, price 12s. 6d.

Edited by JAMES A. H. MURRAY, LL.D., sometime President of the Philological Society; with the assistance of many Scholars and Men of Science.

Vol. III (E, F, and G). Part I. Edited by Mr. HENRY BRADLEY. In the Press.

Bosworth and Toller. An Anglo-Saxon Dictionary, based on the MS. collections of the late JOSEPH BOSWORTH, D.D. Edited and enlarged by Prof. T. N. TOLLER, M.A., Owens College, Manchester. Parts I-III. A—SAR. 4to. stiff covers, 15s. each. Part IV. In the Press.

Earle. A Book for the Beginner in Anglo-Saxon. By JOHN EARLE, M.A. Third Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

— The Philology of the English Tongue. Fourth Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

Mayhew and Skeat. A Concise Dictionary of Middle English, from A.D. 1150 to 1580. By A. L. MAYHEW, M.A., and W. W. SKEAT, Litt. D. Crown 8vo. half roan, 7s. 6d.

Skeat. An Etymological Dictionary of the English Language, arranged on an Historical Basis. By W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D. Second Edition. 4to. 2l. 4s.

A Supplement to the First Edition of the above. 4to. 2s. 6d.

— A Concise Etymological Dictionary of the English Language. Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 5s. 6d.

— Principles of English Etymology. First Series. The Native Element. Crown 8vo. 9s.

Oxford: Clarendon Press.

-
- Sweet. An Anglo-Saxon Primer, with Grammar, Notes and Glossary. By HENRY SWEET, M.A. 2nd Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.
- An Anglo-Saxon Reader. In Prose and Verse. With Grammatical Introduction, Notes, and Glossary. Sixth Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Extra fcap. 8vo. 8s. 6d.
- A Second Anglo-Saxon Reader. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.
- Old English Reading Primers :
- I. Selected Homilies of Ælfric. Stiff covers, 1s. 6d.
- II. Extracts from Alfred's Orosius. Stiff covers, 1s. 6d.
- First Middle English Primer, with Grammar and Glossary. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.
- Second Middle English Primer. Extracts from Chaucer, with Grammar and Glossary. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.
- History of English Sounds from the Earliest Period. With full Word-Lists. 8vo. 14s.
- A Primer of Phonetics. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- Elementarbuch des Gesprochenen Englisch. Grammatik, Texte und Glossar. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo., stiff covers, 2s. 6d.
- Tancock. An Elementary English Grammar and Exercise Book. By O. W. TANCOCK, M.A. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
- An English Grammar and Reading Book, for Lower Forms in Classical Schools. Fourth Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Saxon Chronicles. Two of the Saxon Chronicles parallel (787-1001 A.D.). A Revised Text. Edited, with Introduction, Critical Notes, and Glossary, by CHARLES PLUMMER, M.A., on the basis of an Edition by JOHN EARLE, M.A. Crown 8vo., stiff covers, 3s.

Specimens of Early English. A New and Revised Edition. With Introduction, Notes, and Glossarial Index.

Part I. From Old English Homilies to King Horn (A.D. 1150 to A.D. 1300). By R. MORRIS, LL.D. Ed. 2. Extra fcap. 8vo. 9s.

Part II. From Robert of Gloucester to Gower (A.D. 1298 to A.D. 1393). By R. MORRIS, LL.D., and W. W. SKEAT, Litt. D. Third Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

Specimens of English Literature, from the 'Ploughmans Crede' to the 'Shepheardes Calender' (A.D. 1394 to A.D. 1579). With Introduction, Notes, and Glossarial Index. By W. W. SKEAT, Litt. D. Fourth Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

Typical Selections from the best English Writers, with Introductory Notices. In 2 vols. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d. each.

Vol. I. Latimer to Berkeley.

Vol. II. Pope to Macaulay.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Amen Corner, E.C.

A SERIES OF ENGLISH CLASSICS.

(CHRONOLOGICALLY ARRANGED.)

Ormulum, The, with the Notes and Glossary of Dr. R. M. WHITE. Edited by R. HOLT, M.A. 2 vols. Extra fcap. 8vo. 1*l.* 1*s.*

CHAUCER.

I. The Prologue, the Knightes Tale, The Nonne Preestes Tale; from the Canterbury Tales. Edited by R. MORRIS, LL.D. A New Edition, with Collations and Additional Notes by W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2*s.* 6*d.*

II. The Prioresses Tale; Sir Thopas; The Monkes Tale; The Clerkes Tale; The Squieres Tale, &c. Edited by W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D. Third Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4*s.* 6*d.*

III. The Tale of the Man of Lawe; The Pardoner's Tale; The Second Nonnes Tale; The Chanouns Yemannes Tale. By W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D. New Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4*s.* 6*d.*

IV. Minor Poems. Edited by W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D. Crown 8vo. 10*s.* 6*d.*

V. The Legend of Good Women. By W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D. Crown 8vo. 6*s.*

Langland, W. The Vision of William concerning Piers the Plowman, in three Parallel Texts; together with Richard the Redeless. By WILLIAM LANGLAND (about 1362-1399 A.D.). Edited from numerous Manuscripts, with Preface, Notes, and a Glossary, by W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D. 2 vols. 8vo. 1*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.*

— The Vision of William concerning Piers the Plowman, by WILLIAM LANGLAND. Edited, with Notes, by W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D. Fourth Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4*s.* 6*d.*

Gamelyn, the Tale of. Edited, with Notes, Glossary, &c., by W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D. Extra fcap. 8vo. Stiff covers, 1*s.* 6*d.*

WYCLIFFE.

I. The Books of Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon: according to the Wycliffite Version made by NICHOLAS DE HEREFORD, about A.D. 1381, and Revised by JOHN PURVEY, about A.D. 1388. With Introduction and Glossary by W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3*s.* 6*d.*

II. The New Testament in English, according to the Version by JOHN WYCLIFFE, about A.D. 1380, and Revised by JOHN PURVEY, about A.D. 1388. With Introduction and Glossary by W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D. Extra fcap. 8vo. 6*s.*

Minot (Laurence). Poems. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by JOSEPH HALL, M.A., Head Master of the Hulme Grammar School, Manchester. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4*s.* 6*d.*

Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Spenser's Faery Queene. Books I and II. Designed chiefly for the use of Schools. With Introduction and Notes by G. W. KITCHIN, D.D., and Glossary by A. L. MATHEW, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d. each.

Hooker. Ecclesiastical Polity, Book I. Edited by R. W. CHURCH, M.A. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. [See also p. 43.]

OLD ENGLISH DRAMA.

I. York Plays.—The Plays performed by the Crafts or Mysteries of York, on the day of Corpus Christi, in the 14th, 15th, and 16th centuries; now first printed from the unique manuscript in the library of Lord Ashburnham. Edited, with Introduction and Glossary, by LUCY TOULMIN SMITH. 8vo. 1l. 1s.

II. The Pilgrimage to Parnassus, with the Two Parts of the Return from Parnassus. Three Comedies performed in St. John's College, Cambridge, A.D. MDXCVII–MDCI. Edited from MSS. by W. D. MACRAY, M.A., F.S.A. Medium 8vo. Bevelled Boards, Gilt top, 8s. 6d.

III. Marlowe's Edward II. With Introduction, Notes, &c. By O. W. TANCOCK, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. Paper covers, 2s.; cloth, 3s.

IV. Marlowe and Greene. Marlowe's Tragical History of Dr. Faustus, and Greene's Honourable History of Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay. Edited by A. W. WARD, Litt. D. New and enlarged Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 6s. 6d.

SHAKESPEARE. Select Plays. Extra fcap. 8vo. stiff covers.

Edited by W. G. CLARK, M.A., and W. ALDIS WRIGHT, D.C.L.

The Merchant of Venice. 1s. Macbeth. 1s. 6d.

Richard the Second. 1s. 6d. Hamlet. 2s.

Edited by W. ALDIS WRIGHT, D.C.L.

The Tempest. 1s. 6d. Midsummer Night's Dream. 1s. 6d.

As You Like It. 1s. 6d. Coriolanus. 2s. 6d.

Julius Cæsar. 2s. Henry the Fifth. 2s.

Richard the Third. 2s. 6d. Twelfth Night. 1s. 6d.

King Lear. 1s. 6d. King John. 1s. 6d.

Shakespeare as a Dramatic Artist; a popular Illustration of the Principles of Scientific Criticism. By R. G. MOULTON, M.A. Second Edition, Enlarged. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Bacon.

I. Advancement of Learning. Edited by W. ALDIS WRIGHT, D.C.L. Third Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.

II. The Essays. With Introduction and Notes. By S. H. REYNOLDS, M.A. In preparation.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Amen Corner, E.C.

MILTON.

- I. Areopagitica. With Introduction and Notes. By JOHN W. HALES, M.A. Third Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s.
 II. Poems. Edited by R. C. BROWNE, M.A. In two Volumes. Fifth Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 6s. 6d.
 Sold separately, Vol. I. 4s.; Vol. II. 3s.

In paper covers :

- Lycidas*, 3d. L'Allegro, 3d. Il Penseroso, 4d. Comus, 6d.
 III. Paradise Lost. Book I. Edited by H. C. BEECHING, B.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. stiff covers, 1s. 6d.; in Parchment, 3s. 6d.
 IV. Samson Agonistes. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by J. CHURTON COLLINS, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. stiff covers, 1s.

Bunyan.

- I. The Pilgrim's Progress, Grace Abounding, Relation of the Imprisonment of Mr. JOHN BUNYAN. Edited, with Biographical Introduction and Notes, by E. VENABLES, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 5s. In Parchment, 6s.
 II. Holy War, &c. In the Press.

Clarendon.

- I. History of the Rebellion. Book VI. Edited by T. ARNOLD, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.
 II. Characters and Episodes of the Great Rebellion. Selections from Clarendon. Edited by G. BOYLE, M.A., Dean of Salisbury. Crown 8vo., gilt top, 7s. 6d. [See also p. 44.]

Dryden. Select Poems. (Stanzas on the Death of Oliver Cromwell; Astræa Redux; Annus Mirabilis; Absalom and Achitophel; Religio Laici; The Hind and the Panther.) Edited by W. D. CHRISTIE, M.A. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

— An Essay of Dramatic Poesy. Edited, with Notes, by THOMAS ARNOLD, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Locke. Conduct of the Understanding. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, &c., by T. FOWLER, D.D. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.Addison. Selections from Papers in the Spectator. With Notes. By T. ARNOLD, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d. In Parchment, 6s.Steele. Selections from the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian. Edited by AUSTIN DOBSON. Extra fcap. 8vo. 5s. In Parchment, 7s. 6d.Pope. Select Works. With Introduction and Notes. By MARK PATTISON, B.D.

- I. Essay on Man. Extra fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
 II. Satires and Epistles. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.

Parnell. The Hermit. Paper covers, 2d.

Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Gray. Selected Poems. Edited by EDMUND GOSSE, M.A.
Extra fcap. 8vo. In Parchment, 3s.

— The same, together with Supplementary Notes for Schools by FOSTER WATSON, M.A. Stiff covers, 1s. 6d.

— Elegy, and Ode on Eton College. Paper covers, 2d.

Goldsmith.

I. Selected Poems. Edited with Introduction and Notes, by AUSTIN DOBSON. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d. In Parchment, 4s. 6d.

II. The Traveller. Edited by G. BIRKBECK HILL, D.C.L.
Stiff covers, 1s.

III. The Deserted Village. Paper covers, 2d.

JOHNSON.

I. Rasselas. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by
G. BIRKBECK HILL, D.C.L. Extra fcap. 8vo. Bevelled boards, 3s. 6d.
In Parchment, 4s. 6d.

II. Rasselas; Lives of Dryden and Pope. Edited by ALFRED MILNES, M.A. (London). Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d., or Lives of DRYDEN and POPE only, stiff covers, 2s. 6d.

III. Life of Milton. By C. H. FIRTH, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d. Stiff covers, 1s. 6d.

IV. Wit and Wisdom of Samuel Johnson. Edited by
G. BIRKBECK HILL, D.C.L. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

V. Vanity of Human Wishes. With Notes, by E. J.
PAYNE, M.A. Paper covers, 4d.

BOSWELL.

Boswell's Life of Johnson. With the Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides. Edited by G. BIRKBECK HILL, D.C.L., Pembroke College. 6 vols. Medium 8vo. Half bound, 3l. 3s.

Cowper. Edited, with Life, Introductions, and Notes, by H. T. GRIFFITH, B.A.

I. The Didactic Poems of 1782, with Selections from the Minor Pieces, A.D. 1779–1783. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s.

II. The Task, with Tirocinium, and Selections from the Minor Poems, A.D. 1784–1799. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s.

Burke. Select Works. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by E. J. PAYNE, M.A.

I. Thoughts on the Present Discontents; the two Speeches on America. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.

II. Reflections on the French Revolution. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 5s.

III. Four Letters on the Proposals for Peace with the Regicide Directory of France. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 5s.

-
- Burns. Selected Poems. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and a Glossary, by J. LOGIE ROBERTSON, M.A. Crown 8vo. 6s.
- Keats. Hyperion, Book I. With Notes by W. T. ARNOLD, B.A. Paper covers, 4d.
- Byron. Childe Harold. With Introduction and Notes, by H. F. TOZER, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d. In Parchment, 5s.
- Scott. Lay of the Last Minstrel. Edited by W. MINTO, M.A. With Map. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. Parchment, 3s. 6d.
- Lay of the Last Minstrel. Introduction and Canto I, with Preface and Notes, by the same Editor. 6d.
- Marmion. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by T. BAYNE. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- Campbell. Gertrude of Wyoming. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by H. MACAULAY FITZGIBBON, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.
- Shairp. Aspects of Poetry; being Lectures delivered at Oxford, by J. C. SHAIRP, LL.D. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- Palgrave. The Treasury of Sacred Song. With Notes Explanatory and Biographical. By F. T. PALGRAVE, M.A. Half vellum, gilt top, 10s. 6d.
-

SECTION III.

EUROPEAN LANGUAGES. MEDIAEVAL AND MODERN.

(1) FRENCH AND ITALIAN.

- Brachet's Etymological Dictionary of the French Language. Translated by G. W. KITCHIN, D.D. Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- Historical Grammar of the French Language. Translated by G. W. KITCHIN, D.D. Fourth Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- Saintsbury. Primer of French Literature. By GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.
- Short History of French Literature. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- Specimens of French Literature, from Villon to Hugo. Crown 8vo. 9s.
-
- Beaumarchais' Le Barbier de Séville. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by AUSTIN DOBSON. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.
-

Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Corneille's Horace. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

Molière's Les Précieuses Ridicules. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by ANDREW LANG, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Musset's On ne badine pas avec l'Amour, and Fantasio. Edited, with Prolegomena, Notes, etc., by W. H. POLLOCK. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.

Racine's Esther. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.

Voltaire's Mérope. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.

* * * The above six Plays may be had in ornamental case, and bound in Imitation Parchment, price 12s. 6d.

MASSON'S FRENCH CLASSICS.

Edited by Gustave Masson, B.A.

Corneille's Cinna. With Notes, Glossary, etc. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. Stiff covers, 1s. 6d.

Louis XIV and his Contemporaries; as described in Extracts from the best Memoirs of the Seventeenth Century. With English Notes, Genealogical Tables, &c. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

Maistre, Xavier de, &c. Voyage autour de ma Chambre, by XAVIER DE MAISTRE. Ourika, by MADAME DE DURAS; Le Vieux Tailleur, by MM. ERCKMANN-CHATRIAN; La Veillée de Vincennes, by ALFRED DE VIGNY; Les Jumeaux de l'Hôtel Corneille, by EDMOND ABOUT; Mésaventures d'un Écolier, by RODOLPHE TÖPFFER. Third Edition, Revised. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

— Voyage autour de ma Chambre. Limp. 1s. 6d.

Molière's Les Fourberies de Scapin, and Racine's Athalie. With Voltaire's Life of Molière. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

— Les Fourberies de Scapin. With Voltaire's Life of Molière. Extra fcap. 8vo. stiff covers, 1s. 6d.

— Les Femmes Savantes. With Notes, Glossary, etc. Extra fcap. 8vo. cloth, 2s. Stiff covers, 1s. 6d.

Racine's Andromaque, and Corneille's Le Menteur. With LOUIS RACINE's Life of his Father. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

Regnard's Le Joueur, and Brueys and Palaprat's Le Grondeur. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

Sévigné, Madame de, and her chief Contemporaries, Selections from their Correspondence. Intended more especially for Girls' Schools. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s.

- Blouët. L'Éloquence de la Chaire et de la Tribune Françaises.
 Edited by PAUL BLOUËT, B.A. Vol. I. Sacred Oratory. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.
- Gautier, Théophile. Scenes of Travel. Selected and Edited by GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.
- Perrault's Popular Tales. Edited from the Original Editions, with Introduction, etc., by ANDREW LANG, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo., paper boards, 5s. 6d.
- Quinet's Lettres à sa Mère. Selected and Edited by GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.
- Sainte-Beuve. Selections from the Causeries du Lundi.
 Edited by GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.
- Dante. Selections from the Inferno. With Introduction and Notes. By H. B. COTTERILL, B.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.
- Tasso. La Gerusalemme Liberata. Cantos i, ii. With Introduction and Notes. By the same Editor. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

(2) GERMAN AND GOTHIC.

- Max Müller. The German Classics, from the Fourth to the Nineteenth Century. With Biographical Notices, Translations into Modern German, and Notes. By F. MAX MÜLLER, M.A. A New Edition, Revised, Enlarged, and Adapted to WILHELM SCHERER'S
 'History of German Literature,' by F. LICHTENSTEIN. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 21s.
- Scherer. A History of German Literature by WILHELM
 SCHERER. Translated from the Third German Edition by Mrs. F.
 C. CONYBEARE. Edited by F. MAX MÜLLER. 2 vols. 8vo. 21s.
- Skeat. The Gospel of St. Mark in Gothic. By W. W.
 SKEAT, Litt. D. Extra fcap. 8vo. cloth, 4s.
- Wright. An Old High German Primer. With Grammar,
 Notes, and Glossary. By JOSEPH WRIGHT, Ph.D. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- A Middle High German Primer. With Grammar,
 Notes, and Glossary. By JOSEPH WRIGHT, Ph.D. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

LANGE'S GERMAN COURSE.

By Hermann Lange, Lecturer on French and German at the Manchester Technical School, etc.

- I. Germans at Home ; a Practical Introduction to German Conversation, with an Appendix containing the Essentials of German Grammar. Third Edition. 8vo. 2s. 6d.
- II. German Manual ; a German Grammar, Reading Book, and a Handbook of German Conversation. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

Oxford: Clarendon Press.

III. Grammar of the German Language. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

IV. German Composition ; A Theoretical and Practical Guide to the Art of Translating English Prose into German. Second Edition. 8vo. 4s. 6d. [A Key to the above, price 5s. Just Published.]

German Spelling ; A Synopsis of the Changes which it has undergone through the Government Regulations of 1880. 6d.

BUCHHEIM'S GERMAN CLASSICS.

Edited, with Biographical, Historical, and Critical Introductions, Arguments (to the Dramas), and Complete Commentaries, by C. A. BUCHHEIM, Phil. Doc., Professor in King's College, London.

Becker (the Historian). Friedrich der Grosse. Edited, with Notes, an Historical Introduction, and a Map. 3s. 6d.

Goethe :

- (a) Egmont. A Tragedy. 3s.
- (b) Iphigenie auf Tauris. A Drama. 3s.

Heine :

- (a) Prosa : being Selections from his Prose Writings. 4s. 6d.
- (b) Harzreise. Cloth, 2s. 6d. ; paper covers, 1s. 6d.

Lessing :

- (a) Nathan der Weise. A Dramatic Poem. 4s. 6d.
- (b) Minna von Barnhelm. A Comedy. 3s. 6d.

Schiller :

- (a) Wilhelm Tell. A Drama. Large Edition. With Map. 3s. 6d.
- (b) Wilhelm Tell. School Edition. With Map. 2s.
- (c) Historische Skizzen. With Map. 2s. 6d.

Modern German Reader. A Graduated Collection of Extracts from Modern German Authors :—

Part I. Prose Extracts. With English Notes, a Grammatical Appendix, and a complete Vocabulary. Fourth Edition. 2s. 6d.

Part II. Extracts in Prose and Poetry. With English Notes and an Index. Second Edition. 2s. 6d.

German Poetry for Beginners. Edited with English Notes and a complete Vocabulary, by EMMA S. BUCHHEIM. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.

Chamisso. Peter Schlemihl's Wundersame Geschichte. Edited with Notes and a complete Vocabulary, by EMMA S. BUCHHEIM. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.

- Lessing. The Laokoon, with Introduction, English Notes, etc. By A. HAMANN, Phil. Doc., M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.
- Niebuhr: Griechische Heroen-Geschichten (Tales of Greek Heroes). With English Notes and Vocabulary, by EMMA S. BUCHHEIM. Second, Revised Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. cloth, 2s., stiff covers, 1s. 6d.
Edition A. Text in German Type.
Edition B. Text in Roman Type.
- Schiller's Wilhelm Tell. Translated into English Verse by E. MASSIE, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 5s.

(3) SCANDINAVIAN.

- Cleasby and Vigfússon. An Icelandic-English Dictionary, based on the MS. collections of the late RICHARD CLEASBY. Enlarged and completed by G. VIGFÚSSON, M.A. With an Introduction, and Life of Richard Cleasby, by G. WEBBE DASENT, D.C.L. 4to. 3l. 7s.
- Sweet. Icelandic Primer, with Grammar, Notes, and Glossary. By HENRY SWEET, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- Vigfússon. Sturlunga Saga, including the Islendinga Saga of Lawman STURLA THORDSSON and other works. Edited by Dr. GUDBRAND VIGFÚSSON. In 2 vols. 8vo. 2l. 2s.
- Vigfússon and Powell. Icelandic Prose Reader, with Notes, Grammar, and Glossary. By G. VIGFÚSSON, M.A., and F. YORK POWELL, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- Corpus Poeticum Boreale. The Poetry of the Old Northern Tongue, from the Earliest Times to the Thirteenth Century. Edited, classified, and translated, with Introduction, Excursus, and Notes, by GUDBRAND VIGFÚSSON, M.A., and F. YORK POWELL, M.A. 2 vols. 8vo. 2l. 2s.
- The Landnámabók. Edited and translated by the same. In the Press.

SECTION IV.

CLASSICAL LANGUAGES.

(1) LATIN.

STANDARD WORKS AND EDITIONS.

- Ellis. Harleian MS. 2610; Ovid's Metamorphoses I, II, III, 1-622; XXIV Latin Epigrams from Bodleian or other MSS.; Latin Glosses on Apollinaris Sidonius from MS. Digby 172. Collated and Edited by ROBINSON ELLIS, M.A., LL.D. (Anecdota Oxon.) 4s.

Oxford: Clarendon Press.

-
- King and Cookson. The Principles of Sound and Inflexion, as illustrated in the Greek and Latin Languages. By J. E. KING, M.A., and CHRISTOPHER COOKSON, M.A. 8vo. 18s.
- Lewis and Short. A Latin Dictionary, founded on Andrews' edition of Freund's Latin Dictionary, revised, enlarged, and in great part rewritten by CHARLTON T. LEWIS, Ph.D., and CHARLES SHORT, LL.D. 4to. 1l. 5s.
- Nettleship. Contributions to Latin Lexicography. By HENRY NETTLESHIP, M.A. 8vo. 21s.
- Lectures and Essays on Subjects connected with Latin Scholarship and Literature. By HENRY NETTLESHIP, M.A. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- The Roman Saturna. 8vo. sewed, 1s.
- Ancient Lives of Vergil. 8vo. sewed, 2s.
- Papillon. Manual of Comparative Philology. By T. L. PAPILLON, M.A. Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.
- Pinder. Selections from the less known Latin Poets. By NORTH PINDEB, M.A. 8vo. 15s.
- Sellar. Roman Poets of the Augustan Age. VIRGIL. By W. Y. SELLAR, M.A. New Edition. Crown 8vo. 9s.
- Roman Poets of the Republic. Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 10s.
- Wordsworth. Fragments and Specimens of Early Latin. With Introductions and Notes. By J. WORDSWORTH, D.D. 8vo. 18s.
-
- Avianus. The Fables. Edited, with Prolegomena, Critical Apparatus, Commentary, etc., by ROBINSON ELLIS, M.A., LL.D. 8vo. 8s. 6d.
- Catulli Veronensis Liber. Iterum recognovit, apparatus criticum prolegomena appendices addidit, ROBINSON ELLIS, A.M. 8vo. 16s.
- Catullus, a Commentary on. By ROBINSON ELLIS, M.A. Second Edition. 8vo. 18s.
- Cicero. De Oratore. With Introduction and Notes. By A. S. WILKINS, Litt.D.
- Book I. Second Edition. 8vo. 7s. 6d. Book II. 8vo. 5s.
- Philippic Orations. With Notes. By J. R. KING, M.A. Second Edition. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- Select Letters. With English Introductions, Notes, and Appendices. By ALBERT WATSON, M.A. Third Edition. 8vo. 18s.
- Horace. With a Commentary. Vol. I. The Odes, Carmen Seculare, and Epodes. By E. C. WICKHAM, M.A. Second Edition. 8vo. 12s.
-

- Livy, Book I. With Introduction, Historical Examination, and Notes. By J. R. SEELEY, M.A. Second Edition. 8vo. 6s.
- Nonius Marcellus, de Compensiosa Doctrina (Harleian MS. 2719). Collated by J. H. ONIONS, M.A. (Anecdota Oxon.) 3s. 6d.
- Ovid. P. Ovidii Nasonis Ibis. Ex Novis Codicibus edidit, Scholia Vetera Commentarium cum Prolegomenis Appendice Indice addidit, R. ELLIS, A.M. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- P. Ovidi Nasonis Tristium Libri V. Recensuit S. G. OWEN, A.M. 8vo. 16s.
- Persius. The Satires. With a Translation and Commentary. By JOHN CONINGTON, M.A. Edited by HENRY NETTLESHIP, M.A. Second Edition. 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- Plautus. Bentley's Plautine Emendations. From his copy of Gronovius. By E. A. SONNENSCHN, M.A. (Anecdota Oxon.) 2s. 6d.
- Scriptores Latini rei Metricae. Edidit T. GAISFORD, S.T.P. 8vo. 5s.
- Tacitus. The Annals. Books I–VI. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by H. FURNEAUX, M.A. 8vo. 18s.

LATIN EDUCATIONAL WORKS.

GRAMMARS, EXERCISE BOOKS, &c.

ALLEN.

Rudimenta Latina. Comprising Accidence, and Exercises of a very Elementary Character, for the use of Beginners. By JOHN BARROW ALLEN, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.

An Elementary Latin Grammar. By the same Author. Fifty-Seventh Thousand. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

A First Latin Exercise Book. By the same Author. Fourth Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

A Second Latin Exercise Book. By the same Author. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

* * A Key to First and Second Latin Exercise Books, in one volume, price 5s. Supplied to Teachers only on application to the Secretary of the Clarendon Press.

An Introduction to Latin Syntax. By W. S. GIBSON, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.

First Latin Reader. By T. J. NUNNS, M.A. Third Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.

A Latin Prose Primer. By J. Y. SARGENT, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Passages for Translation into Latin. For the use of Passmen and others. Selected by J. Y. SARGENT, M.A. Seventh Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

* * A Key to the above, price 5s. Supplied to Teachers only on application to the Secretary of the Clarendon Press.

Exercises in Latin Prose Composition; with Introduction, Notes, and Passages of Graduated Difficulty for Translation into Latin. By G. G. RAMSAY, M.A., LL.D. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.

Hints and Helps for 'Latin Elegiacs. By H. LEE-WARNER, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

* * A Key to the above, price 4s. 6d. Supplied to Teachers only on application to the Secretary of the Clarendon Press.

Reddenda Minora, or Easy Passages, Latin and Greek, for Unseen Translation. For the use of Lower Forms. Composed and selected by C. S. JERRAM, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Anglice Reddenda, or Extracts, Latin and Greek, for Unseen Translation. By C. S. JERRAM, M.A. Third Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

Anglice Reddenda. Second Series. By the same Author. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s.

A School Latin Dictionary. By CHARLTON T. LEWIS, Ph.D. Small 4to. 18s.

LATIN CLASSICS FOR SCHOOLS.

Caesar. The Commentaries (for Schools). With Notes and Maps. By CHARLES E. MOBERLY, M.A.

The Gallic War. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.

— Books I and II. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.

— Books III, IV, V. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

— Books VI, VII, VIII. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

The Civil War. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

— Book I. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.

Catulli Veronensis Carmina Selecta, secundum recognitionem ROBINSON ELLIS, A.M. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

CICERO. Selection of Interesting and Descriptive Passages. With Notes. By HENRY WALFORD, M.A. In three Parts. Third Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.

Each Part separately, limp, 1s. 6d.

Part I. Anecdotes from Grecian and Roman History.

Part II. Omens and Dreams: Beauties of Nature.

Part III. Rome's Rule of her Provinces.

CICERO. De Senectute. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by L. HUXLEY, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.

— pro Cluentio. With Introduction and Notes. By W. RAMSAY, M.A. Edited by G. G. RAMSAY, M.A. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

— Select Orations (for Schools). In Verrem Actio Prima. De Imperio Gn. Pompeii. Pro Archia. Philippica IX. With Introduction and Notes by J. R. KING, M.A. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

— In Q. Caecilium Divinatio, and In C. Verrem Actio Prima. With Introduction and Notes, by J. R. KING, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. limp, 1s. 6d.

— Speeches against Catilina. With Introduction and Notes, by E. A. UPCOTT, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

— Selected Letters (for Schools). With Notes. By the late C. E. PRICHARD, M.A., and E. R. BERNARD, M.A. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s.

— Select Letters. Text. By ALBERT WATSON, M.A. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s.

Cornelius Nepos. With Notes. By OSCAR BROWNING, M.A. Third Edition. Revised by W. R. INGE, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s.

Horace. With a Commentary. (In a size suitable for the use of Schools.) Vol. I. The Odes, Carmen Seculare, and Epodes. By E. C. WICKHAM, M.A. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 6s.

— Selected Odes. With Notes for the use of a Fifth Form. By E. C. WICKHAM, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.

Juvenal. Thirteen Satires. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by C. H. PEARSON, M.A., and HERBERT A. STRONG, M.A., LL.D. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Also separately:—

Part I. Introduction, Text, etc., 3s. Part II. Notes, 3s. 6d.

Livy. Books V–VII. With Introduction and Notes. By A. R. CLUER, B.A. Second Edition. Revised by P. E. MATHESON, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 5s.

— Book V. By the same Editors. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

— Books XXI–XXIII. With Introduction and Notes. By M. T. TATHAM, M.A. Second Edition, enlarged. Extra fcap. 8vo. 5s.

— Book XXI. By the same Editor. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

— Book XXII. With Introduction, Notes, and Maps. By the same Editor. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

Oxford: Clarendon Press.

-
- Livy. Selections (for Schools). With Notes and Maps. By H. LEE-WARNER, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. In Parts, limp, each 1s. 6d.
- Part I. The Caudine Disaster.
- Part II. Hannibal's Campaign in Italy.
- Part III. The Macedonian War.
- Ovid. Selections for the use of Schools. With Introductions and Notes, and an Appendix on the Roman Calendar. By W. RAMSAY, M.A. Edited by G. G. RAMSAY, M.A. Third Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 5s. 6d.
- Tristia. Book I. The Text revised, with an Introduction and Notes. By S. G. OWEN, B.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- Tristia. Book III. With Introduction and Notes. By the same Editor. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.
- Plautus. Captivi. Edited by WALLACE M. LINDSAY, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.
- Plautus. Trinummus. With Notes and Introductions. (Intended for the Higher Forms of Public Schools.) By C. E. FREEMAN, M.A., and A. SLOMAN, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s.
- Pliny. Selected Letters (for Schools). With Notes. By C. E. PRICHARD, M.A., and E. R. BERNARD, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s.
- Sallust. With Introduction and Notes. By W. W. CAPES, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.
- Tacitus. The Annals. Books I-IV. Edited, with Introduction and Notes (for the use of Schools and Junior Students), by H. FURNEAUX, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 5s.
- The Annals. Book I. With Introduction and Notes, by the same Editor. Extra fcap. 8vo. limp. 2s.
- Terence. Andria. With Notes and Introductions. By C. E. FREEMAN, M.A., and A. SLOMAN, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s.
- Adelphi. With Notes and Introductions. (Intended for the Higher Forms of Public Schools.) By A. SLOMAN, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s.
- Phormio. With Notes and Introductions. By A. SLOMAN, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s.
- Tibullus and Propertius. Selections. Edited by G. G. RAMSAY, M.A. (In one or two parts.) Extra fcap. 8vo. 6s.
- Virgil. With Introduction and Notes. By T. L. PAPILLON, M.A. Two vols. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d. The Text separately, 4s. 6d.
- Bucolics. Edited by C. S. JERRAM, M.A. In one or two Parts. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.
- Georgics. By the same Editor. In the Press.
-

London: HENRY FROWDE, Amen Corner, E.C.

- Virgil. Aeneid I. With Introduction and Notes, by the same Editor. Extra fcap. 8vo. limp, 1s. 6d.
 — Aeneid IX. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by A. E. HAIGH, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. limp, 1s. 6d. In two Parts, 2s.

(2) GREEK.

STANDARD WORKS AND EDITIONS.

- Allen. Notes on Abbreviations in Greek Manuscripts. By T. W. ALLEN, Queen's College, Oxford. Royal 8vo. 5s.
Chandler. A Practical Introduction to Greek Accentuation, by H. W. CHANDLER, M.A. Second Edition. 10s. 6d.
Haigh. The Attic Theatre. A Description of the Stage and Theatre of the Athenians, and of the Dramatic Performances at Athens. By A. E. HAIGH, M.A. 8vo. 12s. 6d.
Head. Historia Numorum: A Manual of Greek Numismatics. By BARCLAY V. HEAD. Royal 8vo. half-bound, 2l. 2s.
Hicks. A Manual of Greek Historical Inscriptions. By E. L. HICKS, M.A. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
King and Cookson. The Principles of Sound and Inflexion, as illustrated in the Greek and Latin Languages. By J. E. KING, M.A., and CHRISTOPHER COOKSON, M.A. 8vo. 18s.
Liddell and Scott. A Greek-English Lexicon, by H. G. LIDDELL, D.D., and ROBERT SCOTT, D.D. Seventh Edition, Revised and Augmented throughout. 4to. 1l. 16s.
Papillon. Manual of Comparative Philology. By T. L. PAPHILLON, M.A. Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.
Veitch. Greek Verbs, Irregular and Defective. By W. VEITCH, LL.D. Fourth Edition. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.
Vocabulary, a copious Greek-English, compiled from the best authorities. 24mo. 3s.

- Aeschinem et Isocratem, Scholia Graeca in. Edidit G. DINDORFIUS. 1852. 8vo. 4s.
Aeschines. See under Oratores Attici, and Demosthenes.
Aeschyl quae supersunt in Codice Laurentiano quoad effici potuit et ad cognitionem necesse est visum typis descripta edidit R. MERKEL. Small folio, 1l. 1s.
Aeschylus: Tragoediae et Fragmenta, ex recensione GUIL. DINDORFII. Second Edition, 1851. 8vo. 5s. 6d.
 — Annotationes GUIL. DINDORFII. Partes II. 1841. 8vo. 10s.

Oxford: Clarendon Press.

-
- Anecdota Graeca Oxoniensia. Edidit J. A. CRAMER, S.T.P. Tomi IV. 1835. 8vo. 1l. 2s.
- Graeca e Codd. mss. Bibliothecae Regiae Parisiensis. Edidit J. A. CRAMER, S.T.P. Tomi IV. 1839. 8vo. 1l. 2s.
- Apsinis et Longini Rhetorica. E Codicibus mss. recensuit JOH. BAKIUS. 1849. 8vo. 3s.
- Aristophanes. A Complete Concordance to the Comedies and Fragments. By HENRY DUNBAR, M.D. 4to. 1l. 1s.
- J. Caravellae Index in Aristophanem. 8vo. 3s.
- Comoediae et Fragmenta, ex recensione GUIL. DINDORFII. Tomi II. 1835. 8vo. 11s.
- Annotationes GUIL. DINDORFII. Partes II. 8vo. 11s.
- Scholia Graeca ex Codicibus aucta et emendata a GUIL. DINDORFIO. Partes III. 1838. 8vo. 1l.
- ARISTOTLE.
- Ex recensione IMMANUELIS BEKKERI. Accedunt Indices Sylburgiani. Tomi XI. 1837. 8vo. 2l. 10s.
The volumes (except vol. IX) may be had separately, price 5s. 6d. each.
- The Politics, with Introductions, Notes, etc., by W. L. NEWMAN, M.A., Fellow of Balliol College, Oxford. Vols. I and II. Medium 8vo. 28s.
- The Politics, translated into English, with Introduction, Marginal Analysis, Notes, and Indices, by B. JOWETT, M.A. Medium 8vo. 2 vols. 21s.
- Ethica Nicomachea, ex recensione IMMANUELIS BEKKERI. Crown 8vo. 5s.
- Aristotelian Studies. I. On the Structure of the Seventh Book of the Nicomachean Ethics. By J. C. WILSON, M.A. 8vo. Stiff covers, 5s.
- The English Manuscripts of the Nicomachean Ethics, described in relation to Bekker's Manuscripts and other Sources. By J. A. STEWART, M.A. (Anecdota Oxon.) Small 4to. 3s. 6d.
- On the History of the process by which the Aristotelian Writings arrived at their present form. By R. SHUTE, M.A. 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- Physics. Book VII. Collation of various mss.; with Introduction by R. SHUTE, M.A. (Anecdota Oxon.) Small 4to. 2s.
- Choerobosci Dictata in Theodosii Canones, necnon Epimerismi in Psalmos. E Codicibus mss. edidit THOMAS GAISFORD, S.T.P. Tomi III. 1842. 8vo. 15s.
-

Demosthenes. Ex recensione GUIL. DINDORFII. Tomi IX. 1846-1851. 8vo. 2l. 6s.

Separately:—

Textus. 1l. 1s. Annotations. 15s. Scholia. 10s.

Demosthenes and Aeschines. The Orations of Demosthenes and Aeschines on the Crown. With Introductory Essays and Notes. By G. A. SIMCOX, M.A., and W. H. SIMCOX, M.A. 8vo. 12s.

Euripides. Tragoediae et Fragmenta, ex recensione GUIL. DINDORFII. Tomi II. 1833. 8vo. 10s.

— Annotations GUIL. DINDORFII. Partes II. 1839. 8vo. 10s.

— Scholia Graeca, ex Codicibus aucta et emendata a GUIL. DINDORFIO. Tomi IV. 1863. 8vo. 1l. 16s.

— Alcestis, ex recensione G. DINDORFII. 1834. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

Harpocrationis Lexicon. Ex recensione G. DINDORFII. Tomi II. 1854. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

Hephaestionis Enchiridion, Terentianus Maurus, Proclus, etc. Edidit T. GAISFORD, S.T.P. Tomi II. 1855. 10s.

Heracliti Ephesii Reliquiae. Recensuit I. BYWATER, M.A. Appendicis loco additae sunt Diogenis Laertii Vita Heracliti, Particulae Hippocratei De Diaeta Lib. I., Epistolae Heracliteae. 8vo. 6s.

HOMER.

— A Complete Concordance to the Odyssey and Hymns of Homer; to which is added a Concordance to the Parallel Passages in the Iliad, Odyssey, and Hymns. By HENRY DUNBAR, M.D. 4to. 1l. 1s.

— Seberi Index in Homerum. 1780. 8vo. 6s. 6d.

— A Grammar of the Homeric Dialect. By D. B. MONRO, M.A. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

— Ilias, cum brevi Annotatione C. G. HEYNII. Accedunt Scholia minora. Tomi II. 1834. 8vo. 15s.

— Ilias, ex rec. GUIL. DINDORFII. 1856. 8vo. 5s. 6d.

— Scholia Graeca in Iliadem. Edited by W. DINDORF, after a new collation of the Venetian MSS. by D. B. MONRO, M.A., Provost of Oriel College. 4 vols. 8vo. 2l. 10s.

— Scholia Graeca in Iliadem Townleyana. Recensuit ERNESTUS MAASS. 2 vols. 8vo. 1l. 16s.

— Odyssea, ex rec. G. DINDORFII. 1855. 8vo. 5s. 6d.

— Scholia Graeca in Odysseam. Edidit GUIL. DINDORFIUS. Tomi II. 1855. 8vo. 15s. 6d.

— Odyssey. Books I-XII. Edited with English Notes, Appendices, etc. By W. W. MERRY, D.D., and the late JAMES RIDDELL, M.A. Second Edition. 8vo. 16s.

Oratores Attici, ex recensione BEKKERI :

- I. Antiphon, Andocides, et Lysias. 1823. 8vo. 7s.
- II. Isocrates. 1823. 8vo. 7s.
- III. Isaeus, Aeschines, Lycurgus, Dinarchus, etc. 1823. 8vo. 7s.

Paroemiographi Graeci, quorum pars nunc primum ex
Codd. mss. vulgatur. Edidit T. GAISFORD, S.T.P. 1836. 8vo. 5s. 6d.

PLATO.

- Apology, with a revised Text and English Notes, and a Digest of Platonic Idioms, by JAMES RIDDELL, M.A. 8vo. 8s. 6d.
- Philebus, with a revised Text and English Notes, by EDWARD POSTE, M.A. 1860. 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- Sophistes and Politicus, with a revised Text and English Notes, by L. CAMPBELL, M.A. 1867. 8vo. 18s.
- Theaetetus, with a revised Text and English Notes, by L. CAMPBELL, M.A. Second Edition. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- The Dialogues, translated into English, with Analyses and Introductions, by B. JOWETT, M.A. 5 vols. medium 8vo. 3l. 10s.
- The Republic, translated into English, with Analysis and Introduction, by B. JOWETT, M.A. Medium 8vo. 12s. 6d.; half-roan, 14s.
- Index to Plato. Compiled for Prof. Jowett's Translation of the Dialogues. By EVELYN ABBOTT, M.A. 8vo. Paper covers, 2s. 6d.

Plotinus. Edidit F. CREUZER. Tomi III. 1835. 4to. 1l. 8s.

Polybius. Selections. Edited by J. L. STRACHAN-DAVIDSON, M.A. With Maps. Medium 8vo. buckram, 21s.

SOPHOCLES.

- The Plays and Fragments. With English Notes and Introductions, by LEWIS CAMPBELL, M.A. 2 vols.
Vol. I. Oedipus Tyrannus. Oedipus Coloneus. Antigone. 8vo. 16s.
Vol. II. Ajax. Electra. Trachiniae. Philoctetes. Fragments. 8vo. 16s.
- Tragoediae et Fragmenta, ex recensione et cum commentariis GUIL. DINDORFII. Third Edition. 2 vols. Fcap. 8vo. 1l. 1s.
Each Play separately, limp, 2s. 6d.
- The Text alone, with large margin, small 4to. 8s.
- The Text alone, square 16mo. 3s. 6d.
Each Play separately, limp, 6d.
- Tragoediae et Fragmenta cum Annotationibus GUIL. DINDORFII. Tomi II. 1849. 8vo. 10s.
The Text, Vol. I. 5s. 6d. The Notes, Vol. II. 4s. 6d.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Amen Corner, E.C.

Stobaei Florilegium. Ad mss. fidem emendavit et supplevit T. GAISFORD, S.T.P. Tomi IV. 1822. 8vo. 1l.

— Eclogarum Physicarum et Ethicarum libri duo. Accedit Hieroclii Commentarius in aurea carmina Pythagoreorum. Ad mss. Codd. recensuit T. GAISFORD, S.T.P. Tomi II. 1850. 8vo. 11s.

Thucydides. Translated into English, with Introduction, Marginal Analysis, Notes, and Indices. By B. JOWETT, M.A., Regius Professor of Greek. 2 vols. Medium 8vo. 1l. 12s.

XENOPHON. Ex rec. et cum annotatt. L. DINDORFII.

I. Historia Graeca. Second Edition. 1853. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

II. Expositio Cyri. Second Edition. 1855. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

III. Institutio Cyri. 1857. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

IV. Memorabilia Socratis. 1862. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

V. Opuscula Politica Equestria et Venatica cum Arriani Libello de Venatione. 1866. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

GREEK EDUCATIONAL WORKS.

GRAMMARS, EXERCISE BOOKS, &c.

Chandler. The Elements of Greek Accentuation: abridged from his larger work by H. W. CHANDLER, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

Liddell and Scott. An Intermediate Greek-English Lexicon, abridged from LIDDELL and SCOTT's Seventh Edition. Small 4to. 12s. 6d.

Liddell and Scott. A Greek-English Lexicon, abridged from LIDDELL and SCOTT's 4to. edition. Square 12mo. 7s. 6d.

Miller. A Greek Testament Primer. An Easy Grammar and Reading Book for the use of Students beginning Greek. By the Rev. E. MILLER, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Moulton. The Ancient Classical Drama. A Study in Literary Evolution. Intended for Readers in English and in the Original. By R. G. MOULTON, M.A. Crown 8vo. 8s. 6d.

Wordsworth. A Greek Primer, for the use of beginners in that Language. By the Right Rev. CHARLES WORDSWORTH, D.C.L. Seventh Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

— Graecae Grammaticae Rudimenta in usum Scholarum. Auctore CAROLO WORDSWORTH, D.C.L. Nineteenth Edition. 12mo. 4s.

Passages for Translation into Greek Prose. By J. YOUNG SARGENT, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s.

Exemplaria Graeca. Being Selections from "Passages for Translation into Greek Prose." By the same author. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s.

Models and Materials for Greek Iambic Verse. By the same author. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.

- Græce Reddenda. By C. S. JERRAM, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.
- Reddenda Minora, or Easy Passages, Latin and Greek, for Unseen Translation. By C. S. JERRAM, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
- Anglice Reddenda, or Extracts, Latin and Greek, for Unseen Translation. By C. S. JERRAM, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.
- Anglice Reddenda. Second Series. By the same Author. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s.
- Golden Treasury of Ancient Greek Poetry. By R. S. WRIGHT, M.A. Second Edition. Revised by EVELYN ABBOTT, M.A., LL.D. Extra fcap. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- Golden Treasury of Greek Prose, being a Collection of the finest passages in the principal Greek Prose Writers, with Introductory Notices and Notes. By R. S. WRIGHT, M.A., and J. E. L. SHADWELL, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.

GREEK READERS.

- Easy Greek Reader. By EVELYN ABBOTT, M.A. In one or two Parts. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s.
- First Greek Reader. By W. G. RUSHBROOKE, M.L. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.
- Second Greek Reader. By A. M. BELL, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- Specimens of Greek Dialects; being a Fourth Greek Reader. With Introductions, etc. By W. W. MERRY, D.D. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.
- Selections from Homer and the Greek Dramatists; being a Fifth Greek Reader. With Explanatory Notes and Introductions to the Study of Greek Epic and Dramatic Poetry. By EVELYN ABBOTT, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.

GREEK CLASSICS FOR SCHOOLS.

- Aeschylus. In Single Plays. Extra fcap. 8vo.
- I. Agamemnon. With Introduction and Notes, by ARTHUR SIDGWICK, M.A. Third Edition. 3s.
 - II. Choephoroi. By the same Editor. 3s.
 - III. Eumenides. By the same Editor. 3s.
 - IV. Prometheus Bound. With Introduction and Notes, by A. O. PRICKARD, M.A. Second Edition. 2s.

London : HENRY FROWDE, Amen Corner, E.C.

Aristophanes. In Single Plays. Edited, with English Notes, Introductions, &c., by W. W. MERRY, D.D. Extra fcap. 8vo.

I. The Acharnians. Third Edition, 3s.

II. The Clouds. Third Edition, 3s.

III. The Frogs. Second Edition, 3s.

IV. The Knights. Second Edition, 3s.

V. The Birds. 3s. 6d.

Cebes. Tabula. With Introduction and Notes. By C. S. JERRAM, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

Demosthenes. Orations against Philip. With Introduction and Notes, by EVELYN ABBOTT, M.A., and P. E. MATHESON, M.A.

Vol. I. Philippic I. Olynthiacs I-III. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s.

Vol. II. De Pace, Philippic II, De Chersoneso, Philippic III. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.

Euripides. In Single Plays. Extra fcap. 8vo.

I. Alcestis. Edited by C. S. JERRAM, M.A. 2s. 6d.

II. Hecuba. Edited by C. H. RUSSELL, M.A. 2s. 6d.

III. Helena. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, etc., for Upper and Middle Forms. By C. S. JERRAM, M.A. 3s.

IV. Heracleidae. By C. S. JERRAM, M.A. 3s.

V. Iphigenia in Tauris. By the same Editor. 3s.

VI. Medea. By C. B. HEBERDEN, M.A. 2s.

Herodotus. Book IX. Edited, with Notes, by EVELYN ABBOTT, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s.

— Selections. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by W. W. MERRY, D.D. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

Homer.

I. Iliad, Books I-XII. With an Introduction and a brief Homeric Grammar, and Notes. By D. B. MONRO, M.A. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 6s.

II. Iliad, Books XIII-XXIV. With Notes. By the same Editor. Extra fcap. 8vo. 6s.

III. Iliad, Book I. By D. B. MONRO, M.A. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.

IV. Iliad, Books VI and XXI. With Introduction and Notes. By HERBERT HAILSTONE, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d. each.

Homer (continued).

V. Odyssey, Books I–XII. By W. W. MERRY, D.D.
Fortieth Thousand. Extra fcap. 8vo. 5s.

Books I and II, separately, each 1s. 6d.

VI. Odyssey, Books XIII–XXIV. By the same Editor.
Extra fcap. 8vo. 5s.

Lucian. Vera Historia. By C. S. JERRAM, M.A. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Lysias. Epitaphios. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by F. J. SNELL, B.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.

Plato. Meno. With Introduction and Notes. By St.
GEORGE STOCK, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

— The Apology. With Introduction and Notes. By St.
GEORGE STOCK, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

Sophocles. For the use of Schools. Edited with Introductions and English Notes. By LEWIS CAMPBELL, M.A., and EVELYN ABBOTT, M.A. New and Revised Edition. 2 vols. Extra fcap. 8vo.
10s. 6d.

Sold separately: Vol. I, Text, 4s. 6d.; Vol. II, Explanatory Notes, 6s.

Or in single Plays:—

Oedipus Coloneus, Antigone, 1s. 9d. each; Oedipus Tyrannus, Ajax, Electra, Trachiniae, Philoctetes, 2s. each.

Sophocles. Oedipus Rex: Dindorf's Text, with Notes by the present Bishop of St. David's. Extra fcap. 8vo. limp, 1s. 6d.

Theocritus (for Schools). With English Notes. By H.
KYNASTON, D.D. (late SNOW). Third Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.

XENOPHON. Easy Selections (for Junior Classes). With a Vocabulary, Notes, and Map. By J. S. PHILLPOTTS, B.C.L., and C. S.
JERRAM, M.A. Third Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

— Selections (for Schools). With Notes and Maps. By J. S. PHILLPOTTS, B.C.L. Fourth Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

— Anabasis, Book I. Edited for the use of Junior Classes and Private Students. With Introduction, Notes, etc. By J. MARSHALL, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

— Anabasis, Book II. With Notes and Map. By C. S.
JERRAM, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.

— Anabasis, Book III. With Introduction, Analysis,
Notes, etc. By J. MARSHALL, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

Xenophon (continued).

- Vocabulary to the Anabasis. By J. MARSHALL, M.A.
Extra fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
- Cyropaedia, Book I. With Introduction and Notes. By
C. BIGG, D.D. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.
- Cyropaedia, Books IV and V. With Introduction and Notes. By C. BIGG, D.D. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.
- Hellenica, Books I, II. With Introduction and Notes.
By G. E. UNDERHILL, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s.
- Memorabilia. By J. MARSHALL, M.A. In the Press.

SECTION V.

ORIENTAL LANGUAGES*.THE SACRED BOOKS OF THE EAST.

TRANSLATED BY VARIOUS ORIENTAL SCHOLARS, AND EDITED BY
F. MAX MÜLLER.

First Series, Vols. I—XXIV. Demy 8vo. cloth.

- Vol. I. The Upanishads. Translated by F. MAX MÜLLER.
Part I. 10s. 6d.
- Vol. II. The Sacred Laws of the Âryas, as taught in the Schools of Âpastamba, Gautama, Vâsishthâ, and Baudhâyana. Translated by Prof. GEORG BÜHLER. Part I. 10s. 6d.
- Vol. III. The Sacred Books of China. The Texts of Confucianism. Translated by JAMES LEGGE. Part I. 12s. 6d.
- Vol. IV. The Zend-Avesta. Part I. The Vendidad. Translated by JAMES DARMESTETER. 10s. 6d.
- Vol. V. The Pahlavi Texts. Translated by E. W. WEST.
Part I. 12s. 6d.
- Vols. VI and IX. The Qur'ân. Translated by E. H.
PALMER. 21s.
- Vol. VII. The Institutes of Vishnu. Translated by JULIUS JOLLY. 10s. 6d.
- Vol. VIII. The Bhagavadgîtâ, with The Sanatsugâtîya, and The Anugîtâ. Translated by KÂSHINÂTH TRIMBAK TELANG. 10s. 6d.

* See also ANECDOTA OXON., Series II, III, pp. 32, 33, below.

The Sacred Books of the East (continued).

- Vol. X. The Dhammapada, translated from Pāli by F. MAX MÜLLER; and The Sutta-Nipāta, translated from Pāli by V. FAUSBÖLL; being Canonical Books of the Buddhists. 10s. 6d.
- Vol. XI. Buddhist Suttas. Translated from Pāli by T. W. RHYS DAVIDS. 10s. 6d.
- Vol. XII. The Satapatha-Brāhmaṇa, according to the Text of the Mādhyandina School. Translated by JULIUS EGGEING. Part I. Books I and II. 12s. 6d.
- Vol. XIII. Vinaya Texts. Translated from the Pāli by T. W. RHYS DAVIDS and HERMANN OLDENBERG. Part I. 10s. 6d.
- Vol. XIV. The Sacred Laws of the Āryas, as taught in the Schools of Āpastamba, Gautama, Vāsishtā and Baudhāyana. Translated by GEORG BÜHLER. Part II. 10s. 6d.
- Vol. XV. The Upanishads. Translated by F. MAX MÜLLER. Part II. 10s. 6d.
- Vol. XVI. The Sacred Books of China. The Texts of Confucianism. Translated by JAMES LEGGE. Part II. 10s. 6d.
- Vol. XVII. Vinaya Texts. Translated from the Pāli by T. W. RHYS DAVIDS and HERMANN OLDENBERG. Part II. 10s. 6d.
- Vol. XVIII. Pahlavi Texts. Translated by E. W. WEST. Part II. 12s. 6d.
- Vol. XIX. The Fo-sho-hing-tsan-king. A Life of Buddha by Asvaghosha Bodhisattva, translated from Sanskrit into Chinese by Dharmaraksha, A.D. 420, and from Chinese into English by SAMUEL BEAL. 10s. 6d.
- Vol. XX. Vinaya Texts. Translated from the Pāli by T. W. RHYS DAVIDS and HERMANN OLDENBERG. Part III. 10s. 6d.
- Vol. XXI. The Saddharma-puṇḍarīka; or, the Lotus of the True Law. Translated by H. KERN. 12s. 6d.
- Vol. XXII. Gāyā-Sūtras. Translated from Prākṛit by HERMANN JACOBI. Part I. 10s. 6d.
- Vol. XXIII. The Zend-Avesta. Part II. Translated by JAMES DARMESTETER. 10s. 6d.
- Vol. XXIV. Pahlavi Texts. Translated by E. W. WEST. Part III. 10s. 6d.
-

London: HENRY FROWDE, Amen Corner, E.C.

THE SACRED BOOKS OF THE EAST. (Second Series.)

Vol. XXV. Manu. Translated by GEORG BÜHLER. 21s.

Vol. XXVI. The Satapatha-Brâhmana. Translated by JULIUS EGGEING. Part II. 12s. 6d.

Vols. XXVII and XXVIII. The Sacred Books of China. The Texts of Confucianism. Translated by JAMES LEGGE. Parts III and IV. 25s.

Vols. XXIX and XXX. The Grihya-Sûtras, Rules of Vedic Domestic Ceremonies. Translated by HERMANN OLDENBERG.

Part I (Vol. XXIX). 12s. 6d.

Part II (Vol. XXX). In the Press.

Vol. XXXI. The Zend-Avesta. Part III. Translated by L. H. MILLS. 12s. 6d.

Vol. XXXIII. Nârada, and some Minor Law-books. Translated by JULIUS JOLLY. 10s. 6d.

Vol. XXXIV. The Vedânta-Sûtras, with Saṅkara's Commentary. Translated by G. THIBAUT. 12s. 6d.

The following Volumes are in the Press :—

Vol. XXXII. Vedic Hymns. Translated by F. MAX MÜLLER. Part I.

Vol. XXXV. Milinda. Translated by T. W. RHYS DAVIDS.

ARABIC. A Practical Arabic Grammar. Part I. Compiled by A. O. GREEN, Brigade Major, Royal Engineers. Second Edition, Enlarged. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

CHINESE. Catalogue of the Chinese Translation of the Buddhist Tripitaka, the Sacred Canon of the Buddhists in China and Japan. Compiled by BUNYIU NANJIO. 4to. 1l. 12s. 6d.

— Handbook of the Chinese Language. Parts I and II. Grammar and Chrestomathy. By JAMES SUMMERS. 8vo. 1l. 8s.

CHINESE. Record of Buddhistic Kingdoms; being an Account by the Chinese Monk FÂ-HIEN of his travels in India and Ceylon (A.D. 399-414) in search of the Buddhist Books of Discipline. Translated and annotated, with a Korean recension of the Chinese Text, by JAMES LEGGE, M.A., LL.D. Crown 4to., boards, 10s. 6d.

Oxford: Clarendon Press.

CHALDEE. Book of Tobit. A Chaldee Text, from a unique MS. in the Bodleian Library; with other Rabbinical Texts, English Translations, and the Itala. Edited by AD. NEUBAUER, M.A. Crown 8vo. 6s.

COPTIC. Libri Prophetarum Majorum, cum Lamentationibus Jeremiae, in Dialecto Linguae Aegyptiacae Memphitica seu Coptica. Edidit cum Versione Latina H. TATTAM, S.T.P. Tomi II. 1852. 8vo. 17s.

— Libri duodecim Prophetarum Minorum in Ling. Aegypt. vulgo Coptica. Edidit H. TATTAM, A.M. 1836. 8vo. 8s. 6d.

— Novum Testamentum Coptice, cura D. WILKINS. 1716. 4to. 12s. 6d.

HEBREW. Psalms in Hebrew (without points). Cr. 8vo. 2s.

Driver. Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Books of Samuel. By S. R. DRIVER, D.D. 8vo. 14s. Just Published.

— Treatise on the use of the Tenses in Hebrew. By S. R. DRIVER, D.D. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

— Commentary on the Book of Proverbs. Attributed to Abraham Ibn Ezra. Edited from a Manuscript in the Bodleian Library by S. R. DRIVER, D.D. Crown 8vo. paper covers, 3s. 6d.

Neubauer. Book of Hebrew Roots, by Abu 'l-Walid Marwān ibn Janāh, otherwise called Rabbi Yōnāh. Now first edited, with an Appendix, by AD. NEUBAUER. 4to. 2l. 7s. 6d.

Spurrell. Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Book of Genesis. By G. J. SPURRELL, M.A. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

Wickes. Hebrew Accentuation of Psalms, Proverbs, and Job. By WILLIAM WICKES, D.D. 8vo. 5s.

— Hebrew Prose Accentuation. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

SANSKRIT.—Sanskrit-English Dictionary, Etymologically and Philologically arranged, with special reference to Greek, Latin, German, Anglo-Saxon, English, and other cognate Indo-European Languages. By Sir M. MONIER-WILLIAMS, D.C.L. 4to. 4l. 14s. 6d.

— Practical Grammar of the Sanskrit Language, arranged with reference to the Classical Languages of Europe, by Sir M. MONIER-WILLIAMS, D.C.L. Fourth Edition. 8vo. 15s.

— Nalopākhyānam. Story of Nala, an Episode of the Mahābhārata: the Sanskrit Text, with a copious Vocabulary, and an improved version of Dean Milman's Translation, by Sir M. MONIER-WILLIAMS, D.C.L. Second Edition, Revised and Improved. 8vo. 15s.

— Sakuntalā. A Sanskrit Drama, in seven Acts. Edited by Sir M. MONIER-WILLIAMS, D.C.L. Second Edition. 8vo. 1l. 1s.

SYRIAC.—Thesaurus Syriacus: collegerunt Quatremère, Bernstein, Lorschach, Arnoldi, Agrell, Field, Roediger: edidit R. PAYNE SMITH, S.T.P. Vol. I. containing Fasc. I-V. Sm. fol. 5l. 5s.

Fasc. VI. 1l. 1s. Fasc. VII. 1l. 11s. 6d. Fasc. VIII. 1l. 16s.

SYRIAC (continued.)

- The Book of Kallilah and Dimnah. Translated from Arabic into Syriac. Edited by W. WRIGHT, LL.D. 8vo. 1*l.* 1*s.*
- Cyriilli Archiepiscopi Alexandrini Commentarii in Lucae Evangelium quae supersunt Syriace. E MSS. apud Mus. Britan. edidit R. PAYNE SMITH, A.M. 4to. 1*l.* 2*s.*
- — Translated by R. PAYNE SMITH, M.A. 2 vols. 8vo. 14*s.*
- Ephraemi Syri, Rabulae Episcopi Edesseni, Balaei, etc., Opera Selecta. E Codd. Syriacis mss. in Museo Britannico et Bibliotheca Bodleiana asservatis primus edidit J. J. OVERBECK. 8vo. 1*l.* 1*s.*
- John, Bishop of Ephesus. The Third Part of his Ecclesiastical History. [In Syriac.] Now first edited by WILLIAM CURETON, M.A. 4to. 1*l.* 12*s.*
- — Translated by R. PAYNE SMITH, M.A. 8vo. 10*s.*

SECTION VI.

ANECDOTA OXONIENSIA.

(Crown 4to., stiff covers.)

I. CLASSICAL SERIES.

- I. The English Manuscripts of the Nicomachean Ethics. By J. A. STEWART, M.A. 3*s.* 6*d.*
- II. Nonius Marcellus, de Compendiosa Doctrina, Harleian MS. 2719. Collated by J. H. ONIONS, M.A. 3*s.* 6*d.*
- III. Aristotle's Physics. Book VII. With Introduction by R. SHUTE, M.A. 2*s.*
- IV. Bentley's Plautine Emendations. From his copy of Gronovius. By E. A. SONNENSCHNEIN, M.A. 2*s.* 6*d.*
- V. Harleian MS. 2610; Ovid's Metamorphoses I, II, III. 1-622; XXIV Latin Epigrams from Bodleian or other MSS.; Latin Glosses on Apollinaris Sidonius from MS. Digby 172. Collated and Edited by ROBINSON ELLIS, M.A., LL.D. 4*s.*

II. SEMITIC SERIES.

- I. Commentary on Ezra and Nehemiah. By Rabbi Saadiah. Edited by H. J. MATHEWS, M.A. 3*s.* 6*d.*
- II. The Book of the Bee. Edited by ERNEST A. WALLIS BUDGE, M.A. 21*s.*
- III. A Commentary on the Book of Daniel. By Japhet Ibn Ali. Edited and Translated by D. S. MARGOLIOUTH, M.A. 21*s.*
- IV. Mediaeval Jewish Chronicles and Chronological Notes. Edited by AD. NEUBAUER, M.A. 14*s.*

Oxford: Clarendon Press.

ANECDOTA OXONIENSIA (continued).

III. ARYAN SERIES.

- I. Buddhist Texts from Japan. 1. Vagrakkhedikā. Edited by F. MAX MÜLLER. 3s. 6d.
- II. Buddhist Texts from Japan. 2. Sukhāvati Vyūha. Edited by F. MAX MÜLLER, M.A., and BUNYIU NANJIO. 7s. 6d.
- III. Buddhist Texts from Japan. 3. The Ancient Palm-leaves containing the Pragñā-Pāramitā-Hridaya-Sūtra and the Uśaiśa-Vigaya-Dhāraṇī, edited by F. MAX MÜLLER, M.A., and BUNYIU NANJIO, M.A. With an Appendix by G. BÜHLER. 10s.
- IV. Kātyāyana's Sarvānukramanī of the R̥gveda. With Extracts from Shadguruśiṣya's Commentary entitled Vedārthadīpikā. Edited by A. A. MACDONELL, M.A., Ph.D. 16s.
- V. The Dharma Saṃgraha. Edited by KENJIU KASAWARA, F. MAX MÜLLER, and H. WENZEL. 7s. 6d.

IV. MEDIAEVAL AND MODERN SERIES.

- I. Sinonoma Bartholomei. Edited by J. L. G. MOWAT, M.A. 3s. 6d.
- II. Alphita. Edited by J. L. G. MOWAT, M.A. 12s. 6d.
- III. The Saltair Na Rann. Edited from a MS. in the Bodleian Library, by WHITLEY STOKES, D.C.L. 7s. 6d.
- IV. The Cath Finntrága, or Battle of Ventry. Edited by KUNO MEYER, Ph.D., M.A. 6s.
- V. Lives of Saints, from the Book of Lismore. Edited, with Translation, by WHITLEY STOKES, D.C.L. 1l. 11s. 6d. Just Published.

II. THEOLOGY.

A. THE HOLY SCRIPTURES, ETC.

- COPTIC. Libri Prophetarum Majorum, cum Lamentationibus Jeremiae, in Dialecto Linguae Aegyptiacae Memphitica seu Coptica. Edidit cum Versione Latina H. TATTAM, S.T.P. Tomi II. 1852. 8vo. 17s.
- Libri duodecim Prophetarum Minorum in Ling. Aegypt. vulgo Coptica. Edidit H. TATTAM, A.M. 1836. 8vo. 8s. 6d.
- Novum Testamentum Coptice, cura D. WILKINS. 1716. 4to. 12s. 6d.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Amen Corner, E.C.

D

ENGLISH. The Holy Bible in the Earliest English Versions, made from the Latin Vulgate by JOHN WYCLIFFE and his followers : edited by FORSHALL and MADDEN. 4 vols. 1850. Royal 4to. 3l. 3s.

Also reprinted from the above, with Introduction and Glossary by W. W. SKEAT, Litt. D.

I. The Books of Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

II. The New Testament. Extra fcap. 8vo. 6s.

— The Holy Bible : an exact reprint, page for page, of the Authorised Version published in the year 1611. Demy 4to. half bound. 1l. 1s.

— The Holy Bible, Revised Version*.

Cheap editions for School Use.

Revised Bible. Pearl 16mo., cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

Revised New Testament. Nonpareil 32mo., 6d. ; Brevier 16mo., 1s. ; Long Primer 8vo., 1s. 6d.

— The Oxford Bible for Teachers, containing supplementary, HELPS TO THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE, including summaries of the several Books, with copious explanatory notes ; and Tables illustrative of Scripture History and the characteristics of Bible Lands with a complete Index of Subjects, a Concordance, a Dictionary of Proper Names, and a series of Maps. Prices in various sizes and bindings from 3s. to 2l. 5s.

— Helps to the Study of the Bible, taken from the OXFORD BIBLE FOR TEACHERS. Crown 8vo., 3s. 6d.

— The Psalter, or Psalms of David, and certain Canticles, with a Translation and Exposition in English, by RICHARD ROLLE of Ham-pole. Edited by H. R. BRAMLEY, M.A., Fellow of S. M. Magdalen College, Oxford. With an Introduction and Glossary. Demy 8vo. 1l. 1s.

— Studia Biblica. Essays in Biblical Archæology and Criticism, and kindred subjects. By Members of the University of Oxford. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

— Lectures on the Book of Job. Delivered in Westminster Abbey by the Very Rev. G. G. BRADLEY, D.D. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

— Lectures on Ecclesiastes. By the same Author. Cr. 8vo. 4s. 6d.

— The Book of Wisdom : the Greek Text, the Latin Vulgate, and the Authorised English Version ; with an Introduction, Critical Apparatus, and a Commentary. By W. J. DEANE, M.A. 4to. 12s. 6d.

— The Five Books of Maccabees, in English, with Notes and Illustrations by HENRY COTTON, D.C.L. 1832. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

* The Revised Version is the joint property of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge.

Oxford : Clarendon Press.

ENGLISH (continued).

-
- List of Editions of the Bible in English. By HENRY COTTON, D.C.L. Second Edition. 1852. 8vo. 8s. 6d.
- Rhemes and Doway. An attempt to shew what has been done by Roman Catholics for the diffusion of the Holy Scriptures in English. By HENRY COTTON, D.C.L. 1855. 8vo. 9s.
- GOTHIC. Evangeliorum Versio Gothica, cum Interpr. et Annot. E. BENZELII. Edidit E. LYE, A.M. 4to. 12s. 6d.
- The Gospel of St. Mark in Gothic, according to the translation made by WULFILA in the Fourth Century. Edited by W. W. SKEAT, Litt. D. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s.
- GREEK. Old Testament. Vetus Testamentum ex Versione Septuaginta Interpretum secundum exemplar Vaticanum Romae editum. Accedit potior varietas Codicis Alexandrini. Tomi III. 18mo. 18s.
- Vetus Testamentum Graece cum Variis Lectionibus. Editionem a R. HOLMES, S.T.P. inchoatam continuavit J. PARSONS, S.T.B. Tomi V. 1798–1827. folio, 7l.
- Origenis Hexaplorum quæ supersunt; sive, Veterum Interpretum Graecorum in totum Vetus Testamentum Fragmenta. Edidit FRIDERICUS FIELD, A.M. 2 vols. 1875. 4to. 5l. 5s.
- Essays in Biblical Greek. By EDWIN HATCH, M.A., D.D. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- New Testament. Novum Testamentum Graece. Antiquissimorum Codicum Textus in ordine parallelo dispositi. Edidit E. H. HANSELL, S.T.B. Tomi III. 8vo. 24s.
- Novum Testamentum Graece. Accedunt parallela S. Scripturae loca, etc. Edidit CAROLUS LLOYD, S.T.P.R. 18mo. 3s. On writing paper, with wide margin, 10s. 6d.
- Critical Appendices to the above, by W. SANDAY, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.
- Novum Testamentum Graece juxta Exemplar Millianum. 18mo. 2s. 6d. On writing paper, with wide margin, 9s.
- Evangelia Sacra Graece. Fcap. 8vo. limp, 1s. 6d.
- The Greek Testament, with the Readings adopted by the Revisers of the Authorised Version:—
- (1) Pica type, with Marginal References. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d.
 - (2) Long Primer type. Fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.
 - (3) The same, on writing paper, with wide margin, 15s.
- The New Testament in Greek and English. Edited by E. CARDWELL, D.D. 2 vols. 1837. Crown 8vo. 6s.
-

GREEK (continued).

- The Parallel New Testament, Greek and English; being the Authorised Version, 1611; the Revised Version, 1881; and the Greek Text followed in the Revised Version. 8vo. 12s. 6d.
- Diatessaron; sive Historia Jesu Christi ex ipsis Evangelistarum verbis apte dispositis confecta. Ed. J. WHITE. 3s. 6d.

- Outlines of Textual Criticism applied to the New Testament. By C. E. HAMMOND, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- A Greek Testament Primer. An Easy Grammar and Reading Book for the use of Students beginning Greek. By E. MILLER, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- Canon Muratorianus: the earliest Catalogue of the Books of the New Testament. Edited with Notes and a Facsimile of the MS. in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, by S. P. TREGELLES, LL.D. 1867. 4to. 10s. 6d.

HEBREW, etc. Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Book of Genesis. By G. J. SPURRELL, M.A. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

- Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Books of Samuel. By S. R. DRIVER, D.D. 8vo. 14s.
- The Psalms in Hebrew without points. Stiff covers, 2s.
- A Commentary on the Book of Proverbs. Attributed to ABRAHAM IBN EZRA. Edited from a MS. in the Bodleian Library by S. R. DRIVER, D.D. Crown 8vo. paper covers, 3s. 6d.
- The Book of Tobit. A Chaldee Text, from a unique MS. in the Bodleian Library; with other Rabbinical Texts, English Translations, and the Itala. Edited by AD. NEUBAUER, M.A. Crown 8vo. 6s.
- Hebrew Accentuation of Psalms, Proverbs, and Job. By WILLIAM WICKES, D.D. 8vo. 5s.
- Hebrew Prose Accentuation. By the same. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- Horae Hebraicae et Talmudicae, a J. LIGHTFOOT. A new Edition, by R. GANDELL, M.A. 4 vols. 1859. 8vo. 1l. 1s.

LATIN. Libri Psalmorum Versio antiqua Latina, cum Paraphrasi Anglo-Saxonica. Edidit B. THORPE, F.A.S. 1835. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

- Nouum Testamentum Domini Nostri Iesu Christi Latine, secundum Editionem Sancti Hieronymi. Ad Codicum Manuscriptorum fidem recensuit IOHANNES WORDSWORTH, S.T.P., Episcopus Sarisburiensis; in operis societatem adsumto HENRICO IULIANO WHITE, A.M. Partis Prioris Fasciculus Primus. Euangelium Secundum Mattheum. Quarto, Paper covers, 12s. 6d.
- Old-Latin Biblical Texts: No. I. The Gospel according to St. Matthew, from the St. Germain MS. (g₁). Edited with Introduction and Appendices by JOHN WORDSWORTH, D.D. Small 4to., stiff covers, 6s.

LATIN (continued).

- Old-Latin Biblical Texts: No. II. Portions of the Gospels according to St. Mark and St. Matthew, from the Bobbio MS. (k), &c. Edited by JOHN WORDSWORTH, D.D., W. SANDAY, M.A., D.D., and H. J. WHITE, M.A. Small 4to., stiff covers, 21s.
- Old-Latin Biblical Texts: No. III. The Four Gospels, from the Munich MS. (q), now numbered Lat. 6224 in the Royal Library at Munich. With a Fragment from St. John in the Hof-Bibliothek at Vienna (Cod. Lat. 502). Edited, with the aid of Tischendorf's transcript (under the direction of the Bishop of Salisbury), by H. J. WHITE, M.A. Small 4to. stiff covers, 12s. 6d.
- OLD-FRENCH. Libri Psalmorum Versio antiqua Gallica e Cod. ms. in Bibl. Bodleiana adservato, una cum Versione Metrica aliisque Monumentis pervetustis. Nunc primum descriptis et editis FRANCISCUS MICHEL, Phil. Doc. 1860. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

B. FATHERS OF THE CHURCH, ETC.

- St. Athanasius: Orations against the Arians. With an Account of his Life by WILLIAM BRIGHT, D.D. Crown 8vo. 9s.
- Historical Writings, according to the Benedictine Text. With an Introduction by W. BRIGHT, D.D. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- St. Augustine: Select Anti-Pelagian Treatises, and the Acts of the Second Council of Orange. With an Introduction by WILLIAM BRIGHT, D.D. Crown 8vo. 9s.
- Barnabas, The Editio Princeps of the Epistle of, by Archbishop Ussher, as printed at Oxford, A.D. 1642, and preserved in an imperfect form in the Bodleian Library. With a Dissertation on the Literary History of that Edition, by J. H. BACKHOUSE, M.A. Small 4to. 3s. 6d.
- Canons of the First Four General Councils of Nicaea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.
- Notes on the above. By WILLIAM BRIGHT, D.D. Crown 8vo. 5s. 6d.
- Catenae Graecorum Patrum in Novum Testamentum. Edidit J. A. CRAMER, S.T.P. Tomi VIII. 8vo. 2l. 4s.
- Clementis Alexandrini Opera, ex recensione Guil. Dindorfii. Tomi IV. 8vo. 3l.
- Cyrilli Archiepiscopi Alexandrini in XII Prophetas. Edidit P. E. PUSEY, A.M. Tomi II. 8vo. 2l. 2s.
- in D. Joannis Evangelium. Accedunt Fragmenta Varia necnon Tractatus ad Tiberium Diaconum Duo. Edidit post Aubertum P. E. PUSEY, A.M. Tomi III. 8vo. 2l. 5s.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Amen Corner, E.C.

- Cyrelli Commentarii in Lucae Evangelium quae supersunt Syriace. E MSS. apud Mus. Britan. edidit R. PAYNE SMITH, A.M. 4to. 1l. 2s.
- — — Translated by R. PAYNE SMITH, M.A. 2 vols. 8vo. 14s.
- Dowling (J. G.). Notitia Scriptorum SS. Patrum aliorumque vet. Eccles. Mon. quae in Collectionibus Anecdotorum post annum Christi MDCC. in lucem editis continentur. 8vo. 4s. 6d.
- Ephraemi Syri, Rabulae Episcopi Edesseni, Balaei, aliorumque Opera Selecta. E Codd. Syriacis mss. in Museo Britannico et Bibliotheca Bodleiana asservatis primus edidit J. J. OVERBECK. 8vo. 1l. 1s.
- Eusebii Pamphili Evangelicae Praeparationis Libri XV. Ad Codd. mss. recensuit T. GAISFORD, S.T.P. Tomi IV. 8vo. 1l. 10s.
- Evangelicae Demonstrationis Libri X. Recensuit T. GAISFORD, S.T.P. Tomi II. 8vo. 15s.
- contra Hieroclem et Marcellum Libri. Recensuit T. GAISFORD, S.T.P. 8vo. 7s.
- Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History, according to the text of BURTON, with an Introduction by W. BRIGHT, D.D. Crown 8vo. 8s. 6d.
- — — Annotations Variorum. Tomi II. 8vo. 17s.
- Evagrii Historia Ecclesiastica, ex recensione H. VALESII. 1844. 8vo. 4s.
- Irenaeus: The Third Book of St. Irenaeus, Bishop of Lyons, against Heresies. With short Notes and a Glossary by H. DEANE, B.D. Crown 8vo. 5s. 6d.
- Origenis Philosophumena; sive omnium Haeresium Refutatio. E Codice Parisino nunc primum edidit EMMANUEL MILLER. 1851. 8vo. 10s.
- Patrum Apostolicorum, S. Clementis Romani, S. Ignatii, S. Polycarpi, quae supersunt. Edidit GUIL. JACOBSON, S.T.P.R. Tomi II. Fourth Edition. 8vo. 1l. 1s.
- Reliquiae Sacrae secundi tertique saeculi. Recensuit M. J. ROUTH, S.T.P. Tomi V. Second Edition. 8vo. 1l. 5s.
- Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Opuscula. Recensuit M. J. ROUTH, S.T.P. Tomi II. Third Edition. 8vo. 10s.
- Socratis Scholastici Historia Ecclesiastica. Gr. et Lat. Edidit R. HUSSEY, S.T.B. Tomi III. 1853. 8vo. 15s.
- Socrates' Ecclesiastical History, according to the Text of HUSSEY, with an Introduction by WILLIAM BRIGHT, D.D. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

- Sozomeni Historia Ecclesiastica. Edidit R. HUSSEY, S.T.B.
Tomi III. 1860. 8vo. 15s.
- Tertulliani Apologeticus adversus Gentes pro Christianis.
Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by T. HERBERT BINDLEY, M.A.
Crown 8vo. 6s.
- Theodoretii Ecclesiasticae Historiae Libri V. Recensuit
T. GAISFORD, S.T.P. 1854. 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- Graecarum Affectionum Curatio. Ad Codices mss. recensuit T. GAISFORD, S.T.P. 1839. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

C. ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY, ETC.

- Baedae Historia Ecclesiastica. Edited, with English Notes, by G. H. MOBERLY, M.A. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- Bigg. The Christian Platonists of Alexandria; being the Bampton Lectures for 1886. By CHARLES BIGG, D.D. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- Bingham's Antiquities of the Christian Church, and other Works. 10 vols. 8vo. 3l. 3s.
- Bright. Chapters of Early English Church History. By W. BRIGHT, D.D. Second Edition. 8vo. 12s.
- Burnet's History of the Reformation of the Church of England.
A new Edition. Carefully revised, and the Records collated with the originals, by N. POCOCK, M.A. 7 vols. 8vo. 1l. 10s.
- Cardwell's Documentary Annals of the Reformed Church of England; being a Collection of Injunctions, Declarations, Orders, Articles of Inquiry, &c. from 1546 to 1716. 2 vols. 8vo. 18s.
- Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain and Ireland. Edited, after SPELMAN and WILKINS, by A. W.
HADDAN, B.D., and W. STUBBS, D.D. Vols. I and III. Medium
8vo. each 1l. 1s.
- Vol. II, Part I. Medium 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- Vol. II, Part II. Church of Ireland; Memorials of St. Patrick.
Stiff covers, 3s. 6d.
- Formularies of Faith set forth by the King's authority during the Reign of Henry VIII. 8vo. 7s.
- Fuller's Church History of Britain. Edited by J. S. BREWER,
M.A. 6 vols. 8vo. 1l. 19s.
- Gibson's Synodus Anglicana. Edited by E. CARDWELL, D.D.
8vo. 6s.
- Hamilton's (Archbishop John) Catechism, 1552. Edited, with Introduction and Glossary, by THOMAS GRAVES LAW, Librarian of the Signet Library, Edinburgh. With a Preface by the Right Hon. W. E.
GLADSTONE. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d.

- Hussey. Rise of the Papal Power, traced in three Lectures. By ROBERT HUSSEY, B.D. Second Edition. Fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.
- Inett's Origines Anglicanae (in continuation of Stillingfleet). Edited by J. GRIFFITHS, M.A. 3 vols. 8vo. 15s.
- John, Bishop of Ephesus. The Third Part of his Ecclesiastical History. [In Syriac.] Now first edited by WILLIAM CURETON, M.A. 4to. 1l. 12s.
- The same, translated by R. PAYNE SMITH, M.A. 8vo. 10s.
- Le Neve's Fasti Ecclesiae Anglicanae. Corrected and continued from 1715 to 1853 by T. DUFFUS HARDY. 3 vols. 8vo. 1l. 1s.
- Noelli (A.) Catechismus sive prima institutio disciplinae Pietatis Christianae Latine explicata. Editio nova cura GUIL. JACOBSON, A.M. 8vo. 5s. 6d.
- Prideaux's Connection of Sacred and Profane History. 2 vols. 8vo. 10s.
- Primers put forth in the Reign of Henry VIII. 8vo. 5s.
- Records of the Reformation. The Divorce, 1527–1533. Mostly now for the first time printed from MSS. in the British Museum and other Libraries. Collected and arranged by N. POOCK, M.A. 2 vols. 8vo. 1l. 16s.
- Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum. The Reformation of Ecclesiastical Laws, as attempted in the reigns of Henry VIII, Edward VI, and Elizabeth. Edited by E. CARDWELL, D.D. 8vo. 6s. 6d.
- Shirley. Some Account of the Church in the Apostolic Age. By W. W. SHIRLEY, D.D. Second Edition. Fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- Shuckford's Sacred and Profane History connected (in continuation of Prideaux). 2 vols. 8vo. 10s.
- Stillingfleet's Origines Britannicae, with LLOYD's Historical Account of Church Government. Edited by T. P. PANTIN, M.A. 2 vols. 8vo. 10s.
- Stubbs. Registrum Sacrum Anglicanum. An attempt to exhibit the course of Episcopal Succession in England. By W. STUBBS, D.D. Small 4to. 8s. 6d.
- Strype's Memorials of Cranmer. 2 vols. 8vo. 11s.
 Life of Aylmer. 8vo. 5s. 6d.
 Life of Whitgift. 3 vols. 8vo. 16s. 6d.
 General Index. 2 vols. 8vo. 11s.
- Sylloge Confessionum sub tempus Reformandae Ecclesiae editarum. Subjiciuntur Catechismus Heidelbergensis et Canones Synodi Dordrechtanae. 8vo. 8s.

D. LITURGIOLOGY.

Cardwell's Two Books of Common Prayer, set forth by authority in the Reign of King Edward VI, compared with each other. Third Edition. 8vo. 7s.

— History of Conferences on the Book of Common Prayer from 1551 to 1690. Third Edition. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

Hammond. Liturgies, Eastern and Western. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and a Liturgical Glossary, by C. E. HAMMOND, M.A. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

An Appendix to the above, crown 8vo. paper covers, 1s. 6d.

Leofric Missal, The, as used in the Cathedral of Exeter during the Episcopate of its first Bishop, A.D. 1050–1072; together with some Account of the Red Book of Derby, the Missal of Robert of Jumièges, and a few other early MS. Service Books of the English Church. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by F. E. WARREN, B.D., F.S.A. 4to. half morocco, 1l. 15s.

Maskell. Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England, according to the uses of Sarum, York, Hereford, and Bangor, and the Roman Liturgy arranged in parallel columns, with preface and notes. By W. MASKELL, M.A. Third Edition. 8vo. 15s.

— Monumenta Ritualia Ecclesiae Anglicanae. The occasional Offices of the Church of England according to the old use of Salisbury, the Prymer in English, and other prayers and forms, with dissertations and notes. Second Edition. 3 vols. 8vo. 2l. 10s.

Warren. The Liturgy and Ritual of the Celtic Church. By F. E. WARREN, B.D. 8vo. 14s.

E. ENGLISH THEOLOGY.

Beveridge's Discourse upon the XXXIX Articles. 8vo. 8s.

Biscoe's Boyle Lectures on the Acts of the Apostles. 8vo. 9s. 6d.

Bradley. Lectures on the Book of Job. By GEORGE GRANVILLE BRADLEY, D.D., Dean of Westminster. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

Bradley. Lectures on Ecclesiastes. By G. G. BRADLEY, D.D., Dean of Westminster. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

Bull's Works, with NELSON's Life. Edited by E. BURTON, D.D. 8 vols. 8vo. 2l. 9s.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Amen Corner, E.C.

-
- Burnet's Exposition of the xxxix Articles. 8vo. 7s.
- Burton's (Edward) Testimonies of the Ante-Nicene Fathers to the Divinity of Christ. 1829. 8vo. 7s.
- Testimonies of the Ante-Nicene Fathers to the Doctrine of the Trinity and of the Divinity of the Holy Ghost. 1831. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- Butler's Works. 2 vols. 8vo. 11s.
- Sermons. 5s. 6d. Analogy of Religion. 5s. 6d.
- Chandler's Critical History of the Life of David. 8vo. 8s. 6d.
- Chillingworth's Works. 3 vols. 8vo. 1l. 1s. 6d.
- Clergyman's Instructor. Sixth Edition. 8vo. 6s. 6d.
- Comber's Companion to the Temple; or a Help to Devotion in the use of the Common Prayer. 7 vols. 8vo. 1l. 11s. 6d.
- Cranmer's Works. Collected and arranged by H. JENKINS, M.A., Fellow of Oriel College. 4 vols. 8vo. 1l. 10s.
- Enchiridion Theologicum Anti-Romanum.
- Vol. I. JEREMY TAYLOR'S Dissuasive from Popery, and Treatise on the Real Presence. 8vo. 8s.
- Vol. II. BARROW on the Supremacy of the Pope, with his Discourse on the Unity of the Church. 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- Vol. III. Tracts selected from WAKE, PATRICK, STILLINGFLEET, CLAGETT, and others. 8vo. 11s.
- [Fell's] Paraphrase, etc. on the Epistles of St. Paul. 8vo. 7s.
- Greswell's Harmonia Evangelica. Fifth Edition. 8vo. 9s. 6d.
- Prolegomena ad Harmoniam Evangelicam. 8vo. 9s. 6d.
- Dissertations on the Principles and Arrangement of a Harmony of the Gospels. 5 vols. 8vo. 3l. 3s.
- Hall's Works. Edited by P. WYNTER, D.D. 10 vols. 8vo. 3l. 3s.
- Hammond's Paraphrase on the Book of Psalms. 2 vols. 8vo. 10s.
- Paraphrase etc. on the New Testament. 4 vols. 8vo. 1l.
- Heurtley. Harmonia Symbolica: Creeds of the Western Church. By C. HEURTLEY, D.D. 8vo. 6s. 6d.
- Homilies appointed to be read in Churches. Edited by J. GRIFFITHS, M.A. 8vo. 7s. 6d.
-

HOOKE'S WORKS, with his Life by WALTON, arranged by JOHN KEBLE, M.A. Seventh Edition. Revised by R. W. CHURCH, M.A., Dean of St. Paul's, and F. PAGET, D.D. 3 vols. medium 8vo. 1*l.* 16*s.*

— the Text as arranged by J. KEBLE, M.A. 2 vols. 8vo. 11*s.*

Hooper's Works. 2 vols. 8vo. 8*s.*

Jackson's (Dr. Thomas) Works. 12 vols. 8vo. 3*l.* 6*s.*

Jewel's Works. Edited by R. W. JELF, D.D. 8 vols. 8vo. 1*l.* 10*s.*

Martineau. A Study of Religion : its Sources and Contents: By JAMES MARTINEAU, D.D. Second Edition. 2 vols. crown 8vo. 15*s.*

Patrick's Theological Works. 9 vols. 8vo. 1*l.* 1*s.*

Pearson's Exposition of the Creed. Revised and corrected by E. BURTON, D.D. Sixth Edition. 8vo. 10*s.* 6*d.*

— Minor Theological Works. Edited with a Memoir, by EDWARD CHURTON, M.A. 2 vols. 8vo. 10*s.*

Sanderson's Works. Edited by W. JACOBSON, D.D. 6 vols. 8vo. 1*l.* 10*s.*

Stanhope's Paraphrase and Comment upon the Epistles and Gospels. A new Edition. 2 vols. 8vo. 10*s.*

Stillingfleet's Origines Sacrae. 2 vols. 8vo. 9*s.*

— Rational Account of the Grounds of Protestant Religion ; being a vindication of ARCHBISHOP LAUD's Relation of a Conference, &c. 2 vols. 8vo. 10*s.*

Wall's History of Infant Baptism. A New Edition, by HENRY COTTON, D.C.L. 2 vols. 8vo. 1*l.* 1*s.*

Waterland's Works, with Life, by Bp. VAN MILDERT. A new Edition, with copious Indexes. 6 vols. 8vo. 2*l.* 11*s.*

— Review of the Doctrine of the Eucharist, with a Preface by the late Bishop of London. Crown 8vo. 6*s.* 6*d.*

Wheatly's Illustration of the Book of Common Prayer. 8vo. 5*s.*

Wyclif. A Catalogue of the Original Works of John Wyclif. By W. W. SHIRLEY, D.D. 8vo. 3*s.* 6*d.*

— Select English Works. By T. ARNOLD, M.A. 3 vols. 8vo. 1*l.* 1*s.*

— Triologus. With the Supplement now first edited. By GOTTHARD LECHLER. 8vo. 7*s.*

London : HENRY FROWDE, Amen Corner, E.C.

III. POLITICAL SCIENCE.

A. HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, CHRONOLOGY, ETC.

Baker's Chronicle. Chronicon Galfridi le Baker de Swynebroke. Edited with Notes by EDWARD MAUNDE THOMPSON, Hon. LL.D. St. Andrews; Hon. D.C.L. Durham; F.S.A.; Principal Librarian of the British Museum. Small 4to., stiff covers, 18s., cloth, gilt top, 21s.

Bluntschli. The Theory of the State. By J. K. BLUNTSCHLI. Translated from the Sixth German Edition. 8vo. half bound, 12s. 6d.

Boswell's Life of Samuel Johnson, LL.D.; including BOSWELL'S Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides, and JOHNSON'S Diary of a Journey into North Wales. Edited by G. BIRKBECK HILL, D.C.L. In six volumes, medium 8vo. With Portraits and Facsimiles. Half bound, 3l. 3s.

Burnet's History of His Own Time, with the suppressed Passages and Notes. 6 vols. 8vo. 2l. 10s.

— History of James II, with Additional Notes. 8vo. 9s. 6d.

— Life of Sir M. Hale, and Fell's Life of Dr. Hammond. Small 8vo. 2s. 6d.

Calendar of the Clarendon State Papers, preserved in the Bodleian Library. In three volumes. 1869-76.

Vol. I. From 1523 to January 1649. 8vo. 18s.

Vol. II. From 1649 to 1654. 8vo. 16s.

Vol. III. From 1655 to 1657. 8vo 14s.

Calendar of Charters and Rolls preserved in the Bodleian Library. 8vo. 1l. 11s. 6d.

Carte's Life of James Duke of Ormond. A new Edition, carefully compared with the original MSS. 6 vols. 8vo. 1l. 5s.

Casauboni Ephemerides, cum praeftatione et notis J. RUSSELL, S.T.P. Tomi II. 8vo. 15s.

CLARENDON'S History of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England. Re-edited from a fresh collation of the original MS. in the Bodleian Library, with marginal dates and occasional notes, by W. DUNN MACRAY, M.A., F.S.A. 6 vols. Crown 8vo. 2l. 5s.

— History of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England. To which are subjoined the Notes of BISHOP WARBURTON. 1849. 7 vols. medium 8vo. 2l. 10s.

— History of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England. Also his Life, written by himself, in which is included a Continuation of his History of the Grand Rebellion. Royal 8vo. 1l. 2s.

- Clarendon's Life, including a Continuation of his History.
2 vols. 1857. medium 8vo. 1*l.* 2*s.*
- Clinton's Fasti Hellenici. The Civil and Literary Chronology of Greece, from the LVIth to the CXXIIIrd Olympiad. Third Edition.
4to. 1*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.*
- Clinton's Fasti Hellenici. The Civil and Literary Chronology of Greece, from the CXXIVth Olympiad to the Death of Augustus. Second Edition. 4to. 1*l.* 12*s.*
- Epitome of the Fasti Hellenici. 8vo. 6*s.* 6*d.*
- Fasti Romani. The Civil and Literary Chronology of Rome and Constantinople, from the Death of Augustus to the Death of Heraclius. 2 vols. 4to. 2*l.* 2*s.*
- Epitome of the Fasti Romani. 8vo. 7*s.*
- Cramer's Geographical and Historical Description of Asia Minor. 2 vols. 8vo. 11*s.*
- Description of Ancient Greece. 3 vols. 8vo. 16*s.* 6*d.*
- Earle. Handbook to the Land-Charters, and other Saxonie Documents. By JOHN EARLE, M.A., Professor of Anglo-Saxon in the University of Oxford. Crown 8vo. 16*s.*
- Finlay. A History of Greece from its Conquest by the Romans to the present time, B.C. 146 to A.D. 1864. By GEORGE FINLAY, LL.D. A new Edition, revised throughout, and in part re-written, with considerable additions, by the Author, and edited by H. F. TOZER, M.A. 7 vols. 8vo. 3*l.* 10*s.*
- Fortescue. The Governance of England: otherwise called The Difference between an Absolute and a Limited Monarchy. By Sir JOHN FORTESCUE, Kt. A Revised Text. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, etc., by CHARLES PLUMMER, M.A. 8vo. half bound, 12*s.* 6*d.*
- Freeman. History of the Norman Conquest of England; its Causes and Results. By E. A. FREEMAN, D.C.L. In Six Volumes. 8vo. 5*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.*
- The Reign of William Rufus and the Accession of Henry the First. 2 vols. 8vo. 1*l.* 16*s.*
- A Short History of the Norman Conquest of England. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2*s.* 6*d.*
- Gardiner. The Constitutional Documents of the Puritan Revolution. 1628-1660. Selected and Edited by SAMUEL RAWSON GARDINER, M.A. Crown 8vo. 9*s.*
- Gascoigne's Theological Dictionary ("Liber Veritatum"): Selected Passages, illustrating the Condition of Church and State, 1403-1458. With an Introduction by JAMES E. THOROLD ROGERS, M.A. Small 4to. 10*s.* 6*d.*

- George. Genealogical Tables illustrative of Modern History. By H. B. GEORGE, M.A. Third Edition. Small 4to. 12s.
- Greenwell. British Barrows, a Record of the Examination of Sepulchral Mounds in various parts of England. By W. GREENWELL, M.A., F.S.A. Together with Description of Figures of Skulls, General Remarks on Prehistoric Crania, and an Appendix by GEORGE ROLLESTON, M.D., F.R.S. Medium 8vo. 25s.
- Greswell's Fasti Temporis Catholici. 4 vols. 8vo. 2l. 10s.
 — Tables to Fasti, 4to., and Introduction to Tables, 8vo. 15s.
 — Origines Kalendarie Italice. 4 vols. 8vo. 2l. 2s.
 — Origines Kalendarie Hellenice. 6 vols. 8vo. 4l. 4s.
- Gross. The Gild Merchant: a Contribution to English Municipal History. By CHARLES GROSS, Ph.D. 2 vols. 8vo. Nearly ready.
- Hodgkin. Italy and her Invaders. With Plates and Maps. By THOMAS HODGKIN, D.C.L. Vols. I-IV, A.D. 376-553. 8vo. 3l. 8s.
 — The Dynasty of Theodosius; or, Seventy Years' Struggle with the Barbarians. By the same Author. Crown 8vo. 6s.
- Hume. Letters of David Hume to William Strahan. Edited with Notes, Index, etc., by G. BIRKBECK HILL, D.C.L. 8vo. 12s. 6d.
- Jackson. Dalmatia, the Quarnero, and Istria; with Cettigne in Montenegro and the Island of Grado. By T. G. JACKSON, M.A. 3 vols. With many Plates and Illustrations. 8vo. half-bound, 2l. 2s.
- Kitchin. A History of France. With numerous Maps, Plans, and Tables. By G. W. KITCHIN, D.D. In three Volumes. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. each 10s. 6d.
 Vol. I. to 1453. Vol. II. 1453-1624. Vol. III. 1624-1793.
- Knight's Life of Dean Colet. 1823. 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- Lucas. Introduction to a Historical Geography of the British Colonies. By C. P. LUCAS, B.A. With Eight Maps. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.
 — Historical Geography of the Colonies. Vol. I. By the same Author. With Eleven Maps. Crown 8vo. 5s.
- Lloyd's Prices of Corn in Oxford, 1583-1830. 8vo. 1s.
- Luttrell's (Narcissus) Diary. A Brief Historical Relation of State Affairs, 1678-1714. 6 vols. 8vo. 1l. 4s.
- Magna Carta, a careful Reprint. Edited by W. STUBBS, D.D., Lord Bishop of Oxford. 4to. stitched, 1s.
- Metcalf. Passio et Miracula Beati Olai. Edited from a Twelfth-Century MS. by F. METCALFE, M.A. Small 4to. 6s.

OXFORD, University of.

Oxford University Calendar for the Year 1890. Crown 8vo. 6s.

The Historical Register of the University of Oxford. Being a Supplement to the Oxford University Calendar, with an Alphabetical Record of University Honours and Distinctions, completed to the end of Trinity Term, 1888. Crown 8vo. 5s.

Student's Handbook to the University and Colleges of Oxford. Tenth Edition. Revised to December 1888. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

The Examination Statutes ; together with the present Regulations of the Boards of Studies and Boards of Faculties relating thereto. Revised to the end of Trinity Term, 1889. 8vo., paper covers, 1s.

Statuta Universitatis Oxoniensis. 1889. 8vo. 5s.

Statutes made for the University of Oxford, and the Colleges therein, by the University of Oxford Commissioners. 8vo. 12s. 6d.
Also separately—University Statutes 2s.; College Statutes 1s. each.

Supplementary Statutes made by the University of Oxford, and by certain of the Colleges therein, in pursuance of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge Act, 1877; approved by the Queen in Council. 8vo. Paper covers, 2s. 6d.

Statutes of the University of Oxford, codified in the year 1636 under the Authority of ARCHBISHOP LAUD, Chancellor of the University. Edited by the late JOHN GRIFFITHS, D.D. With an Introduction on the History of the Laudian Code by C. L. SHADWELL, M.A., B.C.L. 4to. 1l. 1s.

Enactments in Parliament, specially concerning the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. Collected and arranged by J. GRIFFITHS, D.D. 1869. 8vo. 12s.

Catalogue of Oxford Graduates from 1659 to 1850. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

Index to Wills proved in the Court of the Chancellor of the University of Oxford, &c. Compiled by J. GRIFFITHS, D.D. Royal 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Manuscript Materials relating to the History of Oxford ; contained in the Printed Catalogues of the Bodleian and College Libraries. By F. MADAN, M.A. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

Pattison. Essays by the late MARK PATTISON, sometime Rector of Lincoln College. Collected and arranged by HENRY NETTLESHIP, M.A. 2 vols. 8vo. 24s.

Ranke. A History of England, principally in the Seventeenth Century. By L. VON RANKE. Translated under the superintendence of G. W. KITCHIN, D.D., and C. W. BOASE, M.A. 6 vols. 8vo. 3l. 3s.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Amen Corner, E.C.

- Rawlinson. A Manual of Ancient History. By GEORGE RAWLINSON, M.A. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 14s.
- Ricardo. Letters of David Ricardo to T. R. Malthus (1810-1823). Edited by JAMES BONAR, M.A. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- Rogers. History of Agriculture and Prices in England, A.D. 1259-1793. By JAMES E. THOROLD ROGERS, M.A.
 Vols. I and II (1259-1400). 8vo. 2l. 2s.
 Vols. III and IV (1401-1582). 8vo. 2l. 10s.
 Vols. V and VI (1583-1702). 8vo. 2l. 10s.
- First Nine Years of the Bank of England. 8vo. 8s. 6d.
- Protests of the Lords, including those which have been expunged, from 1624 to 1874; with Historical Introductions. In three volumes. 8vo. 2l. 2s.
- Sprigg's England's Recovery; being the History of the Army under Sir Thomas Fairfax. 8vo. 6s.
- Stubbs. Select Charters and other Illustrations of English Constitutional History, from the Earliest Times to the Reign of Edward I. Arranged and edited by W. STUBBS, D.D., Lord Bishop of Oxford. Fifth Edition. Crown 8vo. 8s. 6d.
- The Constitutional History of England, in its Origin and Development. Library Edition. 3 vols. Demy 8vo. 2l. 8s.
 Also in 3 vols. crown 8vo. price 12s. each.
- Seventeen Lectures on the Study of Medieval and Modern History, delivered at Oxford 1867-1884. Crown 8vo. 8s. 6d.
- Tozer. The Islands of the Aegean. By H. FANSHAWE TOZER, M.A., F.R.G.S. Crown 8vo. 8s. 6d.
- Wellesley. A Selection from the Despatches, Treaties, and other Papers of the MARQUESS WELLESLEY, K.G., during his Government of India. Edited by S. J. OWEN, M.A. 8vo. 1l. 4s.
- Wellington. A Selection from the Despatches, Treaties, and other Papers relating to India of Field-Marshal the DUKE OF WELLINGTON, K.G. Edited by S. J. OWEN, M.A. 8vo. 1l. 4s.
- Whitelock's Memorials of English Affairs from 1625 to 1660. 4 vols. 8vo. 1l. 10s.

B. ENGLISH AND ROMAN LAW.

- Anson. Principles of the English Law of Contract, and of Agency in its Relation to Contract. By SIR W. R. ANSON, D.C.L. Fifth Edition. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- Law and Custom of the Constitution. Part I. Parliament. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- Bentham. An Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation. By JEREMY BENTHAM. Crown 8vo. 6s. 6d.

- Digby. An Introduction to the History of the Law of Real Property. By KENELM E. DIGBY, M.A. Third Edition. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- Grueber. Lex Aquilia. The Roman Law of Damage to Property: being a Commentary on the Title of the Digest 'Ad Legem Aquiliam' (ix. 2). With an Introduction to the Study of the Corpus Iuris Civilis. By ERWIN GRUEBER, Dr. Jur., M.A. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- Hall. International Law. By W. E. HALL, M.A. Third Edition. 8vo. 22s. 6d.
- Holland. Elements of Jurisprudence. By T. E. HOLLAND, D.C.L. Fourth Edition. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- The European Concert in the Eastern Question, a Collection of Treaties and other Public Acts. Edited, with Introductions and Notes, by T. E. HOLLAND, D.C.L. 8vo. 12s. 6d.
- Alberici Gentilis, I.C.D., I.C., De Iure Belli Libri Tres. Edidit T. E. HOLLAND, I.C.D. Small 4to. half morocco, 21s.
- The Institutes of Justinian, edited as a recension of the Institutes of GAIUS, by T. E. HOLLAND, D.C.L. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 5s.
- Holland and Shadwell. Select Titles from the Digest of Justinian. By T. E. HOLLAND, D.C.L., and C. L. SHADWELL, B.C.L. 8vo. 14s.
- Also sold in Parts, in paper covers, as follows:—
- Part I. Introductory Titles. 2s. 6d.
- Part II. Family Law. 1s.
- Part III. Property Law. 2s. 6d.
- Part IV. Law of Obligations (No. 1). 3s. 6d.
- Part IV. Law of Obligations (No. 2). 4s. 6d.
- Markby. Elements of Law considered with reference to Principles of General Jurisprudence. By Sir WILLIAM MARKBY, D.C.L. Fourth Edition. 8vo. 12s. 6d.
- Moyle. Imperatoris Iustiniani Institutionum Libri Quattuor; with Introductions, Commentary, Excursus and Translation. By J. B. MOYLE, D.C.L. Second Edition. 2 vols. 8vo. 22s.
- Pollock and Wright. An Essay on Possession in the Common Law. By Sir F. POLLOCK, M.A., and R. S. WRIGHT, B.C.L. 8vo. 8s. 6d.
- Poste. Gaii Institutionum Juris Civilis Commentarii Quattuor; or, Elements of Roman Law by Gaius. With a Translation and Commentary by EDWARD POSTE, M.A. Second Edition. 8vo. 18s.
- Raleigh. The English Law of Property. By THOS. RALEIGH, M.A. Just ready.

Stokes. The Anglo-Indian Codes. By WHITLEY STOKES, LL.D. Vol. I. Substantive Law. 8vo. 30s. Vol. II. Adjective Law. 8vo. 35s.

— Supplement to the above, 1887, 1888. 2s. 6d.

Twiss. The Law of Nations considered as Independent Political Communities. By SIR TRAVERS TWISS, D.C.L.

Part I. On the rights and Duties of Nations in time of Peace. New Edition, Revised and Enlarged. 8vo. 15s.

Part II. On the Rights and Duties of Nations in time of War. Second Edition, Revised. 8vo. 21s.

C. POLITICAL ECONOMY, ETC.

Rogers. A Manual of Political Economy, for the use of Schools. By J. E. THOROLD ROGERS, M.A. Third Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d.

Smith's Wealth of Nations. A new Edition, with Notes, by J. E. THOROLD ROGERS, M.A. 2 vols. 8vo. 21s.

IV. PHILOSOPHY, LOGIC, &c.

Bacon. Novum Organum. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, &c., by T. FOWLER, D.D. Second Edition. 8vo. 15s.

— Novum Organum. Edited, with English Notes, by G. W. KITCHIN, D.D. 8vo. 9s. 6d.

— Novum Organum. Translated by G. W. KITCHIN, D.D. 8vo. 9s. 6d.

Berkeley. The works of GEORGE BERKELEY, D.D., formerly Bishop of Cloyne; including many of his writings hitherto unpublished. With Prefaces, Annotations, and an Account of his Life and Philosophy, by ALEXANDER CAMPBELL FRASER, LL.D. 4 vols. 8vo. 2l. 18s.

The Life, Letters, &c., separately, 16s.

— Selections. With Introduction and Notes. For the use of Students in the Universities. By ALEXANDER CAMPBELL FRASER, LL.D. Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

Bosanquet. Logic; or, the Morphology of Knowledge. By B. BOSANQUET, M.A. 8vo. 21s.

Butler's Works, with Index to the Analogy. 2 vols. 8vo. 11s.

Fowler. The Elements of Deductive Logic, designed mainly for the use of Junior Students in the Universities. By T. FOWLER, D.D. Ninth Edition, with a Collection of Examples. Extra fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

- Fowler. The Elements of Inductive Logic, designed mainly for the use of Students in the Universities. Fourth Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 6s.
- The Principles of Morals (Introductory Chapters). By T. FOWLER, D.D., and J. M. WILSON, B.D. 8vo. boards, 3s. 6d.
- The Principles of Morals. Part II. By T. FOWLER, D.D. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- Green. Prolegomena to Ethics. By T. H. GREEN, M.A. Edited by A. C. BRADLEY, M.A. 8vo. 12s. 6d.
- Hegel. The Logic of Hegel; translated from the Encyclopaedia of the Philosophical Sciences. With Prolegomena by WILLIAM WALLACE, M.A. 8vo. 14s.
- Hume's Treatise of Human Nature. Reprinted from the Original Edition in Three Volumes, and Edited by L. A. Selby-Bigge, M.A. Crown 8vo. 9s.
- Locke's Conduct of the Understanding. Edited by T. FOWLER, D.D. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s.
- Lotze's Logic, in Three Books; of Thought, of Investigation, and of Knowledge. English Translation; Edited by B. BOSANQUET, M.A. Second Edition. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 12s.
- Metaphysic, in Three Books; Ontology, Cosmology, and Psychology. English Translation; Edited by B. BOSANQUET, M.A. Second Edition. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 12s.
- Martineau. Types of Ethical Theory. By JAMES MARTINEAU, D.D. Second Edition. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 15s.
- A Study of Religion: its Sources and Contents. A New Edition. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 15s.

V. PHYSICAL SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS.

- Acland. Synopsis of the Pathological Series in the Oxford Museum. By Sir H. W. ACLAND, M.D., F.R.S. 8vo. 2s. 6d.
- Aldis. A Text-Book of Algebra: with Answers to the Examples. By W. S. ALDIS, M.A. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- Aplin. The Birds of Oxfordshire. By O. V. APLIN. 8vo. with a Map and one coloured Plate. 10s. 6d.
- Archimedis quae supersunt omnia cum Eutocii commentariis ex recensione J. TORELLI, cum novâ versione Latinâ. 1792. Fol. 1l. 5s.
- Baynes. Lessons on Thermodynamics. By R. E. BAYNES, M.A. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Amen Corner, E.C.

BIOLOGICAL SERIES. (Translations of Foreign Memoirs).

- I. Memoirs on the Physiology of Nerve, of Muscle, and of the Electrical Organ. Edited by J. BURDON-SANDERSON, M.D., F.R.S.S.L. & E. Medium 8vo. 1l. 1s.
- II. The Anatomy of the Frog. By Dr. ALEXANDER ECKER, Professor in the University of Freiburg. Translated, with numerous Annotations and Additions, by GEORGE HASLAM, M.D. Medium 8vo. 21s.
- IV. Essays upon Heredity and kindred Biological Problems. By Dr. AUGUST WEISMANN, Professor in the University of Freiburg in Breisgau. Authorised Translation. Edited by EDWARD B. POULTON, M.A., F.L.S., F.G.S., SELMAR SCHÖNLAND, Ph.D., and ARTHUR E. SHIPLEY, M.A., F.L.S. Medium 8vo. 16s.

BOTANICAL SERIES.

- History of Botany (1530-1860).* By JULIUS VON SACHS. Authorised Translation, by H. E. F. GARNSEY, M.A. Revised by ISAAC BAYLEY BALFOUR, M.A., M.D., F.R.S. Crown 8vo. 10s.
- Comparative Anatomy of the Vegetative Organs of the Phanerogams and Ferns.* By Dr. A. DE BARY. Translated and Annotated by F. O. BOWER, M.A., F.L.S., and D. H. SCOTT, M.A., Ph.D., F.L.S. Royal 8vo., half morocco, 1l. 2s. 6d.
- Outlines of Classification and Special Morphology of Plants.* A new Edition of SACHS' Text-Book of Botany, Book II. By Dr. K. GOEBEL. Translated by H. E. F. GARNSEY, M.A., and Revised by ISAAC BAYLEY BALFOUR, M.A., M.D., F.R.S. Royal 8vo., half morocco, 1l. 1s.
- Lectures on the Physiology of Plants.* By JULIUS VON SACHS. Translated by H. MARSHALL WARD, M.A., F.L.S. Royal 8vo. half morocco, 1l. 11s. 6d.
- Comparative Morphology and Biology of Fungi, Mycetozoa and Bacteria.* By Dr. A. DE BARY. Translated by H. E. F. GARNSEY, M.A., Revised by ISAAC BAYLEY BALFOUR, M.A., M.D., F.R.S. Royal 8vo., half morocco, 1l. 2s. 6d.
- Lectures on Bacteria.* By Dr. A. DE BARY. Second Improved Edition. Translated by H. E. F. GARNSEY, M.A. Revised by ISAAC BAYLEY BALFOUR, M.A., M.D., F.R.S. Crown 8vo. 6s.
- Introduction to Fossil Botany.* By Count H. VON SOLMS-LAUBACH. Authorised English Translation, by H. E. F. GARNSEY, M.A. Edited by ISAAC BAYLEY BALFOUR, M.A., M.D., F.R.S. In the Press.
- Annals of Botany.* Edited by ISAAC BAYLEY BALFOUR, M.A., M.D., F.R.S., SYDNEY H. VINES, D.Sc., F.R.S., and W. G. FARLOW, M.D. Vol. I. Royal 8vo., half morocco, gilt top, 1l. 16s.
- Bradley's Miscellaneous Works and Correspondence.* With an Account of Harriot's Astronomical Papers. 4to. 17s.

- Chambers. A Handbook of Descriptive Astronomy. By G. F. CHAMBERS, F.R.A.S. Fourth Edition.
 Vol. I. The Sun, Planets, and Comets. 8vo. 21s.
 Vol. II. Instruments and Practical Astronomy. Immediately.
- Clarke. Geodesy. By Col. A. R. CLARKE, C.B., R.E. 8vo. 12s. 6d.
- Cremona. Elements of Projective Geometry. By LUIGI CREMONA. Translated by C. LEUDESDOFF, M.A. 8vo. 12s. 6d.
- Graphical Statics. Two Treatises on the Graphical Calculus and Reciprocal Figures in Graphical Statics. By the same Author. Translated by T. HUDSON BEARE. Demy 8vo. 8s. 6d.
- Daubeny's Introduction to the Atomic Theory. 16mo. 6s.
- Donkin. Acoustics. By W. F. DONKIN, M.A., F.R.S. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- Etheridge. Fossils of the British Islands, Stratigraphically and Zoologically arranged. Part I. PALAEOZOIC. By R. ETHERIDGE, F.R.S.S. L. & E., F.G.S. 4to. 1l. 10s.
- EUCLID REVISED. Containing the Essentials of the Elements of Plane Geometry as given by Euclid in his first Six Books. Edited by R. C. J. NIXON, M.A. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.
 Sold separately as follows:—
 Book I. 1s. Books I, II. 1s. 6d.
 Books I–IV. 3s. Books V, VI. 3s.
- Euclid. Geometry in Space. Containing parts of Euclid's Eleventh and Twelfth Books. By the same Editor. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- Fisher. Class-Book of Chemistry. By W. W. FISHER, M.A., F.C.S. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.
- Galton. The Construction of Healthy Dwellings. By Sir DOUGLAS GALTON, K.C.B., F.R.S. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- Hamilton and Ball. Book-keeping. New and enlarged Edition. By Sir R. G. C. HAMILTON, and JOHN BALL. Extra fcap. 8vo. limp cloth, 2s.
Ruled Exercise books adapted to the above may be had, price 1s. 6d.
- Harcourt and Madan. Exercises in Practical Chemistry. Vol. I. Elementary Exercises. By A. G. VERNON HARCOURT, M.A., and H. G. MADAN, M.A. Fourth Edition. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- Madan. Tables of Qualitative Analysis. By H. G. MADAN, M.A. Large 4to., paper covers, 4s. 6d.
- Hensley. Figures made Easy. A first Arithmetic Book. By LEWIS HENSLEY, M.A. Crown 8vo. 6d.
- Answers to the Examples in Figures made Easy, together with two thousand additional Examples, with Answers. Crown 8vo. 1s.

- Hensley. The Scholar's Arithmetic. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.
 — Answers to Examples in Scholar's Arithmetic. 1s. 6d.
 — The Scholar's Algebra. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.
- Hughes. Geography for Schools. By ALFRED HUGHES, M.A., late Scholar of Corpus Christi College, Oxford. Part I. Practical Geography. With Diagrams. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.
- Maclaren. A System of Physical Education: Theoretical and Practical. By ARCHIBALD MACLAREN. Extra fcap. 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- Maxwell. A Treatise on Electricity and Magnetism. By J. CLERK MAXWELL, M.A. Second Edition. 2 vols. 8vo. 1l. 11s. 6d.
 — An Elementary Treatise on Electricity. Edited by WILLIAM GARNETT, M.A. 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- Minchin. A Treatise on Statics with Applications to Physics. By G. M. MINCHIN, M.A. Third Edition. Vol. I. Equilibrium of Coplanar Forces. 8vo. 9s. Vol. II. Statics. 8vo. 16s.
 — Uniplanar Kinematics of Solids and Fluids. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- Müller. On certain Variations in the Vocal Organs of the Passeres. By J. MÜLLER. Translated by F. J. BELL, B.A., and edited by A. H. GARROD, M.A., F.R.S. With Plates. 4to. 7s. 6d.
- Nixon. See EUCLID REVISED.
- Phillips. Geology of Oxford and the Valley of the Thames. By JOHN PHILLIPS, M.A., F.R.S. 8vo. 21s.
 — Vesuvius. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- Prestwich. Geology, Chemical, Physical, and Stratigraphical. By JOSEPH PRESTWICH, M.A., F.R.S. In two Volumes.
 Vol. I. Chemical and Physical. Royal 8vo. 1l. 5s.
 Vol. II. Stratigraphical and Physical. With a new Geological Map of Europe. Royal 8vo. 1l. 16s.
 New Geological Map of Europe. In case or on roller. 5s.
- Price. Treatise on Infinitesimal Calculus. By BARTHOLOMEW PRICE, M.A., F.R.S.
 Vol. I. Differential Calculus. Second Edition. 8vo. 14s. 6d.
 Vol. II. Integral Calculus, Calculus of Variations, and Differential Equations. Second Edition. 8vo. 18s.
 Vol. III. Statics, including Attractions; Dynamics of a Material Particle. Second Edition. 8vo. 16s.
 Vol. IV. Dynamics of Material Systems. Second Edition. 8vo. 18s.
- Pritchard. Uranometria Nova Oxoniensis. A Photometric determination of the magnitudes of all Stars visible to the naked eye, from the Pole to ten degrees south of the Equator. By C. PRITCHARD, D.D., F.R.S. Royal 8vo. 8s. 6d.
 — Astronomical Observations made at the University Observatory, Oxford, under the direction of C. PRITCHARD, D.D. No. 1. Royal 8vo. paper covers, 3s. 6d.

- Rigaud's Correspondence of Scientific Men of the 17th Century, with Table of Contents by A. de MORGAN, and Index by J. RIGAUD, M.A. 2 vols. 8vo. 18s. 6d.
- Rolleston and Jackson. Forms of Animal Life. A Manual of Comparative Anatomy, with descriptions of selected types. By GEORGE ROLLESTON, M.D., F.R.S. Second Edition. Revised and enlarged by W. HATCHETT JACKSON, M.A. Medium 8vo. 1l. 16s.
- Rolleston. Scientific Papers and Addresses. By GEORGE ROLLESTON, M.D., F.R.S. Arranged and edited by WILLIAM TURNER, M.B., F.R.S. With a Biographical Sketch by EDWARD TYLOR, F.R.S. 2 vols. 8vo. 1l. 4s.
- Smyth. A Cycle of Celestial Objects. Observed, Reduced, and Discussed by Admiral W. H. SMYTH, R.N. Revised, condensed, and greatly enlarged by G. F. CHAMBERS, F.R.A.S. 8vo. 12s.
- Stewart. An Elementary Treatise on Heat, with numerous Woodcuts and Diagrams. By BALFOUR STEWART, LL.D., F.R.S. Fifth Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- Vernon-Harcourt. Treatise on Rivers and Canals, relating to Control and Improvement of Rivers, and Design, Construction, and Development of Canals. By L. F. VERNON-HARCOURT, M.A. 2 vols. 8vo. 1l. 1s.
- Harbours and Docks; their Physical Features, History, Construction, Equipment, and Maintenance; with Statistics as to their Commercial Development. 2 vols. 8vo. 25s.
- Walker. The Theory of a Physical Balance. By JAMES WALKER, M.A. 8vo. stiff cover, 3s. 6d.
- Watson and Burbury.
- I. A Treatise on the Application of Generalised Coordinates to the Kinetics of a Material System. By H. W. WATSON, D.Sc., and S. H. BURBURY, M.A. 8vo. 6s.
 - II. The Mathematical Theory of Electricity and Magnetism. Vol. I. Electrostatics. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
Vol. II. Magnetism and Electrodynamics. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- Williamson. Chemistry for Students. With Solutions. By A. W. WILLIAMSON, Phil. Doc., F.R.S. Extra fcap. 8vo. 8s. 6d.
- Westwood. Thesaurus Entomologicus Hopeianus, or a Description of the rarest Insects in the Collection given to the University by the Rev. William Hope. By J. O. WESTWOOD, M.A., F.R.S. With 40 Plates. Small folio, half morocco, 7l. 10s.

VI. ART AND ARCHÆOLOGY.

- Butler. Ancient Coptic Churches of Egypt. By A. J. BUTLER, M.A., F.S.A. 2 vols. 8vo. 30s.
- Head. Historia Numorum. A Manual of Greek Numismatics. By BARCLAY V. HEAD, Assistant-Keeper of the Department of Coins and Medals in the British Museum. Royal 8vo. Half morocco, 42s.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Amen Corner, E.C.

Jackson. Dalmatia, the Quarnero and Istria; with Cettigne in Montenegro and the Island of Grado. By T. G. JACKSON, M.A., Author of 'Modern Gothic Architecture.' In 3 vols. 8vo. With many Plates and Illustrations. Half bound, 42s.

MUSIC.

Hullah. Cultivation of the Speaking Voice. By JOHN HULLAH. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

Onseley. Treatise on Harmony. By Sir F. A. GORE OUSELEY, Bart. Third Edition. 4to. 10s.

— Treatise on Counterpoint, Canon, and Fugue, based upon that of Cherubini. Second Edition. 4to. 16s.

— Treatise on Musical Form and General Composition. Second Edition. 4to. 10s.

Troutbeck and Dale. Music Primer (for Schools). By J. TROUTBECK, D.D., and F. DALE, M.A. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Robinson. A Critical Account of the Drawings by Michel Angelo and Raffaello in the University Galleries, Oxford. By J. C. ROBINSON, F.S.A. Crown 8vo. 4s.

Tyrwhitt. Handbook of Pictorial Art. With coloured Illustrations, Photographs, and a chapter on Perspective by A. Macdonald. By R. St. J. TYRWHITT, M.A. Second Edition. 8vo. half morocco, 18s.

Upcott. Introduction to Greek Sculpture. By L. E. UPCOTT, M.A. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

Vaux. Catalogue of the Castellani Collection of Antiquities in the University Galleries, Oxford. By W. S. W. VAUX, M.A. Crown 8vo. 1s.

VII. PALAEOGRAPHY.

Gardthausen. Catalogus Codicum Graecorum Sinaiticorum. Scriptis V. GARDTHAUSEN Lipsiensis. With six pages of Facsimiles. 8vo. linen, 25s.

Fragmenta Herculanensia. A Descriptive Catalogue of the Oxford copies of the Herculanean Rolls, together with the texts of several papyri, accompanied by facsimiles. Edited by WALTER SCOTT, M.A., Fellow of Merton College, Oxford. Royal 8vo. 21s.

Herculanensium Voluminum Partes II. 1824. 8vo. 10s.

—
figure
M.A.,
M.A.

By

ONE

used

(ed.

J. ire.

rel
C.

ed
e.
H

~~JAN 31 1988~~

~~JAN 31 1989~~

~~SEP 30 1992~~

~~JUN 01 1993~~

~~SEP 10 1996~~

NOV 20 1998

3 2044 037 730 603

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

THE SACRED BOOKS OF THE EAST

London

HENRY FROWDE

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE
AMEN CORNER, E.C.

New York

MACMILLAN & CO., 66 FIFTH AVENUE

THE
SACRED BOOKS OF THE EAST

TRANSLATED

BY VARIOUS ORIENTAL SCHOLARS

AND EDITED BY

F. MAX MÜLLER

VOL. XXXVIII

©xford

AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

1896

[All rights reserved]

Oxford

PRINTED AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

BY HORACE HART, PRINTER TO THE UNIVERSITY

BOOKS OF THE EAST UNIVERSITY

Digitized by Google

TRANSLITERATION OF ORIENTAL ALPHABETS.

VOWELS.	MISSIONARY ALPHABET.			Sanskrit.	Zend.	Pehlvi.	Persian.	Arabic.	Hebrew.	Chinese.
	I Class.	II Class.	III Class.
1 Neutral	o			...	...	...	...	...	...	...
2 Laryngo-palatalis	æ			...	...	...	...	...	...	...
3 " labialis	ø			...	...	...	...	...	...	...
4 Gutturalis brevis	a			...	...	...	...	...	...	...
5 " longa	ā	(a)		...	...	...	...	...	...	...
6 Palatalis brevis	i			...	...	...	...	...	...	...
7 " longa	ī	(i)		...	...	...	...	...	...	...
8 Dentalis brevis	h			...	...	...	...	...	...	...
9 " longa	h			...	...	...	...	...	...	...
10 Lingualis brevis	rī			...	...	...	...	...	...	...
11 " longa	rī			...	...	...	...	...	...	...
12 Labialis brevis	u			...	...	...	...	...	...	...
13 " longa	ū	(u)		...	...	...	...	...	...	...
14 Gutturo-palatalis brevis	e			...	...	...	...	...	...	...
15 " longa	é (ai)	(e)		...	...	...	...	...	...	...
16 Diphthongus gutturo-palatalis	āi	(ai)		...	...	...	...	...	...	...
17 " "	ei (ēi)			...	...	...	...	...	...	...
18 " "	oi (ōu)			...	...	...	...	...	...	...
19 Gutturo-labialis brevis	o			...	...	...	...	...	...	...
20 " longa	ō (au)	(o)		...	...	...	...	...	...	...
21 Diphthongus gutturo-labialis	āu	(au)		...	...	...	...	...	...	...
22 " "	eu (ēu)			...	...	...	...	...	...	...
23 " "	ou (ōu)			...	...	...	...	...	...	...
24 Gutturalis fracta	ä			...	...	...	...	...	...	...
25 Palatalis fracta	ī			...	...	...	...	...	...	...
26 Labialis fracta	ū			...	...	...	...	...	...	...
27 Gutturo-labialis fracta	ō			...	...	...	...	...	...	...

TRANSLITERATION OF ORIENTAL ALPHABETS ADOPTED FOR THE TRANSLATIONS
OF THE SACRED BOOKS OF THE EAST.

CONSONANTS	MISSIONARY ALPHABET.					Sanskrit.	Zend.	Pehlvi.	Persian.	Arabic.	Hebrew.	Chinese.
				III Class.
	I Class.	II Class.	III Class.
Gutturales.
1 Tenuis	k					क	𐬕	𐬌	𐬕	𐬕	𐬕	k
2 " aspirata	kh					ख	𐬖	𐬍	𐬖	𐬖	𐬖	kh
3 Media	g					ग	𐬗	𐬎	𐬗	𐬗	𐬗
4 " aspirata	gh					घ	𐬘	𐬏	𐬘	𐬘	𐬘
5 Gutturo-labialis	q
6 Nasalis	h (ng)					ङ	{ 𐬙 (ng) }
7 Spiritus asper	h					ह	𐬚 (h)					h, hs
8 " lenis	'
9 " asper faucalis	h
10 " lenis faucalis	h
11 " asper fricatus		'h
12 " lenis fricatus		'h
Gutturales modificatae (palatales, &c.)
13 Tenuis		k				𐬠	𐬡	𐬠	𐬠	𐬠	𐬠	k
14 " aspirata		kh				𐬡	𐬢	𐬡	𐬡	𐬡	𐬡	kh
15 Media		g				𐬢	𐬣	𐬢	𐬢	𐬢	𐬢
16 " aspirata		gh				𐬣	𐬤	𐬣	𐬣	𐬣	𐬣
17 " Nasalis		h				𐬤	𐬥	𐬤	𐬤	𐬤	𐬤

TRANSLITERATION OF ORIENTAL ALPHABETS

CONSONANTS (continued).	MISSIONARY ALPHABET.			Sanskrit.	Zend.	Pehlevi.	Persian.	Arabic.	Hebrew.	Chinese.
	I Class.	II Class.	III Class.
18 Semivocalis	y	...	...	य	𐬨 𐬩 𐬪 init.	𐬨	𐬨	ي	י	י
19 Spiritus asper	...	(y)	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
20 " lenis	...	(y)	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
21 " asper assibilatus	...	s	...	श	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	س	ש	ש
22 " lenis assibilatus	...	z	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
Dentales.
23 Tenuis	t	...	...	त	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	ت	ת	ת
24 " aspirata	th	...	...	थ	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	ת	ת	ת
25 " assibilata	...	...	TH	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
26 Media	d	...	...	द	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	ד	ד	ד
27 " aspirata	dh	...	...	ध	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	ד	ד	ד
28 " assibilata	...	...	DH	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
29 Nasalis	n	...	...	न	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	ن	נ	נ
30 Semivocalis	l	...	...	ल	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	ل	ל	ל
31 " mollis 1	...	l	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
32 " mollis 2	...	...	L	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
33 Spiritus asper 1	s	...	...	स	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	س	ס	ס
34 " asper 2	...	...	s (S)	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
35 " lenis	z	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
36 " asperimus 1	...	...	z (z)	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
37 " asperimus 2	...	...	z (z)	...	...	...	...	...	...	...

THE VEDÂNTA-SÛTRAS

WITH THE COMMENTARY BY

SANĀKARÂKÂRYA

TRANSLATED BY

GEORGE THIBAUT

PART II

Oxford

AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

1896

[All rights reserved]

REESE

685
M 946
v.38

CONTENTS.

VEDĀNTA-SŪTRAS WITH THE COMMENTARY BY SAṆKARĀKĀRYA.

ADHYĀYA II.

	PAGE
Pāda III	3
Pāda IV	74

ADHYĀYA III.

Pāda I	101
Pāda II	133
Pāda III	184
Pāda IV	285

ADHYĀYA IV.

Pāda I	331
Pāda II	364
Pāda III	382
Pāda IV	405

INDEXES BY DR. M. WINTERNITZ:—

Index of Quotations to Volumes XXXIV (i) and XXXVIII (ii)	421
Index of Sanskrit Words to Volumes XXXIV (i) and XXXVIII (ii)	431
General Index to Volumes XXXIV (i) and XXXVIII (ii)	441
Corrigenda	503

Transliteration of Oriental Alphabets adopted for the Trans- lations of the Sacred Books of the East	505
---	-----

VEDÂNTA-SÛTRAS

WITH

SAÑKARA BHÂSHYA.

SECOND ADHYĀYA.

THIRD PĀDA.

REVERENCE TO THE HIGHEST SELF !

1. Ether ¹ (does) not (originate), on account of the absence of scriptural statement.

In the Vedānta-texts we meet in different places with different statements concerning the origination of various things. Some of those passages declare that ether originated; some do not. Some record the origination of air; others do not. Other passages again make analogous statements concerning the individual soul and the vital airs.—Similarly we observe that other scriptural texts contradict one another concerning order of succession and the like.—Now, as we ourselves have inferred the worthlessness of other philosophical doctrines from their mutual contradictions, a suspicion might arise that our doctrine is equally worthless, owing to its intrinsic contradictions. Hence a new discussion is begun in order to clear from all doubt the sense of all those Vedānta-texts which refer to creation, and thus to remove the suspicion alluded to.

Here we have to consider in the first place the question whether ether has an origin or not.—The pūrvapakshin maintains that ether does not originate, since there is no scriptural statement to that effect. For in the chapter which treats of the origin (of the world) ether is not mentioned at all. In the passage ‘In the beginning there was that only which is, one only, without a second’ the Khândogya at first introduces Brahman as the general subject-matter, by means of the clause ‘that which is,’ and thereupon (in the passages ‘It thought,’ ‘It sent forth fire,’ &c.) records the origin of three elements, viz. fire, water, and earth; giving the first place to fire which (ordinarily) occupies the middle place among the five elements¹. Now, as scriptural statement is our (only) authority in the origination of the knowledge of supersensuous things, and as there is no scriptural statement declaring the origin of ether, ether must be considered to have no origin.

¹ Here, as generally in the preceding parts of this translation, ākāśa is rendered by 'ether.' There is no doubt that occasionally the appropriate—and in some cases the only possible—rendering is not 'ether' but 'space;' but the former rendering, after all, best agrees with the general Vedāntic view of ākāśa. The Vedāntins do not clearly distinguish between empty space and an exceedingly fine matter filling all space, and thus it happens that in many cases where we speak of the former they speak of ākāśa, i.e. the all-pervading substratum of sound; which howsoever attenuated is yet one of the material elements, and as such belongs to the same category as air, fire, water, and earth.

2. But there is (a scriptural statement of the origination of ether).

The conjunction ‘but’ indicates the adoption of another alternative.—The origin of ether may not be stated in the Khândogya; but it is stated in other scriptural passages. For the text of the Taittirīyikas, after having introduced Brahman as the general subject-matter,—in the words, ‘The true, knowledge, without end is Brahman,’—goes on to say, ‘From that Self sprang ether’ (Taitt. Up. II, 1).—Hence there arises a conflict of scriptural passages, the creation sometimes being said to begin with fire, sometimes with ether.—But may we not appropriately assume the two scriptural passages to form one syntactical whole?—It would be well indeed if we could do so, but a unity of the kind desired cannot be admitted, because the creator who is mentioned only once—in the passage ‘he sent forth fire’—cannot be connected with two things to be created, as if the construction were ‘He sent forth fire, he sent forth ether.’—But—an objection may be raised—we see that sometimes an agent, although mentioned once only, is yet connected with two objects ; as when we say ‘after having cooked broth he now cooks rice.’ We therefore may combine the two scriptural sentences into one, ‘Brahman having created ether created fire.’—Such a combination of sentences, we reply, is not admissible here, because the Khândogya intimates that fire was created first, while the Taittirīyaka assigns the same position to ether, and because it is impossible that both should have been created first.—The same remarks apply to a further contradiction involved in the other scriptural passage, ‘From that Self sprang ether,’ &c. ; for there also the material cause and the fact of origination, being mentioned only once, cannot be connected with fire as well as ether, so as to effect a sentence of the following kind, ‘from that there sprang ether, from that there sprang fire.’ Moreover the Taittirīyaka states separately that ‘fire (sprang) from air¹.’—With regard to this conflict of statements somebody now maintains the following view.

¹ The usual order being ether, air, fire, water, earth.

3. (The Vedic statement concerning the origination of ether) has a secondary sense, on account of the impossibility (of the origination of ether).

The ether does not originate on account of the absence of scriptural statement.—That other passage which (apparently) declares the origination of the ether must be taken as having a secondary (figurative) meaning.—Why?—On account of the impossibility. The origination of ether cannot be shown to be possible as long as there exist followers of the opinion of the reverend Kaṇabhūg (Kaṇāda). For the latter deny the origination of ether on the ground that it is impossible to demonstrate the existence of the required apparatus of causes. Whatever is originated, they say, is originated from inherent causes, non-inherent causes, and operative causes. Of a substance the inherent causes are substances belonging to the same class and more than one in number. But for ether there are no such originating substances, belonging to the same class and more than one in number, from which, as its inherent cause, it could originate, and consequently there also exists no non-inherent cause of ether; for the latter would have to be looked for in the conjunction of the primary substances. And as thus there exist no inherent cause and no non-inherent cause, there is absolutely no room for an operative cause; for the only function of the latter is to assist the two other causes. Those elements moreover which have an origin, as fire and the like, we may conceive to exist in different conditions at an earlier and a later time; we may conceive e.g. that fire, previously to its origination, did not give light or produce any other effects, while it does do so subsequently to its origination. Of the ether, on the other hand, no such difference between an earlier and a later period can be conceived; for, we ask, would it be possible to maintain that before its alleged origination there were no large, minute, and atomic spaces?—That ether is without an origin further follows from its characteristic qualities, such as all-pervadingness and so on, which altogether distinguish it from earth and the other elements.—Hence, as the word ‘ether’ (ākāśa) is used in a secondary sense in such phrases as ‘make room’ (ākāśa), ‘there is room,’ and as space although one only is designated as being of different kinds when we speak of the space of a jar, the space of a house, &c.—a form of expression met with even in Vedic passages such as ‘he is to place the wild animals in the spaces’ (ākāśeshu)—we conclude that those Vedic passages also which speak of its origination must be supposed to have a secondary meaning.

¹ While the Khând. says that fire sprang from the Self.

4. And on account of the word (of the Veda).

The word of the Veda also proclaims the non-originatedness of ether; for it declares that ‘air and ether (antariksha) are immortal’ (Bṛi. Up. II, 3, 3), and what is immortal cannot have an origin. Another scriptural passage (‘omnipresent and eternal like ether’), by comparing two attributes of Brahman, viz. omnipresence and eternity with the other, intimates that those qualities belong to the ether also ; in which case no beginning can be attributed to it. Other passages to be quoted in this connexion are, 'As this ether is infinite, so the Self is to be known as infinite ;' and 'Brahman has the ether for its body, the ether is the Self.' For if the ether had a beginning, it could not be predicated of Brahman (as is done in the last passage), as we predicate blueness of a lotus ('the lotus is blue'). Hence we understand that the eternal Brahman is of the same nature as ether.

5. The one (word 'sprang') may be (taken in its secondary as well as in its primary sense), like the word 'Brahman.'

This Sûtra contains the reply to a doubt.—If we admit the opinion maintained hitherto, how can one and the same word 'sprang' ('from that Self sprang the ether') be used, in the same chapter, in its primary (real) meaning with regard to fire and so on, and in a secondary meaning with regard to ether?—The answer to this objection is that the one word 'sprang' may, according to the nature of the things to which it refers, be used in its primary as well as its secondary sense, just as the word 'Brahman' is used. For the one word 'Brahman' is, in the passage Taitt. Up. III, 2-6 ('Try to know Brahman by penance, for penance is Brahman'), used in a secondary sense with regard to food, &c., and in its primary sense with regard to bliss ; and the same word Brahman is, in the way of figurative identification (bhakti), applied to penance, which is merely the means of knowing Brahman, and again directly to Brahman as the object of knowledge.—But how—to raise another question—can we, on the supposition of ether having no beginning, uphold the validity of the statement made in the clause 'one only, without a second?' For if ether is a second entity (co-existing with Brahman from eternity), it follows that Brahman has a second. And if so, how can it be said that when Brahman is known everything is known? (Kh. Up. VI, 1).—The word 'one,' the pûrva-pakshin replies, may be used with reference to (the absence of) effects. As in ordinary life a person, who on a certain day sees in a potter's house a lump of clay, a staff, a wheel and so on, and on the following day a number of finished vessels, might say, 'Yesterday there was only clay,' meaning thereby only that on the preceding day there were no things made of clay, not that there were no staff, wheel and the like ; so the passage under discussion also is to be understood.—The term 'without a second' (does not exclude the existence from eternity of ether, but) excludes the existence of any other superintending being (but Brahman). While there is a superintending potter in addition to the material cause of the vessels, i. e. the clay, there is no other superintendent in addition to Brahman, the material cause of the world. Nor does the existence of ether as a second entity involve Brahman's being associated with a second (and therefore not being of a simple nature). For diversity is founded on difference of characteristic attributes, and before the origin (of the creation) no difference of attributes separating Brahman and ether exists ; the two being mixed like water and milk, and having the common attributes of all-pervadingness, immateriality and so on. At the time of creation however a certain diversity of the two determines itself, Brahman putting forth energy in order to produce the world, while the ether remains immoveable.—And also from the passages quoted above—such as 'Brahman has the ether for its body'—it follows that the two are identical. Thence again it follows that through the knowledge of Brahman everything is known.—Moreover every effect, which is produced, is produced in such a way as not to be separated from ether in place as well as in time, and ether itself is non-separated in place and time from Brahman ; hence, if there are known Brahman and its effects, the ether also is known. The case is similar to that of a few drops of water poured into a jug full of milk. Those drops are taken when the milk is taken ; the taking of the drops does not constitute something additional to the taking of the milk. Analogously the ether, as being non-separate in place and time from Brahman and its effects, is comprised within Brahman, and consequently we have to understand the passages about the origin of the ether in a secondary sense.—To this argumentation we make the following reply.

6. The non-abandonment of the promissory statements (results only) from the non-difference (of the entire world from Brahman), according to the words of the Veda.

In all the Vedânta-texts we meet with promissory statements of the following nature:—‘That by which we hear what is not heard, perceive what is not perceived, know what is not known’ (Kh. Up. VI, 1, 3); ‘When the Self has been seen, heard, perceived, and known, then all this is known’ (Bri. Up. IV, 5, 6); ‘Sir, what is that through which if it is known everything else becomes known?’ (Mu. Up. I, 1, 3); ‘Outside that which is there is no knowledge.’ These promissory statements are not abandoned, i.e. not stultified, only if the entire aggregate of things is non-different from Brahman, the object of knowledge; for if there were any difference, the affirmation that by the knowledge of one thing everything is known, would be contradicted thereby. Non-difference again of the two is possible only if the whole aggregate of things originates from the one Brahman. And we understand from the words of the Veda that that affirmation can be established only through the theory of the non-difference of the material cause and its effects. For the affirmation contained in the clause ‘That by which we hear what is not heard,’ &c., is proved by the analogous instances of clay, &c., which all aim at showing the identity of effect and cause. In order to establish this, the subsequent clauses also (‘Being only, my dear, this was in the beginning, one only, without a second; it thought; it sent forth fire,’ &c.) at first state that the aggregate of effects belongs to Brahman, and then declare its identity with Brahman, viz. from the passage ‘In it all that exists has its Self’ (VI, 8, 7), up to the end of the prapâṭhaka.—If, now, the ether were not one of the effects of Brahman, it could not be known by Brahman being known, and that would involve an abandonment of a (previous) affirmation; an alternative which, as invalidating the authoritativeness of the Veda, is of course altogether unacceptable.—Similarly in all the Vedānta-texts certain passages are to be found which, by means of various instances, make the same affirmation, so e.g. ‘This everything, all is that Self’ (Bṛi. Up. II, 4, 6); ‘Brahman alone is that Immortal before’ (Mu. Up. II, 2, 11).—Hence, like fire and the other substances, the ether also is a product.—The averment made by the pūrvapakshin that on account of the absence of scriptural statements the ether is not a product is unfounded, since a scriptural passage referring to the origin of ether has already been pointed out, viz. ‘from that Self sprang ether.’—True,—the pūrvapakshin may reply,—such a statement has indeed been pointed out, but it is contradicted by another statement, viz. ‘It sent forth fire,’ &c. Should it be alleged that there can be no contradiction, because all scriptural passages form one whole, the reply is that all non-contradictory passages form a whole; in the present case, however, a contradiction has been shown to exist, because the creator, who is mentioned only once, cannot be connected with two things created; because two things cannot both be created first; and because an option is, in that case, inadmissible¹.—This reply, we rejoin, is without force. It is indeed true that it is impossible to explain the passage of the Taittirīyaka in any modified sense; for it distinctly declares that fire was produced in the third place, ‘From that Self sprang the ether, from ether air, from air fire.’ But, on the other hand, it is possible to give a different turn to the passage from the Kāṇḍogya, which may be explained to mean that ‘Brahman, after having created ether and air, created fire.’ For as the purport of this passage is to relate the origin of fire, it cannot at the same time impugn the account of the origin of ether given in another passage; according to the principle that to one and the same sentence a double purport must not be ascribed. As, on the other hand, one creator may successively create more than one thing, and as on that ground the combination of the two passages into one syntactical whole is possible, we are not obliged to disregard any scriptural statement on account of its meaning being contradicted (by other scriptural passages). Nor do we mean to say that a creator mentioned only once is to be connected with two created things; for the other (second) created thing is supplied from another scriptural passage. And, in the same way as the fact of the whole aggregate of things being produced from Brahman—which is stated directly in the passage ‘Let a man meditate with calm mind on that as beginning, ending and breathing in it’ (Kh. Up. III, 14, 1)—does not impugn the order of creation stated elsewhere to begin with fire; so also the statement as to fire being produced from Brahman has no force to impugn the order of creation which, in another scriptural passage, is said to begin with ether.

¹ For we cannot maintain that optionally either the one or the other was created first.

But, it may be objected, the passage ‘Let a man meditate with calm mind,’ &c. has the purpose of enjoining calmness, and does not state anything with regard to creation; it need not therefore adapt itself to the order (of creation) established by another passage¹. On the other hand, the passage ‘It sent forth fire’ refers to the creation, and we must therefore accept the order exactly as stated there.—This objection we refute by the remark that it is not legitimate to abandon, from deference to the circumstance of fire occupying the first place (in the Kh. Up.), the thing, viz. the ether which is known (to have been created) from another passage; for order of succession is a mere attribute of things (and therefore subordinate to the latter). Moreover, in the passage ‘It sent forth fire’ we meet with no word directly indicating the order of succession; but we merely infer the latter from the sense, and this (merely inferred) order is impugned by the order established by another direct scriptural statement, viz. 'From air there sprang fire.' Now with regard to the question whether ether or fire were created first, neither option nor addition are permissible, because the former is impossible in itself, and the latter non-admitted by the texts¹. Hence the two scriptural passages are not contradictory.—Moreover, in order to justify the promise made in the Khândogya in the beginning of the chapter ('That instruction by which we hear what is not heard'), we have to count the ether, although 'not heard' (i. e. not mentioned in the text) among the things produced; how much more impossible then is it for us not to accept the statement actually made about the ether in the Taittiriya!—To the assertion, made above by the pûrvapakshin, that the ether as occupying the same space with everything is known together with Brahman and its effects, and that thus the assertion (of everything being known through Brahman) is not contradicted; and that moreover the scriptural passage 'one only, without a second' is not contradicted, because Brahman and the ether may be considered as non-separate, like milk and water, we make the following reply. That knowledge of everything through the knowledge of one thing (of which scripture speaks) cannot be explained through the analogy of milk mixed with water, because we understand from the parallel instance of a piece of clay being brought forward (Kh. Up. VI, 1, 4) that the knowledge of everything has to be explained through the relation of the material cause and the material effect (the knowledge of the cause implying the knowledge of the effect). Moreover, the knowledge of everything, if assumed to be analogous to the case of the knowledge of milk and water, could not be called a perfect knowledge (samyag-vigñāna), because the water which is apprehended only through the knowledge of the milk (with which it is mixed) is not grasped by perfect knowledge¹. Nor can Vedic affirmations about things be viewed, like ordinary human statements, as mixed up with error, untruth, and deceit². And we should do violence to the emphatic assertion made in the passage 'one only, without a second,' if we explained it according to the analogy of milk mixed with water.—Nor must we explain the cognition of everything (through one thing), and the assertion as to the one without a second, as referring only to a part of existing things, viz. the avowed effects of Brahman (to the exclusion of ether), on the ground that such is the case in the parallel instances of clay and the like. For what is said about clay and the like is not something altogether new and independent; but has to be understood in connexion with the previous passage 'Svetaketu, as you are so conceited,' &c. We therefore must conclude that the 'knowledge of everything' has all things whatever for its objects, and is here introduced with a view to showing that everything is the effect of Brahman.

¹ Yatparaḥ sabdaḥ sa sabdārtho na kāyam sabdaḥ sṛishṭiparo'to na prasiddham kramam bādhitum alam iti. Ân. Gi.

¹ An optional proceeding, i. e. the doctrine that either ether or fire was the first product is impossible because only actions to be done, not existing things, fall within the sphere of option; addition, i. e. the fact of fire and ether together being the first creation is not admitted by scripture, which teaches a successive creation of the elements.

The next Sûtra replies to the assertion, made by the pûrvapakshin, that the passage which speaks of the origin of ether is to be understood in a secondary sense, on account of the impossibility (of ether having an origin).

7. But wherever there are effects, there is division; as in ordinary life.

The conjunction 'but' is meant to exclude the suspicion of impossibility.—We must not imagine the origin of ether to be impossible, because wherever we observe effects (modifications of a substance), such as jars, pots and urns, or bracelets, armlets and earrings, or needles, arrows and swords, we also observe division; while, on the other hand, nothing which is not an effect is seen to be divided ¹. Now, we apprehend ether as divided from earth and so on; hence ether also must be an effect. Thereby (i. e. by the circumstance of their being divided) place (dis), time, mind (manas) and the atoms also are shown to be effects.

¹ For the water, although mixed with the milk, yet is different from it.

² But the promise that through the knowledge of one thing everything becomes known is to be taken in its full literal meaning.

But—an objection may be raised—the Self also is divided from ether and so on, and hence it follows that it is an effect like jars and the like.—This objection we refute by pointing to the scriptural statement that ‘ether sprang from the Self’ (Taitt. Up. II, 1). For if the Self also were a mere modification (of something else), it would follow that all effects such as the ether and so on are without a Self ²; for scripture mentions nothing beyond the Self, and that Self itself would (on the supposition stated) be a mere effect. And thus we should be driven to the hypothesis of a general void (śūnyavāda). Just because it is the Self, it is impossible for us to entertain the idea even of its being capable of refutation. For the (knowledge of the) Self is not, in any person’s case, adventitious, not established through the so-called means of right knowledge; it rather is self-established. The Self does indeed employ perception and the other means of right knowledge for the purpose of establishing previously non-established objects of knowledge; for nobody assumes such things as ether and so on to be self-established independently of the means of right knowledge. But the Self, as being the abode of the energy that acts through the means of right knowledge, is itself established previously to that energy. And to refute such a self-established entity is impossible. An adventitious thing, indeed, may be refuted, but not that which is the essential nature (of him who attempts the refutation); for it is the essential nature of him who refutes. The heat of a fire is not refuted (i. e. sublated) by the fire itself.—Let us further consider the relation expressed in the following clauses: ‘I know at the present moment whatever is present; I knew (at former moments) the nearer and the remoter past; I shall know

¹ Whatever is divided, is an effect, as jars, pots, &c. Whatever is not an effect, is not divided, as the Self.

² I. e. without a material cause.

(in the future) the nearer and the remoter future.' Here the object of knowledge changes according as it is something past or something future or something present ; but the knowing agent does not change, since his nature is eternal presence. And as the nature of the Self is eternal presence, it cannot undergo destruction even when the body is reduced to ashes ; nay we cannot even conceive that it ever should become something different from what it is.—It thus follows from the essential irrefutability of its nature that the Self is not an effect. The ether, on the other hand, falls under the category of effected things.

To the objection, raised above by the pûrvapakshin, that there is no plurality of homogeneous substances out of which the ether could originate, we reply that it is not an absolute law that effects should originate only from things belonging to the same genus, not from such as belong to different genera. Threads for instance and the conjunctions of threads¹ do not belong to the same genus, the former being admitted to belong to the genus 'substance,' the latter to the genus 'quality.' Nor again is there a binding rule that the operative causes such as the shuttle, the loom and so on should belong to the same genus.—Well then let the doctrine that the causes must belong to the same genus extend to the inherent causes only, not to the other causes².—But here also there is no absolute rule. For we see that one and the same rope is made of things belonging to different genera, such as threads and cow-hair, and several kinds of cloth are woven of vegetable thread and wool.—If it were assumed that the postulate of the inherent causes belonging to the same genus refers only to the genera of essentiality, substantiality, &c., the rule would be a superfluous one ; for in that sense every inherent cause belongs to the same genus as every other³.

¹ Threads are the inherent cause of a piece of cloth ; the conjunction of the threads constitutes the non-inherent cause ; the loom, shuttle, &c. are the operative causes.

² So much only was in fact insisted upon by the pûrvapakshin, II, 3, 3.

³ An inherent cause is always a substance (dravya), and as such —Nor again is there an absolute rule that only a plurality of inherent causes, not one such cause, is able to originate an effect. For it is admitted that an atom as well as the mind (manas) originate their first activity; i. e. one atom by itself, and also the mind by itself, give rise to their primary actions, without being in conjunction with other substances.—And, should it be said that there is an absolute rule as to several causes only having originating power in the case of the origination of substances only (not in the case of the origination of actions, &c.), we again deny that, because it is admitted that there is such a thing as change (transformation). An absolute rule, such as maintained by you, would exist if substances did originate other substances, only when assisted by conjunction (a non-inherent cause). But, as a matter of fact, one and the same substance, when passing over into a different state distinguished by peculiar characteristic marks, is admitted to be an effect. In some cases more substances than one undergo the change, as when a young plant springs from seed and earth; in other cases one substance only changes, as when milk turns into curds.—In short it is none of the Lord's laws that only several causes in conjunction should produce an effect. We therefore decide, on the authority of scripture, that the entire world has sprung from the one Brahman, ether being produced first and later on the other elements in due succession. A statement to that effect has already been made above (II, 1, 24).

The further assertion made by the pūrvapakshin, that on the assumption of ether having had an origin it is impossible to conceive a difference between the former and later periods (the time before and after the origination of ether) is likewise unfounded; for we have to understand that that very specialising difference ¹, from which we ascertain at present that there is a thing such as ether, different from earth and the other elements, did not exist before the always falls under the notion of essentiality (sattā), which constitutes the summum genus for substances, qualities, and actions.

¹ Viz. the quality of sound.

origination of ether. And just as Brahman's nature does not participate in the nature of earth and the other elements characterised by grossness and similar qualities,—according to such scriptural passages as 'It is not gross, it is not subtle,'—so also it does not participate in the nature of ether, as we understand from the passage 'it is without ether' (Bri. Up. III, 8, 8). It therefore remains a settled conclusion that, before ether was produced, Brahman existed without ether.

The inference, drawn by the pûrvapakshin, that ether has no beginning, because it differs in nature from those substances which avowedly have a beginning, such as earth and so on, is without any value; for, as it is contradicted by scripture, it must be considered fallacious. We, on our part, have brought forward arguments showing that ether is an originated thing; and we may moreover reason as follows: Ether is non-eternal, because it is the substratum of a non-eternal quality, viz. sound, just as jars and other things, which are the substrata of non-eternal qualities, are themselves non-eternal.—Nor is there any danger of this latter reasoning being extended to the Self also, for the philosopher who takes his stand on the Upanishads does not admit that the Self is the substratum of non-eternal qualities. Moreover, those who teach ether to have an origin do not consider it proved that it is all-pervading and so on.

In reply to the remarks made under II, 3, 4 we point out that those scriptural passages which speak of the 'immortality of ether' are to be understood in the same way as the analogous statements about the immortality of the gods¹, since the origin and destruction of the ether have been shown to be possible. And if it is said of Brahman that 'it is omnipresent and eternal like ether,' Brahman is there compared to ether, whose greatness is well known, merely in order to indicate its supereminent greatness, not in order to maintain its being equal to ether. Similarly, when we say that the sun moves with the speed of an arrow, we merely mean that he moves fast, not that he moves at the same rate as an arrow. This remark explains that scriptural passage also in which Brahman is declared to be infinite like ether.—On the other hand, such passages as ‘It is greater than ether’ prove that the extent of ether is less than that of Brahman; passages like ‘there is no image of him’ (Sve. Up. IV, 19) show that there is nothing to compare Brahman to; and passages like ‘Everything else is of evil’ (Bri. Up. III, 4, 2) show that everything different from Brahman such as ether, &c. is of evil.—All which serves to refute the assertion that the passage which declares ether to have originated has to be taken in a secondary sense, as the word Brahman actually has to be taken in some passages. Scripture and reasoning in combination rather show that ether has an origin, and the final conclusion therefore is that ether is an effect of Brahman.

¹ I.e. as referring to a relative immortality only.

8. Hereby air (also) is explained.

The present Sūtra extends the reasoning concerning ether to the air of which the ether is the abode.—The different views about air also are to be arranged in an analogous manner. The pûrvapakshin maintains that the air is not a product, because it is not mentioned in that chapter of the Khândogya which treats of the origination of things.—The opposite opinion is, that the air is mentioned in the parallel chapter of the Taittiriya (‘from the ether sprang the air’).—The two scriptural passages being of a conflicting nature, the pûrvapakshin maintains that the passage which declares the air to have originated must be taken in a secondary sense; firstly on account of the impossibility (of the literal sense being adopted), as shown (in the adhikarana treating of the ether); secondly on account of that passage which denies that it ever sets, ‘Vāyu (the air) is the deity that never sets’ (Bri. Up. I, 5, 22); and thirdly on account of those passages which declare it to be immortal. The final opinion on the other hand is, that air is a product; in the first place because this conclusion is conformable to the general tendency of scripture; and, in the second place, because it is generally admitted that whatever is divided is an effect.—The denial of its ever setting refers to the lower knowledge (*aparā vidyā*¹) and is merely a relative one, Vāyu not setting in the same way as fire, &c. The statement as to the immortality, &c. of air has already received its reply (in the adhikaraṇa treating of the ether).—Here it may be asked why, ether and air being equally mentioned and not mentioned in the chapters treating of the origin of the world, one adhikaraṇa is not considered to suffice for both, and why instead of that there is made a formal extension of the former reasoning to the latter case, although there is no difference between the two cases.—To this we reply that there is indeed some reason for the question; that, however, the formal extension is made for the purpose of removing any doubts which might possibly be engendered in the minds of slow-witted people by mere words². For as, in the Saṁvargavidyā and other passages, the glory of Vāyu is referred to as an object of worship; and as scripture says that he never sets, &c., some men might think that he is eternal.

9. But there is no origin of that which is (i.e. of Brahman), on account of the impossibility (of such an origin).

Somebody, who has learned from scripture that ether and air, although not in themselves likely to have originated, yet actually are things with a beginning, might feel inclined to suspect that Brahman itself has sprung from something else.—And further somebody, who has learned from scripture that from ether and the other elements which are themselves mere effects further effects are produced, might think that also Brahman, from which ether has sprung, is a mere effect.—In order to remove this doubt the Sūtra declares that Brahman, whose Self is Being, must not be suspected to have sprung from anything else 'on account of the impossibility.' Brahman which is mere Being cannot spring from mere being, since the relation of cause and effect cannot exist without a certain superiority (on the part of the cause). Nor again can Brahman spring from that which is something particular, since this would be contrary to experience. For we observe that particular forms of existence are produced from what is general, as, for instance, jars and pots from clay, but not that what is general is produced from particulars. Nor again can Brahman spring from that which is not (asat), for that which is not is without a Self¹, and moreover scripture expressly rejects that view, in the passage 'How could that which is spring from that which is not?' (Kh. Up. VI, 2, 2). Another passage, moreover, expressly denies that Brahman has any progenitor, 'He is the cause, the lord of the lords of the organs, and there is of him neither progenitor nor lord' (Sve. Up. VI, 9).—With regard to ether and air the possibility of an origin has been shown; but in Brahman's case there is no such possibility; hence the cases are not parallel. Nor does the fact of other effects springing from effects imply that Brahman also must be an effect; for the non-admission of a fundamental causal substance would drive us to a retrogressus in infinitum. And that fundamental causal substance which as a matter of fact is generally acknowledged to exist, just that is our Brahman.—Thus there is not any contradiction.

¹ In which Brahman is spoken of as to be meditated upon under the form of Vāyu.

² Sabdānurodhiny eva saṅkā na vastvanurodhinīti. Ān. Gi.

10. Fire (is produced) thence (i.e. from air); for thus (the text) declares.

In the Khândogya it is said that fire has for its source that which is (Brahman), in the Taittiriya that it has the air for its source. There being thus a conflict of scriptural passages with regard to the origin of fire, the pûrvapakshin maintains that fire has Brahman for its source.—Why?—Because the text, after having stated at the outset that there existed only that which is, teaches that it sent forth fire; and because the assertion of everything being known through Brahman is possible only in case of everything being produced from Brahman; and because the scriptural statement as to the 'Taggalān' (Kh. Up. III, 14, 1) specifies no difference¹; and because another scriptural passage (Mu. Up. II, 1, 3) teaches that everything without exception is born from Brahman. The Taittiriyaka also makes a statement about the entire world without any exception, 'after having brooded he sent forth all whatever there is' (Taitt. Up. II, 6). Hence the statement that 'fire was produced from air' (Taitt. Up. II, 1) must be considered to teach the order of succession only 'fire was produced subsequently to air.'

¹ And cannot therefore constitute a cause; for a cause is the Self of its effects.

To this the Sūtra replies that fire was produced thence, i.e. from air, because the text declares it to be so—'from air sprang fire.' For if fire had sprung directly from Brahman and not from air, the scriptural statement that 'fire sprang from air' would be contradicted thereby. That that statement should intimate the order of succession merely, as maintained by the pūrvapakshin, we cannot admit. For as in the preceding sentence ('from that Self sprang ether') the fifth case (ātmanaḥ) denotes the Self as that from which the origination proceeds, and as the same verb ('sprang') governs our sentence also, and as in the following sentences also—such as 'from earth the herbs'—the fifth case (pr̥thivyāḥ) denotes that from which something proceeds, we understand that in our sentence also the fifth case (vāyoḥ) denotes that from which fire proceeds. Moreover, if we should explain our sentence to mean 'after air fire was produced,' we should have to supply some preposition (or adverb as 'after,' 'subsequently'), while that construction which rests on the proper sense of the fifth case-affix is ready made at hand and does not require anything to be supplied. The passage therefore intimates that fire springs from air.—But, it may be said, the other scriptural passage ('it sent forth fire') intimates that fire springs from Brahman.—Not so, we reply; for this latter passage remains uncontradicted, even if we assume that fire sprang from Brahman only through intermediate links (not directly).

¹ But implies the whole world to have sprung from Brahman.

Even the supposition that Brahman, after having created ether and air, assumed the form of air and thus created fire would not be opposed to fire having sprung from Brahman; for we may say equally that milk comes from the cow, that curds come from the cow, that cheese comes from the cow. There is, moreover, a scriptural passage declaring that Brahman abides as the Self of its effects, viz. Taitt. Up. II, 7, 'That made itself its Self.' And analogously Smṛiti—in the passage beginning 'Cognition, knowledge, steadiness of mind' (Bha. Gī. X, 4)—says about the Lord, 'From me only spring the manifold states of the beings.' For although cognition and so on are observed to spring directly from their immediate causes, yet (the assertion made in the passage quoted holds good), since the entire aggregate of beings is, directly or indirectly, derived from the Lord.—Thereby those scriptural passages are accounted for which speak of the creation (on the whole) without specifying the order of succession¹; for they may be explained anyhow, while on the other hand the passages specifying the order of creation cannot be turned in any other way (i.e. not away from their direct sense). The general assertion, moreover, of everything springing from Brahman requires only that all things should ultimately proceed from that which is, not that they should be its immediate effects.—Thus there remains no difficulty.

11. Water (is produced from fire).

We have to supply from the preceding Sūtra the words 'thence' and 'for thus the text declares.'—Water is produced from fire; for the text says, 'it sent forth water' (Kh. Up. VI, 2, 3), and 'from fire (sprang) water' (Taitt. Up. II, 1). These explicit statements allow no room for doubt². The Sūtrakāra, however, having explained the creation of fire, and being about to explain the creation of ¹ I.e. it appears from the preceding discussion that those passages have to be explained in such a way as to agree with those other passages which state the order of the created beings.

² So that the Sūtra might possibly be looked upon as not called for.

earth, propounds this Sûtra in order to insert water (and thus to point out its position in the srîṣṭīkrama).

12. The earth (is meant by the word 'anna'), on account of the subject-matter, the colour, and other passages.

We read, 'Water thought, may I be many, may I grow forth. It sent forth food (anna)' (Kh. Up. VI, 2, 4).—Here a doubt arises, whether the word 'anna' denotes things fit to be used as food, such as rice, barley and the like; or cooked food; or else the earth.

The pûrvapakshin maintains that the word is to be understood in the former sense; for, he says, the word 'anna' means 'food' in ordinary language, and is moreover confirmed in that sense by the complementary passage, 'Therefore whenever it rains anywhere, most food is then produced;' for when it rains, rice, barley and the like, but not earth, are produced in abundance.

To this we reply that by the word 'anna' we have to understand earth as being produced from water.—Why?—On account of the subject-matter, on account of the colour, and on account of other passages.—The subject-matter, in the first place, is clearly connected with the elements, as we see from the preceding passages, 'it sent forth fire, it sent forth water.' It would therefore be improper to pass over a further element, viz. earth, when its turn has come, and to assume without reason that rice and the like are meant by the word 'anna.'—In the second place, we find that in a complementary passage there is mentioned a colour which agrees with earth, 'the black colour (of fire) is the colour of anna.' Eatable things on the other hand, such as cooked dishes, and rice, barley and the like, are not necessarily black.—But earth too is not necessarily black; for the soil of some fields has a whitish colour like milk, and that of others looks red like glowing coals!—True, but that does not affect our argument, since what we have to look to is the predominant colour. Now the predominant colour of earth is black, not either white or red. The *Paurânika*s also designate the colour of the earth by the term 'night'

(sarvarī); now the night is black, and we therefore conclude that black is the colour of earth also.—In the third place other scriptural passages also, which refer to the same subject, declare that ‘from water (sprang) earth’ (Taitt. Up. II, 1), and that ‘what was there as the froth of the water, that was hardened and became the earth’ (Bṛi. Up. I, 2, 2). On the other hand the text declares that rice and the like were produced from the earth, ‘From earth sprang herbs, from herbs food’ (Taitt. Up. II, 1).—As, thus, the general subject-matter as well as other arguments clearly proves that the word ‘anna’ here denotes earth, we can in no way accept the view that rice and the like are referred to. The common use of language to which the pūrvapakshin appeals is of no avail against the arguments favouring our interpretation. The complementary passage also (‘whenever it rains,’ &c.) is to be viewed as pointing out that, owing to the earthy nature of food (rice, &c.), earth itself mediately springs from water.—For all these reasons the word ‘anna’ denotes this earth.

13. But on account of the indicatory mark supplied by their reflecting (i.e. by the reflection attributed to the elements), he (i.e. the Lord is the creative principle abiding within the elements).

A doubt here arises whether ether and the other elements do themselves send forth their effects, or if the highest Lord abiding within certain Selfs produces, after reflection, certain effects.

Here the pūrvapakshin maintains that the elements themselves send forth, because the texts speak of them as acting independently; compare, for instance, ‘from ether sprang air, from air fire,’ &c. The objection that non-intelligent beings cannot enter on independent activity is invalidated by the fact that the elements also are spoken of in the sacred texts as endowed with intelligence, cf. for instance, ‘fire thought,’ ‘water thought’ (Kh. Up. VI, 2, 3; 4).

To this we reply that the highest Lord himself abiding within certain Selfs sends forth, after reflection, certain effects.—Why?—On account of the indicatory marks. For texts such as 'he who dwells in the earth, and within the earth, whom the earth does not know, whose body the earth is and who rules the earth within' show that the elements enter on their activity only if presided over by an intelligent principle. Texts such as 'He became sat and tyat' (which occurs in the passage, 'he wished may I be many, may I grow forth,' Taïtt. Up. II, 6) and 'It made itself its Self' (i. e. the Self of everything which exists; II, 7) show that he (the highest Lord) is the Self of everything. The thinking and hearing which the texts attribute to water and fire must be viewed as due to the fact of the highest Lord having entered them; for the passage, 'there is no other seer but he,' denies there being any other seer (thinker), and that which is (i. e. Brahman), in the character of seer (or thinker), constitutes the subject-matter of the whole chapter; as we conclude from the introductory passage, 'It thought, may I be many, may I grow forth' (Kh. Up. VI, 2, 3).

14. The order (in which the elements are retracted into Brahman) is the reverse of that (i. e. the order in which they are created); this is proved (by its agreement with observation).

Having considered the order of the creation of the elements we now proceed to consider the order of their retraction.—The question here is whether their retraction takes place in an indefinite order, or in the order of the creation, or in the inverse order. That the origin, the subsistence and the retraction of the elements all depend on Brahman, scripture declares 'That from whence these beings are born, that by which when born they live, that into which they enter at their death.'

The pûrvapakshin maintains that the retraction of the elements is not bound to any definite order, because scripture contains no specific information on the point. Or else, he says, let him who wishes to know the order of the retraction accept the order of creation, since the latter is expressly mentioned in the texts.

To this we reply that the order of retraction must be viewed as the reverse of the order of creation. For we see in ordinary life that a man who has ascended a stair has, in descending, to take the steps in the reverse order. Moreover we observe that things made of clay, such as jars, dishes, &c., on being destroyed pass back into clay, and that things which have originated from water, such as snow and hailstones, again dissolve into water. Hence we rightly assume that earth which has (according to scripture) sprung from water passes back into water when the period of its subsistence comes to an end, and that water which has sprung from fire passes back into fire. In this way each particular effect passes back into its immediately antecedent cause—each cause being of a subtler nature than its effect—until in the end the last cause is refunded into Brahman, the ultimate and most subtle of all causes. It certainly would be irrational to assume that an effect, passing over its immediate cause, should at once refund itself into the cause of the cause. Smṛiti also declares that the order of retraction is the order of origination inverted, ‘The earth, the basis of the world, is dissolved into water, O divine Rishi, the water into fire, the fire into air.’ The order of creation is indeed stated in the sacred texts, but that statement refers to creation only, and can therefore not be extended to retraction. We, moreover, cannot even desire to apply the order in which the elements are created to their retraction also since it is clearly unsuitable in the latter case. For, as long as an effect subsists, it is impossible to assume the dissolution of the cause, since on the dissolution of the latter the effect also cannot exist. On the other hand, we may assume a continued existence of the cause although the effect be destroyed; for that is actually observed in the case of clay (and the things made of it).

15. If it be said that between (Brahman and the elements) the intellect and mind (are mentioned; and that therefore their origination and retraction are to be placed) somewhere in the series, on account of there being inferential signs (whereby the order of the creation of the elements is broken); we deny that, on account of the non-difference (of the organs and the elements).

In what precedes we have said that the creation and the retraction of the elements take place in direct and reverse order; further that the creation proceeds from the Self, and that the retraction terminates in the Self.—Now Śruti as well as Smṛiti enlightens us concerning the existence of the mind (manas) together with the senses, and of the intellect (buddhi); compare, for instance, the indicatory marks contained in the passage, Ka. Up. I, 3, 3, 4, ‘Know the intellect to be the charioteer and the mind the reins; the senses they call the horses,’ &c. And as the whole aggregate of beings avowedly springs from Brahman, we must assume that the mind, the intellect and the senses also originate from it and are again merged in it in due order, occupying a definite place among the things created and retracted. Moreover the Ātharvāna (Mundaka), in the chapter treating of the creation, mentions the organs between the Self and the elements, ‘From him is born breath, mind and all organs of sense, ether, air, light, water and the earth the support of all’ (II, 1, 3). And from this there results a break in the previously stated order of the creation and the retraction of the elements.

This we deny, on account of the non-difference (of the organs from the elements). If the organs themselves are of the nature of the elements, their origination and retraction are the same as those of the elements, and we therefore have not to look out in their case for a different order. And that the organs are of the nature of the elements, for that we have inferential marks, in passages such as the following, ‘for mind, my child, consists of earth, breath of water, speech of fire’ (Kh. Up. VI, 6, 5). That the organs (although in reality belonging to the elements) are sometimes mentioned separately from them, is to be understood in the same way as when the Parivṛāgakas (mendicant Brāhmaṇas) are spoken of separately from the Brāhmaṇas. And supposing even that the organs are not of the nature of the elements, still the order of the origin of the elements would not be interfered with by the organs ; for we might assume either that the organs are produced first and the elements last ; or else that the elements are produced first and the organs last. In the Ātharvāna-upanishad quoted above we have merely a serial enumeration of the organs and the elements, not a statement as to the order of their origination. Similarly in other places also the series of the organs is recorded apart from the series of the elements ; so, for instance, in the following passage, ' Pragāpati indeed was all this in the beginning, he reflected on himself ; he sent forth mind ; there was mind only ; mind reflected on itself ; it sent forth speech,' &c.—Hence the origination of the organs does not cause a break in the order of the origination of the elements.

16. But the designation (as being born and dying) abides in the (bodies of beings) moving and non-moving ; it is secondary (metaphorical) if applied to the soul, as the existence (of those terms) depends on the existence of that (i.e. the body).

On account of certain popular modes of expression such as ' Devadatta is born,' ' Devadatta has died,' and the like, and on account of certain ceremonies such as the Gātaka-karman, some people might fall into the error of thinking that the individual soul has a beginning, and in the end undergoes destruction. This error we are going to dispel.—The individual soul has no beginning and is not subject to dissolution, since thus only it can be connected with the results of actions, as the Sāstra teaches. If the individual soul perished after the body, there would be no sense in the religious injunctions and prohibitions referring to the enjoyment and avoidance of pleasant and unpleasant things in another body (another birth). And scripture says, ' This body indeed dies when the living soul has left it, the living soul does not die ' (Kh. Up. VI, 11, 3).—But it has been pointed out above that ordinary language speaks of the birth and the death of the individual soul !—True ; but the terms ' birth ' and ' death,' if applied to the soul, have to be taken in a secondary sense.—What then is that thing to which those words apply in their primary sense, and with reference to which we can speak of a secondary sense?—They apply, we answer, to whatever moves and whatever does not move. The words ‘birth’ and ‘death’ have reference to the bodies of moving and non-moving beings; for such beings are born (produced) and die. To them the terms ‘birth’ and ‘death’ apply in their primary sense; while they are used metaphorically only with reference to the soul dwelling in them. For their existence (i. e. their being used) depends on the existence of the body; i. e. the words ‘birth’ and ‘death’ are used where there take place the manifestation and disappearance of bodies, not where they are absent. For nobody ever observes a soul being born or dying, apart from its connexion with a body. That the words ‘birth’ and ‘death’ have reference to the conjunction with—and separation from—a body merely, is also shown by the following passage: ‘On being born that person assuming his body, &c.; when he passes out (of the body) and dies,’ &c. (Bri. Up. IV, 3, 8). The gâta-ceremony also is to be viewed as having reference to the manifestation of the body only; for the soul is not manifested.—Whether the individual soul is produced from the highest Self like ether, &c. or not, will be discussed in the next Sûtra; the present Sûtra merely states that the gross origination and dissolution which belong to the body do not affect the soul.

17. The (living) Self is not (produced) as there is no scriptural statement, and as it is eternal according to them (i. e. scriptural passages).

There is a Self called the living one (the individual soul), which rules the body and the senses, and is connected with the fruits of actions. With regard to that Self the conflict of scriptural passages suggests the doubt, whether it is produced from Brahman like ether and the other elements, or if, like Brahman itself, it is unproduced. Some scriptural passages, by comparing it to sparks proceeding from a fire and so on, intimate that the living soul is produced from Brahman; from others again we learn that the highest Brahman, without undergoing any modification, passes, by entering into its effects (the elements), into the condition of the individual soul. These latter passages do not thus record an origination of the individual soul.

The pūrvapakshin maintains that the individual soul is produced, because on that view the general promissory statement is not contradicted. For the general assertion that 'by one thing being known all this is known' is not contradicted, only if the entire aggregate of things springs from Brahman; while it would be contradicted by the assumption of the individual soul being a thing of a different kind. Nor can the individual soul be conceived as mere unmodified highest Self, on account of the difference of their respective characteristics. For the highest Self is characterised by freedom from sin and so on, while the individual soul possesses the opposite attributes. That it is an effect, follows moreover from its being divided. For ether and all other things, in so far as divided, are effects, and we have concluded therefrom that they have an origin. Hence the soul also, which is distributed through all the bodies, doing good and evil and experiencing pleasure and pain, must be considered to originate at the time when the entire world is produced. We have moreover the following scriptural passage, 'As small sparks come forth from fire, thus from that Self all vital airs,' &c. (Bṛi. Up. II, 1, 20). This text teaches first the creation of the aggregate of objects of fruition, beginning with the vital airs, and then (in the words, 'all the Selves') separately teaches the creation of all the enjoying souls. Again we have the passage, 'As from a blazing fire sparks, being of the same nature as fire, fly forth a thousandfold, thus are various beings brought forth from the Imperishable, my friend, and return hither also' (Mu. Up. II, 1, 1); a passage descriptive of the origin and the retractation of the souls, as we infer from the statement about the sameness of nature¹.

¹ That the word bhāvāḥ 'beings' here means 'individual souls,' we conclude from their being said to have the same nature as the Imperishable.

For the individual souls are of the same nature as Brahman, because they are endowed with intelligence. Nor can the fact that in some places (as, for instance, in the accounts of the creation of the elements) the creation of the soul is not mentioned, invalidate what is stated about it in other places; it being a general principle of interpretation that whatever new, and at the same time non-contradictory, matter is taught in some scriptural passage has to be combined with the teaching of all other passages. Hence that passage also which speaks of the Self entering (into its effects and thus becoming gīva) must be explained as stating the Self's passing over into an effect (viz. the soul), analogously to such passages as 'that made itself its Self,' &c. (Taitt. Up. II, 7).—From all which it follows that the individual soul is a product.

To all this we reply, that the individual soul is not a product.—Why?—On account of the absence of scriptural statement. For in the chapters which treat of the creation, the production of the soul is, in most cases, not mentioned.—But, it was admitted above that the circumstance of something not being stated in some places does not invalidate the statements made about it elsewhere.—True, that was admitted; but we now declare that the production of the soul is not possible.—Why?—'On account of the eternity, &c., resulting from them' (i.e. the scriptural passages). The word ' &c.' implies non-originatedness and similar attributes. For we know from scriptural passages that the soul is eternal, that it has no origin, that it is unchanging, that what constitutes the soul is the unmodified Brahman, and that the soul has its Self in Brahman. A being of such a nature cannot be a product. The scriptural passages to which we are alluding are the following:—'The living Self dies not' (Kh. Up. VI, 11, 3); 'This great unborn Self undecaying, undying, immortal, fearless is indeed Brahman' (Bri. Up. IV, 4, 25); 'The knowing Self is not born, it dies not' (Ka. Up. I, 2, 18); 'The Ancient is unborn, eternal, everlasting' (Ka. Up. I, 2, 18); 'Having sent forth that he entered into it' (Taitt. Up. II, 6); 'Let me now enter those with this living Self and let me then evolve names and forms' (Kh. Up. VI, 3, 2); 'He entered thither to the very tips of the finger-nails' (Bri. Up. I, 4, 7); 'Thou art that' (Kh. Up. VI, 8, 7); 'I am Brahman' (Bri. Up. I, 4, 10); 'This Self is Brahman knowing all' (Bri. Up. II, 5, 19).—All these texts declare the eternity of the soul, and thus militate against the view of its having been produced.—But it has been argued above that the soul must be a modification because it is divided, and must have an origin because it is a modification!—It is not, we reply, in itself divided; for scripture declares that 'there is one God hidden in all beings, all-pervading, the Self within all beings' (Sve. Up. VI, 11); it only appears divided owing to its limiting adjuncts, such as the mind and so on, just as the ether appears divided by its connexion with jars and the like. Scripture (viz. Bri. Up. IV, 4, 5, 'that Self is indeed Brahman, made up of knowledge, mind, life, sight, hearing,' &c.) also declares that the one unmodified Brahman is made up of a plurality of intellects (buddhi), &c. By Brahman being made up of mind and so on is meant, that its nature is coloured thereby, while the fact of its being entirely separate from it is non-apparent. Analogously we say that a mean, cowardly fellow is made up of womanishness.—The casual passages which speak of the soul's production and dissolution must therefore be interpreted on the ground of the soul's connexion with its limiting adjuncts; when the adjunct is produced or dissolved, the soul also is said to be produced or dissolved. Thus scripture also declares, 'Being altogether a mass of knowledge, having risen from out of these elements it again perishes after them. When he has departed there is no more knowledge' (Bri. Up. IV, 5, 13). What is meant there, is only the dissolution of the limiting adjuncts of the Self, not the dissolution of the Self itself¹. The text itself explains this, in reply to Maitreyi's question ('Here, Sir, thou hast landed me in utter bewilderment. Indeed I do not understand him, that when he has departed there is no more knowledge'), in the words, 'I say nothing that is bewildering. Verily, beloved, that Self is imperishable and of an indestructible nature. But it enters into contact with the sense organs.'—Non-contradiction moreover of the general assertion (about everything being known through one) results only from the acknowledgment that Brahman is the individual soul. The difference of the attributes of both is also owing to the limiting adjuncts only. Moreover the words 'Speak on for the sake of final deliverance' (uttered by Ganaka with reference to the instruction he receives from Yāgñavalkya about the vigñāna-maya ātman) implicitly deny that the Self consisting of knowledge (i.e. the individual soul) possesses any of the attributes of transitory existence, and thus show it to be one with the highest Self.—From all this it follows that the individual soul does not either originate or undergo destruction.

¹ Hence the phrase, 'there is no more knowledge,'—which seems to contradict the term 'a mass of knowledge,'—only means that, on the limiting adjuncts being dissolved, there is no longer any knowledge of distinctions.

18. For this very reason (the individual soul is) intelligent.

Owing to the conflicting views of the philosophical schools there arises a doubt whether, as the followers of Kaṇāda think, the soul is in itself non-intelligent, so that its intelligence is merely adventitious; or if, as the Sāṅkhyas think, eternal intelligence constitutes its very nature.

The pūrvapakshin maintains that the intelligence of the Self is adventitious, and is produced by the conjunction of the Self with the mind (manas), just as, for instance, the quality of redness is produced in a jar by the conjunction of the jar with fire. For if the soul were of eternal (essential) intelligence, it would remain intelligent in the states of deep sleep, swoon, and possession, while as a matter of fact, men when waking from sleep and so on declare in reply to questions addressed to them that they were not conscious of anything. Men in their ordinary state, on the other hand, are seen to be (actively) intelligent. Hence, as intelligence is clearly intermittent, we conclude that the Self's intelligence is adventitious only.

To this we reply that the soul is of eternal intelligence, for that very reason that it is not a product but nothing else but the unmodified highest Brahman which, owing to the contact with its limiting adjuncts, appears as individual soul. That intelligence constitutes the essential nature of the highest Brahman, we know from scriptural passages such as 'Brahman is knowledge and bliss' (Bri. Up. III, 9, 28, 7); 'Brahman is true, knowledge, infinite' (Taitt. Up. II, 1); 'Having neither inside nor outside, but being altogether a mass of knowledge' (Bri. Up. IV, 5, 13). Now, if the individual soul is nothing but that highest Brahman, then eternal intelligence constitutes the soul's essential nature also, just as light and heat constitute the nature of fire. In the chapter treating of that which consists of knowledge, there are, moreover, passages (directly declaring that the individual soul is of the nature of self-luminous intelligence), 'He not asleep himself looks down upon the sleeping (senses)' (Bri. Up. IV, 3, 11); 'That person is self-illuminated' (Bri. Up. IV, 3, 14); 'For there is no intermission of the knowing of the knower' (Bri. Up. IV, 3, 30). That the soul's nature is intelligence, follows moreover from the passage (Kh. Up. VIII, 12, 4) where it is represented as connected with knowledge through all sense-organs, 'He who knows, let me smell this, he is the Self,' &c. &c.—From the soul's essential nature being intelligence it does not follow that the senses are useless; for they serve the purpose of determining the special object of each sense, such as smell and so on. This is expressly declared by scripture, 'Smell is for the purpose of perceiving odour' (Kh. Up. VIII, 12, 4).—The objection that sleeping persons are not conscious of anything is refuted by scripture, where we read concerning a man lying in deep sleep, 'And when there he does not see, yet he is seeing though he does not see. For there is no intermission of the seeing of the seer, because it cannot perish. But there is then no second, nothing else different from him that he could see' (Bri. Up. IV, 3, 23). That means:

The absence of actual intelligising is due to the absence of objects, not to the absence of intelligence ; just as the light pervading space is not apparent owing to the absence of things to be illuminated, not to the absence of its own nature. —The reasoning of the Vaiseshikas and others is, as contradicting scripture, merely fallacious, and we therefore decide that eternal intelligence is the essential nature of the soul.

19. (On account of the scriptural declarations) of (the soul's) passing out, going and returning, (the soul is of atomic size).

We now have to consider of what size the soul is, whether of atomic size or of a medium size, or of great (infinite) size.—But, it has been shown above that the soul is not a product and that eternal intelligence constitutes its nature, whence it follows that it is identical with the highest Self. Now the infinity of the highest Self is clearly stated in scripture ; what need then is there of a discussion of the soul's size?—True, we reply ; but certain scriptural passages which speak of the soul's passing out, going and returning, establish the primâ facie view that the soul is of limited size, and moreover in some places scripture expressly declares it to be of atomic size. The present discussion is therefore begun for the purpose of clearing up this doubtful point.

The pûrvapakshin maintains that, on account of its being said to pass out, go and return, the soul must be held to be of limited, atomic size. Its passing out is mentioned (Kau. Up. III, 3), 'And when he passes out of this body he passes out together with all these ;' its going (Kau. Up. I, 2), 'All who depart from this world go to the moon ;' its returning (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 6), 'From that world he returns again to this world of action.' From these statements as to the soul's passing out, going and returning it follows that it is of limited size. For motion is impossible in the case of an all-pervading being. And a limited size being once admitted, we have to conclude more especially that the size is atomic, since the hypothesis of the soul being of the same size as the body has already been refuted in our examination of the Ārṇata-system.

20. And on account of the two latter (i.e. going and returning) being connected with their Self (i.e. the agent), (the soul is of atomic size).

We admit that 'passing out' might possibly be attributed to the soul even if it does not move, viz. if that expression be taken to mean the soul's ceasing to be the ruler of the body, in consequence of the results of its former actions having become exhausted; just as somebody when ceasing to be the ruler of a village may be said to 'go out.' But the two latter activities, viz. going and returning, are not possible in the case of something which does not move; for they are both connected with the own Self (of the agent), going (and coming back) being activities abiding in the agent¹. Now going and coming are possible for a being that is not of medium size, only if it is of atomic size. And as going and coming must be taken in their literal sense, we conclude that the passing out also means nothing but the soul's actual moving out of the body. For the soul cannot go and return without first having moved out of the body. Moreover certain parts of the body are mentioned as the points from which the soul starts in passing out, viz. in the following passage, 'Either from the eye or from the skull or from other places of the body (the Self passes out)' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 2). Other passages mention that the embodied soul goes and comes within the body also; so, for instance, 'He taking with him those elements of light descends into the heart' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 1); 'Having assumed light he again goes to his place' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 3, 11).—Thereby the atomic size of the soul is established as well.

21. If it be said that (the soul is) not atomic, on account of scriptural statements about what is not that (i.e. what is opposed to atomic size); we deny that, on account of the other one (the highest Self) being the subject-matter (of those passages).

¹ Going is known to be an activity inherent in the agent, from the fact of its producing effects inherent in him, such as his conjunction with— or disjunction from—other things.

Nevertheless, it may be objected, the soul cannot be of atomic size, because there are scriptural statements of what is not that, i.e. because there are scriptural statements of its size being the opposite of atomic size. So that by accepting the alternative of atomic size we should place ourselves in opposition to scriptural passages such as the following, 'He is that great unborn Self who consists of knowledge, is surrounded by the Prāṇas, the ether within the heart' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 22); 'Like the ether he is omnipresent, eternal'; 'Truth, knowledge, infinite is Brahman' (Taitt. Up. II. 1).

This objection, the pūrvapakshin replies, is not valid 'on account of the other one forming the subject of discussion.' For those statements about a size different (from the atomic one) occur under the heading of the highest Self which on account of its pre-eminence constitutes the general object of knowledge in all Vedānta-texts; and moreover the passage, 'It is spotless, beyond the ether' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 20), specially proves that the highest Self constitutes the subject-matter (in the passage quoted above from the Bṛi. Up.). Thus with regard to the other passages also.—But from the expressions, 'consisting of knowledge, surrounded by the prāṇas,' it appears that the embodied Self only (not the highest Self) is designated as connected with greatness.—That designation, the pūrvapakshin replies, is founded on an intuition, vouched for by scripture, as in the case of Vāmadeva¹.—As therefore the statements of a different size refer to the highest Self (prāgñā), they do not militate against the view of the individual soul being of atomic size.

22. And also on account of direct statement, and of inference.

The soul is of atomic size for that reason also that scripture contains a direct statement to that effect, 'By thought is to be known that atomic Self into which breath has entered fivefold' (Mu. Up. III, 1, 9). That the Self spoken of there as atomic is the living Self, i.e. the individual soul, we see from its connexion with breath.—Inference also favours the conclusion that the soul is of atomic size; i.e. we infer that from such passages as 'That living soul is to be known as part of the hundredth part of the point of a hair divided a hundred times' (Sve. Up. V, 9), and, 'That lower one also is seen small even like the point of a goad.'—But, an objection may here be raised, if the soul is assumed to be of atomic size, and therefore to occupy one point of the body only, the fact of sensation extending over the whole body would appear contrary to reason. And yet it is a matter of experience that men bathing in the Ganges or in a pond experience the sensation of cold over their whole bodies, and again that in summer people feel hot all over the body.—To this objection the following Sūtra replies.

¹ Who 'paramāṛthadrīṣh/yā' identifies himself with everything in the universe. (Rīg-veda Samhita IV, 26. 1 ff.).

23. There is no contradiction, as in the case of sandal-ointment.

Just as a drop of sandal-ointment, although in actual contact with one spot of the body only, yet produces a refreshing sensation extending over the whole body; so the soul, although abiding in one point of the body only, may be the cause of a perception extending over the entire body. And as the soul is connected with the skin (which is the seat of feeling), the assumption that the soul's sensations should extend over the whole body is by no means contrary to reason. For the connexion of the soul and the skin abides in the entire skin, and the skin extends over the whole body.

24. If it be said (that the two cases are not parallel), on account of the specialisation of abode (present in the case of the sandal-ointment, absent in the case of the soul); we deny that, on account of the acknowledgment (by scripture, of a special place of the soul), viz. within the heart.

Here it may be objected that the argumentation relied upon in the last Sûtra is not admissible, because the two cases compared are not parallel. If it were a settled matter that the soul dwells in one point of the body, the drop of sandal-ointment might be adduced as a parallel instance. But, as a matter of fact, we know from perception that the drop of sandal-ointment is in contact with one spot of the body only, just as we know that it refreshes the whole body; while in the case of the soul observation tells us only that it is percipient all over the body, but not that it abides in one spot.—Should it be said that the latter point must be settled by inference, we reply that inference is here of no use, because it is not capable of removing the doubt whether the perception extending over the whole body belongs to a soul which extends over the whole body like the skin and the sense of touch inhering in it, or to a soul which is all-pervading like ether, or to a soul which, like a drop of ointment, is minute and abides in one spot only¹.

This objection, the pûrvapakshin replies, is unfounded 'on account of the acknowledgment of a speciality of abode,' an abiding in one spot of the body being admitted in the case of the soul no less than in the case of a drop of ointment. For we read in the Vedânta-texts that the soul abides within the heart; cp. for instance, the information given (in Pr. Up. III, 6), 'The Self is in the heart;' (Kh. Up. VIII, 3, 3), 'That Self abides in the heart;' (Bri. Up. IV, 3, 7), 'Who is that Self?—He who is within the heart, surrounded by the Prâṇas, the person of light, consisting of knowledge.'—As therefore the two cases compared are not devoid of parallelism, the argumentation resorted to in Sûtra 23 is unobjectionable.

25. Or on account of (its) quality (viz. intelligence), as in cases of ordinary experience.

¹ We cannot reason as follows, 'The soul is atomic because it produces effects extending (over the whole body), like a drop of sandal-ointment;' for that reasoning would apply to the sense of touch (the skin) also, which we know not to be of atomic size.

That the soul although atomic produces effects extending over the whole body, is not contrary to reason, on account of the pervadingness of intellect which is its quality. From ordinary experience we know that luminous things, such as lamps or gems, although occupying only one spot of a chamber, produce, by means of their light which fills the chamber, an effect in every part of the chamber.—This Sūtra has the purpose of removing the doubts of those who might object that sandal-ointment, because consisting of parts, may perhaps refresh the entire body by the diffusion of imperceptible particles; that, however, the soul as a mere atom does not possess any parts by means of which it could diffuse itself through the whole body.—But how can a quality extend beyond that in which it inheres, and abide elsewhere? We certainly do not see that the whiteness which is the quality of a piece of cloth extends beyond that piece of cloth to other places. Nor must you say that the case of the soul is analogous to that of the light diffused from a lamp; for that light itself is admitted to be (not a quality but) a substance. The flame of a lamp is substantial light with its particles crowded close to one another; the light diffused from that flame is substantial light whose particles are thin and scattered.—The reply to this objection is given in the next Sūtra.

26. The extending beyond is as in the case of odour.

Just as odour, although a quality, extends beyond the odorous substance—as appears from the fact of our perceiving odour even without actually grasping flowers which are the seat of odour—so the quality of intelligence also may extend beyond the soul although the latter be atomic. It therefore is an undue stretch of inference to maintain that a quality, such as colour and the like, cannot separate itself from the substratum in which it inheres, because it is a quality; for we see that odour although a mere quality does separate itself from its substratum.—The objection that odour also separates itself from its substance only with the substance (i. e. parts of the substance) we do not admit, because that would involve the dwindling away of the fundamental substance from which the separation of parts takes place. But that it does not so dwindle away, we conclude from its remaining in its former condition ; otherwise it would lose the heaviness and other qualities belonging to it in its former state.—Well, but perhaps the separation of the particles in which odour resides is not noticed on account of their minuteness. Nevertheless the fact may be that minute odorous atoms spreading in all directions enter the cavity of the nose and there produce the sensation of smell.—This we cannot admit, because the atoms are suprasensible, and because in some cases, as, for instance, from the blossoms of the nâgakesara-tree, a very strong odour is perceived ¹. According to the generally prevailing idea, moreover, it is not the odorous substance which is smelled, but ordinary people rather think that they smell the odour only.—The objection that, because we do not perceive colour and so on to extend beyond their substratum, we have no right to assume that odour does so, we cannot admit, because there is no room for that conclusion ², on account of the (actually existing) perception (of the smell apart from the odorous substance). Logicians must shape their inferences in such a way as to make them agree with ordinary observation, not in any other way. For, to quote another instance, the circumstance that one of the qualities, viz. taste, is perceived by the tongue, certainly does not entitle us to draw the general inference that colour and the other qualities also are perceived by means of the tongue.

27. And thus (scripture also) declares.

Scripture also, after having signified the soul's abiding in the heart and its atomic size, declares by means of such ¹ Single atoms could not produce any sensations ; trasareṇus, i. e. combinations of three atoms even could not produce lively sensations.

² Viz. that smell cannot exist apart from the odorous substance, because it is a quality like colour.

passages as 'Up to the hairs, up to the tips of the nails' (Kau. Up. IV, 20; Bri. Up. I. 4, 7), that the soul pervades the entire body by means of intelligence which is its quality.

28. On account of the separate statement (of soul and intelligence).

From the passage 'Having by knowledge taken possession of the body' which represents the soul and intelligence as separate, viz. as respectively the agent and the instrument of action, we understand that the soul pervades the body only by means of intelligence, its quality. Again the passage 'Then (the intelligent person) having through the intelligence of the senses absorbed within himself all intelligence' (Bri. Up. II, 1, 17) shows intelligence to be different from the agent, i.e. the embodied soul, and so likewise confirms our view.—The reply to all this is as follows.

29. But it is designated thus (i.e. as atomic), on account of its having for its essence the qualities of that (i.e. the buddhi); as in the case of the intelligent Self (i.e. Brahman).

The word 'but' is meant to set aside the opinion maintained hitherto.—The soul is not of atomic size, since scripture does not declare it to have had an origin. On the contrary, as scripture speaks of the highest Brahman entering into the elements and teaches that it is their Self, the soul is nothing else but the highest Brahman. And if the soul is the highest Brahman, it must be of the same extent as Brahman. Now scripture states Brahman to be all-pervading. Therefore the soul also is all-pervading.—On that view all the statements about the all-pervadingness of the soul made in Sruti and Smṛiti are justified, so, for instance, the passage, 'He is that great unborn Self who consists of knowledge, is surrounded by the prāṇas &c.' (Bri. Up. IV, 4, 22). Nor again could the soul, if it were of atomic size, experience sensations extending over the whole body. If it be said that that is possible owing to the soul's connexion with the sense of touch (the skin), we deny that assertion. For from that it would follow that, when we tread on a thorn, the sensation extends over the whole body, since the connexion of the thorn and the skin abides in the entire skin, and the skin extends over the whole body. While as a matter of fact, when treading on a thorn we experience a sensation in the sole of the foot only.—Nor again is it possible that a quality of an atom should diffuse itself beyond the atom. For qualities occupy the same place with the substances of which they are qualities, and a quality not abiding in its substance would no longer be a quality. Concerning the light emitted from a lamp we have already shown that it is, not a quality, but rather a different kind of substance. Hence odour also, being avowedly a quality, can exist in so far only as it inheres in its substance; otherwise it would cease to be odour. Thus the reverend Dvaipâyana also says, 'Having perceived odour in water some unthinking people ascribe it to the latter; but know that it is in the earth only, and (merely) passes over into air and water.' If the intelligence of the soul pervades the whole body, the soul cannot be atomic; for intelligence constitutes the soul's proper nature, just as heat and light constitute that of fire. A separation of the two as quality and that which is qualified does not exist. Now it has already been shown (II, 2, 34) that the soul is not of the same size as the body; the only remaining alternative therefore is that it is all-pervading (infinite). But why then, our opponent asks, is the soul designated (in some scriptural passages) as being of atomic size, &c.?—It is designated as such 'on account of being of the nature of the essence of that (i.e. the buddhi).—The Self is here said to be of the nature of the essence of the mind's (buddhi) qualities, because those qualities, such as desire, aversion, pleasure, pain and so on, constitute the essence, i.e. the principal characteristics of the Self as long as it is implicated in transmigratory existence. Apart from the qualities of the mind the mere Self does not exist in the samsâra state; for the latter, owing to which the Self appears as an agent and enjoyer, is altogether due to the circumstance of the qualities of the buddhi and the other limiting adjuncts being wrongly superimposed upon the Self. That the non-transmigrating eternally free Self which neither acts nor enjoys is declared to be of the same size as the buddhi, is thus due only to its having the qualities of the buddhi for its essence (viz. as long as it is in fictitious connexion with the buddhi). Moreover we have the scriptural passage, 'That living soul is to be known as part of the hundredth part of the point of a hair, divided a hundred times, and yet it is to be infinite' (Sve. Up. V, 9), which at first states the soul to be atomic and then teaches it to be infinite. Now this is appropriate only in the case of the atomicity of the soul being metaphorical while its infinity is real; for both statements cannot be taken in their primary sense at the same time. And the infinity certainly cannot be understood in a metaphorical sense, since all the Upanishads aim at showing that Brahman constitutes the Self of the soul. —The other passage also (Sve. Up. V, 8) which treats of the measure of the soul, 'The lower one, endowed with the quality of mind and the quality of body, is seen small even like the point of a goad,' teaches the soul's small size to depend on its connexion with the qualities of the buddhi, not upon its own Self. The following passage again, 'That small (anu) Self is to be known by thought' (Mu. Up. III, 1, 9), does not teach that the soul is of atomic size, since the subject of the chapter is Brahman in so far as not to be fathomed by the eye, &c., but to be apprehended by the serene light of knowledge, and since moreover the soul cannot be of atomic size in the primary sense of the word. Hence the statement about anutva (smallness, subtlety) has to be understood as referring either to the difficulty of knowing the soul, or else to its limiting adjuncts. Similarly such passages as 'Having by knowledge taken possession of the whole body' (Kau. Up. III, 6), which mention a difference (between the soul and knowledge), must be understood to mean that the soul takes possession of the whole body through the buddhi, its limiting adjunct; or else they must be considered as mere modes of expression, as when we speak of the body of a stone statue. For we have already shown that the distinction of quality and thing qualified does not exist in the case of the soul.—The statements as to the soul abiding in the heart are likewise to be explained on the ground of the buddhi abiding there.—That also the soul's passing out and so on depend on the limiting adjuncts, is shown by the passage, 'What is it by whose passing out I shall pass out, and by whose staying I shall stay? He sent forth prāṇa, &c. (Pr. Up. VI, 3, 4). For where there is no passing out, no going and returning are known; for what has not left the body cannot go and return¹.—As thus the soul (as long as involved in the samsāra) has for its essence the qualities of its limiting adjuncts, it is spoken of as minute. The case is analogous to that of Brahman (prāgñā). Just as in those chapters whose topic is the meditation on the qualified Brahman, the highest Self is spoken of as possessing relative minuteness and so on, because it has the qualities of its limiting adjuncts for its essence (cp. 'Smaller than a grain of rice or barley,' 'He who consists of mind, whose body is prāṇa, &c., Kh. Up. III, 14, 2; 3); so it is also with the individual soul.—Very well, let us then assume that the transmigratory condition of the soul is due to the qualities of the buddhi forming its essence. From this, however, it will follow that, as the conjunction of buddhi and soul—which are different entities—must necessarily come to an end, the soul when disjoined from the buddhi will be altogether undefinable and thence non-existing or rather non-existing in the samsāra state².—To this objection the next Sūtra replies.

30. The objection (raised above) is not valid, since (the connexion of the soul with the buddhi) exists as long as the soul; it being thus observed (in scripture).

We need not fear that the objection formulated above can be proved.—Why?—'On account of the existence of the connexion of the soul with the buddhi, as long as the ¹ So that the distinction insisted on in Sūtra 20 is not valid.

² Katham asattvam svarūpena sattvād ity āsaṅkhyāha samsāritvam veti. Ān. Gi.

soul exists.' That means : as long as this Self is in the samsāra-state, as long as the samsāra-state is not brought to an end by means of perfect knowledge, so long the connexion of the soul with the buddhi does not cease. And as long as its connexion with the buddhi, its limiting adjunct, lasts, so long the individual soul remains individual soul, implicated in transmigratory existence. In reality, however, there is no individual soul but in so far as it is fictitiously hypostatized by the buddhi, its limiting adjunct. For in attempting to determine the object of the Vedānta-texts we meet with no other intelligent substance but the one omniscient Lord whose nature is eternal freedom. This appears from innumerable texts, such as the following :—'There is no other seer but he, there is no other hearer but he, there is no other perceiver but he, there is no other knower but he' (Bri. Up. III, 7, 23); 'There is nothing that sees, hears, perceives, knows but it' (Bri. Up. III, 8, 11); 'Thou art that' (Kh. Up. VI, 8, 7); 'I am Brahman' (Bri. Up. I, 4, 10).—How again is it known that the soul is connected with the buddhi as long as it exists?—We reply : because that is seen (viz. in scripture). For scripture makes the following declaration : 'He who is within the heart, consisting of knowledge, surrounded by the prāṇas, the person of light, he remaining the same wanders along the two worlds as if thinking, as if moving' (Bri. Up. IV, 3, 7). Here the term 'consisting of knowledge' means 'consisting of buddhi,' as we infer from another passage, viz. 'The Self consisting of knowledge, mind, life, sight, hearing' (Bri. Up. IV, 4, 5), where knowledge is enumerated among mind and so on¹. By 'being made up of buddhi' is meant 'having for one's essence the qualities of buddhi.' Similarly a phrase like 'Devadatta is made up of womanishness,' which may be made use of in ordinary language, means that in Devadatta feminine attributes such as softness of voice and the like prevail. Moreover, the passage, 'He remaining the same wanders along the two worlds,' declares that the Self, even when going to another world, is not separated from the buddhi, &c. For if we ask whereby it does remain the same, the answer, based on proximity¹, is 'by means of the buddhi.'—Further, such modes of expression, 'as if thinking,' 'as if moving,' lead us to the same conclusion; for they mean that the Self does not think and move on its own account, but thinks as it were and moves as it were, because the buddhi to which it is joined really moves and thinks.—Moreover, the connexion of the Self with the buddhi, its limiting adjunct, depends on wrong knowledge, and wrong knowledge cannot cease except through perfect knowledge; hence as long as there does not rise the cognition of Brahman being the universal Self, so long the connexion of the soul with the buddhi and its other limiting adjuncts does not come to an end. Thus scripture also says, 'I know that great person of sunlike lustre beyond the darkness. A man who knows him passes over death; there is no other path to go' (Sve. Up. III, 8).

¹ And therefore has to be understood in the sense of buddhi.

But, an objection is raised, in the states of deep sleep and retraction (pralaya) no connexion of the Self with the buddhi can be acknowledged, since scripture declares that 'then he becomes united with the True, he is gone to his own' (Kh. Up. VI, 8, 1), and as then all modifications have avowedly passed away. How then can it be said that the connexion with the buddhi exists as long as the Self?—To this objection the following Sûtra replies.

31. On account of the appropriateness of the manifestation of that (connexion) which exists (potentially); like virile power.

As in ordinary life virile power and so on, existing potentially only in young children, and being then looked upon as non-existing, become manifest at the time of puberty—and do not originate at that time from previous non-existence, because in that case they might originate in eunuchs also—; so the connexion of the soul with the buddhi exists potentially merely during deep sleep and the period of general retraction, and again becomes manifest at the time of waking and the time of creation.—This explanation is appropriate, because nothing can be assumed to spring up unless from something else ; otherwise we should have to suppose that effects spring up without causes. That the rising from deep sleep is due to the existence of potential avidyā, scripture also declares, 'Having become merged in the True they know not that they are merged in the True. Whatever these creatures are here, whether a lion or a wolf,' &c. (Kh. Up. VI, 9, 2 ; 3).—It is therefore a proved matter that the connexion of the soul with the buddhi and the other adjuncts lasts as long as the soul (in its samsāra-state).

¹ I.e. on the proximity of terms clearly indicating the buddhi, viz. vigñāna-mayaḥ prāṇeshu.

32. Otherwise (if no manas existed) there would result either constant perception or constant non-perception, or else a limitation of either of the two (i.e. of the soul or of the senses).

The internal organ which constitutes the limiting adjunct of the soul is called in different places by different names, such as manas (mind), buddhi (intelligence), vijñāna (knowledge), kitta (thought). This difference of nomenclature is sometimes made dependent on the difference of the modifications of the internal organ which is called manas when it is in the state of doubt, &c., buddhi when it is in the state of determination and the like.—Now we must necessarily acknowledge the existence of such an internal organ ; because otherwise there would result either perpetual perception or perpetual non-perception. There would result perpetual perception whenever there is a conjunction of the soul, the senses and the objects of sense—the three together constituting the instruments of perception ; or else, if on the conjunction of the three causes the effect did not follow, there would take place perpetual non-perception. But neither of these two alternatives is actually observed.—Or else we should have to assume that there are obstacles in the way of the energy either of the Self or the sense-organs. But the former is not possible, as the Self is not capable of any modification ; nor the latter, as we cannot assume that the energy of the sense-organ which is non-obstructed in the preceding and the following moment should, without any cause, be obstructed (in the intervening moment). Hence we have to acknowledge the existence of an internal organ through whose attention and non-attention perception and non-perception take place. Thus scripture declares, ' My mind was elsewhere, I did not see ; my mind was elsewhere, I did not hear ; for a man sees with his mind and hears with his mind ' (Bri. Up. I, 5, 3). Scripture moreover shows that desire and similar states are modifications of the mind, ' Desire, representation, doubt, faith, want of faith, memory, forgetfulness, shame, reflection, fear, all this is mind.' The explanation given in Sûtra 29 is therefore an appropriate one.

33. (The soul is) an agent, on account of scripture having a purport (thereby).

In connexion with the doctrine that the soul possesses for its essence the qualities of the buddhi, another attribute of the soul is set forth.—The individual soul is an agent, because thus scripture has a purport. For only on that assumption scriptural injunctions (such as ' He is to sacrifice,' ' He is to make an oblation into the fire,' ' He is to give,' &c.) acquire a purport ; otherwise they would be purportless. For they all teach special acts to be done by agents ; which would not be possible if the soul did not possess the quality of being an agent.—On that supposition a meaning belongs to the following passage also, ' For it is he who sees, hears, perceives, conceives, acts, he the person whose Self is knowledge ' (Pr. Up. IV, 9).

34. And on account of (the text) teaching its wandering about.

The quality of being an agent has to be attributed to the soul for that reason also, that, in a chapter treating of the soul, the text declares it to wander about in the state of sleep, ' The immortal one goes wherever he likes ' (Bri. Up.

IV, 3, 12); and again, 'He moves about, according to his pleasure, within his own body' (Bṛi. Up. II, 1, 18).

35. On account of its taking.

The quality of being an agent has to be attributed to the soul for that reason also that in the same chapter treating of the soul the text speaks of the soul taking its instruments, 'Having taken, through the intelligence of the senses, intelligence,' and 'having taken the senses' (Bṛi. Up. II, 1, 18; 17).

36. (The soul is an agent) also because it is designated as such with regard to actions; if it were not such, there would be a change of designation.

The quality of being an agent belongs to the soul for that reason also that the sacred texts speak of its agency in sacred and secular actions, 'Understanding performs the sacrifice, it performs all acts' (Taitt. Up. II, 5).—But, an objection may here be raised, we have seen that the word 'understanding' applies to the buddhi; how then can it indicate the circumstance of the soul being an agent?—The soul only, we reply, is designated there, not the buddhi. If the soul were not meant to be designated, there would be a change in the designation, i. e. the passage would run, 'through understanding it performs,' &c. For we see that in another passage where the buddhi is meant the word 'understanding' is exhibited in the instrumental form, 'Having through the understanding (intelligence) of these senses taken all understanding' (Bṛi. Up. II, 1, 17). In the passage under discussion, on the other hand, the word 'understanding' is given in the case characteristic of the agent (viz. the nominative), and therefore indicates the Self which is distinct from the buddhi. Hence your objection is not valid.—Another objection is raised. If the soul in so far as distinct from the buddhi were the agent, it would, because it is independent, bring about exclusively what is pleasant and useful to itself, not the opposite. We, however, observe that it does bring about the opposite also. But such an unrestricted proceeding does not become the independent Self.—To this objection the following Sûtra replies.

37. The absence of restriction is as in the case of perception.

Just as this Self, although free with regard to perception, yet perceives unrestrictedly what is unpleasant as well as what is pleasant, so we assume that it also brings about what is unpleasant as well as what is pleasant.—The objection that in the act of perception also the soul is not free because it depends on the employment of the causes of perception (i.e. the sense-organs), we invalidate by the remark that the use of the causes of perception is merely to present the objects of perception, that however in the act of perception the soul because endowed with intelligence does not depend on anything else¹.—Moreover in actions also the soul is not absolutely free, as it depends on differences of place, time, and efficient causes. But an agent does not cease to be so because he requires assistance. A cook remains the agent in the action of cooking although he requires fuel, water, and so on. The presence of a plurality of co-operating factors is therefore not opposed to the activity of the soul unrestrictedly extending to actions productive of pleasant as well as unpleasant results.

38. On account of the reversal of power.

The soul distinct from 'understanding' has to be viewed as an agent for the following reason also. If the buddhi which is denoted by the term 'understanding' were the agent, there would take place a reversal of power, i.e. the instrumental power which appertains to the buddhi would have to be set aside, and to be replaced by the power of an agent. But if the buddhi has the power of an agent, it must be admitted that it is also the object of self-consciousness (ahampratyaya)¹, since we see that everywhere activity is preceded by self-consciousness, 'I go, I come, I eat, I drink,' &c. But if the buddhi is endowed with the power of an agent and effects all things, we have to assume for it another instrument by means of which it effects everything. For we see that agents although themselves capable of acting yet become really active only through making use of instruments.—Hence the whole dispute is about a name only, and there is no real difference, since in either case that which is different from the instrument of action is admitted to be the agent.

¹ Kakshurâdînâm vishayopanâyakatvât tadupalabdhou kâmanas ketanatvena svâtantryâd udâharasiddhir ity âha neti. Ân. Gi.

39. And on account of the impossibility of meditation (samādhi).

Moreover the meditation taught in the Vedānta-texts, whose aim is the realisation of the Self as represented by the Upanishads, is possible only if the Self is the agent². Compare the following passages, 'Verily, the Self is to be seen, to be heard, to be perceived, to be marked' (Bṛi. Up. II, 4, 5); 'The Self we must seek out, we must try to understand' (Kh. Up. VIII, 7, 1); 'Meditate on the Self as Om' (Mu. Up. II, 2, 6).—Therefrom also it follows that the Self is an agent.

40. And as the carpenter, in double fashion.

That the embodied Self is an agent, has been proved by the reasons set forth in Sūtra 33, &c. We now have to consider whether this agency depends on the fundamental nature of the Self, or is due to its limiting adjuncts.—If here it be maintained that for the same reasons which were employed to prove the Self's being an agent its agency must be held to be natural, there being no reasons to the contrary, we reply as follows.

¹ And that would virtually identify the buddhi with the gīva, the individual soul.

² The Self which enjoys the fruit of final release must be the agent in the meditation which is instrumental in bringing about final release.

The Self's being an agent cannot be founded on its real nature, because (if it were so) the impossibility of final release would follow. For if being an agent belongs to the soul's nature, it can never free itself from it—no more than fire can divest itself of heat,—and as long as man has not freed himself from activity he cannot obtain his highest end, since activity is essentially painful.—But, an objection will be raised, the end of man may be obtained, even as long as the potentiality of activity remains, viz. by man avoiding the effects of activity, and this he may accomplish by avoiding its occasions, just as fire, for instance, although endowed with the potentiality of burning, does, if fuel is withheld from it, not produce its natural effect, i.e. burning.—This objection we invalidate by the remark that the occasions, because connected (with the soul) by means of the peculiar connexion called 'potentiality' (power), cannot be avoided absolutely¹.—Nor can it be said that release will be obtained through the means effecting it being employed, because whatever depends on means to be employed is non-eternal. Scripture moreover declares that release results from the instruction about the eternally pure, intelligent, free Self. Now instruction of this nature would not be possible, if the agentship of the Self formed part of its nature. The agentship of the Self is therefore due to the attributes of its adjuncts being ascribed to it, and does not form part of its nature. Hence scripture says of the Self, 'As if thinking, as if moving' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 3, 7), and 'He (the Self) when in union with the body, the senses, and the mind, is called the enjoyer by wise people' (Ka. Up. I, 3, 4); which passages show that the Self passes into the special condition of being an enjoyer, &c., only through its connexion with the limiting adjuncts. For to the discerning there is no Self called the living Self and being either agent or enjoyer, apart from the highest Self ; according to the scriptural passage 'There is no other seer but he,' &c. (Bri. Up. III. 7, 23). Nor must we suppose that, if there were no intelligent individual Soul, different from the highest Self and distinct from the aggregate consisting of buddhi, &c., it would follow that the highest Self is involved in the samsāra-state as agent and enjoyer. For the conditions of being agent and enjoyer are presented by Nescience merely. Scripture also, after having declared (in the passage, 'For where there is duality, as it were, there one sees the other,' &c., Bri. Up. IV, 5, 15) that the conditions of being an agent and an enjoyer belong to the state of Nescience only, excludes them from the state of knowledge, 'But where the Self only is all this, how should he see another?' And again, after having declared that the Self, in the states of waking and of dreaming, suffers weariness owing to the contact with its limiting adjuncts, like a falcon flying about in the air, scripture teaches that that fatigue ceases in deep sleep when the soul is embraced by the intelligent (highest) Self. 'This indeed is his true form in which his wishes are fulfilled, in which the Self only is his wish, in which no wish is left,—free from any sorrow'—up to 'This is his highest goal, this is his highest success, this is his highest world, this is his highest bliss' (Bri. Up. IV, 3, 21-32).—This the teacher intimates in the Sūtra, 'and as the carpenter in both ways.' 'And' is here used in the sense of 'but.' It is not to be supposed that the agentship of the Self belongs to its true nature, as heat belongs to the nature of fire. But just as in ordinary life a carpenter as long as working with his axe and other tools undergoes pain, while on the other hand he enjoys ease and leisure after having finished his work, laid his tools aside and returned to his home ; so the Self also, as long as it is joined with duality presented by Nescience and is an agent in the states of waking and dreaming, undergoes pain ; but as soon as, for the purpose of shaking off its weariness, it enters into its own highest Self, it frees itself from the complex of effects and instruments, and enjoys full ease in the state of deep sleep. And in the state of final release also, the Self, having dispelled the darkness of ignorance by the light of knowledge, and having reached the state of absolute isolation and rest, enjoys full ease.—The case of the carpenter must be considered as being parallel to the following extent. The carpenter is, in certain kinds of work, such as cutting wood, &c., an agent with regard to certain definite tools, such as the axe and so on, but a non-agent with his mere body ; so this Self also is an agent in all its functions with regard to its instruments, such as the mind, &c., but is a non-agent by its own Self. On the other hand, the Self has no parts corresponding to the hands and other limbs of the carpenter, by means of which it could take up or put aside its instruments, as the carpenter takes up and puts aside his tools.

¹ Kartṛitvasya dharmādīni nimittāni teshām gñānānivartyatve muktāv api sambhavāt kartṛitvam syāt gñānena tannivṛttau teshām agñānakāryatvāt kṛitam kartṛitvam api tathā syāt, sakter ā saktarākyaśāpekshatayā sanimittakriyālakṣaṇasakyāpekshakatvād anirmokṣas tasmān nimittaparihāśasya duranushānatvān na śaktivāde muktir iti. Ān. Gi.

Śaktarākyaśārayā śaktiḥ svasattayāśasyam śakyam ākshipati. Bhā.

In reply to the reasons brought forward in favour of the soul's agentship being natural, as, for instance, the reason based on scripture having a purport, we remark that the scriptural injunctions in prescribing certain acts presuppose an agentship established somehow, but do not themselves aim at establishing the (direct) agentship of the Self. Now we have shown that the agentship of the Self does not constitute part of its real nature because scripture teaches that its true Self is Brahman ; we therefore conclude that the Vedic injunctions are operative with reference to that agentship of the soul which is due to Nescience. Such scriptural passages also as 'The agent, the person whose Self is understanding' (Pr. Up. IV, 9), must be assumed, because being of the nature of anuvādas¹, to refer to an agentship already established elsewhere, and being the product of Nescience.

The preceding remarks refute also the reasons founded on 'the wandering about' and the 'taking' (Sûtras 34, 35), as the statements about them also are mere anuvādas.—But, an objection may be raised, the passage which teaches that the soul while its instruments are asleep, 'moves about, according to its pleasure, within its own body' (Bṛi. Up. II. 1, 18), clearly implies that the pure Self is an agent. And in the passage relative to the taking ('(the puruṣa) having through the intelligence of the senses absorbed all intelligence'), the fact of the instruments appearing in the objective and instrumental cases likewise intimates that the pure Self is the agent.—To this we reply that even in the state of dream the instruments of the Self are not altogether at rest; for scripture states that even then it is connected with the buddhi, 'Having become a dream, together with buddhi it passes beyond this world.' Smṛiti also says, 'When, the senses being at rest, the mind not being at rest is occupied with the objects, that state know to be a dream.' And scripture says that desire, &c., are modifications of the mind (cp. Bṛi. Up. I, 5, 3). Now these are observed in dreams; therefore the Self wanders about in dreams together with the mind only. That wandering about moreover is founded on the mental impressions (vāsanā) only, is not real. Thus scripture also in describing our doings in dreams qualifies them by an 'as it were.' 'As it were rejoicing together with women, or laughing as it were, or seeing terrible sights' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 3, 13). Ordinary people also describe their dreams in the same manner, 'I ascended as it were the summit of a mountain,' 'I saw a tree as it were.'—And although it is true that, in the statement about the taking, the instruments are exhibited in the objective and instrumental cases, still the agentship of the Self must be considered as connected with those instruments, since we have shown that the pure Self cannot be an agent.

¹ I.e. being only incidental remarks about matters established or taught elsewhere.

In ordinary language also we meet with similar variations of expression; the two sentences, for instance, 'the warriors fight' and 'the king fights by means of his warriors,' really have the same meaning. Moreover, the statement about the taking means to express only the cessation of activity on the part of the instruments, not the independent activity of any one.—The passage referred to above, 'understanding performs the sacrifice,' establishes the agentship of the buddhi merely, as the word 'understanding' is known to have that sense, and as the mind is mentioned close by, and as in the passage, 'Faith is its head,' &c., faith and so on are declared to be the members of the Self which consists of understanding, and as faith, &c., are known to be attributes of the buddhi. Another reason is furnished by the complementary sentence, 'All gods worship understanding as the oldest, as Brahman' (Taïtt. Up. II, 5), for buddhi is known to be the oldest, i. e. the first produced¹. Another scriptural passage also avers that that sacrifice is accomplished by means of speech and buddhi, 'The sacrifice is what results from speech and mind.' Nor can it rightly be maintained (cp. Sûtra 38) that to view the instruments as agents would lead to an exchange of power on the part of the buddhi; for all instruments must necessarily be considered as agents in regard of their special functions². But with reference to perception (upalabdhi) those instruments are (not agents, but) mere instruments, and perception belongs to the Self. Nor can agentship be ascribed to the Self on account of perception, since permanent perception constitutes its nature (and hence cannot be viewed as a mere transitory activity). Nor can the agentship which has self-consciousness for its antecedent belong to the perceiving principle (upalabdhri); for self-consciousness itself is an object of perception (on the part of the upalabdhri, i. e. the pure, isolated, intelligent Self). And on this doctrine there is no occasion for assuming a further instrument, as we maintain the buddhi itself to be the instrument.

The objection founded on the impossibility of meditation (Sûtra 39) is already refuted by the fact, pointed out above, of scripture having a purport, meditation being enjoined by scripture with reference to such agentship as is already established by other passages.—The result of all this is that the agentship of the Self is due to its limiting adjuncts only.

¹ According to the sruti: mahad yaksham prathamagam veda yo ha vai gyesh/ham ka sresh/ham ka veda.

² Wood, for instance, is an 'agent' in regard of the function of burning, while it is a mere instrument with reference to the action of cooking.

41. But from the highest (Lord there result samsāra and moksha), because scripture teaches that.

We now enter on the discussion whether the agentship, characterising the individual soul in the state of Nescience and founded on its limiting adjuncts, is independent of the Lord or dependent on him.

The pūrvapakshin maintains that the soul as far as it is an agent does not depend on the Lord, because the assumption of such a dependence would serve no purpose. For as the individual soul has motives in its own imperfections, such as passion, aversion, and so on, and is furnished with the whole apparatus of the other constituents of action¹, it is able to occupy on its own account the position of an agent; and what then should the Lord do for it? Nor does ordinary experience show that in addition to the oxen which are required for such actions as ploughing and the like the Lord also is to be depended upon. Moreover (if all activity depended on the Lord) it would follow that the Lord is cruel because imposing on his creatures activity which is essentially painful, and at the same time unjust because allotting to their activities unequal results.—But it has already been shown (II, 1, 34) that the Lord cannot be taxed with cruelty and injustice, on account of his dependence.—True, that has been shown, but only on the condition of the dependence on the Lord being possible. Now such dependence is possible only if there exist religious merit and demerit on the part of the creatures, and these again exist if the soul is an agent; if then the agentship of the soul again depends on the Lord, whereupon will the Lord's dependence depend? And (if we should assume the Lord to determine the souls without reference to their merits and demerits) it would follow that the souls have to undergo consequences not due to their actions.—Hence the soul's activity is independent.

¹ I.e. the constituents of action such as instrument, object, &c., exclusive of the agent.

Setting aside this primâ facie view by means of the word 'but,' the Sûtrakâra asserts 'from the highest.' For the soul which in the state of Nescience is blinded by the darkness of ignorance and hence unable to distinguish itself from the complex of effects and instruments, the samsâra-state in which it appears as agent and enjoyer is brought about through the permission of the Lord who is the highest Self, the superintendent of all actions, the witness residing in all beings, the cause of all intelligence; and we must therefore assume that final release also is effected through knowledge caused by the grace of the Lord.

Why so?—'Because scripture teaches that.' For although the soul has its own imperfections, such as passion and so on, for motives, and is furnished with the whole apparatus of action, and although ordinary experience does not show that the Lord is a cause in occupations such as ploughing and the like, yet we ascertain from scripture that the Lord is a causal agent in all activity. For scripture says, 'He makes him whom he wishes to lead up from these worlds do a good deed; and the same makes him whom he wishes to lead down from these worlds, do a bad deed' (Kau. Up. III, 8); and again, 'He who dwelling within the Self pulls the Self within' (Sat. Br. XIV, 6, 7, 30).

But if causal agency thus belongs to the Lord, it follows that he must be cruel and unjust, and that the soul has to undergo consequences of what it has not done.—This objection the following Sûtra refutes.

42. But with a view to the efforts made (by the soul) (the Lord makes it act), on account of the (otherwise resulting) purportlessness of the injunctions and prohibitions, &c.

The word 'but' removes the objections started.—The Lord makes the soul act, having regard to the efforts made by it, whether meritorious or non-meritorious. Hence there is no room for the objections raised. Having regard to the inequality of the virtuous and vicious actions of the souls, the Lord, acting as a mere occasional cause, allots to them corresponding unequal results. An analogous case is furnished by rain. As rain constitutes the common occasional cause for shrubs, bushes, corn, and so on, which belong to different species and spring each from its particular seed—for the inequality of their sap, flowers, fruits, and leaves results neither when rain is absent nor when the special seeds are absent—; so we also must assume that the Lord arranges favourable or unfavourable circumstances for the souls with a view to their former efforts.—But if the activity of the soul is dependent on something else, this having regard (on the part of the Lord) to former effort is inappropriate.—By no means, we reply; for although the activity of the soul is not independent, yet the soul does act. The Lord indeed causes it to act, but it acts itself. Moreover, the Lord in causing it to act now has regard to its former efforts, and he caused it to act in a former existence, having regard to its efforts previous to that existence; a regressus against which, considering the eternity of the samsāra, no objections can be raised.—But how is it known that the Lord has regard to the efforts made (in former existences)?—The Sūtra replies: from the purportlessness, &c., of injunctions and prohibitions. For thus (i.e. if the Lord has regard to former actions) injunctions such as ‘he who is desirous of the heavenly world is to sacrifice,’ and prohibitions such as ‘a Brāhmaṇa must not be killed,’ are not devoid of purport. On the other alternative they would be without purport, and the Lord would in fact be enjoined in the place of injunctions and prohibitions¹, since the soul would be absolutely dependent. And then the Lord might requite with good those who act according to the injunctions, and with evil men doing what is forbidden; which would subvert the authoritativeness of the Veda. Moreover, if the Lord were absolutely without any regard, it would follow that also the ordinary efforts of men are without any purport; and so likewise the special conditions of place, time, and cause. And also the difficulty mentioned above¹ would present itself.—All these latter difficulties the Sûtrakâra comprises in his ‘&c.’

¹ Īśvara eva vidhinishedhayoḥ sthāne niyugyeta yad vidhinishedhayoḥ phalam tad īśvareṇa tatpratipāditadharmādharmanirapekṣheṇa kṛtam iti. Bhā.

43. (The soul is) a part of the Lord, on account of the declarations of difference, and (because) in a different way also some record that (Brahman) is of the nature of slaves, fishers, and so on.

We have shown that the individual soul and the Lord stand to each other in the relation of what is being acted upon and what is acting upon. This relation is observed in ordinary life to exist only between things connected, such as a master and a servant, or a fire and its sparks. Now as the soul and the Lord also are acknowledged to stand in the relation of what is acted upon and what is acting, a doubt arises whether their connexion is analogous to that of a master and a servant, or to that of a fire and its sparks.

The pûrvapakshin maintains that either the matter is to be considered as undetermined, or that the connexion is like that of master and servant, because that connexion only is well known to be the relation of ruler (Lord) and subject ruled.

To this the Sûtra replies that the soul must be considered a part of the Lord, just as a spark is a part of the fire. By ‘part’ we mean ‘a part as it were,’ since a being not composed of parts cannot have parts in the literal sense.—Why, then, do we not view the Lord, who is not composed of parts, as identical with the soul?—‘On account of the declarations of difference.’ For such scriptural passages as ‘That (self) it is which we must search out, that it is which we must try to understand’ (Kh. Up.

¹ I.e. the objectionable assumption that men have to undergo consequences not resulting from their own former actions.

VIII, 7); 'He who knows him becomes a muni' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 22); 'He who dwelling within the Self pulls the Self within' (Bṛi. Up. III, 7, 23); which all of them refer to a difference (between the highest and the individual Self) would be inappropriate, if there were no difference.—But, it may be said, these statements of difference would agree better with a relation similar to that of master and servant.—Hence the sūtrakāra adds, 'and otherwise also.' That the soul is a part (of the Lord) we learn not only from the passages declaring their difference, but there are other statements also which teach their non-difference. The members of a certain śākhā of the Atharva-veda record in a Brahma-sūkta that 'Brahman are the fishermen, Brahman the slaves, Brahman these gamblers,' &c. Here low creatures such as fishermen, and slaves depending on their masters, and gamblers are called Brahman; whence it appears that all individual souls which have entered into aggregates of effects and instruments (i.e. bodies) depending on name and form are Brahman. The same view is set forth in other passages such as 'Thou art woman, thou art man; thou art youth, thou art maiden; thou as an old man totterest along on thy staff, thou art born with thy face turned everywhere' (Sve. Up. IV, 3), and 'The wise one who, having produced all forms and made all names, sits calling (the things by their names)' (Taitt. Âr. III, 12, 7). Passages such as 'There is no other seer but he' and other similar ones establish the same truth.—Non-differenced intelligence belongs to the soul and the Lord alike, as heat belongs to the sparks as well as the fire.—From these two views of difference and non-difference there results the comprehensive view of the soul being a part of the Lord.—The following Sūtra supplies a further reason.

44. And on account of the mantra.

A mantra also intimates the same view. 'Such is the greatness of it; greater than it is the Person. One foot of it are all beings, three feet of it are the Immortal in heaven' (Kh. Up. III, 12, 6). Here the word 'beings' denotes all moving and non-moving things, among which the souls occupy the first place ; in accordance with the use of the word in the following passage, ' Not giving pain to any being (bhūta) except at the tīrthas ' (Kṛ. Up. VIII, 15). Herefrom also we conclude that the individual soul is a part of the Lord.—And again from the following reason.

45. Moreover it is so stated in Smṛiti.

In the Īsvara-gītā (Bhagavad-gītā) also it is said that the soul is a part of the Lord, ' an eternal part of me becomes the individual soul in the world of life ' (Bha. Gī. XV, 7). With regard to the assertion made above, viz. that in ordinary life the relation of ruler and ruled is known to hold good in the case of master and servant &c. only, we remark that, although that may be the case in ordinary life, we ascertain from scripture that the relation of part and whole and that of ruler and ruled may go together. Nor is there anything contradictory in assuming that the Lord who is provided with superexcellent limiting adjuncts rules the souls which are connected with inferior adjuncts only.

Here the pūrvapakshin raises another objection. If we admit that the souls are parts of the Lord, it follows that the Lord also, whose part the soul is, will be afflicted by the pain caused to the soul by its experience of the samsāra-state ; as we see in ordinary life that the entire Devadatta suffers from the pain affecting his hand or foot or some other limb. Herefrom it would follow that they who obtain Brahman obtain a greater pain¹ ; so that the former samsāra-condition would be preferable, and complete knowledge be devoid of purpose.—To this the following Sūtra replies.

46. (As the soul is affected by pleasure and pain) not so the highest (Lord) ; as in the case of light and so on.

We maintain that the highest Lord does not feel the pain of the samsāra-state in the same way as the soul does. The soul being engrossed by Nescience identifies itself as it were with the body and so on, and imagines itself to be affected by the experience of pain which is due to Nescience, 'I am afflicted by the pain due to the body;' the highest Lord, on the other hand, neither identifies himself with a body, nor imagines himself to be afflicted by pain. The pain of the individual soul also is not real, but imaginary only, caused by the error consisting in the non-discrimination of (the Self from) the body, senses, and other limiting adjuncts which are due to name and form, the effects of Nescience. And as a person feels the pain of a burn or cut which affects his body by erroneously identifying himself with the latter, so he feels also the pain affecting others, such as sons or friends, by erroneously identifying himself with them, entering as it were into them through love, and imagining 'I am the son, I am the friend.' Wherefrom we infer with certainty that the feeling of pain is due merely to the error of false imagination. At the same conclusion we arrive on the ground of negative instances. Let us consider the case of many men, each of whom possesses sons, friends, &c., sitting together, some of them erroneously imagining that they are connected with their sons, friends, &c., while others do not. If then somebody calls out 'the son has died,' 'the friend has died,' grief is produced in the minds of those who are under the imagination of being connected with sons and friends, but not in the minds of religious mendicants who have freed themselves from that imagination. From this it appears that perfect knowledge is of use even to an ordinary man; of how much greater use then will it be to him (i.e. the Lord) whose nature is eternal pure intelligence, who sees nothing beside the Self for which there are no objects. Hence it follows that perfect knowledge is not purposeless. —To illustrate this view the Sūtra introduces a comparison 'like light,' &c. Just as the light of the sun or the moon which pervades the entire space becomes straight or bent as it were when the limiting adjuncts with which it is in contact, such as a finger, for instance, are straight or bent, but does not really become so; and just as the ether, although imagined to move as it were when jars are being moved, does not really move; and as the sun does not tremble, although its image trembles when you shake the cup filled with water in which the sun's light is reflected ; thus the Lord also is not affected by pain, although pain be felt by that part of him which is called the individual soul, is presented by Nescience, and limited by the buddhi and other adjuncts. That also the soul's undergoing pain is due to Nescience only, we have already explained. Accordingly the Vedānta-texts teach that, when the soul's individual state, due to Nescience, is sublated, it becomes Brahman, 'Thou art that &c.'—Thus there is no occasion to conclude that the highest Self is affected by the pain of the individual soul.

¹ Viz. by participating in all pain.

47. And the Smṛitis state (that).

Vyāsa and others state in their smṛitis that the highest Self is not afflicted by the pain of the individual soul, 'That highest Self is said to be eternal, devoid of qualities, nor is it stained by the fruits of actions any more than a lotus leaf by water. But that other Self whose essence is action is connected with bondage and release ; again and again it is joined with the seventeenfold aggregate¹.—On the ground of the particle 'and' (in the Sūtra) we have to supply 'and scripture also records that.' So, for instance, 'One of them eats the sweet fruit, the other looks on without eating' (Mu. Up. III, 1, 1), and 'The one Self within all things is never contaminated by the misery of the world, being himself without' (Ka. Up. II, 5, 11).

Here the pūrvapakshin raises a new objection.—If there is only one internal Self of all beings, what room is there for permissions and prohibitions, worldly as well as Vedic ? You must not reject this objection on the ground of your having proved that the individual soul is a part of the Lord, and that thus injunctions and prohibitions may, without any mutual interference, apply to the soul which is different from the Lord. For there are other scriptural passages which teach that the soul is not different from the Lord, and therefore not a part of him, as, for instance, the following ones :

¹ I.e. the subtle body consisting of the ten sense-organs, the five prāṇas, manas, and buddhi.

'Having sent forth that he entered into it' (Taitt. Up. II, 6); 'There is no other seer but he' (Bri. Up. III, 7, 23); 'From death to death goes he who perceives therein any diversity' (Bri. Up. IV, 4, 19); 'Thou art that' (Kh. Up. VI, 8, 7); 'I am Brahman' (Bri. Up. I, 4, 10). Should you say that just from this concurrence of intimations of difference on the one hand and non-difference on the other hand it follows that the soul is a part of the Lord, we reply that such might be the case if the intention of the texts were to teach difference as well as non-difference. But the fact is that the texts aim solely at teaching non-difference, because through the knowledge of Brahman being the universal Self the highest end of man is obtained. About difference on the other hand mere occasional statements (anuvāda) are made as about something already established naturally (i.e. apart from scripture). Moreover, we have already maintained that Brahman as not composed of parts can have no parts. Hence it follows that the one highest Self which is within all beings appears as individual soul, and it therefore remains to show how injunctions and prohibitions are possible.

48. (The possibility of) injunctions and prohibitions (results) from the connexion (of the Self) with bodies; as in the case of light and so on.

Passages such as 'He is to approach his wife at the proper time,' and 'he is not to approach the wife of his guru,' are examples of permissions (or injunctions) and prohibitions; or again passages such as 'He is to kill the animal devoted to Agnīshomau,' and 'He is not to hurt any being.' Corresponding examples from ordinary life are: 'A friend is to be served,' and 'Enemies are to be shunned.' Permissions and prohibitions of this kind are possible, because the Self although one only is connected with various bodies.—Of what kind then is that connexion?—It consists in the origination in the Self of the erroneous notion that the Self is the aggregate consisting of the body and so on. This erroneous notion is seen to prevail in all living beings, and finds its expression in thoughts such as the following: 'I go,' 'I come,' 'I am blind,' 'I am not blind,' 'I am confused,' 'I am not confused.' That erroneous notion cannot be removed by anything but perfect knowledge, and before the latter supervenes, it remains spread among all living beings. And thus, although the Self must be admitted to be one only, injunctions and prohibitions are possible owing to the difference effected by its connexion with bodies and other limiting adjuncts, the products of Nescience.—It then follows that for him who has obtained perfect knowledge, injunctions and prohibitions are purportless.—No, we reply, (they are not purportless for him, but they do not refer to him), since to him who has obtained the highest aim no obligation can apply. For obligations are imposed with reference to things to be avoided or desired; how then should he, who sees nothing, either to be wished or avoided, beyond the universal Self, stand under any obligation? The Self certainly cannot be enjoined on the Self.—Should it be said that injunctions and prohibitions apply to all those who discern that the soul is something different from the body (and therefore also to him who possesses perfect knowledge), we reply that (such an assertion is too wide, since) obligation depends on a man's imagining his Self to be (actually) connected with the body. It is true that obligation exists for him only who views the soul as something different from the body; but fundamentally all obligation is an erroneous imagination existing in the case of him only who does not see that his Self is no more connected with a body than the ether is with jars and the like. For him, on the other hand, who does not see that connexion no obligation exists, much less, therefore, for him who discerns the unity of the Self.—Nor does it result from the absence of obligation, that he who has arrived at perfect knowledge can act as he likes; for in all cases it is only the wrong imagination (as to the Self's connexion with a body) that impels to action, and that imagination is absent in the case of him who has reached perfect knowledge.—From all this it follows that injunctions and prohibitions are based on the Self's connexion with the body; 'as in the case of light.' The case under discussion is analogous to cases such as the following: Light is one only, and yet we shun a fire which has consumed dead bodies, not any other fire. The sun is one only ; yet we shun only that part of his light which shines on unholy places, not that part which falls on pure ground. Some things consisting of earth are desired, e.g. diamonds and beryls ; other things likewise consisting of earth are shunned, e.g. dead bodies. The urine and dung of cows are considered pure and used as such ; those of other animals are shunned. And many similar cases.

49. And on account of the non-extension (of the individual soul), there is no confusion (of the results of actions).

Well, let it be granted that injunctions and prohibitions are valid, because the Self although one is joined with particular bodies.—From the admission, however, of the unity of the Self it follows that there must be a confusion of the fruits of actions, there being only one master (i.e. one soul to enjoy the fruits of action).—This is not so, we reply, because there is no extension of the acting and enjoying Self, i.e. no connexion on its part with all bodies. For, as we have shown, the individual soul depends on its adjuncts, and owing to the non-extension of those adjuncts there is also non-extension of the soul. Hence there is no confusion of actions or fruits of actions.

50. And (the individual soul is) an appearance (reflection) only.

And that individual soul is to be considered a mere appearance of the highest Self, like the reflection of the sun in the water ; it is neither directly that (i.e. the highest Self), nor a different thing. Hence just as, when one reflected image of the sun trembles, another reflected image does not on that account tremble also ; so, when one soul is connected with actions and results of actions, another soul is not on that account connected likewise. There is therefore no confusion of actions and results. And as that 'appearance' is the effect of Nescience, it follows that the samsāra which is based on it (the appearance) is also the effect of Nescience, so that from the removal of the latter there results the cognition of the soul being in reality nothing but Brahman.

For those, on the other hand, who maintain that there are many Selfs and all of them all-pervading, it follows that there must be a confusion of actions and results.—In what way?—According to the opinion of the Sāṅkhyas there exist many all-pervading Selfs, whose nature is pure intelligence, devoid of qualities and of unsurpassable excellence. For the common purpose of all of them there exists the pradhāna, through which the souls obtain enjoyment and release.—According to the followers of Kaṇāda there exist many all-pervading Selfs, but they are, like so many jars or stools, mere substances and unintelligent in themselves. With those Selfs there co-operate the internal organs (manas), atomic and also unintelligent. From the conjunction of these two classes of substances, viz. the Selfs and the internal organs, there spring the nine special qualities of the Selfs, viz. desire, &c.¹ These qualities inhere in the individual Selfs separately, without any confusion, and that constitutes the samsāra-state. Final release, on the other hand, consists in the absolute non-origination of those nine qualities.

With regard to these opinions we remark that, as far as the Sāṅkhyas are concerned, their doctrine that all Selfs are of the nature of intelligence, and that there is no difference between them in the point of proximity (to the pradhāna), &c.², implies that, if one Self is connected with pleasure and pain, all Selfs will be so connected.—Well but, the Sāṅkhya might reply, a difference (in the connexion of the individual Selfs with pleasure and pain) may result from the circumstance that the activity of the pradhāna aims at the isolation (emancipation) of the Selfs³. Otherwise the activity of the pradhāna would serve no other end but to manifest the pradhāna's power, in consequence whereof no final release would ever take place.—This argumentation, we reply, is not sound. For we have no right to assume a difference which has for its only motive the accomplishment of an end desirable (to us, viz. the emancipation of the Self), but we must rather bring forward some proof for that difference. If no such proof can be brought forward, the desired end, i.e. the emancipation of the soul, must be supposed not to take place; while at the same time the absence of any cause of difference establishes the confusion of actions and their results.—Against the Kāṇādas we urge that if, on their theory, the internal organ is connected with one soul, it must in the same way be connected with all other souls as well, as there is no difference in the point of proximity, &c.¹ Hence, there being no difference of cause and consequently no difference of effect, it follows that, when one soul is connected with pleasure and pain, all souls are thus connected.—But may not the limitation (of actions and their results) be caused by the unseen principle (adrishṭa)? By no means, the following Sūtra replies.

¹ Cognition, pleasure, pain, desire, aversion, endeavour, merit, demerit, and bhāvanā.

² The &c. implies the non-activity (audāsīnya) of the Selfs.

³ And therefore proceeds in a special definite direction capable of effecting in the end the emancipation of some particular Self.

51. On account of the unseen principle being non-limitative.

While there are many souls, all-pervading like ether, and in equal proximity to all bodies from within as well as without, the so-called unseen principle (adrishṭa), which is of the nature of religious merit or demerit, is acquired through mind, speech, and body (i.e. thoughts, words, and actions).—Now, according to the Sāṅkhyas, that principle inheres not in the Self, but abides in the pradhāna and cannot, on account of the pradhāna being the same (for all souls), be the limitative cause of the enjoyment of pleasure and pain for each individual Self.—And according to the Kāṇādas also the unseen principle is due to the non-particular conjunction of the Self with the internal organs, and as thus there is no limitative reason for any particular adrishṭa belonging to any particular soul, the doctrine is open to the same objection.—Well, but there are at work in every particular Self resolutions, &c., such as, ‘I wish to obtain that result,’ ‘I wish to avoid that other result,’ ‘I am striving for that purpose,’ ‘I wish to act in that way,’ &c. &c., and these may, we assume, define the relation of ownership in which particular Selves stand to particular adrishṭas.—This objection is negated in the following Sūtra.

¹ The ' &c.' implies substantiality and so on.

52. And this is also the case in resolutions, &c.

The objection pointed out before applies also to resolutions, &c., for they also are made through the non-particular conjunction of the internal organ and the Self, in proximity to all Selves. Hence they also cannot furnish a reason for limitation.

53. (Should it be said that distinction of pleasure, pain, &c., results) from (difference of) place; we say no, on account of the (Self's) being within (all things).

Here it might be objected that, although all Selves are all-pervading, yet their conjunction with the internal organ which is seated in the body must take place in that part of each Self which is limited by the body; and that thus there may result from difference of locality a limitative distinction of resolutions, &c., of the adrishṭa, and of pleasure and pain.—This also, we reply, is not possible ‘on account of the being within.’ For, as being equally infinite, all Selves are within all bodies. Thus the Vaiśeṣikas have no right whatever to assume any part of the Self to be limited by the body. And if they do assume such a part of the Self which in reality is without any parts, that part because merely assumptive will be incapable of limiting a real effect. Moreover, it is impossible to limit the body which originates in proximity to all (omnipresent) Selves to one particular Self to the exclusion of all others. Moreover, on the doctrine of limitation due to difference of place, it would follow that sometimes two Selfs enjoying the same pleasure or pain might effect their fruition by one and the same body, since it may happen that the unseen principle of two Selfs occupies the same place. For we may observe, e.g. that after Devadatta's body has moved away from a certain spot in which Devadatta had enjoyed a certain amount of pleasure or pain, and the body of Yaṅṇadatta has moved into that very same place, Yaṅṇadatta enjoys an equal amount of pleasure or pain; a thing which (on the theory discussed) could not happen if the unseen principles of the two men did not occupy the same place. From the doctrine that the unseen principles occupy fixed places it would, moreover, follow that no enjoyment of the heavenly world, &c. can take place; for the adrīṣṭa is effected in definite places such as e.g. the body of a Brāhmaṇa, and the enjoyment of the heavenly world is bound to a definite different place.—It further¹ is impossible to maintain that there exist many all-pervading Selfs², as there are no parallel instances. Mention if you can a plurality of other things occupying the same place!—You will perhaps bring forward colour and so on³. But we refuse to accept that instance as parallel, because colour, &c., although non-different in so far as they are attributes of one substance, yet differ through their essential characteristics. On the other hand there is no difference of characteristics between your (alleged) many Selfs. If you say that a difference of characteristics can be established on the ground of the ultimate special differences (of all substances), we point out that you implicate yourself in a logical circle as the assumption of difference of characteristics and the assumption of ultimate differences presuppose each other.

¹ And this is an attack on the basis of the position of the Sāṅkhyas as well as of the Vāireśhikas.

² Which being equally omnipresent would all occupy the same space.

³ Many attributes such as colour, smell, touch, &c. reside in one place as belonging to one material object.

Should you adduce as parallel instances the all-pervadingness of ether, &c. (the ' &c.' implying place and time), we reply that their all-pervadingness is not proved for him who holds the doctrine of Brahman and looks upon ether and so on as mere effects.

All which establishes the conclusion that the only doctrine not open to any objections is the doctrine of the unity of the Self.

FOURTH PĀDA.

REVERENCE TO THE HIGHEST SELF!

I. Thus the vital airs.

In the third pāda it has been shown that a conflict of Vedic passages as to ether, &c., does not exist. The same is now done in this fourth pāda with regard to the vital airs. On the one hand the chapters treating of the origin of things do not record an origin of the vital airs; so e.g. (Kh. Up. VI, 2, 3) 'It sent forth fire,' &c.; and (Taitt. Up. II, 1) 'From that Self sprang ether,' &c. On the other hand it is said expressly in some places that the vital airs were not produced. The following passage, e.g. 'Non-being indeed was this in the beginning; they say: what was that non-being? those rīshis indeed were the non-being in the beginning; they say: who are those rīshis? the vital airs indeed are the rīshis' (Sat. Br. VI, 1, 1, 1), states that the vital airs existed before the origin of things.—In other passages again we read of the origin of the vital airs also, so e.g. 'As small sparks come forth from fire, thus do all vital airs come forth from that Self' (Bṛi. Up. II, 1, 20); 'From that is born the vital air, mind, and all organs of sense' (Mu. Up. II, 1, 3); 'The seven vital airs also spring from him' (Mu. Up. II, 1, 8); 'He sent forth the vital air; from the vital air śraddhā, ether, air, light, water, earth, sense, mind, food' (Pr. Up. VI, 4). Hence as there is a conflict of scriptural passages, and as no reason can be made out for deciding in favour of either alternative, the pūrvapakshin thinks that either no opinion can be formed, or that the passages relative to the origin of the vital airs must be taken in a metaphorical sense, since scripture expressly states the prāṇas to have existed before the creation.

In reply to this the author of the Sūtras says, 'thus the prāṇas.—What then, it will be asked, is the fitness of the word ‘thus,’ as there is no point of comparison with the matter under discussion? The matter under discussion at the conclusion of the preceding pāda was the refutation of those who maintain a plurality of omnipresent Selfs, and with this no comparison can be instituted because there is no similarity. For a comparison is possible only where there is similarity; as when we say, e.g. ‘as a lion so is Bala-varman.’ Possibly it might be said that the comparison is meant to intimate similarity with the advīṣṭa; the meaning being that as the advīṣṭa is not limited because it is produced in proximity to all Selfs, so the prāṇas also are not limited with regard to all the different Selfs. But, on that explanation, the Sūtra would be an idle repetition, as it has already been explained that that absence of limitation is due to the non-limitation of bodies.—Nor can the prāṇas be compared with the individual soul, because that would be contrary to the conclusion about to be established. For it has been shown that the individual soul is without an origin, while the intention is to declare that the prāṇas have an origin. Hence it appears that the word ‘so’ is devoid of connexion.—Not so, we reply. A connexion may be established by means of a comparison based on the exemplifying passages. Under that category fall those passages which state the origin of the prāṇas, as e.g. ‘From that Self come forth all prāṇas, all worlds, all gods, all beings’ (Bṛi. Up. II, 1, 20); which passage means that as the worlds and so on are produced from the highest Brahman so the prāṇas also. Such passages also as (Mu. Up. II, 1, 3) ‘From him are born prāṇa, mind and all organs of sense, ether, air, light, water, and the earth the support of all,’ are to be considered as intimating that the origin of the prāṇas is analogous to that of the ether, &c.—Or else, as a connexion with a somewhat remote object of comparison is resorted to in such cases as the one treated of in Pū. Mī. Sū. III, 4, 32 (‘and the accident in drinking Soma, in the same manner’)¹, we may construe our Sūtra in the following way: in the same way as ether and so on, which are mentioned in the beginning of the preceding pāda, are understood to be effects of the highest Brahman, so the prāṇas also are effects of the highest Brahman. And if it be asked what reason we have for assuming the prāṇas to be so, we reply: the fact of this being stated by scripture.—But it has been shown above that in some places the origin of the prāṇas is not mentioned.—That is of no weight, we reply, as it is mentioned in other places. For the circumstance of a thing not being stated in some places has no power to invalidate what is stated about it in other places. Hence, on account of equality of scriptural statement, it is proper to maintain that the prāṇas also are produced in the same way as ether and so on.

¹ The ‘tadvat’ in the quoted Sūtra refers not to the immediately preceding adikarṇa but to Sūtra III, 4, 28.

2. On account of the impossibility of a secondary (origin of the prāṇas).

Against the objection that the origin of the prāṇas must be understood in a secondary sense because the text states that they existed before the origin of the world, the Sūtra-kāra declares 'on account of the impossibility of a secondary origin.' The statement as to the origin of the prāṇas cannot be taken in a secondary sense because therefrom would result the abandonment of a general assertion. For after the text has asserted that the knowledge of everything depends on the knowledge of one ('What is that through which when it is known everything else becomes known?' Mu. Up. I, 1, 3), it goes on to say, in order to prove that assertion, that 'From him is born prāṇa,' &c. (Mu. Up. II, 1, 3). Now the assertion is made good only if the whole world including the prāṇas is an effect of Brahman, because then there is no effect independent of the material cause; if on the other hand the statement as to the origin of the prāṇas were taken in a secondary sense, the assertion would thereby be stultified. The text, moreover, makes some concluding statements about the matter asserted, 'The Person is all this, sacrifice, penance, Brahman, the highest Immortal' (II, 1, 10), and 'Brahman alone is all this; it is the Best.'—That same assertion is to be connected with such passages as the following, 'When we see, hear, perceive, and know the Self, then all this is known' (Bṛi. Up. II, 4, 5).—How then have we to account for the statement that the prāṇas existed before the creation?—That statement, we reply, does not refer to the fundamental causal substance; for we ascertain from scriptural passages, such as Mu. Up. II, 1, 2 ('That heavenly Person is without breath and without mind, pure, higher than the high Imperishable'), that the fundamental causal substance is devoid of all distinctions such as breath and the like. We must rather view the statement about the existence of the prāṇas before the creation as having for its object a subordinate causal substance¹, and being made with reference to the effects of the latter only. For it is known from Sruti and Smṛiti that even in the universe of evolved things many states of being may stand to each other in the relation of causal substance and effect. —In the adhikaraṇa treating of the ether there occurred a Sūtra (composed of the same syllables) 'gauṇyasambhavāt,' which as being the pūrvapaksha-sūtra had to be explained as 'gauṇī asambhavāt,' 'the statement about the origin of ether must be taken in a secondary sense on account of the impossibility (of the primary sense).' There the final conclusion was established by means of the abandonment of the general assertion. Here on the other hand the Sūtra is the Siddhānta Sūtra and we have therefore explained it as meaning 'on account of the impossibility of a secondary meaning.'—Those who explain the present Sūtra in the same way as the previous Sūtra overlook the fact of the general assertion being abandoned (viz. if the passages referring to the origin of the prāṇas were taken in a secondary sense).

3. On account of that (word which indicates origin) being enunciated at first (in connexion with the prāṇas).

That the scriptural statement about the origin of the

¹ Such as Hiranyagarbha.

prāṇas is to be taken in its literal sense just as the statements about the ether, &c., appears from that circumstance also that the one word which (in the passage from the Mu. Up.) indicates origination, viz. 'is born' (gāyate), is in the first place connected with the prāṇas and has afterwards to be joined with ether, &c., also ('from him is born breath, mind, and all organs of sense, ether, air,' &c.). Now as it is a settled matter that the phrase 'is born' must be taken in its primary sense with reference to ether and so on, it follows that the origin of the prāṇas also to which the same word is applied must be understood as a real origin. For it would be impossible to decide that a word enunciated once only in one chapter and one sentence, and connected with many other words, has in some cases to be taken in its primary sense, and in others in a secondary sense; for such a decision would imply want of uniformity.—So likewise in the passage, 'He sent forth prāṇa, from prāṇa śraddhā,' &c. (Pr. Up. VI, 4), the phrase 'he sent forth' which the text exhibits in conjunction with the prāṇas has to be carried on to śraddhā and the other things which have an origin.—The same reasoning holds good in those cases where the word expressing origination occurs at the end and has to be connected with the preceding words; as e.g. in the passage ending 'all beings come forth from the Self,' where the word 'come forth' must be connected with the prāṇas, &c., mentioned in the earlier part of the sentence.

4. Because speech is preceded by that (viz. fire and the other elements).

Although in the chapter, 'That sent forth fire,' &c., the origin of the prāṇas is not mentioned, the origin of the three elements, fire, water, and earth only being stated, nevertheless, the fact of the text declaring that speech, prāṇa, and mind presuppose fire, water, and earth—which in their turn have Brahman for their causal substance—proves that they—and, by parity of reasoning, all prāṇas—have sprung from Brahman. That speech, prāṇa, and mind presuppose fire, water, and earth is told in the same chapter, 'For truly, my child, mind consists of earth, breath of water, speech of fire' (Kh. Up. VI, 5, 4). If their consisting of earth and so on is taken literally, it follows at once that they have sprung from Brahman. And if it be taken in a metaphorical sense only, yet, as the sentence forms part of the chapter which treats of the evolution of names and forms effected by Brahman; and as the introductory phrase runs, 'That by which we hear what is not heard' (Kh. Up. VI, 1, 3); and as the concluding passage is 'In it all that exists has its Self' (Kh. Up. VI, 8, 7); and as the matter is moreover known from other scriptural passages; we understand that also the statement about mind and so on consisting of earth, &c., is meant to teach that they are products of Brahman.—It is therefore an established conclusion that the prāṇas also are effects of Brahman.

5. (The prāṇas are) seven, on account of this being understood (from scriptural passages) and of the specification (of those seven).

So far we have shown that there is in reality no conflict of scriptural passages regarding the origin of the prāṇas. It will now be shown that there is also no conflict regarding their number. The chief vital air (mukhya prāṇa) will be discussed later on. For the present the Sūtrakāra defines the number of the other prāṇas. A doubt arises here owing to the conflicting nature of the scriptural passages. In one place seven prāṇas are mentioned, 'The seven prāṇas spring from him' (Mu. Up. II, 1, 8). In another place eight prāṇas are mentioned as being grahas, 'Eight grahas there are and eight atigrahas' (Bṛi. Up. III, 2, 1). In another place nine, 'Seven are the prāṇas of the head, two the lower ones' (Taitt. Samh. V, 3, 2, 5). Sometimes ten, 'Nine prāṇas indeed are in men, the navel is the tenth' (Taitt. Samh. V, 3, 2, 3). Sometimes eleven, 'Ten are these prāṇas in man, and Ātman is the eleventh' (Bṛi. Up. III, 9, 4). Sometimes twelve, 'All touches have their centre in the skin,' &c. (Bṛi. Up. II, 4, 11). Sometimes thirteen, 'The eye and what can be seen,' &c. (Pr. Up. IV, 8).—Thus the scriptural passages disagree about the number of the prāṇas.

Here the pūrvapakshin maintains that the prānas are in reality seven in number, on account of understanding, i.e. because they are understood to be so many, from passages such as 'The seven prānas spring from him,' &c. These seven prānas are moreover specified in the other passage quoted above, 'Seven indeed are the prānas of the head.'—But in the same passage we meet with the following reiteration, 'Resting in the cave they are placed there seven and seven,' which intimates that there are prānas in addition to the seven.—No matter, we reply; that reiteration is made with reference to the plurality of men, and means that each man has seven prānas; it does not mean that there are two sets of seven prānas each of different nature.—But, another objection will be raised, other scriptural passages speak of the prānas as eight in number; how then should they be seven?—True, we reply, the number of eight also is stated; but on account of the contradictory nature of the statements we have to decide in favour of either of the two numbers; hence we decide in favour of the number seven, in deference to the (simpler) assumption of a low number, and consider the statements of other numbers to refer to the difference of modifications (of the fundamental seven prānas).—To this argumentation the next Sūtra replies.

6. But (there are also, in addition to the seven prānas mentioned,) the hands and so on. This being a settled matter, therefore (we must) not (conclude) thus (viz. that there are seven prānas only).

In addition to the seven prānas scripture mentions other prānas also, such as the hands, &c., 'The hand is one graha and that is seized by work as the atigraha; for with the hands one does work' (Bṛi. Up. III, 2, 8), and similar passages. And as it is settled that there are more than seven, the number seven may be explained as being contained within the greater number. For wherever there is a conflict between a higher and a lower number, the higher number has to be accepted because the lower one is contained within it; while the higher is not contained within the lower. We therefore must not conclude that, in deference to the lower number, seven prāṇas have to be assumed, but rather that there are eleven prāṇas, in deference to the higher number. This conclusion is confirmed by one of the passages quoted, 'Ten are these prāṇas in man, and Ātman is the eleventh.' By the word Ātman we have to understand the internal organ, on account of its ruling over the organs. Should it be objected that scripture also mentions numbers higher than eleven, viz. twelve and thirteen, we admit that, but remark that there are no objective effects in addition to the eleven (well-known) objective effects on account of which additional organs would have to be assumed. There are five distinctions of buddhi having for their respective objects sound, touch, colour, taste, and smell, and on their account there are the five intellectual organs; again there are five classes of action, viz. speaking, taking, going, evacuation, and begetting, and on their account there are the five organs of action; finally there is the manas which has all things for its objects and extends to the past, the present, and the future; it is one only but has various functions. On account of the plurality of its functions we find it designated by different terms in different places, as manas or buddhi or ahamkāra or kitta. Thus scripture also after having enumerated the various functions such as desire, &c., says at the end, 'All this is manas only.'—That passage again which speaks of the prāṇas of the head as seven means four prāṇas only, which on account of the plurality of their places may be counted as seven; viz. the two ears, the two eyes, the two nostrils, and speech.—Nor can it be maintained that there are in reality only so many (i.e. seven), the other prāṇas being mere functions of the seven; for the functions of the hands and so on are absolutely different (from the functions of the seven senses admitted by the pūrvapakshin).—Again, in the passage 'Nine prāṇas indeed are in man, the navel is the tenth,' the expression 'ten prāṇas' is used to denote the different openings of the human body, not the difference of nature of the prāṇas, as we conclude from the navel being mentioned as the eleventh. For no prāṇa is known that bears the name of navel; but the navel as being one of the special abodes of the chief prāṇa is here enumerated as a tenth prāna.—In some places so and so many are counted for the purpose of meditation ; in other places so and so many for the purpose of illustration ¹. As the statements concerning the number of the prānas are of so varying a nature we must therefore distinguish in each case what the object of the statement is. Meanwhile it remains a settled conclusion that that statement which makes the prānas to be eleven is authoritative, on account of the objective effects (being eleven also).

The two Sūtras (referring to the number of the prānas) may be construed in the following manner also. The prānas are seven because scripture mentions the going (gati) of seven only, 'When he thus departs life departs after him, and when life thus departs all the other prānas ² depart after it' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 2).—But, it may be objected, this passage says 'all the other prānas;' how then does it declare the going of seven only?—The Sūtra replies, 'on account of their being specified.' Seven senses only, from seeing up to feeling, are specified there because so many only are under discussion ; as we see from the enumeration given in the passage, 'When that person in the eye turns away then he ceases to know any forms. He has become one they say, he does not see' &c. The word 'all' refers here only to what is under discussion, i.e. only to the seven prānas mentioned before, not to any other. Analogously when we say 'all the Brāhmanas have been fed,' we mean only those Brāhmanas who have been invited and concern us at the time, not any other.—If it be objected that the passage quoted mentions understanding (viṣṇāna) as the eighth thing departing, and that we therefore have no right to speak of the departing of seven only, we reply that manas and understanding differ not in essential nature but only in function, and that on this account we are entitled to speak of seven prānas only.—The answer to this pūrvapaksha is as follows.—In addition to the seven senses, other prāṇas also, such as the hands, are known to exist, as we see from such passages as ‘The hands are one graha,’ &c. (Bṛi. Up. III, 2, 8). By their being a graha (seizer) is meant that they are bonds by which the individual soul (kshetragñā) is tied. Now the individual soul is tied not in one body only, but is equally tied in other bodies also. Hence it follows that that bond called graha (i.e. among other things the hands) moves over into other bodies also. Smṛiti also (‘He—the Self—is joined with the aggregate of eight, comprising breath, &c.¹, as his mark; his bondage consists in being bound by it, his release in being freed from it’) shows that the Self is, previous to final release, not freed from the bonds called grahas. And also in the enumeration of the senses and their objects given by the Atharvāna Upanishad (‘The eye and what can be seen,’ &c., Pr. Up. IV, 8), the organs of action such as the hands and so on, together with their objects, are specified as well, ‘the hands and what can be grasped; the member and what can be delighted; the anus and what can be evacuated; the feet and what can be walked.’ Moreover the passage, ‘These ten vital breaths and ātman as the eleventh; when they depart from this mortal body they make us cry’ (Bṛi. Up. III, 9, 4), shows that eleven prāṇas depart from the body.—Moreover the word ‘all’ (which occurs in the passage, Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 2) must, because connected with the word ‘prāṇas,’ denote all prāṇas, and cannot, on the ground of general subject-matter, be limited to the seven prāṇas; for a direct statement has greater force than the subject-matter. Even in the analogous sentence, ‘all Brāhmaṇas have been fed,’ we have, on the ground of the words, to understand all Brāhmaṇas living on the earth; but because it is impossible to feed all Brāhmaṇas in the latter sense, we accept that meaning of ¹ The eightfold aggregate of which the Self is freed in final release only comprises the five prāṇas (vital airs), the pentad of the five subtle elements, the pentad of the organs of intellect, the pentad of the organs of action, the tetrad of internal organs (manas, &c.), avidyā, desire (kāma), and karman.

¹ Sapta prānāḥ prabhavāntīty āder gatim āha kvaṇid iti, aśṭau grahā ityāder gatim sūtrayati gatim iti. Ān. Gi.

² I.e. seeing, smelling, tasting, speaking, hearing, feeling, and the manas.

'all,' according to which it denotes all invited Brāhmaṇas. In our case on the other hand there is no reason whatever for narrowing the meaning of 'all.'—Hence the word 'all' includes all prāṇas without exception. Nothing on the other hand prevents the enumeration of seven prāṇas being taken as illustrative only. It is therefore an established conclusion, resting on the number of the effects as well as on Vedic statement, that there are eleven prāṇas.

7. And (they are) minute.

The author of the Sūtras adds another characteristic quality of the prāṇas. The prāṇas under discussion must be viewed as minute. By their minuteness we have to understand subtilty and limited size; but not atomic size, as otherwise they would be incapable of producing effects which extend over the whole body. They must be subtle; for if they were big the persons surrounding a dying man would see them coming out from the body at the moment of death, as a snake comes out of its hole. They must be limited; for if they were all-pervading the scriptural statements as to their passing out of the body, going and coming, would be contradicted thereby, and it could not be established that the individual soul is 'the essence of the qualities of that' (i. e. the manas; cp. II, 3, 29). Should it be said that they may be all-pervading, but at the same time appear as functions (vr̥tti) in the body only, we rejoin that only a function can constitute an instrument. Whatever effects perception, may it be a function or something else, just that is an instrument for us. The disagreement is therefore about a name only, and the assumption of the instruments (prāṇas) being all-pervading is thus purposeless.—Hence we decide that the prāṇas are subtle and of limited size.

8. And the best (i. e. the chief vital air).

The Sūtra extends to the chief vital air (mukhya prāṇa) a quality already asserted of the other prāṇas, viz. being an effect of Brahman.—But, an objection may be raised, it has already been stated of all prāṇas without difference that they are effects of Brahman; e. g. the passage, 'From him is born breath, mind, and all organs of sense' (Mu. Up. II, 1, 3), states the origin of prāṇa separately from the senses and the manas; and there are other passages also such as 'He sent forth prāṇa' (Pr. Up. VI, 4). Why then the formal extension?—We reply: For the purpose of removing further doubt. For in the Nāsadiya-sūkta whose subject is Brahman there occurs the following mantra: 'There was neither death nor the Immortal; nor manifestation of either night or day. By its own law the One was breathing without wind; there was nothing different from that or higher than it' (Ri. Samh. X, 129, 2). Here the words, 'was breathing,' which denote the proper function of breath, intimate that breath existed as it were before the creation. And therefrom it might be concluded that prāṇa is not produced; an idea which the Sūtrakāra discards by the formal extension (to prāṇa of the quality of having originated from Brahman).—Moreover the word 'breathed' does not intimate that prāṇa existed before the creation; for in the first place it is qualified by the addition 'without wind,' and in the second place scriptural passages—such as 'He is without breath, without mind, pure' (Mu. Up. II, 1, 2)—declare expressly that the causal substance is without any qualifications such as prāṇa and so on. Hence the word 'breathed' has merely the purpose of setting forth the existence of the cause.—The term 'the best' (employed in the Sūtra) denotes the chief vital air, according to the declaration of scripture, 'Breath indeed is the oldest and the best' (Kh. Up. V, 1, 1). The breath is the oldest because it begins its function from the moment when the child is conceived; the senses of hearing, &c., on the other hand, begin to act only when their special seats, viz. the ears, &c., are formed, and they are thus not 'the oldest.' The designation 'the best' belongs to the prāṇa on account of its superior qualities and on account of the passage, 'We shall not be able to live without thee' (Bṛi. Up. VI, 1, 13).

9. (The chief prāṇa is) neither air nor function, on account of its being mentioned separately.

An inquiry is now started concerning the nature of that chief prāṇa.—The pūrvapakshin maintains that the prāṇa is, according to Sruti, nothing but air. For Sruti says, 'Breath is air; that air assuming five forms is prāṇa, apāna, vyāna, udāna, samāna.'—Or else the pūrvapaksha may be formulated according to the view of another philosophical doctrine, and prāṇa may be considered as the combined function of all organs. For so the followers of another doctrine (viz. the Sāṅkhyas) teach, 'The five airs, prāṇa, &c., are the common function of the instruments¹.'

To this we reply that the prāṇa is neither air nor the function of an organ; for it is mentioned separately. From air prāṇa is distinguished in the following passage, 'Breath indeed is the fourth foot of Brahman. That foot shines as Agni with its light and warmth.' If prāṇa were mere air, it would not be mentioned separately from air.—Thus it is also mentioned separately from the functions of the organs; for the texts enumerate speech and the other organs and mention prāṇa separately from them, and the function and that to which the function belongs (the organ) are identical. If it were a mere function of an organ, it would not be mentioned separately from the organs. Other passages also in which the prāṇa is mentioned separately from air and the organs are here to be considered so, e.g. 'From him is born breath, mind, and all organs of sense, ether, air,' &c. (Mu. Up. II, 1, 3). Nor is it possible that all the organs together should have one function (and that that function should be the prāṇa); for each organ has its own special function and the aggregate of them has no active power of its own.—But—an objection may be raised—the thing may take place in the manner of the moving bird-cage. Just as eleven birds shut up in one cage may, although each makes a separate effort, move the cage by the combination of their efforts; so the eleven prāṇas which abide in one body may, although each has its own special function, by the combination of these functions, produce one common function called prāṇa.—This objection, we reply, is without force. The birds indeed may, by means of their separate subordinate efforts, which all favour the movement of the cage, move the cage by combination; that is a matter of observation. But we have no right to assume that the different prāṇas with their subordinate functions such as hearing &c. can, by combination, produce the function of vital breath; for there is no means to prove this, and the vital breath is in kind absolutely different from hearing and so on.—Moreover, if the vital breath were the mere function of an organ (or the organs) it could not be glorified as the ‘best,’ and speech and so on could not be represented as subordinate to it. Hence the vital breath is different from air and the functions (of the organs).—How then have we to understand the scriptural passage, ‘The prāṇa is air,’ &c.?—The air, we reply, passing into the adhyātma-state, dividing itself fivefold and thus abiding in a specialized condition is called prāṇa. It therefore is neither a different being nor is it mere air. Hence there is room for those passages as well which identify it with air as those which do not.—Well, let this be granted. The prāṇa then also must be considered to be independent in this body like the individual soul, as scripture declares it to be the ‘best’ and the organs such as speech, &c., to be subordinate to it. For various powers are ascribed to it in scriptural passages. It is said, for instance, that when speech and the other (organs) are asleep the prāṇa alone is awake; that the prāṇa alone is not reached by death; that the prāṇa is the absorber, it absorbs speech, &c.; that the prāṇa guards the other senses (prāṇas) as a mother her sons¹. Hence it follows that the prāṇa is independent in the same way as the individual soul.—This view is impugned in the next Sūtra.

¹ Sāṅkhya Sū. II, 31; where, however, the reading is 'sāmānya-karṇavṛtīḥ,' explained by the Comm. as sādhārṇī karṇasya antaḥ-karṇatrayasya vṛtīḥ parizāmbhedā iti. Saṅkara, on the other hand, understands by karṇa the eleven prāṇas discussed previously.

¹ Cp. Ka. Up. II, 5, 8; Bri. Up. I, 5, 21; Kh. Up. IV, 3, 3; Pr. Up. II, 13.

10. But (the prāṇa is subordinate to the soul) like the eye, &c., on account of being taught with them (the eye, &c.), and for other reasons.

The word 'but' sets aside the independence of the prāṇa. As the eye and so on stand, like the subjects of a king, in mere subordinate relation to the acting and enjoying of the soul and are not independent, so the chief vital air also, occupying a position analogous to that of a king's minister, stands in an entirely subordinate relation to the soul and is not independent.—Why?—Because it is taught (spoken of) together with them, i. e. the eye and the other organs, in such passages as the colloquy of the prāṇas, &c. For to be mentioned together is appropriate only in the case of things with the same attributes, as e. g. the Bṛihat-sāman and the *Rathantara-sāman*¹. The words 'and so on' (in the Sūtra) indicate other reasons refuting the independence of the prāṇa, such as its being composed of parts, its being of a non-intelligent nature and the like.—Well, but if it be admitted that the prāṇa stands to the soul in the relation of an instrument as the eye and so on, it will follow that we must assume another sense-object analogous to colour and so on. For the eyes, &c., occupy their specific subordinate position with regard to the soul through their functions which consist in the seeing of colour and so on. Now we can enumerate only eleven classes of functions, viz. the seeing of colour and so on, on whose account we assume eleven different prāṇas, and there is no twelfth class of effects on account of which a twelfth prāṇa could be assumed.—To this objection the following Sūtra replies.

11. And on account of (its) not being an instrument the objection is not (valid); for thus (scripture) declares.

The objection urged, viz. that there would result another sense-object, is not valid; because the prāṇa is not an instrument. For we do not assume that the prāṇa is, like the eye, an organ because it determines a special sense-object. Nor is it on that account devoid of an effect; since scripture declares that the chief vital air has a specific effect which cannot belong to the other prāṇas. For in the so-called colloquies of the prāṇas we read in the beginning, 'The prāṇas quarrelled together who was best;' after that we read, 'He by whose departure the body seems worse than worst, he is the best of you;' thereupon the text, after showing how, on the successive departure of speech and so on, the life of the body, although deprived of one particular function, went on as before, finally relates that as soon as the chief prāṇa was about to depart all other prāṇas became loosened and the body was about to perish; which shows that the body and all the senses subsist by means of the chief prāṇa. The same thing is declared by another passage, 'Then prāṇa as the best said to them: Be not deceived; I alone dividing myself fivefold support this body and keep it' (Pr. Up. II, 3). Another passage, viz. 'With prāṇa guarding the lower nest' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 3, 12), shows that the guarding of the body depends on prāṇa. Again, two other passages show that the nourishing of the body depends on prāṇa, 'From whatever limb prāṇa goes away that limb withers' (Bṛi. Up. I, 3, 19), and 'What we eat and drink with it supports the other vital breaths.' And another passage declares that the soul's departing and staying depend on prāṇa, 'What is it by whose departure I shall depart, and by whose staying I shall stay?—The created prāṇa' (Pr. Up. VI, 3; 4).

¹ Which go together because they are both sāmans.

12. It is designated as having five functions like mind.

The chief vital air has its specific effect for that reason also that in scripture it is designated as having five functions, prāṇa, apāna, vyāna, udāna, samāna. This distinction of functions is based on a distinction of effects. Prāṇa is the forward-function whose work is aspiration, &c.; apāna is the backward-function whose work is inspiration, &c.; vyāna is that which, abiding in the junction of the two, is the cause of works of strength¹; udāna is the ascending function and is the cause of the passing out (of the soul); samāna is the function which conveys the juices of the food equally through all the limbs of the body. Thus the prāṇa has five functions just as the mind (manas) has. The five functions of the mind are the five well-known ones caused by the ear, &c., and having sound and so on for their objects. By the functions of the mind we cannot here understand those enumerated (in Bṛi. Up. I, 5, 3), 'desire, representation,' &c., because those are more than five.—But on the former explanation also there exists yet another function of the mind which does not depend on the ear, &c., but has for its object the past, the future, and so on; so that on that explanation also the number five is exceeded.—Well, let us then follow the principle that the opinions of other (systems) if unobjectionable may be adopted, and let us assume that the five functions of the manas are those five which are known from the Yogaśāstra, viz. right knowledge, error, imagination, slumber, and remembrance. Or else let us assume that the Sūtra quotes the manas as an analogous instance merely with reference to the plurality (not the fivefoldness) of its functions.—In any case the Sūtra must be construed to mean that the prāṇa's subordinate position with regard to the soul follows from its having five functions like the manas.

13. And it is minute.

And the chief vital air is to be considered as minute like the other prāṇas.—Here also we have to understand by minuteness that the chief vital air is subtle and of limited size, not that is of atomic size; for by means of its five functions it pervades the entire body. It must be viewed as subtle because when passing out of the body it is not perceived by a bystander, and as limited because scripture speaks of its passing out, going and coming.—But, it may be said, scripture speaks also of its all-pervadingness; so, e.g. 'He is equal to a grub, equal to a gnat, equal to an elephant, equal to these three worlds, equal to this Universe' (Bṛi. Up. I, 3, 22).—To this we reply that the all-pervadingness of which this text speaks belongs to the Self of the prâṇa in its adhidaivata relation, according to which it appears as Hiraṇyagarbha in his double—universal and individual—form, not in its adhyâtma relation. Moreover the statements of equality 'equal to a grub,' &c., just declare the limited size of the prâṇa which abides within every living being.—Thus there remains no difficulty.

¹ Viz. the holding in of the breath; cp. Kh. Up. I, 3, 3-5.

14. But there is guidance (of the prâṇas) by fire, &c., on account of that being declared by scripture.

Here there arises a discussion whether the prâṇas of which we have been treating are able to produce their effects by their own power or only in so far as guided by divinities.—The pûrvapakshin maintains that the prâṇas being endowed with the capacity of producing their effects act from their own power. If we, moreover, admitted that the prâṇas act only in so far as guided by divinities, it would follow that those guiding divinities are the enjoyers (of the fruits of the actions), and the individual soul would thus cease to be an enjoyer. Hence the prâṇas act from their own power.—To this we reply as follows. 'But there takes place guidance by fire,' &c.—The word 'but' excludes the pûrvapaksha. The different classes of organs, speech, &c., the Sûtra says, enter on their peculiar activities, guided by the divinities animating fire, and so on. The words, 'on account of that being declared by scripture,' state the reason. For different passages declare this, cp. Ait. Âr. II, 4, 2, 4, 'Agni having become speech entered the mouth.' This statement about Agni (fire) becoming speech and entering the mouth is made on the assumption of Agni acting as a ruler with his divine Self (not as a mere element). For if we abstract from the connexion with the divinity we do not see that there is any special connexion of fire either with speech or the mouth. The subsequent passages, 'Vâyu having become breath entered into the nostrils,' &c., are to be explained in the same way.

—This conclusion is confirmed by other passages also, such as ‘Speech is indeed the fourth foot of Brahman; that foot shines with Agni as its light and warms’ (Kh. Up. IV, 18, 3), which passage declares that speech is made of the light of Agni. Other passages intimate the same thing by declaring that speech, &c., pass over into Agni, &c., cp. Bṛi. Up. I, 3, 12, ‘He carried speech across first; when speech had become freed from death it became Agni.’ Everywhere the enumeration of speech and so on on the one side and Agni and so on on the other side—wherein is implied a distinction of the personal and the divine element—proceeds on the ground of the same relation (viz. of that which is guided and that which guides). Smṛiti-passages also declare at length that speech, &c., are guided by Agni and the other divinities, cp. for instance, ‘Brāhmaṇas knowing the truth call speech the personal element, that which is spoken the natural element and fire (Agni) the divine element.’—The assertion that the prāṇas being endowed with the capability of producing their effects act from their own power is unfounded, as we see that some things which possess the capability of motion, e.g. cars, actually move only if dragged by bulls and the like. Hence, as both alternatives are possible¹, we decide on the ground of scripture that the prāṇas act under the guidance of the divinities.—The next Sūtra refutes the assertion that from the fact of the divinities guiding the prāṇas it would follow that they—and not the embodied soul—are the enjoyers.

15. (It is not so) (because the prāṇas are connected) with that to which the prāṇas belong (i.e. the individual soul), (a thing we know) from scripture.

Although there are divinities guiding the prāṇas, yet we learn from scripture that those prāṇas are connected with the embodied soul which is the Lord of the aggregate of instruments of action. The following passage, e.g. 'where the sight has entered into the void there is the person of the eye; the eye itself is the instrument of seeing. He who knows, let me smell this, he is the Self; the nose is the instrument of smelling,' declares that the prânas are connected with the embodied soul only. Moreover the plurality of the divinities guiding the organs renders it impossible that they should be the enjoyers in this body. For that there is in this body only one embodied enjoyer is understood from the possibility of the recognition of identity and so on¹.

¹ Viz. that something should act by itself, and that it should act under guidance only.

16. And on account of the permanence of this (viz. the embodied soul).

This embodied soul abides permanently in this body as the enjoyer, since it can be affected by good and evil and can experience pleasure and pain. Not so the gods; for they exist in the state of highest power and glory and cannot possibly enter, in this wretched body, into the condition of enjoyers. So scripture also says, 'Only what is good approaches him; verily evil does not approach the devas' (Bri. Up. I, 5, 20).—And only with the embodied soul the prânas are permanently connected, as it is seen that when the soul passes out &c. the prânas follow it. This we see from passages such as the following: 'When it passes out the prâna passes out after it, and when the prâna thus passes out all the other prânas pass after it' (Bri. Up. IV, 4, 2). Hence although there are ruling divinities of the organs, the embodied soul does not cease to be the enjoyer; for the divinities are connected with the organs only, not with the state of the soul as enjoyer.

17. They (the prânas) are senses, on account of being so designated, with the exception of the best (the mukhya prâna).

We have treated of the mukhya prâna and the other

¹ Yo=ham rūpam adrākṣham so=ham sṛinomīty ekasyaiva praty-abhigñānam pratisamdhānam. Go. Ân.

eleven prāṇas in due order.—Now there arises another doubt, viz. whether the other prāṇas are functions of the mukhya prāṇa or different beings.—The pūrvapakshin maintains that they are mere functions, on account of scriptural statement. For scripture, after having spoken of the chief prāṇa and the other prāṇas in proximity, declares that those other prāṇas have their Self in the chief prāṇa, ‘Well, let us all assume his form. Thereupon they all assumed his form’ (Bṛi. Up. I, 5, 21).—Their unity is moreover ascertained from the unity of the term applied to them, viz. prāṇa. Otherwise there either would result the objectionable circumstance of one word having different senses, or else the word would in some places have to be taken in its primary sense, in others in a derived sense. Hence, as prāṇa, apāṇa, &c. are the five functions of the one chief prāṇa, so the eleven prāṇas also which begin with speech are mere functions of the chief prāṇa.—To this we reply as follows. Speech and so on are beings different from the chief prāṇa, on account of the difference of designation.—Which is that difference of designation?—The eleven prāṇas remaining if we abstract from the best one, i.e. the chief prāṇa, are called the sense-organs (indriya), as we see them designated in Sruti, ‘from him is born breath, mind, and all organs of sense’ (Mu. Up. II, 1, 3). In this and other passages prāṇa and the sense-organs are mentioned separately.—But in that case the mind also would have to be excluded from the class of sense-organs, like the prāṇa; as we see that like the latter it is separately mentioned in the passage, ‘The mind and all organs of sense.’ True; but in Smṛiti eleven sense-organs are mentioned, and on that account the mind must, like the ear, and so on, be comprised in the sense-organs. That the prāṇa on the other hand is a sense-organ is known neither from Smṛiti nor Sruti.—Now this difference of designation is appropriate only if there is difference of being. If there were unity of being it would be contradictory that the prāṇa although one should sometimes be designated as sense-organ and sometimes not. Consequently the other prāṇas are different in being from the chief prāṇa.—For this conclusion the following Sūtra states an additional reason,

18. On account of the scriptural statement of difference.

The prāṇa is everywhere spoken of as different from speech, &c. The passage, e.g. beginning with 'They said to speech' (Bṛi. Up. I, 3, 2), enumerates speech, &c., which were overwhelmed by the evil of the Asuras, concludes thereupon the section treating of speech, &c., and then specially mentions the mukhya prāṇa as overcoming the Asuras, in the paragraph beginning 'Then they said to the breath in the mouth.'—Other passages also referring to that difference may be quoted, so, for instance, 'He made mind, speech, and breath for himself' (Bṛi. Up. I, 5, 3).—For this reason also the other prāṇas are different in being from the chief prāṇa.—Another reason follows.

19. And on account of the difference of characteristics.

There is moreover a difference of characteristics between the chief prāṇa and the other prāṇas. When speech &c. are asleep, the chief prāṇa alone is awake. The chief prāṇa alone is not reached by death, while the other prāṇas are. The staying and departing of the chief prāṇa—not that of the sense-organs—is the cause of the maintenance and the destruction of the body. The sense-organs, on the other hand, are the cause of the perception of the sense-objects, not the chief prāṇa. Thus there are manifold differences distinguishing the prāṇa from the senses, and this also shows the latter to be different in being from the prāṇa.—To infer from the passage, 'thereupon they all assumed his form,' that the sense-organs are nothing but prāṇa is wrong, because there also an examination of the context makes us understand their difference. For there the sense-organs are enumerated first ('Voice held, I shall speak,' &c.); after that it is said that speech, &c. were seized by death in the form of weariness ('Death having become weariness held them back; therefore speech grows weary'); finally prāṇa is mentioned separately as not having been overcome by death ('but death did not seize the central breath'), and is asserted to be the best ('he is the best of us'). The assuming of the form of prāṇa has therefore, in accordance with the quoted passages, to be understood to mean that the energizing of speech and so on depends on the prāṇa, but not that they are identical with it.—Hence it follows that the word 'prāṇa' is applied to the sense-organs in a secondary sense. Thus Sruti also says, 'Thereupon they all assumed his form, and therefore they are called after him prāṇas;' a passage declaring that the word prāṇa, which properly refers to the chief prāṇa, is secondarily applied to the sense-organs also. Speech and the other sense-organs are therefore different in being from the prāṇa.

20. But the fashioning of names and forms belongs to him who renders tripartite, on account of the teaching (of scripture).

In the chapter treating of the Being (sat), subsequently to the account of the creation of fire, water, and food (earth), the following statement is made, 'That divinity thought, let me now enter those three beings with this living Self (gīva ātmā), and let me then evolve names and forms¹;—let me make each of these three tripartite' (Kh. Up. VI, 3, 2 ; 3).—Here the doubt arises whether the agent in that evolution of names and forms is the gīva (the living, i.e. the individual Self or soul) or the highest Lord.—The pūrvapakshin maintains the former alternative, on account of the qualification contained in the words 'with this living Self.' The use of ordinary language does, in such phrases as 'Having entered the army of the enemy by means of a spy I count it,' attribute the counting of the army in which the spy is the real agent to the Self of the king who is the causal agent; which attribution is effected by means of the use of the first person, 'I count.' So here the sacred text attributes the evolving of names and forms—in which the gīva is the real agent—to the Self of the divinity which is the causal agent; the attribution being effected by means of the use of the first person, 'let me evolve.'—Moreover we see in the case of names such as Dittha, Davittha, &c., and in the case of forms such as jars, dishes and the like that the individual soul only is the evolving agent¹. Hence the evolution of names and forms is the work of the gīva.

¹ Literally, with this living Self having entered let me evolve, &c.

To this the Sūtra replies: 'But the fashioning of names and forms belongs to him who renders tripartite.' The particle 'but' discards the pūrvapaksha. Fashioning means evolving. The term 'he who renders tripartite' denotes the highest Lord, his agency being designated as beyond contradiction in the case of the rendering tripartite (of fire, &c.). The entire evolution of names and forms which is seen, e.g. in fire, sun, moon, lightning, or in different plants such as kusa-grass, kâsa-grass, palâsa-trees, or in various living beings such as cattle, deer, men, all this manifold evolution according to species and individuals can surely be the work of the highest Lord only, who fashioned fire, water, and earth.—Why?—On account of the teaching of the sacred text.—For the text says at first 'that divinity,' &c., and then goes on in the first person 'let me evolve;' which implies the statement that the highest Brahman only is the evolving agent.—But we ascertain from the qualification contained in the words 'with this living Self,' that the agent in the evolution is the living Self!—No, we reply. The words 'with this living Self' are connected with the words 'having entered,' in proximity to which they stand; not with the clause 'let me evolve.' If they were connected with the former words, we should have to assume that the first person, which refers to the divinity—viz. 'let me evolve'—is used in a metaphorical sense. And with regard to all the manifold names and forms such as mountains, rivers, oceans, &c., no soul, apart from the Lord, possesses the power of evolution; and if any have such power, it is dependent on the highest Lord. Nor is the so-called 'living Self' absolutely different from the highest Lord, as the spy is from the king; as we see from its being qualified as the living Self, and as its being the gīva (i. e. an individual soul apparently differing from the universal Self) is due to the limiting adjuncts only. Hence the evolution of names and forms which is effected by it is in reality effected by the highest Lord. And that the highest Lord is he who evolves the names and forms is a principle acknowledged by all the Upanishads ; as we see from such passages as 'He who is called ether is the evolver of all forms and names' (Kh. Up. VIII, 14). The evolution of names and forms, therefore, is exclusively the work of the highest Lord, who is also the author of the tripartite arrangement.—The meaning of the text is that the evolution of names and forms was preceded by the tripartition, the evolution of each particular name and form being already explained by the account of the origin of fire, water, and earth. The act of tripartition is expressly described by Sruti in the cases of fire, sun, moon, and lightning, 'The red colour of burning fire is the colour of fire, the white colour of fire is the colour of water, the black colour of fire the colour of earth,' &c. In this way there is evolved the distinctive form of fire, and in connexion therewith the distinctive name 'fire,' the name depending on the thing. The same remarks apply to the cases of the sun, the moon, and lightning. The instance (given by the text) of the tripartition of fire implies the statement that the three substances, viz. earth, water, fire, were rendered tripartite in the same manner ; as the beginning as well as the concluding clause of the passage equally refers to all three. For the beginning clause says, 'These three beings became each of them tripartite ;' and the concluding clause says, 'Whatever they thought looked red they knew was the colour of fire,' &c. &c., up to 'Whatever they thought was altogether unknown they knew was some combination of these three beings.' Having thus described the external tripartition of the three elements the text goes on to describe another tripartition with reference to man, 'those three beings when they reach man become each of them tripartite.' This tripartition in man the teacher sets forth (in the following Sūtra) according to scripture, with a view to the refutation of some foreseen objection.

¹ Names being given and vessels being shaped by a class of gīvas, viz. men.

21. The flesh, &c., originates from earth, according to the scriptural statement; and (so also) in the case of the two other (elements).

From tripartite earth when assimilated by man there are produced as its effects flesh, &c., according to scripture. For the text says, 'Food (earth) when eaten becomes three-fold; its grossest portion becomes feces, its middle portion flesh, its subtlest portion mind.' The meaning is that the tripartite earth is eaten in the shape of food such as rice, barley, &c.; that its grossest parts are discharged in the form of feces, that its middle parts nourish the flesh of the body, and its subtlest parts feed the mind. Analogously we have to learn from the text the effects of the two other elements, viz. fire and water; viz. that urine, blood, and breath are the effects of water; bone, marrow, and speech those of fire.—Here now an objection is raised. If all material things are tripartite (i.e. contain parts of the three elements alike)—according to the indifferent statement, 'He made each of these tripartite'—for what reason then has there been made the distinction of names, 'this is fire, this is water, this is earth?' And again, why is it said that among the elements of the human body, flesh, &c., is the effect of the eaten earth only; blood, &c., the effect of the water drunk; bone, &c., the effect of the fire eaten?—To this objection the next Sûtra replies.

22. But on account of their distinctive nature there is a (distinctive) designation of them.

The word 'but' repels the objection raised. By 'distinctive nature' we have to understand preponderance. Although all things are tripartite, yet we observe in different places a preponderance of different elements; heat preponderates in fire, water in all that is liquid, food in earth. This special tripartition aims at rendering possible the distinctions and terms of ordinary life. For if the tripartition resulted in sameness, comparable to that of the three strands of a tripartite rope, we could not distinguish—and speak of as distinguished—the three elements.—Hence, although there is a tripartition, we are enabled 'on account of distinctive nature' to give special designations to the three elements, viz. fire, water, and earth and their products.—The repetition (of 'designation of them') indicates the termination of the adhyāya.

THIRD ADHYĀYA.

FIRST PĀDA.

REVERENCE TO THE HIGHEST SELF !

1. In obtaining a different (body) (the soul) goes enveloped (by subtle parts of the elements), (as appears from) question and explanation.

In the second adhyāya we have refuted the objections raised against the Vedāntic view of Brahman on the ground of Smṛiti and reasoning; we have shown that all other opinions are devoid of foundation, and that the alleged mutual contradictions of Vedic texts do not exist. Further we have demonstrated that the entities different from—but subordinate to—the individual soul (such as prāṇa, &c.) spring from Brahman.—Now in the third adhyāya we shall discuss the following subjects: the manner in which the soul together with its subordinate adjuncts passes through the samsāra (III, 1); the different states of the soul and the nature of Brahman (III, 2); the separateness or non-separateness of the vidyās and the question whether the qualities (of Brahman) have to be cumulated or not (III, 3); the accomplishment of man's highest end by means of perfect knowledge (saṃyagdarsana), the different injunctions as to the means of perfect knowledge and the absence of certain rules as to release which is the fruit (of perfect knowledge¹) (III, 4). As occasion leads some other matters also will be explained.—The first pāda explains, on the ground of the so-called vidyā of the five fires (Kh. Up. V, 3-10), the different modes of the soul's passing through the samsāra; the reason of that doctrine being (the inculcation of) absence of all desire (vairāgya), in accordance with the scriptural remark at the end (of the vidyā), 'hence let a man take care to himself.'—The soul accompanied by the chief vital air, the sense-organs and the mind, and taking with itself nescience (avidyā), moral good or ill-desert (karman), and the impressions left by its previous existences¹, leaves its former body and obtains a new body; this is known from the scriptural passage extending from Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 1 ('Then those prāṇas gather around him') up to IV, 4, 4 ('It makes to itself another newer and more beautiful shape'); which passage forms part of a chapter treating of the samsāra-state. And it moreover follows from the possibility (thus resulting) of the soul enjoying the fruits of good and evil actions.—Here the question arises whether the soul when going to the new body is enveloped or not by subtle parts of the elements constituting the seeds of the body.—It is not so enveloped, the pūrvapakshin says.—Why?—Because scripture, while stating that the soul takes the organs with itself, does not state the same with regard to the elements. For the expression 'those parts of light' (tegomâtrāḥ) which occurs in the passage 'He taking with him those parts of light,' &c., intimates that the organs only are taken (and not the elements), since in the complementary portion of the passage the eye, &c., are spoken of, and not the subtle parts of the elements. The subtle parts of the elements can moreover easily be procured anywhere; for wherever a new body is to be originated they are present, and the soul's taking them with itself would, therefore, be useless. Hence we conclude that the soul when going is not enveloped by them.

¹ I.e. the absence of a rule laying down that release consequent on knowledge takes place in the same existence in which the means of reaching perfect knowledge are employed.

To this the teacher replies, 'in obtaining another it goes enveloped.' That means: we must understand that the soul when passing from one body to another is enveloped by the subtle parts of the elements which are the seeds of the new body.—How do we know this?—‘From the question and the explanation.’ The question is, ‘Do you know why in the fifth libation water is called man?’ (V, 3, 3.) The explanation, i.e. answer, is given in the entire passage which, after having explained how the five libations in the form of śraddhā, Soma, rain, food, seed are offered in the five fires, viz. the heavenly world, Parganya, the earth, man and woman, concludes, ‘For this reason is water in the fifth oblation called man.’ Hence we understand that the soul goes enveloped by water.—But—an objection will be raised—another scriptural passage declares that like a caterpillar the soul does not abandon the old body before it makes an approach to another body¹. (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 3, ‘And as a caterpillar.’)—We reply that what there is compared to the (action of the) caterpillar is (not the non-abandonment of the old body but) merely the lengthening out of the creative effort whose object is the new body to be obtained, which (new body) is presented by the karman of the soul². Hence there is no contradiction.—As the mode of obtaining a new body is thus declared by Sruti, all hypotheses which owe their origin to the mind of man only are to be set aside because they are contradicted by scripture. So e.g. the opinion (of the Sāṅkhyas) that the Self and the organs are both all-pervading³, and when obtaining a new body only begin to function in it in consequence of the karman; or the opinion (of the Bauddhas) that the Self alone

¹ I read avidyā with the commentators (Go. Ān., however, mentions the reading 'vidyā' also); although vidyā appears preferable. Cp. Max Müller's note 2, p. 175, Upan. II; Deussen, p. 405.—Pūrvapragñā ganmāntariya-samskāraḥ. Ān. Gi.

¹ Evam hi sūkshmadehaparishvaktō ramhet yady asya sthūlam sarīram ramhato na bhavet, asti tv asya vartamānasthūlasarīrayogaś ādehāntaraprāptes trinagalāyukānidarsanena, tasmān nidarsana-srutivirodhān na sūkshmadehaparishvaktō ramhatīti. Bhā.

² Pratipattavyaś prāptavyo yo dehas tadviśayāyā bhāvanāyā utpādanāyā dīrghibhāvamātram galūkayopamīyate. Bhā.—Ān. Gi. explains: prāptavyo yo dehas tadviśayabhāvanāyā devo+ham ityādikāyā dīrghibhāvo vyavahitārthālambanatvam tāvanmātram ityādi.

³ *Karānānām āhamkārikatvāt tasya vyāpītvāt teshām api tadāt-makānām vyāpītvam. Go. Ān.—*The organs are, according to the Sāṅkhya, the immediate effects of the āhamkāra, but why all-pervading on that account?

(without the organs) begins to function in a new body, and that as the body itself, so new sense-organs also are produced in the new abode of fruition¹; or the opinion (of the Vaiseshikas) that the mind only proceeds to the new abode of fruition²; or the opinion (of the Digambara Gainas) that the individual soul only flying away from the old body alights in the new one as a parrot flies from one tree to another.—But—an objection will be raised—from the quoted question and answer it follows that the soul goes enveloped by water only, according to the meaning of the word made use of by scripture, viz. water. How then can the general statement be maintained that the soul goes enveloped by subtle parts of all elements?—To this doubt the next Sūtra replies.

2. But on account of (water) consisting of three (elements) (the soul is enveloped not by water merely; the latter alone is, however, mentioned) on account of preponderance.

The word 'but' disposes of the objection raised.—Water consists of three elements, as we know from the scriptural statement regarding tripartition. If, therefore, water is admitted to originate (the new body) the other two elements also have necessarily to be admitted (as taking part in the origination). The body moreover consists of three elements, as the effects of the three, i.e. fire, water, and earth, are observed in it, and further as it contains three materials, viz. wind, bile, and phlegm³. Being such it cannot originate from mere water, the other elements being left aside. Hence the term water made use of in the scriptural question and answer refers to the fact of water preponderating, not to its being the only element. As a matter of fact we see that in all animated bodies liquid substances such as juices, blood, and the like preponderate.—But we likewise observe in bodies a large amount of earthy matter!—True, but the amount of water is larger than that of any other matter. Moreover, liquid matter prevails in that which is the seed of the body. Further, we know that works (karma) constitute the efficient cause for the origination of a new body, and (sacrificial) works such as the agnihotra, &c., consist in the offering of liquid substances such as Soma, butter, milk and the like. Thereby also the preponderance of water is established. And on account of that preponderance the word ‘water’ implies the subtle parts of all the elements which constitute the seed of the body.

¹ Ātmā khalv ālayaḥ śāśanasamtānas tasya vṛttayaḥ sabdādiguḥ śāśanāni tallābhāḥ sarīrāntare bhavati, kevalasābhas tu karaṇasāhityam ātmano vārayati. Go. Ān.

² Kevalam karaṇair ātmanā ka rahitam iti yāvat, karaṇāni nūtanany eva tatrārabhyante ātmā tu vibhutvād akriyoḥpi tatra vṛttimātram āpnoti. Ān. Gi.

³ The last of which only is of prevailing watery character.

3. And on account of the going of the prānas.

Scripture states that, when a new body is obtained, the prānas also go (from the old body to the new one). Cp. ‘When he thus departs the (chief) prāna departs after him, and when the prāna thus departs all the other prānas depart after it’ (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 2), and similar passages. Now this going of the prānas is not possible without a base; hence we infer that water also—mixed with parts of the other elements—goes (from the old body to the new one), serving the purpose of supplying a base for the moving prānas. For the prānas cannot, without such a base, either move or abide anywhere; as we observe in living beings.

4. If it be said (that the prānas do not go) on account of the scriptural statement as to entering into Agni, &c., we deny this on account of the metaphorical nature (of those statements).

Well, the pûrvapakshin resumes, we deny that at the time when a new body is obtained the prānas go with the soul, because scripture speaks of their going to Agni, &c. For that at the time of death speech and the other prānas go to Agni and the other gods the following passage expressly declares: ‘When the speech of the dead person enters into the fire, breath into the air,' &c. (Bṛi. Up. III, 2, 13).—To this we reply that the objection is of no force on account of the metaphorical character of those statements. The entering of speech, &c., into Agni is metaphorical, because we observe no such entering in the case of the hairs of the head and body. For although the text says that 'the hairs of the body enter into the shrubs and the hairs of the head into the trees;' still we cannot understand this to mean that the hairs actually fly away from the body and enter into trees and shrubs. On the other hand, the soul could not go at all if we denied to it the limiting adjunct formed by the prāṇas, and without the latter it could not, in the new body, enter into the state of fruition. Besides, other passages distinctly declare that the prāṇas go with the soul.—From all this we conclude that the passage about speech, &c. entering into Agni, metaphorically expresses that Agni and the other divinities who act as guides of the prāṇas and co-operate with them stop their co-operation at the time of death.

5. If an objection be raised on the ground of (water) not being mentioned in the first fire, we refute it by remarking that just it (viz. water) (is meant), on the ground of fitness.

Well, the pūrvapakshin resumes, but how can it be ascertained that 'in the fifth oblation water is called man,' considering that water is not mentioned by scripture with reference to the first fire (altar)? For the text enumerates five fires—the first of which is the heavenly world—as the abodes of the five oblations. With reference to the first of those fires—introduced by the words 'The fire is that world, O Gautama,' it is stated that śraddhā (faith) is the material constituting the oblation ('on that altar the devas offer śraddhā'); while nothing is said about water being the offered material. If, with reference to the four following fires, viz. Parganya, &c., water is assumed to constitute the offering, we have no objection because in the substances stated there as forming the oblations, viz. Soma, and so on, water may preponderate. But to set aside, in the case of the first fire, śraddhâ (i.e. faith) which is directly mentioned in the text, and to substitute in its place the assumption of water, about which the text says nothing, is an arbitrary proceeding. In reality śraddhâ must be explained, in conformity with its ordinary meaning, as a kind of mental state, viz. faith. Hence it is objectionable to maintain that water, in the fifth oblation, becomes man.

To this view of the pûrvapakshin we demur, because, in the case of the first fire, the word śraddhâ is to be taken in the sense of 'water.'—On what ground?—On the ground of fitness. For on that explanation only beginning, middle, and end of the passage harmonise so that the syntactical unity of the whole remains undisturbed. On the other explanation (i.e. śraddhâ being taken in the sense of 'faith'), if the question were asked how water, in the fifth oblation, can be called man, and if, in way of reply, the text could point only to faith, i.e. something which is not water, as constituting the material of the oblation; then question and answer would not agree, and so the unity of the whole passage would be destroyed. The text, moreover, by concluding 'For this reason is water in the fifth oblation called man,' indicates the same interpretation¹.—Further, the text points out, as effects of śraddhâ, substances in which water in its gross form preponderates, viz. Soma, rain, &c. And this again furnishes a reason for interpreting śraddhâ as water, because the effect generally is cognate in nature to the cause. Nor again can the mental conception called faith be taken out from the mind or soul, whose attribute it is, and be employed as an offering, as the heart can be cut out of the sacrificial animal. For this reason also the word śraddhâ must be taken to mean 'water.' Water can, moreover, be fitly called by that name, on the ground of Vedic usage, cp. 'śraddhâ indeed is water' (Taitt. Samh. I, 6, 8, 1). Moreover, water when forming the seed of the body enters into the state of thinness, subtilty, and herein again resembles faith, so that its being called śraddhâ is analogous to the case of a man who is as valiant as a lion being himself called a lion.—Again, the word śraddhā may fitly be applied to water, because water is intimately connected with religious works (sacrifices, &c.) which depend on faith; just as the word ‘platform’ is applied to men (standing on the platform). And finally the waters may fitly be called śraddhā, on account of their being the cause of faith, according to the scriptural passage, ‘Water indeed produces faith in him for holy works¹.’

¹ Upasamhârâlokanâyâm api śraddhâśabdatvam apâm evety âha tv iti. Ân. Gi.

6. (Should it be said that the souls are not enveloped by water) on account of this not being stated by scripture, we refute the objection on the ground of those who perform ishṭis, &c., being understood.

Well, let it be granted that, on account of question and answer, water, passing through the forms of śraddhā, &c., may in the fifth oblation obtain the shape of man. But still we cannot allow that the souls when moving from one body into another are enveloped by water. For this is not directly stated by scripture, there being in the whole passage no word referring to the souls, while there are words referring to water. Hence the assertion that the soul goes enveloped by water is unfounded.—This objection is invalid, we reply, ‘on account of those who perform ishṭis, &c., being understood.’ For in the passage beginning ‘But they who living in a village practise sacrifices, works of public utility and alms, they go to the smoke’ (V, 3, 10), it is said that those who perform ishṭis reach, on the road of the fathers leading through smoke, &c., the moon, ‘From ether they go to the moon; that is Soma, the king.’ Now these same persons are meant in the passage about the five fires also, as we conclude from the equality of scriptural statement in the passage, ‘In that fire the devas offer śraddhā. From that oblation rises Soma the king¹. To those² (persons who have performed ishṭis, &c.) water is supplied in the shape of the materials employed to perform the agnihotra, the darsapûrnamâsa and other sacrifices, viz. sour milk, milk, &c., which substances, as consisting mostly of water, may directly be considered as water. Of these, when offered in the âhavanīya, the subtle parts assume the form of an apûrva resulting from the oblation³, and attach themselves to the performer of the sacrifice. Then (when the sacrificer dies) the priests offer his body, with the funeral ceremonies⁴, into the crematory fire, with the mantra, '(may) he (go) to the heavenly world, svâhâ.' Then the water forming the oblation—which was connected with deeds resulting from faith⁵—having assumed the form of an apûrva envelops the souls of those who had performed the sacrifices, and leads them up to the heavenly world to receive their reward.—In accordance with the preceding interpretation scripture says in the agnihotra chapter also—in the complementary passage constituting the reply to the six questions—that the two agnihotra-oblations go up to the other world in order to originate the fruit (of the work of the sacrificer), 'Those two oblations when offered go up, &c.' (Sat. Br. XI, 6, 2, 6).—Hence we conclude that the ¹ Both passages speak of something reaching, i.e. becoming the moon. Now, as that something is, in the passage about the road of the fathers, the gîvas of those who have performed ishṭis, &c., we conclude that by the śraddhā also, from which in the other passage the moon is said to rise, those gîvas are meant, or, properly speaking, the subtle body of water which envelops those gîvas.—Dhûmâdivâkye pañcâgnivâkye ka somarâgatvaprapṭisravanâvireśhād ishṭîdikârinâḥ śraddhârabditâdbhir veshiṭitâ dyulokam yāntīti bhātīty arthaḥ. Ân. Gi.

¹ Āpo heti, asmai pumse-dhikāṛiṇe saṁnamante ganayanti darsanamātreṇa snānādipunya-karmasiddhyartham śraddhām ity arthaḥ. Ān. Gi.

² Ân. Gi. introduces this clause by: nanu mahad iha śrutyor vailakshanyam, śraddhârabditânâm apâm kvaṭid dyuloke homaḥ śrutaḥ kvaṭid ishṭîdikârinâḥ dhûmâdikramenâkâsaprâptir na ka teshâm âpaḥ santi yena tadveshiṭitânâm gatis tatrâha teshâm keti.

³ I read, with a MS. of Ân. Gi., âhutypûrvarûpâḥ.

⁴ The so-called antyeshṭi.

⁵ And is on that account properly called śraddhā.

souls, when going to the enjoyment of the fruits of their works, are enveloped by the water of which the oblations consist¹.

But how can it be maintained that those who perform sacrifices, &c., go to the enjoyment of the fruit of their works, considering that scripture declares them when having reached the moon—by the path leading through smoke, &c.—to become food, ‘That is Soma the king; that is the food of the gods; the gods do eat it’ (Kh. Up. V, 10, 4); and the corresponding passage, ‘Having reached the moon they become food, and then the Devas feed on them there as sacrificers feed on Soma as it increases and decreases’ (Bri. Up. VI, 2, 16)? If, in accordance with these passages, they are eaten by the gods as by tigers, &c., it is not possible that they should enjoy the fruit of their deeds.—To this the following Sūtra replies.

7. Or (the souls’ being the food of the gods is) metaphorical, on account of their not knowing the Self. For thus (scripture) declares.

The word ‘or’ is meant to set aside the started objection. The souls’ being food has to be understood in a metaphorical, not a literal, sense, as otherwise all scriptural statements of claims (adhikāra)—such as ‘He who is desirous of the heavenly world is to sacrifice’—would be contradicted. If the performers of sacrifices, &c., did not, in the sphere of the moon, enjoy the fruits of their works, why should they undertake works such as sacrifices, which are to him who performs them the cause of great trouble? We see, moreover, that the word 'food,' as denoting in general whatever is the cause of enjoyment, is metaphorically used of that also which is not food (in the narrower sense), as, for instance, in such phrases as 'the Vaisyas are the food of kings, the animals are the food of the Vaisyas.' Hence what is meant there by the term 'eating' is the rejoicing of the gods with the performers of sacrifices, &c., who stand in a subordinate (instrumental) relation to that rejoicing—a rejoicing analogous to that of an ordinary man with beloved persons such as wife, children, friends, and so on—not actual eating like the chewing and swallowing of sweet-meats. For that the gods eat in the ordinary way a scriptural passage expressly denies (Kh. Up. III, 6, 1), 'The gods do not eat or drink; by seeing the nectar they are satisfied.' At the same time the performers of sacrifices, although standing in a subordinate relation to the gods, may themselves be in a state of enjoyment, like servants who (although subordinate to the king) themselves live on the king.—That the performers of sacrifices are objects of enjoyment for the gods follows, moreover, from their quality of not knowing the Self. For that those who do not know the Self are objects of enjoyment for the gods the following scriptural passage shows, 'Now, if a man worships another deity, thinking the deity is one and he is another, he does not know. He is like a beast for the Devas' (Bṛi. Up. I, 4, 10). That means: he, in this life, propitiating the gods by means of oblations and other works, serves them like a beast, and does so in the other world also, depending on them like a beast and enjoying the fruits of his works as assigned by them.—The latter part of the Sûtra can be explained in another manner also¹. Those who do not know the Self are those who perform works only, such as sacrifices, &c., ¹ Anâtmasabdâsruter mukhyârthatvânurodhena sâtâmsasyârtham uktvâ prakaraṇânurodhenârthântaram âha. Ân. Gi.

¹ Śaṅkara’s attempts to render plausible the interpretation of śraddhā by ‘water,’ and to base thereon the doctrine of the souls when going to a new body being enveloped by a subtle involucrum of water (and the other elements contained therein) are, of course, altogether artificial. I do not, however, see that he can be taxed with inconsistency (as he is by Deussen, p. 408). Śraddhā is to him in the first place the gross water which constitutes the chief material employed in the sacrifices; in the second place the apūrva which results from the sacrifice, and which is imagined to consist of the subtle parts of the water whose gross parts have been consumed by the sacrificial fire. These subtle parts attach themselves to the soul, accompany it as an involucrum when it goes to another world, and form the base of any new body which the soul may have to assume in accordance with its previous deeds.

and do not join knowledge to works. We then take the expression, 'the knowledge of the Self,' as indirectly denoting the knowledge of the five fires; an explanation which rests on the general subject-matter. And on account of the performers of sacrifices being destitute of the knowledge of the five fires the circumstance of their serving as food is brought forward as a mere *gunavāda*¹ for the purpose of glorifying the knowledge of the five fires. For the latter is what the text aims at enjoining, as we infer from the general purport of the passage.—'For thus' another scriptural passage 'declares,' viz. that enjoyment (on the part of the gṛīva) takes place in the sphere of the moon, 'Having enjoyed greatness in the Soma world he returns again' (Pr. Up. V, 4). Another scriptural passage also declares that the performers of sacrifices dwelling together with the gods obtain enjoyment, 'A hundred blessings of the fathers who have conquered this world make one blessing of the work-gods, who obtain their godhead by work' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 3, 33).—As thus the statement about the performers of sacrifices becoming food is metaphorical only, we understand that it is their souls which go, and hence there is no longer any objection to the doctrine that they go enveloped by water.

8. On the passing away of the works (the soul redescends) with a remainder, according to scripture and Smṛiti, as it went (i.e. passing through the same stations) and not thus (i.e. in the inverse order).

Scripture states that the souls of those who perform sacrifices, and the like, rise on the road leading through smoke, and so on, to the sphere of the moon, and when they have done with the enjoyment (of the fruits of their works) again descend, 'Having dwelt there, *yāvatsampātam*², they return again that way as they came,' &c., up to 'Those whose conduct has been good obtain some good birth, the birth of a Brāhmaṇa, &c.—Those whose conduct has been evil obtain the birth of a dog, &c.' (Kh. Up. V, 10, 5-7). Here it must be considered whether the souls, after having enjoyed the fruits of all their works, descend without a remainder (anusaya, of their works), or with such a remainder (of unrequited works).—The pûrvapakshin says: without such a remainder.—Why?—On account of the specification 'yâvat sampâtam.' The word sampâta here denotes the aggregate of works (karmâsaya)¹, which is so called because by it the souls pass from this world to that world for the purpose of enjoying the fruits of the works. So that the entire clause 'Having dwelt there as far as the aggregate of the works extends' indicates their works being completely requited there. The same thing is indicated by another scriptural passage, 'But when in their case that (i.e. the effect of their works) ceases' (Bri. Up. VI, 2, 16).—Well, but why should we not assume that these passages (do not mean that all works are requited there but) only indicate that the soul enjoys in the other world so long as there are works to be enjoyed there?—It is impossible to assume this, because elsewhere a reference is made to the totality of works. For the passage, Bri. Up. IV, 4, 6, 'Having obtained the end of whatever deed he does here on earth, he again returns from that world to this world to action,' intimates, by means of the comprehensive term 'whatever,' that all works done here are exhausted there.—Moreover, death has the power of manifesting those works whose fruit has not yet begun²; the manifestation of those works not being possible previously to death because then they are obstructed by those works whose fruits have already begun. Now death must manifest alike all works whose fruits had not begun previously, because the cause being the same the effects cannot be different. Analogously a lamp which is placed at the same distance from a jar and a piece of cloth illuminates the latter as well as the former.—Hence it follows that the souls descend without a remainder of unrequited works.

¹ See part i, p. 221.

² About which term see further on.

¹ The Comm. on Kh. Up. V, 10, 5, explains it by 'sampatanti yeneti sampâtâḥ karmanâḥ kshayaḥ, yâvat sampâtam yâvat karmanâḥ kshayaḥ.'

² Abhivyaktis ka karmanâm phaladânâyonmukhatvam. Ân. Gi.

To this we reply as follows : ‘ On the passing away of the works with a remainder.’ That means : when the aggregate of works with which the souls had risen to the moon for the purpose of the enjoyment of their fruits is, by such enjoyment, exhausted, then the body, consisting of water, which had originated in the moon for the purpose of such enjoyment, is dissolved by contact with the fire of the grief springing from the observation that the enjoyment comes to an end ; just as snow and hail are melted by contact with the rays of the sun, or the hardness of ghee by contact with the heat of fire. Then, at the passing away of the works, i. e. when the works performed, such as sacrifices, &c., are, by the enjoyment of their fruits, exhausted, the souls descend with a remainder yet left.—But on what grounds is that remainder assumed ?—On the ground of what is seen (Sruti) and Smṛiti. For scripture declares manifestly that the souls descend joined with such a remainder, ‘ Those whose conduct (karana) has been good will quickly attain some good birth, the birth of a Brāhmaṇa, or a Kshattriya, or a Vaiśya. But those whose conduct has been evil will quickly attain an evil birth, the birth of a dog, or a hog, or a Kāṇḍāla.’ That the word karana here means the remainder (of the works) will be shown later on. Moreover, the different degrees of enjoyment which are implied in the difference of birth on the part of the living beings point, as they cannot be accidental, to the existence of such a remainder of works. For we know from scripture that good fortune as well as misfortune is caused by good and evil works. Smṛiti also teaches that the members of the different castes and āśramas do, in accordance with their works, at first enjoy the fruit of their works and then enter into new existences, in which they are distinguished from each other by locality, caste, family, shape, length of life, knowledge, conduct, property, pleasure, and intelligence ; which doctrine implies that they descend with a remainder of their works.—Of what kind then is that so-called remainder?—Some say that thereby we have to understand a remainder of the works which had been performed (in the previous existence) for the sake of the heavenly world, and whose fruits have (for the greater part) been enjoyed. That remainder might then be compared to the remainder of oil which sticks to the inside of a vessel previously filled with oil even after it has been emptied.—But you have no right to assume a remainder in the case of works, the fruits of which have been enjoyed already, since the adrishṭa (which springs from works) is opposed to the works (so as to destroy them completely¹).—This objection, we reply, is not valid, as we do not maintain that the works are completely requited (previously to the new existence).—But the souls do ascend to the sphere of the moon for the express purpose of finding there a complete requital of their works!—True; but when only a little of the effects of their works is left, they can no longer stay there. For as some courtier who has joined the king's court with all the requisites which the king's service demands is unable to remain at court any longer, when in consequence of his long stay most of his things are worn out, so that he is perhaps left with a pair of shoes and an umbrella only; so the soul, when possessing only a small particle of the effects of its works, can no longer remain in the sphere of the moon.—But all this reasoning is in fact altogether unfounded². For it has already been stated that, on account of (the adrishṭa) being opposed to the work, the continued existence of a remainder cannot be admitted in the case of works which had been performed with a view to the heavenly world, and which have been requited in the moon.—But has it not also been said above that not all the work whose fruit the heavenly world is meets with requital there?—Yes, but that statement is not defensible. For works which are performed for the purpose of obtaining the heavenly world produce their entire heavenly fruit for the soul only as long as it stays in heaven, and if we take our stand on scripture we have no right to assume that they produce even a particle of fruit for the souls after those have again descended from heaven. That some part of the oil continues to remain in the vessel is unobjectionable because we see it, and we likewise see that some part of the courtier's equipment continues to remain with him ; but that some part of those works which led the soul to heaven continues to exist, that we neither see nor are able to surmise, because it would contradict the texts declaring that the heavenly world (alone) is the fruit of the works.—That of works whose fruit is heaven, such as sacrifices and the like, no remainder continues to exist, we must necessarily acknowledge for the following reason also. If some part of those good works, such as sacrifices, &c., on account of which the agents enjoyed the heavenly world, were surmised to continue in existence as a remainder, that remainder would in all cases be itself a good one, would never be of a contrary nature. But then our supposition would be in conflict with the scriptural passage which distinguishes remainders of a different kind, viz. 'Those whose conduct has been good ;—those whose conduct has been evil,' &c. Hence after the fruits of that set of works which is required in the other world have been (completely) enjoyed, the remaining other set of works whose fruits are to be enjoyed in this world constitutes the so-called anusaya with which the souls re-descend.—It was said above that we must assume the souls to descend without any such remainder, after having reached, by the enjoyment of the fruits, the end of all the works done here below, on account of the comprehensive statement implied in the expression 'whatever.' But that assertion cannot be upheld as the existence of such a remainder has been proved. Hence we have to understand that the souls re-descend after having exhausted, by the enjoyment of its fruits, only that entire part of the works done here below whose fruit belongs to the other world and is begun to be enjoyed there.—The proof given by us of the existence of the remainder refutes at the same time the other assertion made above, viz. that death manifests equally all works the enjoyment of whose fruits was not begun here below, and that on that account we are not entitled to draw a line between works whose fruits begin in the other world and works whose fruits begin in this world only (i.e. in a new existence on earth).—We, moreover, have to ask for what reason it is maintained that death manifests (i.e. lays open and makes ready for requital) those works whose fruits have not begun here below. The answer will be that in this life the operation of certain works cannot begin because it is obstructed by other works whose fruits already begin here below, that, however, that operation does begin as soon as, at the moment of death, the obstruction ceases. Well, then, if previously to death those actions whose fruits have already begun prevent other actions from beginning their operation, at the time of death also certain works of less force will be obstructed in their operation by other works of greater force, it being impossible that the fruits of works of opposite tendency should begin at the same time. For it is impossible to maintain that different deeds whose fruits must be experienced in different existences should, merely because they have this in common that their fruits have not begun (previously to death), become manifest on the occasion of one and the same death, and originate one new existence only; against this militates the fact of the definite fruits (attached to each particular work) being of contrary natures¹. Nor, on the other hand, can we maintain that at the time of death some works manifest themselves while others are altogether extinguished; for that would contradict the fact that absolutely all works have their fruits. No work in fact can be extinguished except by means of expiatory actions, &c.² Smṛiti also declares that works whose operation is ob-

¹ Bhândānusârīnaḥ snehasyāvirodhād yuktaḥ seshah, karma tu phalodayavirodhitvât phalam keḡ gâtam nashṭam eveti na tasya seshasiddhir iti saṅkate nanv iti. Ân. Gi.

² Īvakâro madhuroktyâ prayukto vastutas tv evakâro vivakshitaḥ. Ân. Gi.

¹ On which account they cannot be experienced in one and the same existence.

² Works are extinguished either by expiatory ceremonies or by the knowledge of Brahman or by the full fruition of their consequences.

structed by other works leading to fruits of a contrary nature last for a long time, 'Sometimes a good deed persists immovable as it were, the doer meanwhile remaining immersed in the samsāra, until at last he is released from pain.'

Moreover, if all unrequited works becoming manifest on the occasion of one and the same death were to begin one new existence only, the consequence would be that those who are born again in the heavenly world, or in hell, or as animals, could, as not entitled thereto, perform no religious works, and being thus excluded from all chance of acquiring religious merit and demerit could not enter on any new forms of existence, as all reason for the latter would be absent¹. And that would further contradict Smṛiti, which declares that some single actions, such as the murder of a Brāhmaṇa, are the causes of more than one new existence. Nor can we assume, for the knowledge of the particular results springing from religious merit and demerit, any other cause than the sacred texts². Nor, again, does death manifest (bring about the requital of) those works whose fruit is observed to be enjoyed already here below, as, for instance, the kārireshī, &c.³ How then can we allow the assumption that death manifests all actions? The instance of the lamp (made use of by the pūrvapakshin) is already refuted by our having shown the relative strength of actions⁴. Or else we may look on the matter as analogous to the manifestation (by a lamp) of bigger and smaller objects. For as a lamp, although equally distant from a big and a very small thing, may manifest the former only

¹ And in consequence of this they could never obtain final release.

² We have the sacred texts only to teach us what the effects of particular good or evil actions may be.

³ The kārireshī is a sacrifice offered by those who are desirous of rain.

⁴ I.e. by our having shown that death does not equally manifest all works, but that, after death has taken place, the stronger works bring about their requital while the operation of the weaker ones is retarded thereby.

and not the latter, so death provokes the operation of the stronger works only, not of the weaker ones, although an equal opportunity presents itself for both sets of works as hitherto unrequited.—Hence the doctrine that all works are manifested by death cannot be maintained, as it is contradicted by Sruti, Smṛiti, and reason alike. That the existence of a remainder of works should stand in the way of final release is a misplaced fear, as we know from Sruti that all works whatever are destroyed by perfect knowledge. It therefore is a settled conclusion that the souls re-descend with a remainder of works. They descend ‘as they came’ (mounted up); ‘not thus,’ i.e. in inverted order. We conclude that they descend ‘as they came’ from the fact of ether and smoke, which the text includes in the road of the fathers, being mentioned in the description of the descent also, and from the expression ‘as they came.’ That they follow the inverted order we conclude from night, &c., not being mentioned, and from the cloud, &c., being added.

9. Should it be objected that on account of conduct (the assumption of a remainder is not needed), we deny this because (the scriptural expression ‘conduct’) is meant to connote (the remainder); so Kārshnâgini thinks.

But—an objection may be raised—the scriptural passage, which has been quoted for the purpose of proving that the existence of a remainder of works (‘those whose conduct has been good,’ &c.), declares that the quality of the new birth depends on karana, not on anusaya. Now karana and anusaya are different things; for karana is the same as karitra, âkâra, śīla, all of which mean conduct¹, while anusaya denotes work remaining from required work. Scripture also speaks of actions and conduct as different things, ‘According as he acts and according as he conducts himself so will he be’ (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 5); and ‘Whatever works are blameless those should be regarded, not others ; whatever our good conduct was that should be observed by thee' (Taitt. Up. I, 11, 2). From the passage which proclaims the dependence of the quality of birth on conduct the existence of an unrequited remainder of works cannot therefore be proved.—This objection is without force, we reply, because the scriptural term 'conduct' is meant to connote the remainder of the works. This is the opinion of the teacher Kârṣṇāgini.

¹ Śīla also means here ‘conduct’ only, as we see from its being co-ordinated with karana, karitra, &c.; not character.

10. If it be said that purposelessness (of conduct would result therefrom), we deny this on account of the dependence (of work) on that (conduct).

That may be ; but for what reason should we abandon that meaning which the term 'karana' directly conveys, viz. the meaning 'conduct,' and accept the merely connotative meaning 'remainder of the works?' Conduct, which the text directly mentions, may be supposed to have for its fruit either a good or an evil birth, according as it is enjoined or prohibited, good or evil. Some fruit will have to be allowed to it in any case ; for otherwise it would follow that it is purposeless.—This objection is without force 'on account of the dependence on it.' Such works as sacrifices, and the like, depend on conduct in so far as somebody whose conduct is not good is not entitled to perform them. This we know from Smṛiti-passages, such as the following, 'Him who is devoid of good conduct the Vedas do not purify.'—And also if conduct is considered as subservient to man¹ it will not be purposeless. For when the aggregate of works such as sacrifices, &c., begins to originate its fruit, the conduct which has reference to the sacrifice will originate there (i.e. in the fruit) some addition.

¹ I.e. as something which produces in man a samskāra analogous to that produced by other preparatory or purificatory rites such as bathing, &c.—In the preceding sentences conduct had been spoken of not as purushārtha but as karmāṅga. In that case it produces no separate result ; while if considered as purushārtha it has a special result of its own.

And it is known from Sruti as well as Smṛiti that work effects everything¹. It is, therefore, the opinion of Kārsh-nāgini that the remainder of works only—which is connoted by the term ‘conduct’—is the cause of the souls entering on new births. For as work may be the cause of new births, it is not proper to assume that conduct is the cause. If a man is able to run away by means of his feet he will surely not creep on his knees.

11. But (karana means) nothing but good and evil works; thus Bādari opines.

The teacher Bādari, however, thinks that the word ‘karana’ denotes nothing else but good works and evil works. It means the same as anushthāna (performance) or karman (work). For we see that the root kar (to walk, to conduct oneself) is used in the general sense of acting. Of a man who performs holy works such as sacrifices, &c., people say in ordinary language, ‘that excellent man walks in righteousness.’ The word ākāra also denotes only a kind of religious duty. That works and karana (conduct) are sometimes spoken of as different things is analogous to the distinction sometimes made between Brāhmanas and *Pari-vrāgakas*². We, therefore, decide that by men of good karana are meant those whose works are worthy of praise, by men of evil karana those whose works are worthy of blame.

12. Of those also who do not perform sacrifices (the ascent to the moon) is stated by scripture.

It has been said that those who perform sacrifices, &c., go to the moon. The question now arises whether those also who do not perform sacrifices go to the moon or not.—The pūrvapakshin maintains that it cannot be asserted that men belonging to the former class only go to the moon, because scripture speaks of the moon as being resorted to by those also who have not performed sacrifices. For the Kāushītakins make the following general statement, 'All who depart from this world go to the moon' (Kau. Up. I, 2). Moreover, the origination of a new body in the case of those who are born again is not possible without their having (previously) reached the moon, on account of the precise definition of number contained in the statement, 'In the fifth oblation' (Kh. Up. V, 9, 1)¹. Hence all men must be supposed to resort to the moon. If it be objected that it does not appear proper that those who perform sacrifices and those who do not should go to the same place, we reply that there is no real objection, because those who do not perform sacrifices do not enjoy anything in the moon.

¹ A clause added to guard against the assumption—which might be based on the preceding remarks—that conduct is, after all, the cause of the quality of the new birth.

² Although the latter are a mere sub-class of the former.

13. But of the others, after having enjoyed the fruits of their actions in Samyamana, ascent and descent take place; as such a course is declared (by scripture).

'But' discards the pūrvapaksha. It is not true that all men go to the moon. For the ascent to the moon is for the purpose of enjoyment only; it is neither without a special purpose nor for the mere purpose of subsequent re-descent. Just as a man climbs on a tree for the purpose of breaking fruit or blossoms, not either without any aim or for the mere purpose of coming down again. Now it has been admitted already that for those who do not offer sacrifices there is not any enjoyment in the moon; hence those only who perform sacrifices rise to the moon, not any other persons. The latter descend to Samyamana, the abode of Yama, suffer there the torments of Yama corresponding to their evil deeds, and then again re-ascend to this world. Such is their ascent and descent; as we maintain on the ground of such a course being declared by scripture. For a scriptural passage embodying Yama's own words declares that those who die without having offered sacrifices fall into Yama's power. 'The other world never rises before the eyes of the careless child deluded by the delusion of wealth. This is the world, he thinks, there is no other; thus he falls again and again under my sway' (Ka. Up. I, 2, 6). Scripture contains many other passages likewise leading us to infer that men fall into Yama's power; cp. e.g. 'Yama, the gathering-place of men' (Ri. Samh. X, 14, 1).

¹ Which statement presupposes four other oblations, the first of which is the one from which 'Soma the king rises.'

14. The *Smṛiti*s also declare this.

Moreover, authorities like Manu, Vyāsa, &c., declare that in the city Samyamana evil works are requited under Yama's rule; cp. the legend of Nāṅiketa and others.

15. Moreover there are seven (hells).

Moreover, the purāṇa-writers record that there are seven hells, Raurava, &c., by name, which serve as abodes of enjoyment of the fruits of evil deeds. As those who do not sacrifice, &c. go there, how should they reach the moon?—But, an objection is raised, the assertion that evil doers suffer punishments allotted by Yama is contradicted by the circumstance that Smṛiti mentions different other beings, such as Kiṭragupta, &c., who act as superintendents in Raurava and the other hells.—This objection the next Sūtra refutes.

16. On account of his activity there also no contradiction exists.

There is no contradiction, as the same Yama is admitted to act as chief ruler in those seven hells. Of Kiṭragupta and others Smṛiti merely speaks as superintendents employed by Yama.

17. But on (the two roads) of knowledge and works, those two being under discussion.

In that place of the knowledge of the five fires, where the answer is expected to the question, 'Do you know why that world never becomes full?' the text runs as follows: 'On neither of these two ways are those small creatures continually returning, of whom it may be said, Live and die. Theirs is a third place. Therefore that world never becomes full.'

By the two ways mentioned in this passage we have to understand knowledge and works.—Why?—On account of their being the subjects under discussion. That means : knowledge and works are under discussion as the means for entering on the road of the gods and the road of the fathers. The clause, 'those who know this,' proclaims knowledge to be the means whereby to obtain the road of the gods ; the clause, 'sacrifices, works of public utility, and alms,' proclaims works to be that by which we obtain the road of the fathers. Under the heading of these two paths there stands the subsequent passage, 'on neither of these two ways, &c.' To explain. Those who are neither entitled, through knowledge, to follow the road of the gods, nor, by works, to follow the road of the fathers, for those there is a third path on which they repeatedly return to the existence of small animals. For this reason also those who do not perform sacrifices, &c. do not reach the moon.—But why should they not first mount to the sphere of the moon and thence descending enter on the existence of small animals? —No, that would imply entire purposelessness of their mounting.—Moreover, if all men when dying would reach the sphere of the moon, that world would be filled by the departed, and from that would result an answer contrary to the question (viz. 'why does not that world become full?'). For an answer is expected showing that that world does not become full.—Nor can we admit the explanation that the other world possibly does not become full because re-descent is admitted ; since this is not stated by scripture. For it is true, indeed, that the not becoming full might be explained from their re-descending ; but scripture actually explains it from the existence of a third place, 'Theirs is a third place ; therefore that world never becomes full.' Hence the fact of the other world not becoming full must be explained from their not-ascending only. For, otherwise, the descent equally taking place in the case of those who do perform sacrifices, &c., it would follow that the statement of a third place is devoid of purpose.—The word 'but' (in the Sūtra) is meant to preclude the idea—arising from the passage of another śākhā (i.e. the Kaush. Up.)

—that all departed go to the moon. Under the circumstances the word ‘all’ which occurs in that passage has to be taken as referring only to those qualified, so that the sense is ‘all those who depart from this world properly qualified go to the moon.’—The next Sûtra is directed against the averment that all must go to the moon for the purpose of obtaining a new body, in accordance with the definite statement of number (‘in the fifth oblation &c.’).

18. Not in (the case of) the third place, as it is thus perceived.

With regard to the third place, the rule of the oblations being five in number need not be attended to for the purpose of obtaining a new body.—Why?—On account of it being perceived thus. That means: because it is seen that the third place is reached in the manner described without any reference to the oblations being limited to the number five, ‘Live and die. That is the third place.’—Moreover, in the passage, ‘In the fifth oblation water is called man,’ the number of the oblations is stated to be the cause of the water becoming the body of a man, not of an insect or moth, &c.; the word ‘man’ applying to the human species only.—And, further, the text merely teaches that in the fifth oblation the waters are called man, and does not at the same time deny that, where there is no fifth oblation, they are not called man; for if it did the latter, the sentence would have the imperfection of having a double sense. We therefore have to understand that the body of those men who are capable of ascending and descending originates in connexion with the fifth oblation, that in the case of other men, however, a body forms itself from water mixed with the other elements even without a settled number of oblations.

19. It is, moreover, recorded in the (ordinary) world.

There are, moreover, traditions, apart from the Veda, that certain persons like Droṇa, Dhrishadyumna, Sitā, Draupadī, &c., were not born in the ordinary way from mothers. In the case of Drona and others there was absent the oblation which is made into the woman ; while in the case of Dhr̥ishṭadyumna and others, even two of the oblations, viz. the one offered into woman and the one offered into man, were absent. Hence in other cases also birth may be supposed to take place independently of the number of oblations.—It is, moreover, commonly known that the female crane conceives without a male.

20. And on account of observation.

It is, moreover, observed that out of the four classes of organic beings—viviparous animals, oviparous animals, animals springing from heat, and beings springing from germs (plants)—the two latter classes are produced without sexual intercourse, so that in their case no regard is had to the number of oblations. The same may therefore take place in other cases also.—But, an objection may here be raised, scripture speaks of those beings as belonging to three classes only, because there are three modes of origin only ; ' That which springs from an egg, that which springs from a living being, that which springs from a germ ' (Kh. Up. VI, 3, 1). How then can it be maintained that there are four classes?—To this objection the next Sūtra replies.

21. The third term comprises that which springs from heat.

The third term in the scriptural passage quoted, i.e. ' that which springs from a germ,' must be understood as implying those beings also which spring from heat ; the two classes having in common that they spring from earth or water, i.e. from something stable. Different from their origin is the origin of those beings which spring from moving things (viz. animals).—In other places the beings springing from heat and those springing from germs are spoken of as constituting separate classes.—Hence there is no contradiction.

22. (On the part of the soul's descending from the moon) there is entering into similarity of being (with ether and so on); as this (only) is possible.

It has been explained that the souls of those who perform sacrifices, &c., after having reached the moon dwell there as long as their works last and then re-descend with a remainder of their works. We now have to inquire into the mode of that descent. On this point scripture makes the following statement: 'They return again the way they came, to the ether, from the ether to the air. Then the sacrificer having become air becomes smoke, having become smoke he becomes mist, having become mist he becomes a cloud, having become a cloud he rains down.'—Here a doubt arises whether the descending souls pass over into a state of identity with ether, &c., or into a state of similarity.—The pûrvapakshin maintains that the state is one of identity, because this is directly stated by the text. Otherwise there would take place so-called indication (lakṣhaṇā). Now whenever the doubt lies between a directly expressed and a merely indicated meaning the former is to be preferred. Thus the following words also, 'Having become air he becomes smoke,' &c., are appropriate only if the soul be understood to identify itself with them.—Hence it follows that the souls become identical with ether, &c.—To this we reply that they only pass into a state of similarity to ether, &c. When the body, consisting of water which the soul had assumed in the sphere of the moon for the purpose of enjoyment, dissolves at the time when that enjoyment comes to an end, then it becomes subtle like ether, passes thereupon into the power of the air, and then gets mixed with smoke, &c. This is the meaning of the clauses, 'They return as they came to the ether, from the ether to the air, &c.'—How is this known to be the meaning?—Because thus only it is possible. For it is not possible that one thing should become another in the literal sense of the word. If, moreover, the souls became identified with ether they could no longer descend through air, &c. And as connexion with the ether is, on account of its all-pervadingness, eternal, no other connexion (of the souls) with it can here be meant but their entering into a state of similarity to it¹. And in cases where it is impossible to accept the literal meaning of the text it is quite proper to assume the meaning which is merely indicated.—For these reasons the souls' becoming ether, &c., has to be taken in the secondary sense of their passing into a state of similarity to ether, and so on.

23. (The soul passes through the stages of its descent) in a not very long time ; on account of the special statement.

A doubt arises with reference to the period beginning with the soul's becoming ether and extending up to its entering into rice, &c., viz. whether the soul remains a long time in the state of similarity to each of the stages of its way before it enters into similarity to the next one, or only a short time.—The pūrvapakshin maintains that, on account of the absence of a definite text, no binding rule exists.—To this we reply that the souls remain in the state of similarity to ether, &c., for a short period only before they fall to the earth in raindrops. We infer this from the circumstance of the text making a special statement. For after having said that the souls enter into rice, &c., it adds, 'From thence the escape is beset with more pain ;' a statement implying that the escape from the previous states was comparatively easy and pleasant. Now this difference in point of pleasantness must be based on the comparative shortness or length of the escape ; for as, at that time, the body is not yet formed, enjoyment (in the ordinary sense) is not possible. Hence we conclude that, up to the moment when the souls enter into rice, &c., their descent is accomplished in a short time.

¹ It might be said that the relation to ether, &c., into which the souls enter, is the relation of conjunction (samyoga), not the relation of similarity. But as nothing can enter into the relation of samyoga with ether (everything being in eternal samyoga with it) we must assume that 'becoming ether' means 'becoming like ether,' and by parity of reasoning, that 'becoming air, &c.,' means 'becoming like air.'

24. (The descending souls enter) into (plants) animated by other (souls), as in the previous cases, on account of scriptural declaration.

In the description of the souls' descent we read, after their coming down in raindrops has been mentioned, 'Then they are born as rice and corn, herbs and trees, sesamum and beans.'—Here a doubt arises whether, at this stage of their descent, the souls to which a remainder of their works continues to cling really pass over into the different species of those immoveable things (plants) and enjoy their pleasures and pains, or if they enter merely into a state of conjunction with the bodies of those plants which are animated by different souls.—The pûrvapakshin maintains that they pass over into those species and enjoy their pleasures and pains, on account of the remainder of works still attaching to them ; firstly, because that enables us to take the verb 'to be born' in its literal sense ; secondly, because we know from Sruti and Smṛiti that the condition of a plant may be a place of enjoyment (of the fruits of actions) ; and thirdly, because sacrifices and similar actions, being connected with harm done to animals, &c., may lead to unpleasant results. We therefore take the 'being born as rice,' &c., of those to whom a remainder of their works attaches, in its literal sense, and consider the case to be analogous to that of a man who is born either as a dog or a hog or a Kândâla, where we have to understand that the man really becomes a dog, and so on, and experiences the pleasures and pains connected with that condition.

To this reasoning we reply as follows:—The souls to which a remainder attaches enter merely into conjunction with rice plants, &c., which are already animated by other souls ; and do not enjoy their pleasures and pains ; 'as in the previous cases.' As the souls' becoming air, smoke, &c., was decided to mean only that they become connected with them ¹, so here too their becoming rice, &c. merely means that they become connected with those plants.—How is this known? —From the fact of the statement here also being of the same nature.—Of what nature?—Here, also, as in the case of the souls becoming ether, &c., down to rain, the text does not refer to any operation of the works; hence we conclude that the souls do not enjoy pleasure and pain. Where, on the other hand, the text wants to intimate that the souls undergo pleasure and pain, there it refers to the operation of the former works; so, e.g. in the passage which treats of men of good or evil conduct. Moreover, if we should take the souls' being born as rice, &c., in its literal sense, it would follow that when the rice plants are reaped, unhusked, split, cooked and eaten, the souls which have descended into them and are animating them would have to leave them; it being generally known that when a body is destroyed the soul animating it abandons it. And then (if the souls left the plants) the text could not state (as it does state, V, 10, 6) that the souls which had entered into the plants are transmitted by animal generation (on the part of those who eat the plants). Hence it follows that the souls which have descended are merely outwardly connected with the plants animated by other souls. This suffices to refute the assertions that 'to be born' must be taken in its literal sense; and that the state of vegetable existence affords a place for enjoyment. We do not entirely deny that vegetable existence may afford a place for enjoyment; it may do so in the case of other beings which, in consequence of their unholy deeds, have become plants. We only maintain that those souls which descend from the moon with an unrequited remainder of works do not experience the enjoyment connected with plant life.

¹ This does not agree well with what had been said above about the souls becoming similar to ether, air, &c.

25. Should it be said that (sacrificial work is) unholy; we deny this on the ground of scripture.

We proceed to refute the remark made by the pūrvapakshin that sacrificial works are unholy because involving harm done to animals, &c., that they may therefore lead to unpleasant results, and that hence the statement as to the souls being born as plants, &c., may be taken in its literal sense; in consequence of which it would be uncalled-for to assume a derived sense.—This reasoning is not valid, because our knowledge of what is duty and the contrary of duty depends entirely on scripture. The knowledge of one action being right and another wrong is based on scripture only; for it lies out of the cognizance of the senses, and there moreover is, in the case of right and wrong, an entire want of binding rules as to place, time, and occasion. What in one place, at one time, on one occasion is performed as a right action, is a wrong action in another place, at another time, on another occasion; none therefore can know, without scripture, what is either right or wrong. Now from scripture we derive the certain knowledge that the gyotishṭoma-sacrifice, which involves harm done to animals (i.e. the animal sacrifice), &c., is an act of duty; how then can it be called unholy?—But does not the scriptural precept, ‘Do not harm any creature,’ intimate that to do harm to any being is an act contrary to duty?—True, but that is a general rule, while the precept, ‘Let him offer an animal to Agnīshomau,’ embodies an exception; and general rule and exception have different spheres of application. The work (i.e. sacrifice) enjoined by the Veda is therefore holy, being performed by authoritative men and considered blameless; and to be born as a plant cannot be its fruit. Nor can to be born as rice and other plants be considered analogous to being born as dogs, &c. For the latter birth scripture teaches with reference to men of evil conduct only; while no such specific qualification is stated in the case of vegetable existence. Hence we conclude that when scripture states that the souls descending from the moon become plants, it only means that they become enclosed in plants.

26. After that (there takes place) conjunction (of the soul) with him who performs the act of generation.

The conclusion arrived at under the preceding Sūtra is confirmed also by scripture stating that the souls, after having entered into plants, ‘become’ beings performing the act of generation, 'for whoever eats the food, whoever performs the act of generation, that again he (the soul) becomes.' Here again the soul's 'becoming' he who performs the act of generation cannot be taken in its literal sense; for a person becomes capable of generation a long time after his birth only, viz. when he reaches puberty. How then should the soul contained in the food eaten enter into that condition in its true sense? Hence we must interpret the passage to mean only that the soul enters into conjunction with one who performs the act of generation; and from this we again infer that the soul's becoming a plant merely means its entering into conjunction with a plant.

27. From the yoni a (new) body (springs).

Then, subsequently to the soul having been in conjunction with a person of generative power, generation takes place, and a body is produced in which the soul can enjoy the fruits of that remainder of works which still attaches to it. This scripture declares in the passage, 'Those whose conduct has been good,' &c. From this, also, it appears that the souls to which a remainder clings, when descending and becoming rice plants, and so on, do not enter into the state of forming the body of those plants with its attendant pleasure and pain, but are 'born as plants' in so far only as they enter into conjunction with them.

SECOND PÂDA.

REVERENCE TO THE HIGHEST SELF!

1. In the intermediate place there is (a real) creation ; for (scripture) says (that).

In the preceding pâda we have set forth, with reference to the knowledge of the five fires, the various stages of the soul's passing through the samsâra. We shall now set forth the soul's different states (waking, dreaming, &c.)—Scripture says (Bri. Up. IV, 3, 9; 10), 'When he falls asleep—; there are no chariots in that state, no horses, no roads, but he himself creates chariots, horses, and roads,' &c.—Here a doubt arises whether the creation thus taking place in dreams is a real one (pâramârthika) like the creation seen in the waking state, or whether it consists of illusion (mâyâ).—The pûrvapakshin maintains that 'in the intermediate place (or state) there is (a real) creation.' By intermediate place we have to understand the place of dreams, in which latter sense the word is used in the Veda, 'There is a third intermediate state, the state of dreams' (Bri. Up. IV, 3, 9). That place is called the intermediate place because it lies there where the two worlds, or else the place of waking and the place of bliss (deep sleep), join. In that intermediate place the creation must be real ; because scripture, which is authoritative, declares it to be so, 'He creates chariots, horses, roads,' &c. We, moreover, infer this from the concluding clause, 'He indeed is the maker' (Bri. Up. IV, 3, 10).

2. And some (state the Self to be) the shaper (creator); sons and so on (being the lovely things which he shapes).

Moreover the members of one śākhâ state that the Self is, in that intermediate state, the shaper of lovely things, 'He, the person who is awake in us while we are asleep, shaping one lovely thing after another' (Ka. Up. II, 5, 8).

Kāma (lovely things) in this passage means sons, &c., that are so called because they are beloved.—But may not the term ‘kāmaḥ’ denote desires merely?—No, we reply; the word kāma is here used with reference to sons, &c.; for those form the general subject of discussion, as we see from some preceding passages, ‘Choose sons and grandsons,’ &c., and ‘I make thee the enjoyer of all kāmās’ (Ka. Up. I, 1, 23 ; 24).—And that that shaper is the highest Self (prāgñā) we infer from the general subject-matter and from the complementary sentence. That the highest Self is the general subject-matter appears from II, 14, ‘That which thou seest as neither this nor that.’ And to that highest Self there also refers the complementary sentence II, 5, 8, ‘That indeed is the Bright, that is Brahman, that alone is called the Immortal. All worlds are contained in it, and no one goes beyond.’—Now it is admitted that the world (creation) of our waking state of which the highest Self (prāgñā) is the maker is real; hence the world of our dreaming state must likewise be real. That the same reasoning applies to the waking and the sleeping state a scriptural passage also declares, ‘Here they say: No, this is the same as the place of waking, for what he sees while awake the same he sees while asleep’ (Bri. Up. IV, 3, 14).—Hence the world of dreams is real.—To this we reply as follows.

3. But it (viz. the dream world) is mere illusion (māyā), on account of its nature not manifesting itself with the totality (of the attributes of reality).

The word ‘but’ discards the pûrvapaksha. It is not true that the world of dreams is real; it is mere illusion and there is not a particle of reality in it.—Why?—‘On account of its nature not manifesting itself with the totality,’ i.e. because the nature of the dream world does not manifest itself with the totality of the attributes of real things.—What then do you mean by the ‘totality’?—The fulfilment of the conditions of place, time, and cause, and the circumstance of non-refutation. All these have their sphere in real things, but cannot be applied to dreams. In the first place there is, in a dream, no space for chariots and the like; for those cannot possibly find room in the limited confines of the body.—Well, but why should not the dreaming person see the objects of his dream outside of his body? He does as a matter of fact perceive things as separated from himself by space; and, Sruti, moreover, declares that the dream is outside the body, ‘Away from the nest the Immortal moves; that immortal one goes wherever he likes’ (Bṛi. Up. IV, 3, 12). And this distinction of the conceptions of staying and going would have no good sense if the being (the soul) did not really go out.—What you maintain is inadmissible, we reply. A sleeping being cannot possibly possess the power to go and return in a moment the distance of a hundred yoganas. Sometimes, moreover, a person recounts a dream in which he went to some place without returning from it, ‘Lying on my bed in the land of the Kurus I was overcome by sleep and went in my dream to the country of the Pañkālas, and being there I awoke.’ If, now, that person had really gone out of his country, he would on waking find himself in the country of the Pañkālas to which he had gone in his dream; but as a matter of fact he awakes in the country of the Kurus.—Moreover, while a man imagines himself in his dream going, in his body, to another place, the bystanders see that very same body lying on the couch. Further, a dreaming person does not see, in his dream, other places such as they really are. But if he in seeing them did actually go about, they would appear to him like the things he sees in his waking state. Sruti, moreover, declares that the dream is within the body, cp. the passage beginning ‘But when he moves about in dream,’ and terminating ‘He moves about, according to his pleasure, within his own body’ (Bṛi. Up. II, 1, 18). Hence the passage about the dreamer moving away from his nest must be taken in a metaphorical sense, as otherwise we should contradict scripture as well as reason; he who while remaining within his own body does not use it for any purpose may be said to be outside the body as it were. The difference of the ideas of staying within the body and going outside must, therefore, be viewed as a mere deception.—In the second place we see that dreams are in conflict with the conditions of time. One person lying asleep at night dreams that it is day in the Bhārata Varsha ; another lives, during a dream which lasts one muhūrta only, through many crowds of years.—In the third place there do not exist in the state of dreaming the requisite efficient causes for either thought or action ; for as, in sleep, the organs are drawn inward, the dreaming person has no eyes, &c. for perceiving chariots and other things ; and whence should he, in the space of the twinkling of an eye, have the power of—or procure the material for—making chariots and the like ?—In the fourth place the chariots, horses, &c., which the dream creates, are refuted, i.e. shown not to exist by the waking state. And apart from this, the dream itself refutes what it creates, as its end often contradicts its beginning ; what at first was considered to be a chariot turns, in a moment, into a man, and what was conceived to be a man has all at once become a tree.—Scripture itself, moreover, clearly declares the chariots, &c., of a dream to have no real existence, ‘There are no chariots in that state, no horses, no roads, &c.’—Hence the visions of a dream are mere illusion.

4. (Not altogether) for it (the dream) is indicative (of the future), according to Śruti ; the experts also declare this.

Well then, as dreams are mere illusion, they do not contain a particle of reality ?—Not so, we reply ; for dreams are prophetic of future good and bad fortune. For scripture teaches as follows, ‘When a man engaged in some work undertaken for a special wish sees in his dreams a woman, he may infer success from that dream-vision.’ Other scriptural passages declare that certain dreams indicate speedy death, so, e.g. ‘If he sees a black man with black teeth, that man will kill him.’—Those also who understand the science of dreams hold the opinion that to dream of riding on an elephant and the like is lucky ; while it is unlucky to dream of riding on a donkey, &c. ; and that certain other dreams also caused by special mantras or devatās or substances contain a particle of truth.—In all these cases the thing indicated may be real ; the indicating dream, however, remains unreal as it is refuted by the waking state. The doctrine that the dream itself is mere illusion thus remains uncontradicted.—On this account the Vedic passage to which the first Sûtra of this pâda refers is to be explained metaphorically. When we say ‘the plough bears, i.e. supports the bullocks,’ we say so because the plough is the indirect cause of the bullocks being kept¹, not because we mean that the plough directly supports the bullocks. Analogously scripture says that the dreaming person creates chariots, &c., and is their maker, not because he creates them directly but because he is the cause of their creation. By his being their cause we have to understand that he is that one who performs the good and evil deeds which are the cause of the delight and fear produced by the apparition, in his dream, of chariots and other things².—Moreover, as in the waking state, owing to the contact of the senses and their objects and the resulting interference of the light of the sun, &c., the self-luminousness of the Self is, for the beholder, difficult to discriminate, scripture gives the description of the dreaming state for the purpose of that discrimination. If then the statements about the creation of chariots, &c., were taken as they stand (i.e. literally) we could not ascertain that the Self is self-luminous³. Hence we have to explain the passage relative to the creation of chariots, &c., in a metaphorical sense, so as to make it agree with the statement about the non-existence of chariots, &c. This explains also the scriptural passage about the shaping (III, 2, 2). The statement made above that in the Kâtaka the highest Self is spoken of as the shaper

¹ Bullocks have to be kept because the fields must be tilled.

² The dreams have the purpose of either cheering or saddening and frightening the sleeper ; so as to requite him for his good and evil works. His adrishâ thus furnishes the efficient cause of the dreams.

³ Because then there would be no difference between the dreaming and the waking state.

of dreams is untrue; for another scriptural passage ascribes that activity to the individual soul, 'He himself destroying, he himself shaping dreams with his own splendour, with his own light' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 3, 9)¹. And in the Kāṭhaka Upanishad itself also we infer from the form of the sentence, 'That one who wakes in us while we are asleep,'—which is an anuvāda, i.e. an additional statement about something well known—that he who is there proclaimed as the shaper of lovely things is nobody else than the (well-known) individual soul. The other passage which forms the complementary continuation of the one just quoted ('That indeed is the Bright, that is Brahman') discards the notion of the separate existence of the individual soul and teaches that it is nothing but Brahman, analogously to the passage 'That art thou.' And this interpretation does not conflict with Brahman being the general subject-matter.—Nor do we thereby deny altogether that the highest (prāgñā) Self is active in dreams; for as being the Lord of all it may be considered as the guide and ruler of the soul in all its states. We only maintain that the world connected with the intermediate state (i.e. the world of dreams) is not real in the same sense as the world consisting of ether and so on is real. On the other hand we must remember that also the so-called real creation with its ether, air, &c., is not absolutely real; for as we have proved before (II, 1, 14) the entire expanse of things is mere illusion. The world consisting of ether, &c., remains fixed and distinct up to the moment when the soul cognizes that Brahman is the Self of all; the world of dreams on the other hand is daily sublated by the waking state. That the latter is mere illusion has, therefore, to be understood with a distinction.

5. But by the meditation on the highest that which is hidden (viz. the equality of the Lord and the soul, becomes manifest); for from him (the Lord) are its (the soul's) bondage and release.

¹ Svayam yihatya pūrvadeham nīkeshāṁ kṛtvā svayam nirmāyāpūrvam vāsanāmayam deham sampādya svena bhāsā svakīyabuddhivṛttiyā svena gyotishā svarūpatāitanyenety arthaḥ. Ān. Gi.

Well, but the individual soul is a part of the highest Self as the spark is a part of the fire. And as fire and spark have in common the powers of burning and giving light, so the individual soul and the Lord have in common the powers of knowledge and rulership; hence the individual soul may, by means of its lordship, effect in the dreaming state a creation of chariots and the like, springing from its wishes (samkalpa).—To this we reply that although the Lord and the individual soul stand to each other in the relation of whole and part, yet it is manifest to perception that the attributes of the two are of a different nature.—Do you then mean to say that the individual soul has no common attributes with the Lord?—We do not maintain that; but we say that the equality of attributes, although existing, is hidden by the veil of Nescience. In the case of some persons indeed who strenuously meditate on the Lord and who, their ignorance being dispelled at last, obtain through the favour of the Lord extraordinary powers and insight, that hidden equality becomes manifest—just as through the action of strong medicines the power of sight of a blind man becomes manifest; but it does not on its own account reveal itself to all men.—Why not?—Because 'from him,' i.e. from the Lord there are bondage and release of it, viz. the individual soul. That means: bondage is due to the absence of knowledge of the Lord's true nature; release is due to the presence of such knowledge. (Thus Sruti declares, 'When that god is known all fetters fall off; sufferings are destroyed and birth and death cease.) From meditating on him there arises, on the dissolution of the body, a third state, that of universal Lordship; he who is alone is satisfied' (Svet. Up. I, 11), and similar passages.

6. Or that (viz. the concealment of the soul's powers springs) from its connexion with the body.

But if the soul is a part of the highest Self, why should its knowledge and lordship be hidden? We should rather expect them to be as manifest as the light and the heat of the spark.—True, we reply ; but the state of concealment of the soul's knowledge and lordship is due to its being joined to a body, i.e. to a body, sense-organs, mind, buddhi, sense-objects, sensations, &c. And to this state of things there applies the simile : As the heat and light of the fire are hidden as long as the fire is still hidden in the wood from which it will be produced by friction, or as long as it is covered by ashes ; so, in consequence of the soul being connected with limiting adjuncts in the form of a body, &c., founded on name and form as presented by Nescience, its knowledge and lordship remain hidden as long as it is possessed by the erroneous notion of not being distinct from those adjuncts.—The word 'or' in the Sūtra is meant to discard the suspicion that the Lord and the soul might be separate entities.—But why should not the soul be separate from the Lord, considering the state of concealment of its knowledge and power? If we allow the two to be fundamentally separate, we need not assume that their separateness is due to the soul's connexion with the body.—It is impossible, we reply, to assume the soul to be separate from the Lord. For in the scriptural passage beginning with 'That divinity thought' &c. (Kh. Up. VI, 3, 2) we meet with the clause, 'It entered into those beings with this living Self' (gīva ātman) ; where the individual soul is referred to as the Self. And then we have the other passage, 'It is the True ; it is the Self ; that art thou, O Svetaketu,' which again teaches that the Lord is the Self of the soul. Hence the soul is non-different from the Lord, but its knowledge and power are obscured by its connexion with the body. From this it follows that the dreaming soul is not able to create, from its mere wishes, chariots and other things. If the soul possessed that power, nobody would ever have an unpleasant dream ; for nobody ever wishes for something unpleasant to himself.—We finally deny that the scriptural passage about the waking state ('dream is the same as the place of waking' &c.) indicates the reality of dreams. The statement made there about the equality of the two states is not meant to indicate that dreams are real, for that would conflict with the soul's self-luminousness (referred to above), and scripture, moreover, expressly declares that the chariots, &c., of a dream have no real existence; it merely means that dreams, because due to mental impressions (vāsanā) received in the waking state, are equal to the latter in appearance. (From all this it follows that dreams are mere illusion.)

7. The absence of that (i.e. of dreams, i.e. dreamless sleep) takes place in the nāḍīs and in the Self; according to scriptural statement.

The state of dream has been discussed; we are now going to enquire into the state of deep sleep. A number of scriptural passages refer to that state. In one place we read, 'When a man is asleep, reposing and at perfect rest so that he sees no dream, then he has entered into those nāḍīs' (Kh. Up. VIII, 6, 3). In another place it is said with reference to the nāḍīs, 'Through them he moves forth and rests in the surrounding body' (Bṛi. Up. II, 1, 19). So also in another place, 'In these the person is when sleeping he sees no dream. Then he becomes one with the prāṇa alone' (Kau. Up. IV, 20). Again in another place, 'That ether which is within the heart in that he reposes' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 22). Again, 'Then he becomes united with that which is; he is gone to his Self' (Kh. Up. VI, 8, 1). And, 'Embraced by the highest Self (prāgñā) he knows nothing that is without, nothing that is within' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 3, 21). Here the doubt arises whether the nāḍīs, &c., mentioned in the above passages are independent from each other and constitute various places for the soul in the state of deep sleep, or if they stand in mutual relation so as to constitute one such place only. The pūrvapakshin takes the former view on account of the various places mentioned serving one and the same purpose. Things serving the same purpose, as, e.g. rice and barley¹, are never seen to be dependent on each other. That the nâḍis, &c., actually serve the same purpose appears from the circumstance of their being all of them exhibited equally in the locative case, 'he has entered into the nâḍis,' 'he rests in the pericardium,' &c.¹—But in some of the passages quoted the locative case is not employed, so, e.g. in 'He becomes united with that which is' (satâ, instrumental case)!—That makes no difference, we reply, because there also the locative case is meant. For in the complementary passage the text states that the soul desirous of rest enters into the Self, 'Finding no rest elsewhere it settles down on breath' (Kh. Up. VI, 8, 2); a passage in which the word 'breath' refers to that which is (the sat). A place of rest of course implies the idea of the locative case. The latter case is, moreover, actually exhibited in a further complementary passage, 'When they have become merged in that which is (sati), they know not that they are merged in it.'—In all these passages one and the same state is referred to, viz. the state of deep sleep which is characterised by the suspension of all special cognition. Hence we conclude that in the state of deep sleep the soul optionally goes to any one of those places, either the nâḍis, or that which is, &c.

¹ Either of which may be employed for making the sacrificial cake.

To this we make the following reply—'The absence of that,' i.e. the absence of dreams—which absence constitutes the essence of deep sleep—takes place 'in the nâḍis and in the Self;' i.e. in deep sleep the soul goes into both together, not optionally into either.—How is this known?—'From scripture.'—Scripture says of all those things, the nâḍis, &c., that they are the place of deep sleep; and those statements we must combine into one, as the hypothesis of option would involve partial refutation². The assertion ¹ The argument of the pūrvapakshin is that the different places in which the soul is said to abide in the state of deep sleep are all exhibited by the text in the same case and are on that account co-ordinate. Mutual relation implying subordination would require them to be exhibited in different cases enabling us to infer the exact manner and degree of relation.

² By allowing option between two Vedic statements we lessen the made above that we are compelled to allow option because the nāḍīs, &c., serve one and the same purpose, is without foundation; for from the mere fact of two things being exhibited in the same case it does not follow by any means that they serve the same purpose, and that for that reason we have to choose between them. We on the contrary see that one and the same case is employed even where things serve different purposes and have to be combined; we say, e.g. 'he sleeps in the palace, he sleeps on the couch'¹. So in the present case also the different statements can be combined into one, 'He sleeps in the nāḍīs, in the surrounding body, in Brahman.' Moreover, the scriptural passage, 'In these the person is when sleeping he sees no dream; then he becomes one with the prāṇa alone,' declares, by mentioning them together in one sentence, that the nāḍīs and the prāṇa are to be combined in the state of deep sleep. That by prāṇa Brahman is meant we have already shown (I, 1, 28). Although in another text the nāḍīs are spoken of as an independent place of deep sleep as it were ('then he has entered into those nāḍīs'), yet, in order not to contradict other passages in which Brahman is spoken of as the place of deep sleep, we must explain that text to mean that the soul abides in Brahman through the nāḍīs. Nor is this interpretation opposed to the employment of the locative case ('into—or in—those nāḍīs'); for if the soul enters into Brahman by means of the nāḍīs it is at the same time in the nāḍīs; just as a man who descends to the sea by means of the river Gaṅgā is at the same time on the Gaṅgā.—Moreover that passage about the nāḍīs, because its purpose is to describe the road, consisting of the rays and nāḍīs, to the Brahma world, mentions the entering of the soul into the nāḍīs in order to glorify the latter (not in order to describe the state of deep sleep); for the clause following upon the one which refers to the enter-authority of the Veda; for the adoption of either alternative sublates, for the time, the other alternative.

¹ Where the two locatives are to be combined into one statement, 'he sleeps on the couch in the palace.'

ing praises the nâḍis, 'There no evil touches him.' The text, moreover, adds a reason for the absence of all evil, in the words, 'For then he has become united with the light.' That means that on account of the light contained in the nâḍis (which is called bile) having overpowered the organs the person no longer sees the sense-objects. Or else Brahman may be meant by the 'light;' which term is applied to Brahman in another passage also, 'It is Brahman only, light only' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 7). The passage would then mean that the soul becomes, by means of the nâḍis, united with Brahman, and that hence no evil touches it. That the union with Brahman is the reason for the absence of all contact with evil, is known from other scriptural passages, such as, 'All evils turn back from it; for the world of Brahman is free from all evil' (Kh. Up. VIII, 4, 1). On that account we have to combine the nâḍis with Brahman, which from other passages is known to be the place of deep sleep.—Analogously we conclude that the pericardium also, because it is mentioned in a passage treating of Brahman, is a place of deep sleep only in subordination to Brahman. For the ether within the heart is at first spoken of as the place of sleep ('He lies in the ether which is in the heart,' Bṛi. Up. II, 1, 17), and with reference thereto it is said later on, 'He rests in the pericardium' (II, 1, 19). Pericardium (purītat) is a name of that which envelops the heart; hence that which rests within the ether of the heart—which is contained in the pericardium—can itself be said to rest within the pericardium; just as a man living in a town surrounded by walls is said to live within the walls. That the ether within the heart is Brahman has already been shown (I, 3, 14).—That again the nâḍis and the pericardium have to be combined as places of deep sleep appears from their being mentioned together in one sentence ('Through them he moves forth and rests in the purītat'). That that which is (sat) and the intelligent Self (prāgñā) are only names of Brahman is well known; hence scripture mentions only three places of deep sleep, viz. the nâḍis, the pericardium, and Brahman. Among these three again Brahman alone is the lasting place of deep sleep; the nāḍīs and the pericardium are mere roads leading to it. Moreover (to explain further the difference of the manner in which the soul, in deep sleep, enters into the nāḍīs, the pericardium and Brahman respectively), the nāḍīs and the pericardium are (in deep sleep) merely the abode of the limiting adjuncts of the soul; in them the soul's organs abide¹. For apart from its connexion with the limiting adjuncts it is impossible for the soul in itself to abide anywhere, because being non-different from Brahman it rests in its own glory. And if we say that, in deep sleep, it abides in Brahman we do not mean thereby that there is a difference between the abode and that which abides, but that there is absolute identity of the two. For the text says, 'With that which is he becomes united, he is gone to his Self;' which means that the sleeping person has entered into his true nature.—It cannot, moreover, be said that the soul is at any time not united with Brahman—for its true nature can never pass away—; but considering that in the state of waking and that of dreaming it passes, owing to the contact with its limiting adjuncts, into something else, as it were, it may be said that when those adjuncts cease in deep sleep it passes back into its true nature. Hence it would be entirely wrong to assume that, in deep sleep, it sometimes becomes united with Brahman and sometimes not². Moreover, even if we admit that there are different places for the soul in deep sleep, still there does not result, from that difference of place, any difference in the quality of deep sleep which is in all cases characterised by the cessation of special cognition; it is, therefore, more appropriate to say that the soul does (in deep sleep) not cognize on account of its oneness, having become united with Brahman; according to the Sruti, 'How should he know another?' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 5, 15).—If, further, the sleeping soul did rest in the nāḍīs and the purītat, it would be impossible to assign any reason for its not cognizing, because in that case it would continue to have diversity for its object; according to the Sruti, 'When there is, as it were, duality, then one sees the other,' &c.—But in the case of him also who has diversity for his object, great distance and the like may be reasons for absence of cognition!—What you say might indeed apply to our case if the soul were acknowledged to be limited in itself; then its case would be analogous to that of Vishnumitra, who, when staying in a foreign land, cannot see his home. But, apart from its adjuncts, the soul knows no limitation.—Well, then, great distance, &c., residing in the adjuncts may be the reason of non-cognition!—Yes, but that leads us to the conclusion already arrived at, viz. that the soul does not cognize when, the limiting adjuncts having ceased, it has become one with Brahman.

¹ Ān. Gi. explains karaṇāni by karmāni: nāḍīṣhu purītatī ka gīvasyopādhyantarbhūtāni karaṇāni karmāni tishṭhantīty upādhyādhāratvam, gīvasya tv ādhāro brahmaiva.

² But with the nāḍīs or the pericardium only.

Nor do we finally maintain that the nāḍis, the pericardium, and Brahman are to be added to each other as being equally places of deep sleep. For by the knowledge that the nāḍis and the pericardium are places of sleep, nothing is gained, as scripture teaches neither that some special fruit is connected with that knowledge nor that it is the subordinate member of some work, &c., connected with certain results. We, on the other hand, do want to prove that that Brahman is the lasting abode of the soul in the state of deep sleep; that is a knowledge which has its own uses, viz. the ascertainment of Brahman being the Self of the soul, and the ascertainment of the soul being essentially non-connected with the worlds that appear in the waking and in the dreaming state. Hence the Self alone is the place of deep sleep.

8. Hence the awaking from that (viz. Brahman).

And because the Self only is the place of deep sleep, on that account the scriptural chapters treating of sleep invariably teach that the awaking takes place from that Self. In the Bṛi. Up. when the time comes for the answer to the question, 'Whence did he come back?' (II, 1, 16), the text says, 'As small sparks come forth from fire, thus all prāṇas come forth from that Self' (II, 1, 20). And Kh. Up. VI, 10, 2, we read: 'When they have come back from the True they do not know that they have come back from the True.' If there were optional places to which the soul might resort in deep sleep, scripture would teach us that it awakes sometimes from the nāḍis, sometimes from the pericardium, sometimes from the Self.—For that reason also the Self is the place of deep sleep.

9. But the same (soul returns from Brahman); on account of work, remembrance, text, and precept.

Here we have to enquire whether the soul when awaking from the union with Brahman is the same which entered into union with Brahman, or another one.—The pūrvapakshin maintains that there is no fixed rule on that point. For just as a drop of water, when poured into a large quantity of water, becomes one with the latter, so that when we again take out a drop it would be hard to manage that it should be the very same drop; thus the sleeping soul, when it has become united with Brahman, is merged in bliss and not able again to rise from it the same. Hence what actually awakes is either the Lord or some other soul.—To this we reply that the same soul which in the state of sleep entered into bliss again arises from it, not any other. We assert this on the ground of work, remembrance, sacred text, and precept; which four reasons we will treat separately. In the first place the person who wakes from sleep must be the same, because it is seen to finish work left unfinished before. Men finish in the morning what they had left incomplete on the day before. Now it is not possible that one man should proceed to complete work half done by another man, because this would imply too much¹.

¹ There would follow from it, e.g. that in the case of sacrifices occupying more than one day, there would be several sacrificers, and that consequently it would be doubtful to whom the fruit of the sacrifice, as promised by the Veda, belongs. And this would imply a stultification of the sacred text.

Hence we conclude that it is one and the same man who finishes on the latter day the work begun on the former.—In the second place the person rising from sleep is the same who went to sleep, for the reason that otherwise he could not remember what he had seen, &c., on the day before ; for what one man sees another cannot remember. And if another Self rose from sleep, the consciousness of personal identity (âtmanusmarāṇa) expressed in the words, 'I am the same I was before,' would not be possible.—In the third place we understand from Vedic texts that the same person rises again, 'He hastens back again as he came, to the place from which he started, to be awake' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 3, 16) ; 'All these creatures go day after day into the Brahma-world and yet do not discover it' (Kṛ. Up. VIII, 3, 2) ; 'Whatever these creatures are here, whether a lion, or a wolf, or a boar, or a worm, or a midge, or a gnat, or a musquito, that they become again and again' (Kṛ. Up. VI, 10, 2). These and similar passages met with in the chapters treating of sleeping and waking have a proper sense only if the same soul rises again.—In the fourth place we arrive at the same conclusion on the ground of the injunctions of works and knowledge, which, on a different theory, would be meaningless. For if another person did rise, it would follow that a person might obtain final release by sleep merely, and what then, we ask, would be the use of all those works which bear fruit at a later period, and of knowledge?—Moreover on the hypothesis of another person rising from sleep, that other person would either be a soul which had up to that time carried on its phenomenal life in another body ; in that case it would follow that the practical existence carried on by means of that body would be cut short. If it be said that the soul which went to sleep may, in its turn, rise in that other body (so that B would rise in A's body and A in B's body), we reply that that would be an altogether useless hypothesis ; for what advantage do we derive from assuming that each soul rises from sleep not in the same body in which it had gone to sleep, but that it goes to sleep in one body and rises in another?—Or else the soul rising (in A's body) would be one which had obtained final release, and that would imply that final release can have an end. But it is impossible that a soul which has once freed itself from Nescience should again rise (enter into phenomenal life). Hereby it is also shown that the soul which rises cannot be the Lord, who is everlastingly free from Nescience.—Further, on the hypothesis of another soul rising, it would be difficult to escape the conclusion that souls reap the fruits of deeds not their own, and, on the other hand, are not required for what they have done.—From all this it follows that the person rising from sleep is the same that went to sleep.—Nor is it difficult to refute the analogical reasoning that the soul, if once united with Brahman, can no more emerge from it than a drop of water can again be taken out from the mass of water into which it had been poured. We admit the impossibility of taking out the same drop of water, because there is no means of distinguishing it from all the other drops. In the case of the soul, however, there are reasons of distinction, viz. the work and the knowledge (of each individual soul). Hence the two cases are not analogous.—Further, we point out that the flamingo, e.g. is able to distinguish and separate milk and water when mixed, things which we men are altogether incapable of distinguishing.—Moreover, what is called individual soul is not really different from the highest Self, so that it might be distinguished from the latter in the same way as a drop of water from the mass of water ; but, as we have explained repeatedly, Brahman itself is on account of its connexion with limiting adjuncts metaphorically called individual soul. Hence the phenomenal existence of one soul lasts as long as it continues to be bound by one set of adjuncts, and the phenomenal existence of another soul again lasts as long as it continues to be bound by another set of adjuncts. Each set of adjuncts continues through the states of sleep as well as of waking ; in the former it is like a seed, in the latter like the fully developed plant. Hence the proper inference is that the same soul awakes from sleep.

10. In him who is senseless (in a swoon, &c.)

there is half-union ; on account of this remaining (as the only possible hypothesis).

There now arises the question of what kind that state is which ordinarily is called a swoon or being stunned. Here the pûrvapakshin maintains that we know only of three states of the soul as long as it abides in a body, viz. the waking state, dreaming, and deep dreamless sleep ; to which may be added, as a fourth state, the soul's passing out of the body. A fifth state is known neither from Sruti nor Smṛiti ; hence what is called fainting must be one of the four states mentioned.—To this we make the following reply. In the first place a man lying in a swoon cannot be said to be awake ; for he does not perceive external objects by means of his senses.—But, it might be objected, may not his case be analogous to that of the arrow-maker ? Just as the man working at an arrow, although awake, is so intent on his arrow that he sees nothing else ; so the man also who is stunned, e.g. by a blow, may be awake, but as his mind is concentrated on the sensation of pain caused by the blow of the club, he may not at the time perceive anything else.—No, we reply, the case is different, on account of the absence of consciousness. The arrow-maker says, ' For such a length of time I was aware of nothing but the arrow ; ' the man, on the other hand, who returns to consciousness from a swoon, says, ' For such a length of time I was shut up in blind darkness ; I was conscious of nothing.'—A waking man, moreover, however much his mind may be concentrated on one object, keeps his body upright ; while the body of a swooning person falls prostrate on the ground. Hence a man in a swoon is not awake.—Nor, in the second place, is he dreaming ; because he is altogether unconscious.—Nor, in the third place, is he dead ; for he continues to breathe and to be warm. When a man has become senseless and people are in doubt whether he be alive or dead, they touch the region of his heart, in order to ascertain whether warmth continues in his body or not, and put their hands to his nostrils to ascertain whether breathing goes on or not. If, then, they perceive neither warmth nor breath, they conclude that he is dead, and carry off his body into the forest in order to burn it; if, on the other hand, they do perceive warmth and breath, they decide that he is not dead, and begin to sprinkle him with cold water so that he may recover consciousness.—That a man who has swooned away is not dead follows, moreover, from the fact of his rising again (to conscious life); for from Yama's realm none ever return.—Let us then say that a man who has swooned lies in deep sleep, as he is unconscious, and, at the same time, not dead!—No, we reply; this also is impossible, on account of the different characteristics of the two states. A man who has become senseless does sometimes not breathe for a long time; his body trembles; his face has a frightful expression; his eyes are staring wide open. The countenance of a sleeping person, on the other hand, is peaceful, he draws his breath at regular intervals; his eyes are closed, his body does not tremble. A sleeping person again may be waked by a gentle stroking with the hand; a person lying in a swoon not even by a blow with a club. Moreover, senselessness and sleep have different causes; the former is produced by a blow on the head with a club or the like, the latter by weariness. Nor, finally, is it the common opinion that stunned or swooning people are asleep.—It thus remains for us to assume that the state of senselessness (in swooning, &c.) is a half-union (or half-coincidence)¹, as it coincides in so far as it is an unconscious state and does not coincide in so far as it has different characteristics.—But how can absence of consciousness in a swoon, &c., be called half-coincidence (with deep sleep)? With regard to deep sleep scripture says, 'He becomes united with the True' (Kh. Up. VI, 8, 1); 'Then a thief is not a thief' (Bri. Up. IV, 3, 22); 'Day and night do not pass that bank, nor old age, death, and grief, neither good nor evil deeds' (Kh. Up. VIII, 4, 1). For the good and evil deeds reach the soul in that way that there arise in it the ideas of being affected by pleasure or pain. Those ideas are absent in deep sleep, but they are likewise absent in the case of a person lying in a swoon ; hence we must maintain that, on account of the cessation of the limiting adjuncts, in the case of a senseless person as well as of one asleep, complete union takes place, not only half-union.—To this we make the following reply. —We do not mean to say that in the case of a man who lies in a swoon the soul becomes half united with Brahman ; but rather that senselessness belongs with one half to the side of deep sleep, with the other half to the side of the other state (i.e. death). In how far it is equal and not equal to sleep has already been shown. It belongs to death in so far as it is the door of death. If there remains (unrequited) work of the soul, speech and mind return (to the senseless person) ; if no work remains, breath and warmth depart from him. Therefore those who know Brahman declare a swoon and the like to be a half-union.—The objection that no fifth state is commonly acknowledged, is without much weight ; for as that state occurs occasionally only it may not be generally known. All the same it is known from ordinary experience as well as from the Āyurveda (medicine). That it is not considered a separate fifth state is due to its being avowedly compounded of other states.

¹ Viz. with deep sleep, as will be explained below.

11. Not on account of (difference of) place also twofold characteristics can belong to the highest ; for everywhere (scripture teaches it to be without any difference).

We now attempt to ascertain, on the ground of Sruti, the nature of that Brahman with which the individual soul becomes united in the state of deep sleep and so on, in consequence of the cessation of the limiting adjuncts.—The scriptural passages which refer to Brahman are of a double character ; some indicate that Brahman is affected by difference, so, e.g. ‘ He to whom belong all works, all desires, all sweet odours and tastes ’ (Kh. Up. III, 14, 2) ; others, that it is without difference, so, e.g. ‘ It is neither coarse nor fine, neither short nor long,’ &c. (Bri. Up. III, 8, 8). Have we, on the ground of these passages, to assume that Brahman has a double nature, or either nature, and, if either, that it is affected with difference, or without difference? This is the point to be discussed.

The pûrvapakshin maintains that, in conformity with the scriptural passages which indicate a double nature, a double nature is to be ascribed to Brahman.

To this we reply as follows.—At any rate the highest Brahman cannot, by itself, possess double characteristics; for on account of the contradiction implied therein, it is impossible to admit that one and the same thing should by itself possess certain qualities, such as colour, &c., and should not possess them.—Nor is it possible that Brahman should possess double characteristics ‘on account of place,’ i.e. on account of its conjunction with its limiting adjuncts, such as earth, &c. For the connexion with limiting adjuncts is unavailing to impart to a thing of a certain nature an altogether different nature. The crystal, e.g. which is in itself clear, does not become dim through its conjunction with a limiting adjunct in the form of red colour; for that it is pervaded by the quality of dimness is an altogether erroneous notion. In the case of Brahman the limiting adjuncts are, moreover, presented by Nescience merely¹. Hence (as the upâdhis are the product of Nescience) if we embrace either of the two alternatives, we must decide in favour of that according to which Brahma is absolutely devoid of all difference, not in favour of the opposite one. For all passages whose aim it is to represent the nature of Brahman (such as, ‘It is without sound, without touch, without form, without decay,’ Ka. Up. I, 3, 15) teach that it is free from all difference.

12. If it be objected that it is not so, on account of the difference (taught by the Veda); we reply that it is not so on account of the declaration of (Brahman) being not such, with reference to each (declaration of difference).

¹ The limiting adjunct of the crystal, i.e. the red colour of a thing, e.g. a flower with which the crystal is in contact, is as real as the crystal itself; only the effect is an illusion.—But the limiting adjuncts of Brahman are in themselves illusion.

Let this be, but nevertheless it cannot be maintained that Brahman is devoid of difference and attributes, and does not possess double attributes either in itself or on account of difference of station.—Why not?—‘On account of difference.’ The various vidyās teach different forms of Brahman; it is said to have four feet (Kh. Up. III, 18, 1); to consist of sixteen parts (Pr. Up. VI, 1); to be characterised by dwarfishness (Ka. Up. V, 3); to have the three worlds for its body (Bṛi. Up. I, 3, 22); to be named Vaisvanara (Kh. Up. V, 11, 2), &c. Hence we must admit that Brahman is qualified by differences also.—But above it has been shown that Brahman cannot possess twofold characteristics!—That also does not contradict our doctrine; for the difference of Brahman’s forms is due to its limiting adjuncts. Otherwise all those scriptural passages which refer to those differences would be objectless.

All this reasoning, we say, is without force ‘on account of the declaration of its being not such, with reference to each,’ i.e. because scripture declares, with reference to all the differences produced by the limiting adjuncts, that there is no difference in Brahman. Cp. such passages as the following: ‘This bright immortal person in this earth, and that bright immortal person incorporated in the body; he indeed is the same as that Self’ (Bṛi. Up. II, 5, 1). It, therefore, cannot be maintained that the connexion of Brahman with various forms is taught by the Veda.

13. Some also (teach) thus.

The members of one sākḥā also make a statement about the cognition of non-difference which is preceded by a censure of the perception of difference, ‘By the mind alone it is to be perceived, there is in it no diversity. He who perceives therein any diversity goes from death to death’ (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 19). Others also (‘By knowing the enjoyer, the enjoyed, and the ruler, everything has been declared to be threefold, and this is Brahman,’ Svet. Up. I, 12) record in their text that the entire world, characterised by enjoyers, things to be enjoyed, and a ruler, has Brahman for its true nature.—But as among the scriptural passages referring to Brahman, there are some which represent it as having a form, and others teaching that it is devoid of form, how can it be asserted that Brahman is devoid of form, and not also the contrary?—To this question the next Sûtra replies.

14. For (Brahman) is merely devoid of form, on account of this being the main purport of scripture.

Brahman, we must definitively assert, is devoid of all form, colour, and so on, and does not in any way possess form, and so on.—Why?—‘On account of this being the main purport (of scripture).’—‘It is neither coarse nor fine, neither short nor long’ (Bṛi. Up. III, 8, 8); ‘That which is without sound, without touch, without form, without decay’ (Ka. Up. I, 3, 15); ‘He who is called ether is the revealer of all forms and names. That within which forms and names are, that is Brahman’ (Kh. Up. VIII, 14, 1); ‘That heavenly person is without body, he is both without and within, not produced’ (Mu. Up. II, 1, 2); ‘That Brahman is without cause and without effect, without anything inside or outside, this Self is Brahman, omnipresent and omniscient’ (Bṛi. Up. II, 5, 19). These and similar passages have for their purport the true nature of Brahman as non-connected with any world, and have not any other purport, as we have proved under I, 1, 4. On the ground of such passages we therefore must definitively conclude that Brahman is devoid of form. Those other passages, on the other hand, which refer to a Brahman qualified by form do not aim at setting forth the nature of Brahman, but rather at enjoining the worship of Brahman. As long as those latter texts do not contradict those of the former class, they are to be accepted as they stand; where, however, contradictions occur, the passages whose main subject is Brahman must be viewed as having greater force than those of the other kind.—This is the reason for our deciding that although there are two different classes of scriptural texts, Brahman must be held to be altogether without form, not at the same time of an opposite nature.—But what then is the position of those passages which refer to Brahman as possessing form?—To this question the next Sūtra replies.

15. And as light (assumes forms as it were by its contact with things possessing form, so does Brahman;) since (the texts ascribing form to Brahman) are not devoid of meaning.

Just as the light of the sun or the moon after having passed through space enters into contact with a finger or some other limiting adjunct, and, according as the latter is straight or bent, itself becomes straight or bent as it were; so Brahman also assumes, as it were, the form of the earth and the other limiting adjuncts with which it enters into connexion. Hence there is no reason why certain texts should not teach, with a view to meditative worship, that Brahman has that and that form. We thus escape the conclusion that those Vedic passages which ascribe form to Brahman are devoid of sense; a conclusion altogether unacceptable since all parts of the Veda are equally authoritative, and hence must all be assumed to have a meaning.—But does this not imply a contradiction of the tenet maintained above, viz. that Brahman does not possess double characteristics although it is connected with limiting adjuncts?—By no means, we reply. What is merely due to a limiting adjunct cannot constitute an attribute of a substance, and the limiting adjuncts are, moreover, presented by Nescience only. That the primeval natural Nescience leaves room for all practical life and activity—whether ordinary or based on the Veda—we have explained more than once.

16. And (scripture) declares (Brahman) to consist of that (i.e. intelligence).

And scripture declares that Brahman consists of intelligence, is devoid of any other characteristics, and is altogether without difference; 'As a mass of salt has neither inside nor outside, but is altogether a mass of taste, thus, indeed, has that Self neither inside nor outside, but is altogether a mass of knowledge' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 5, 13). That means: That Self has neither inside nor outside any characteristic form but intelligence; simple non-differentiated intelligence constitutes its nature; just as a lump of salt has inside as well as outside one and the same saltish taste, not any other taste.

17. (This scripture) also shows, and it is likewise stated in Smṛiti.

That Brahman is without any difference is proved by those scriptural passages also which expressly deny that it possesses any other characteristics; so, e.g. 'Next follows the teaching by No, no' (Bṛi. Up. II, 3, 6); 'It is different from the known, it is also above the unknown' (Ke. Up. I, 4); 'From whence all speech, with the mind, turns away unable to reach it' (Taitt. Up. II, 9). Of a similar purport is that scriptural passage which relates how Bāhva, being questioned about Brahman by Vāshkalin, explained it to him by silence, 'He said to him, "Learn Brahman, O friend," and became silent. Then, on a second and third question, he replied, "I am teaching you indeed, but you do not understand. Silent is that Self."' The same teaching is conveyed by those Smṛiti-texts which deny of Brahman all other characteristics; so, e.g. 'I will proclaim that which is the object of knowledge, knowing which one reaches immortality; the highest Brahman without either beginning or end, which cannot be said either to be or not to be' (Bha. Gītā XIII, 12). Of a similar purport is another Smṛiti-passage, according to which the omniform Nārāyaṇa instructed Nārada, 'The cause, O Nārada, of your seeing me endowed with the qualities of all beings is the Māyā emitted by me; do not cognize me as being such (in reality).'

18. For this very reason (there are applied to Brahman) comparisons such as that of the images of the sun and the like.

Because that Self is of the nature of intelligence, devoid of all difference, transcending speech and mind, to be described only by denying of it all other characteristics, therefore the Moksha Sāstras compare it to the images of the sun reflected in the water and the like, meaning thereby that all difference in Brahman is unreal, only due to its limiting conditions. Compare, e.g. out of many, the two following passages: 'As the one luminous sun when entering into relation to many different waters is himself rendered multiform by his limiting adjuncts; so also the one divine unborn Self;' and 'The one Self of all beings separately abides in all the individual beings; hence it appears one and many at the same time, just as the one moon is multiplied by its reflections in the water.'

The next Sūtra raises an objection.

19. But there is no parallelism (of the two things compared), since (in the case of Brahman) there is not apprehended (any separate substance) comparable to the water.

Since no substance comparable to the water is apprehended in the case of Brahman, a parallelism between Brahman and the reflected images of the sun cannot be established. In the case of the sun and other material luminous bodies, there exists a separate material substance occupying a different place, viz. water; hence the light of the sun, &c., may be reflected. The Self, on the other hand, is not a material thing, and, as it is present everywhere and all is identical with it, there are no limiting adjuncts different from it and occupying a different place.—Therefore the instances are not parallel.

The next Sūtra disposes of this objection.

20. Since (the highest Brahman) is inside (of the limiting adjuncts), it participates in their increase and decrease; owing to the appropriateness (thus resulting) of the two (things compared) it is thus (i.e. the comparison holds good).

The parallel instance (of the sun's reflection in the water) is unobjectionable, since a common feature—with reference to which alone the comparison is instituted—does exist.

Whenever two things are compared, they are so only with reference to some particular point they have in common. Entire equality of the two can never be demonstrated; indeed if it could be demonstrated there would be an end of that particular relation which gives rise to the comparison. Nor does the sūtrakāra institute the comparison objected to on his own account; he merely sets forth the purport of a comparison actually met with in scripture.—Now, the special feature on which the comparison rests is ‘the participation in increase and decrease.’ The reflected image of the sun dilates when the surface of the water expands; it contracts when the water shrinks; it trembles when the water is agitated; it divides itself when the water is divided. It thus participates in all the attributes and conditions of the water; while the real sun remains all the time the same.—Similarly Brahman, although in reality uniform and never changing, participates as it were in the attributes and states of the body and the other limiting adjuncts within which it abides; it grows with them as it were, decreases with them as it were, and so on. As thus the two things compared possess certain common features no objection can be made to the comparison.

21. And on account of the declaration (of scripture).

Scripture moreover declares that the highest Brahman enters into the body and the other limiting adjuncts, ‘He made bodies with two feet, he made bodies with four feet. Having first become a bird he entered the bodies as purusha’ (Bṛi. Up. II, 5, 18); and ‘Having entered into them with this living (individual) Self’ (Kh. Up. VI, 3, 2).—For all these reasons the comparison set forth in Sūtra 18 is unobjectionable.

Some teachers assume that the preceding discussion (beginning from Sūtra 11) comprises two adhikaraṇas, of which the former discusses the question whether Brahman is an absolutely uniform being in which all the plurality of the apparent world vanishes, or a being multiform as the apparent world is; while the latter tries to determine whether Brahman—whose absolute uniformity was established in the former adhikaraṇa—is to be defined as that which is (sat), or as thought (intelligence ; bodha), or as both.—Against this we remark that in no case there is a valid reason for beginning a second adhikaraṇa. For what should be the subject of a special second adhikaraṇa? Sūtra 15 and foll. cannot be meant to disprove that Brahman possesses a plurality of characteristics; for that hypothesis is already sufficiently disposed of in Sūtras 11–14. Nor can they be meant to show that Brahman is to be defined only as ‘that which is,’ not also as ‘thought ;’ for that would imply that the scriptural passage, ‘consisting of nothing but knowledge’ (Bṛi. Up. II, 4, 12), is devoid of meaning. How moreover could Brahman, if devoid of intelligence, be said to be the Self of the intelligent individual soul? Nor again can the hypothetical second adhikaraṇa be assumed to prove that Brahman must be defined as ‘thought’ only, not at the same time as ‘that which is ;’ for if it were so, certain scriptural passages—as e.g. Ka. Up. II, 6, 13, ‘He is to be conceived by the words, He is’—would lose their meaning. And how, moreover, could we admit thought apart from existence?—Nor can it be said that Brahman has both those characteristics, since that would contradict something already admitted. For he who would maintain that Brahman is characterised by thought different from existence, and at the same time by existence different from thought, would virtually maintain that there is a plurality in Brahman, and that view has already been disproved in the preceding adhikaraṇa.—But as scripture teaches both (viz. that Brahman is one only and that it possesses more than one characteristic) there can be no objection to such a doctrine!—There is, we reply, for one being cannot possibly possess more than one nature.—And if it finally should be said that existence is thought and thought existence and that the two do not exclude each other ; we remark that in that case there is no reason for the doubt¹ whether Brahman is that which is, or intelligence, or both.—On the other hand we have shown that the Sūtras can be explained as constituting one adhikarāṇa only. Moreover, as the scriptural texts concerning Brahman disagree in so far as representing Brahman as qualified by form and again as devoid of form we, when embracing the alternative of a Brahman devoid of form, must necessarily explain the position of the other texts, and if taken in that sense the Sūtras (15–21) acquire a more appropriate meaning. And if it is maintained that those scriptural passages also which speak of Brahman as qualified by form have no separate meaning of their own, but likewise teach that Brahman is devoid of all form, viz. by intimating that the plurality referred to has to be annihilated; we reply that this opinion also appears objectionable. In those cases, indeed, where elements of plurality are referred to in chapters treating of the highest knowledge, we may assume them to be mentioned merely to be abstracted from; so e.g. in the passage, Bṛi. Up. II, 5, 19, ‘His horses are yoked hundreds and ten. This is the horses, this is the ten and the thousands, many and endless,’ which passage is immediately followed by the words, ‘This is the Brahman without cause and without effect, without anything inside or outside.’ But where elements of plurality are referred to in chapters treating of devout meditation, we have no right to assume that they are mentioned only to be set aside. This is the case e.g. in the passage, ‘He who consists of mind, whose body is prāṇa, whose form is light’ (Kh. Up. III, 14, 2), which is connected with an injunction of devout meditation contained in the preceding passage, ‘Let him have this will and belief.’ In passages of the latter kind, where the determinations attributed to Brahman may be taken as they stand and viewed as subserving the purposes of devout meditation, we have no right to assume that they are mentioned with the indirect purpose of being discarded. Moreover, if all texts concerning Brahman equally aimed at discarding all thought of plurality, there would be no opportunity for stating the determinative reason (why Brahman is to be viewed as devoid of all form) as was done in Sūtra 14. And further scripture informs us that devout meditations on Brahman as characterised by form have results of their own, viz. either the warding off of calamities, or the gaining of power, or else release by successive steps. All these reasons determine us to view the passages concerning devout meditation on the one hand and the passages concerning Brahman on the other hand as constituting separate classes, not as forming one whole. In what way moreover, we ask, could the two classes of texts be looked upon as constituting one whole?—Our opponent will perhaps reply, 'Because we apprehend them to form parts of one injunction, just as we do in the case of the darsapûrnamâsa-sacrifice and the oblations called prayâgas.'—But this reply we are unable to admit, since the texts about Brahman, as shown at length under I, 1, 4, merely determine an existing substance (viz. Brahman), and do not enjoin any performances. What kind of activity, we moreover ask, are those texts, according to our opponent's view, meant to enjoin? For whenever an injunction is laid upon a person, it has reference to some kind of work to be undertaken by him.—Our opponent will perhaps make the following reply. The object of the injunction is, in the present case, the annihilation of the appearance of duality. As long as the latter is not destroyed, the true nature of Brahman is not known; hence the appearance of duality which stands in the way of true knowledge must be dissolved. Just as the Veda prescribes the performance of certain sacrifices to him who is desirous of the heavenly world, so it prescribes the dissolution of the apparent world to him who is desirous of final release. Whoever wants to know the true nature of Brahman must first annihilate the appearance of plurality that obstructs true knowledge, just as a man wishing to ascertain the true nature of some jar or similar object placed in a dark room must at first remove the darkness. For the apparent world has Brahman for its true nature, not vice versa; therefore the cognition of Brahman is effected through the previous annihilation of the apparent world of names and forms.

¹ And hence no reason for a separate adhikaraṇa.

This argumentation we meet by asking our opponent of what nature that so-called annihilation of the apparent world is. Is it analogous to the annihilation of hardness in butter which is effected by bringing it into contact with fire? or is the apparent world of names and forms which is superimposed upon Brahman by Nescience to be dissolved by knowledge, just as the phenomenon of a double moon which is due to a disease of the eyes is removed by the application of medicine¹? If the former, the Vedic injunctions bid us to do something impossible; for no man can actually annihilate this whole existing world with all its animated bodies and all its elementary substances such as earth and so on. And if it actually could be done, the first released person would have done it once for all, so that at present the whole world would be empty, earth and all other substances having been finally annihilated.—If the latter, i.e. if our opponent maintains that the phenomenal world is superimposed upon Brahman by Nescience and annihilated by knowledge, we point out that the only thing needed is that the knowledge of Brahman should be conveyed by Vedic passages sublating the apparent plurality superimposed upon Brahman by Nescience, such as ‘Brahman is one, without a second;’ ‘That is the true, it is the Self and thou art it.’ (Kh. Up. VI, 2, 1; 8, 7.) As soon as Brahman is indicated in this way, knowledge arising of itself discards Nescience, and this whole world of names and forms, which had been hiding Brahman from us, melts away like the imagery of a dream. As long, on the other hand, as Brahman is not so indicated, you may say a hundred times, ‘Cognize Brahman! Dissolve this world!’ and yet we shall be unable to do either the one or the other.

But, our opponent may object, even after Brahman has been indicated by means of the passages quoted, there is room for injunctions bidding us either to cognize Brahman or to dissolve the world.—Not so, we reply; for both these things are already effected by the indication of the true nature of Brahman as devoid of all plurality ; just as the pointing out of the true nature of the rope has for its immediate result the cognition of the true nature of the rope, and the dissolution of the appearance of a snake or the like. And what is done once need not be done again¹. —We moreover ask the following question : Does the individual soul on which the injunction is laid belong to the unreal element of the phenomenal world or to the real element, i.e. Brahman, which underlies the phenomenal world? If the former, the soul itself is dissolved just as earth and the other elements are, as soon as the knowledge of Brahman's true nature has arisen, and on whom then should the dissolution of the world be enjoined, or who should, by acting on that injunction, obtain release?—If the latter, we are led to the same result. For as soon as there arises the knowledge that Brahman, which never can become the subject of an injunction, is the true being of the soul while the soul as such is due to Nescience, there remains no being on which injunctions could be laid, and hence there is no room for injunctions at all.

¹ I. e. does the injunction bidding us to annihilate the phenomenal world look on it as real or as fictitious, due to Nescience only?

What then, it may be asked, is the meaning of those Vedic passages which speak of the highest Brahman as something to be seen, to be heard, and so on?—They aim, we reply, not at enjoining the knowledge of truth, but merely at directing our attention to it. Similarly in ordinary life imperative phrases such as 'Listen to this!' 'Look at this!' are frequently meant to express not that we are immediately to cognize this or that, but only that we are to direct our attention to it. Even when a person is face to face with some object of knowledge, knowledge may either arise or not ; all that another person wishing to inform him about the object can do is to point it out to him ; knowledge will thereupon spring up in his mind of itself, according to the object of knowledge and according to the means of knowledge employed.—Nor must it be said that an injunction may have the purpose of modifying the knowledge of a thing which was originally obtained by some other means of knowledge¹. For the modified knowledge due to such injunctions is not knowledge in the true sense of the word, but merely a mental energy (i.e. the product, not of an object of knowledge presented to us through one of the means of true knowledge, but of an arbitrary mental activity), and if such modification of knowledge springs up in the mind of itself (i.e. without a deliberate mental act) it is mere error. True knowledge on the other hand, which is produced by the means of true knowledge and is conformable to its object, can neither be brought about by hundreds of injunctions nor be checked by hundreds of prohibitions. For it does not depend on the will of man, but merely on what really and unalterably exists.—For this reason also injunctions of the knowledge of Brahman cannot be admitted.

¹ I.e. after the true nature of Brahman has been once known, there is no longer room for a special injunction to annihilate this apparent world.

A further point has to be considered here. If we admitted that injunctions constitute the sole end and aim of the entire Veda, there would remain no authority for the, after all, generally acknowledged truth that Brahman—which is not subject to any injunction—is the Self of all.—Nor would it be of avail to maintain that the Veda may both proclaim the truth stated just now and enjoin on man the cognition of that truth; for that would involve the conclusion that the one Brahma-sāstra has two—and more-over conflicting—meanings.—The theory combated by us gives moreover rise to a number of other objections which nobody can refute; it compels us to set aside the text as it stands and to make assumptions not guaranteed by the text; it implies the doctrine that final release is, like the results of sacrificial works, (not the direct result of true knowledge but) the mediate result of the so-called unseen principle (adrishṭa), and non-permanent &c. &c.—We therefore again assert that the texts concerning Brahman aim at cognition, not at injunction, and that hence the pretended reason of 'their being apprehended as parts of one injunction' cannot induce us to look upon the entire Veda as one whole.

¹ The pûrvapakshin might refer e.g. to the Vedic injunction, 'he is to meditate upon woman as fire,' and maintain that the object of this injunction is to modify our knowledge of woman derived from perception &c., according to which a woman is not fire.

And finally, even if we admitted that the texts concerning Brahman are of an injunctive character, we should be unable to prove that the texts denying plurality, and the texts setting forth plurality enjoin one and the same thing ; for this latter conclusion cannot be accepted in the face of the several means of proof such as difference of terms¹, and so on, which intimate that there is a plurality of injunctions. The passages respectively enjoining the darsapûrnamâsa-sacrifice and the offerings termed prayâgas may indeed be considered to form one whole, as the qualification on the part of the sacrificer furnishes an element common to the two². But the statements about the Brahman devoid of qualities and those about the qualified Brahman have not any element in common ; for qualities such as 'having light for one's body' contribute in no way towards the dissolution of the world, nor again does the latter help in any way the former. For the dissolution of the entire phenomenal world on the one hand, and regard for a part of that world on the other hand do not allow themselves to be combined in one and the same subject.—The preferable theory, therefore, is to distinguish with us two classes of texts, according as Brahman is represented as possessing form or as devoid of it.

22. For (the clause 'Not so, not so') denies (of Brahman) the suchness which forms the topic of discussion ; and (the text) enounces something more than that.

¹ 'Difference of terms' (śabdântaram) is according to the Pûrva Mîmâṃsâ the first of the six means of proof showing karmabheda or niyogabheda. Cp. Sabara bhâshya on II, 1, 1.

² For the sacrifice as well as its subordinate part—the offering of the prayâgas—has to be performed by a sacrificer acting for one end, viz. the obtainment of the heavenly world.

We read, Bṛi. Up. II, 3, 'Two forms of Brahman there are indeed, the material and the immaterial, the mortal and the immortal, the solid and the fluid, sat and tya.' The text thereupon divides the five elements into two classes, predicates of the essence of that which is immaterial—which it calls puruṣa—saffron-colour, and so on, and then goes on to say, 'Now then the teaching by Not so, not so ! For there is nothing else higher than this (if one says) : It is not so.' Here we have to enquire what the object of the negative statement is. We do not observe any definite thing indicated by words such as 'this' or 'that ;' we merely have the word 'so' in 'Not so, not so !' to which the word 'not' refers, and which on that account indicates something meant to be denied. Now we know that the word 'so' (iti) is used with reference to approximate things, in the same way as the particle 'evam' is used ; compare, e.g. the sentence 'so (iti) indeed the teacher said' (where the 'so' refers to his immediately preceding speech). And, in our passage, the context points out what has to be considered as proximate, viz. the two cosmic forms of Brahman, and that Brahman itself to which the two forms belong. Hence there arises a doubt whether the phrase, 'Not so, not so !' negatives both Brahman and its two forms, or only either ; and if the latter, whether it negatives Brahman and leaves its two forms, or if it negatives the two forms and leaves Brahman.—We suppose, the pūrvapakṣin says, that the negative statement negatives Brahman as well as its two forms ; both being suggested by the context. As the word 'not' is repeated twice, there are really two negative statements, of which the one negatives the cosmic form of Brahman, the other that which has form, i.e. Brahman itself. Or else we may suppose that Brahman alone is negated. For as Brahman transcends all speech and thought, its existence is doubtful, and admits of being negated ; the plurality of cosmic forms on the other hand falls within the sphere of perception and the other means of right knowledge, and can, therefore, not be negated.—On this latter interpretation the repetition of 'not' must be considered as due to emphasis only.

To this we make the following reply. It is impossible that the phrase, 'Not so, not so!' should negative both, since that would imply the doctrine of a general Void. Whenever we deny something unreal, we do so with reference to something real; the unreal snake, e.g. is negated with reference to the real rope. But this (denial of something unreal with reference to something real) is possible only if some entity is left. If everything is denied, no entity is left, and if no entity is left, the denial of some other entity which we may wish to undertake, becomes impossible, i.e. that latter entity becomes real and as such cannot be negated.—Nor, in the second place, can Brahman be denied; for that would contradict the introductory phrase of the chapter, 'Shall I tell you Brahman?' (Bṛi. Up. II, 1, 1); would show disregard of the threat conveyed in Taitt. Up. II, 6, 'He who knows the Brahman as non-existing becomes himself non-existing;' would be opposed to definitive assertions such as 'By the words "He is" is he to be apprehended' (Ka. Up. II, 6, 13); and would involve a stultification of the entire Vedānta.—The phrase that Brahman transcends all speech and thought does certainly not mean to say that Brahman does not exist; for after the Vedānta-part of scripture has established at length the existence of Brahman—in such passages as 'He who knows Brahman obtains the highest;' 'Truth, knowledge, infinite is Brahman'—it cannot be supposed all at once to teach its non-existence. For, as the common saying is, 'Better than bathing it is not to touch dirt at all.' The passage, 'from whence all speech with the mind turns away unable to reach it' (Taitt. Up. II, 4), must, therefore, rather be viewed as intimating Brahman.

The passage of the Bṛi. Up. under discussion has, therefore, to be understood as follows. Brahman is that whose nature is permanent purity, intelligence, and freedom; it transcends speech and mind, does not fall within the category of 'object,' and constitutes the inward Self of all. Of this Brahman our text denies all plurality of forms; but Brahman itself it leaves untouched. This the Sûtra expresses in the words, 'for it denies the suchness which forms the topic of discussion.' That means: The passage 'Not so,' &c., denies of Brahman the limited form, material as well as immaterial, which in the preceding part of the chapter is described at length with reference to the gods as well as the body, and also the second form which is produced by the first, is characterised by mental impressions, forms the essence of that which is immaterial, is denoted by the term purusha, rests on the subtle Self (liṅgātman) and is described by means of comparisons with saffron-colour, &c., since the purusha, which is the essence of what is immaterial, does not itself possess colour perceivable by the eye. Now these forms of Brahman are by means of the word 'so' (iti), which always refers to something approximate brought into connexion with the negative particle 'not.' Brahman itself, on the other hand (apart from its forms), is, in the previous part of the chapter, mentioned not as in itself constituting the chief topic, but only in so far as it is qualified by its forms; this appears from the circumstance of Brahman being exhibited in the genitive case only ('These are two forms of Brahman'). Now, after the two forms have been set forth, there arises the desire of knowing that to which the two forms belong, and hence the text continues, 'Now then the teaching by means of "Not so, not so."' This passage, we conclude, conveys information regarding the nature of Brahman by denying the reality of the forms fictitiously attributed to it; for the phrase, 'Not so, not so!' negatives the whole aggregate of effects superimposed on Brahman. Effects we know to have no real existence, and they can therefore be negated; not so, however, Brahman, which constitutes the necessary basis for all fictitious superimposition.—Nor must the question be asked here, how the sacred text, after having itself set forth the two forms of Brahman, can negative them in the end, contrary to the principle that not to touch dirt is better than bathing after having done so. For the text does not set forth the two forms of Brahman as something the truth of which is to be established, but merely mentions those two forms, which in the sphere of ordinary thought are fictitiously attributed to Brahman, in order finally to negative them and establish thereby the true nature of the formless Brahman.

The double repetition of the negation may either serve the purpose of furnishing a special denial of the material as well as the immaterial form of Brahman ; or the first 'Not so' may negative the aggregate of material elements, while the second denies the aggregate of mental impressions. Or else the repetition may be an emphatic one, intimating that whatever can be thought is not Brahman. This is, perhaps, the better explanation. For if a limited number of things are denied each individually, there still remains the desire to know whether something else may not be Brahman ; an emphatic repetition of the denial on the other hand shows that the entire aggregate of objects is denied and that Brahman is the inward Self ; whereby all further enquiry is checked.—The final conclusion, therefore, is, that the text negatives only the cosmic plurality fictitiously superimposed on Brahman, but leaves Brahman itself untouched.

The Sūtra gives another argument establishing the same conclusion, 'and the text enounces something more than that,' i.e. more than the preceding negation. The words of the text meant are '(not) is there anything beyond.'—If the negation, 'Not so, not so !' were meant to negative all things whatever, and this terminated in absolute non-existence, the text could not even allude to 'anything beyond.'—The words of the text are to be connected as follows. After the clause, 'Not so, not so !' has given information about Brahman, the clause next following illustrates this teaching by saying : There is nothing beyond or separate from this Brahman ; therefore Brahman is expressed by 'Not so, not so !' which latter words do not mean that Brahman itself does not exist. The implied meaning rather is that different from everything else there exists the 'non-negated' Brahman.—The words of the text admit, however, of another interpretation also ; for they may mean that there is no teaching of Brahman higher than that teaching which is implied in the negation of plurality expressed by 'Not so, not so !' On this latter interpretation the words of the Sūtra, 'and the text enounces something more than that,' must be taken to refer to the name mentioned in the text, 'Then comes the name, the True of the True; the senses being the True and he the True of them.'—This again has a sense only if the previous negative clause denies everything but Brahman, not everything but absolute non-existence. For, if the latter were the case, what then could be called the True of the True?—We therefore decide that the clause, 'Not so, not so!' negatives not absolutely everything, but only everything but Brahman.

23. That (Brahman) is unevolved; for (thus scripture) says.

If that highest Brahman which is different from the world that is negated in the passage discussed above really exists, why then is it not apprehended?—Because, the Sūtrakāra replies, it is unevolved, not to be apprehended by the senses; for it is the witness of whatever is apprehended (i.e. the subject in all apprehension). Thus Sruti says, 'He is not apprehended by the eye, nor by speech, nor by the other senses, not by penance or good works' (Mu. Up. III, 1, 8); 'That Self is to be described by No, no! He is incomprehensible, for he cannot be comprehended' (Bri. Up. III, 9, 26); 'That which cannot be seen nor apprehended' (Mu. Up. I, 1, 6); 'When in that which is invisible, incorporeal, undefined, unsupported' &c. (Taitt. Up. II, 7). Similar statements are made in Smṛiti-passages; so e.g. 'He is called unevolved, not to be fathomed by thought, unchangeable.'

24. And in the state of perfect conciliation also (the Yogins apprehend the highest Brahman), according to Sruti and Smṛiti.

At the time of perfect conciliation the Yogins see the unevolved Self free from all plurality. By 'perfect conciliation' we understand the presentation before the mind (of the highest Self), which is effected through meditation and devotion.—This is vouched for by Sruti as well as Smṛiti. So, e.g. Ka. Up. IV, 1, 'The Self-existent pierced the openings of the senses so that they turn outward; therefore man looks without, not within himself. Some wise man, however, with his eyes closed and wishing for immortality, saw the Self within.' And Mu. Up. III, 1, 8, 'When a man's mind has become purified by the serene light of knowledge then he sees him, meditating on him as without parts.' Smṛiti-passages of the same tendency are the following ones, 'He who is seen as light by the Yogins meditating on him sleepless, with suspended breath, with contented minds, with subdued senses; reverence be to him¹!' and 'The Yogins see him, the august, eternal one.'

But if in the state of perfect conciliation there is a being to be conciliated and a being conciliating, does not this involve the distinction of a higher and a lower Self?—No, the next Sūtra replies.

25. And as in the case of (physical) light and the like, there is non-distinction (of the two Selves), the light (i.e. the intelligent Self) (being divided) by its activity; according to the repeated declarations of scripture.

As light, ether, the sun and so on appear differentiated as it were through their objects such as fingers, vessels, water and so on which constitute limiting adjuncts², while in reality they preserve their essential non-differentiatedness; so the distinction of different Selves is due to limiting adjuncts only, while the unity of all Selves is natural and original. For on the doctrine of the non-difference of the individual soul and the highest Self the Vedānta-texts insist again and again³.

¹ Whose Self is Yoga.

² Light is differentiated as it were by the various objects on which it shines; the all-pervading ether is divided into parts as it were by hollow bodies; the sun is multiplied as it were by its reflections in the water.

³ It certainly looks here as if the Bhāṣyakāra did not know what to do with the words of the Sūtra. The 'karmāni,' which is

26. Hence (the soul enters into unity) with the infinite (i.e. the highest Self); for this scripture indicates.

Hence i.e. because the non-difference of all Selves is essential and their difference due to Nescience only, the individual soul after having dispelled Nescience by true knowledge passes over into unity with the highest Self. For this is indicated by scripture, cp. e.g. Mu. Up. III, 2, 9, 'He who knows that highest Brahman becomes even Brahman;' Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 6, 'Being Brahman he goes to Brahman.'

27. But on account of twofold designation, (the relation of the highest Self to the individual soul has to be viewed) like that of the snake to its coils.

In order to justify his own view as to the relation of the conciliating individual soul and the conciliated highest Self, the Sūtrakāra mentions a different view of the same matter.—Some scriptural passages refer to the highest Self and the individual soul as distinct entities, cp. e.g. Mu. Up. III, 1, 8, 'Then he sees him meditating on him as without parts,' where the highest Self appears as the object of the soul's vision and meditation; Mu. Up. III, 2, 8, 'He goes to the divine Person who is greater than the great;' and Bṛi. Up. III, 7, 15, 'Who rules all beings within;' in which passages the highest Self is represented as the object of approach and as the ruler of the individual soul. In other places again the two are spoken of as non-different, so e.g. Kh. Up. VI, 8, 7, 'Thou art that;' Bṛi. Up. I, 4, 10, 'I am Brahman;' Bṛi. Up. III, 4, 1, 'This is thy Self who is within all;' Bṛi. Up. III, 7, 15, 'He is thy Self, the ruler within, the immortal.'—As thus difference and non-difference are equally vouched for by scripture, the acceptance of absolute non-difference would render futile all those as good as passed over by him, is explained by Go. Ân. as 'dhyânâdikarmany upâdhau.' Ân. Gi. says, 'âtmaprakâsarabditogñânataatkârye karmany upâdhau savisheshas' &c.

texts which speak of difference. We therefore look on the relation of the highest Self and the soul as analogous to that of the snake and its coils. Viewed as a whole the snake is one, non-different, while an element of difference appears if we view it with regard to its coils, hood, erect posture and so on.

28. Or else like that of light to its substratum, both being fire.

Or else the relation of the two may be viewed as follows. Just as the light of the sun and its substratum, i.e. the sun himself, are not absolutely different—for they both consist of fire—and yet are spoken of as different, so also the soul and the highest Self.

29. Or else (the relation of the two is to be conceived) in the manner stated above.

Or else the relation of the two has to be conceived in the manner suggested by Sūtra 25. For if the bondage of the soul is due to Nescience only, final release is possible. But if the soul is really and truly bound—whether the soul be considered as a certain condition or state of the highest Self as suggested in Sūtra 27, or as a part of the highest Self as suggested in Sūtra 28—its real bondage cannot be done away with, and thus the scriptural doctrine of final release becomes absurd.—Nor, finally, can it be said that Śruti equally teaches difference and non-difference. For non-difference only is what it aims at establishing; while, when engaged in setting forth something else, it merely refers to difference as something known from other sources of knowledge (viz. perception, &c.).—Hence the conclusion stands that the soul is not different from the highest Self, as explained in Sūtra 25.

30. And on account of the denial.

The conclusion arrived at above is confirmed by the fact of scripture expressly denying that there exists any intelligent being apart from the highest Self. Cp. 'There is no other seer but he' (Bṛi. Up. III, 7, 23). And the same conclusion follows from those passages which deny the existence of a world apart from Brahman and thus leave Brahman alone remaining, viz. 'Now then the teaching, Not so, not so !' (Bri. Up. II, 3, 6); 'That Brahman is without cause and without effect, without anything inside or outside' (Bri. Up. II, 5, 19).

31. Beyond (Brahman, there is something) further, on account of the designations of bank, measure, connexion, separation.

With reference to this Brahman which we have ascertained to be free from all plurality there now arises the doubt—due to the conflicting nature of various scriptural statements—whether something exists beyond it or not. We therefore enter on the task of explaining the true meaning of those scriptural passages which seem to indicate that there is some entity beyond, i.e. apart from Brahman.

The pûrvapakshin maintains that some entity must be admitted apart from Brahman, because Brahman is spoken of as being a bank; as having size; as being connected; as being separated.—As a bank it is spoken of in the passage, Kh. Up. VIII, 4, 1, 'That Self is a bank, a boundary.' The word 'bank' (setu) ordinarily denotes a structure of earth, wood and the like, serving the purpose of checking the flow of water. Here, being applied to the Self, it intimates that there exists something apart from the Self, just as there exists something different from an ordinary bank. The same conclusion is confirmed by the words, 'Having passed the bank' (VIII, 4, 2). For as in ordinary life a man after having crossed a bank reaches some place which is not a bank, let us say a forest; so, we must understand, a man after having crossed, i.e. passed beyond the Self reaches something which is not the Self.—As having size Brahman is spoken of in the following passages, 'This Brahman has four feet (quarters), eight hoofs, sixteen parts.' Now it is well known from ordinary experience that wherever an object, a coin, e.g. has a definite limited size, there exists something different from that object; we therefore must assume that there also exists something different from Brahman.—Brahman is declared to be connected in the following passages, 'Then he is united with the True' (Kh. Up. VI, 8, 1), and 'The embodied Self is embraced by the highest Self' (Bri. Up. IV, 3, 21). Now we observe that non-measured things are connected with things measured, men, e.g. with a town. And scripture declares that the individual souls are, in the state of deep sleep, connected with Brahman. Hence we conclude that beyond Brahman there is something unmeasured.—The same conclusion is finally confirmed by those texts which proclaim difference, so e.g. the passage, I, 6, 6 ff. ('Now that golden person who is seen within the sun' &c.), which at first refers to a Lord residing in the sun and then mentions a Lord residing in the eye, distinct from the former ('Now the person who is seen within the eye'). The text distinctly transfers to the latter the form &c. of the former¹ ('The form of that person is the same as the form of the other' &c.), and moreover declares that the lordly power of both is limited, 'He obtains through the one the worlds beyond that and the wishes of the devas' &c.; which is very much as if one should say, 'This is the reign of the king of Magadha and that the reign of the king of Videha.'

From all this it follows that there exists something different from Brahman.

32. But (Brahman is called a bank &c.) on account of (a certain) equality.

The word 'but' is meant to set aside the previously established conclusion.—There can exist nothing different from Brahman, since we are unable to observe a proof for such existence. That all existences which have a beginning spring from, subsist through, and return into Brahman we have already ascertained, and have shown that the effect is non-different from the cause.—Nor can there exist, apart from Brahman, something which has no beginning, since scripture affirms that 'Being only this was in the beginning, one, without a second.' The promise moreover that through the cognition of one thing everything will be known, renders it impossible that there should exist anything different from Brahman.—But does not the fact that the Self is called a bank, &c. indicate that there exists something beyond the Self?—No, we reply; the passages quoted by the pûrvapakshin have no power to prove his conclusion. For the text only says that the Self is a bank, not that there is something beyond it. Nor are we entitled to assume the existence of some such thing, merely to the end of accounting for the Self being called a bank; for the simple assumption of something unknown is a mere piece of arbitrariness. If, moreover, the mere fact of the Self being called a bank implied the existence of something beyond it, as in the case of an ordinary bank, we should also be compelled to conclude that the Self is made of earth and stones; which would run counter to the scriptural doctrine that the Self is not something produced.—The proper explanation is that the Self is called a bank because it resembles a bank in a certain respect; as a bank dams back the water and marks the boundary of contiguous fields, so the Self supports the world and its boundaries. The Self is thus glorified by the name of bank because it resembles one.—In the clause quoted above, 'having passed that bank,' the verb 'to pass' cannot be taken in the sense of 'going beyond,' but must rather mean 'to reach fully.' In the same way we say of a student, 'he has passed the science of grammar,' meaning thereby that he has fully mastered it.

¹ Which would be unnecessary if the two were not distinct.

33. (The statement as to Brahman having size) subserves the purpose of the mind; in the manner of the four feet (quarters).

In reply to the pûrvapakshin's contention that the statements as to Brahman's size, prove that there exists something different from Brahman, we remark that those statements merely serve the purposes of the mind, i.e. of devout meditation.—But how can the cognition of something consisting of four, or eight, or sixteen parts be referred to Brahman?—Through its modifications (effects), we reply, Brahman is assumed to be subject to measure. For as some men are of inferior, others of middling, others again of superior intelligence, not all are capable of fixing their mind on the infinite Brahman, devoid of all effects. ‘In the manner of the four feet,’ i.e. in the same way as (Kṛ. Up. III, 18), for the purpose of pious meditation, speech and three other feet are ascribed to mind viewed as the personal manifestation of Brahman, and fire and three other feet to the ether viewed as the cosmic manifestation of Brahman.—Or else the phrase, ‘in the manner of the four quarters,’ may be explained as follows. In the same way as to facilitate commerce, a kārshāpāna is assumed to be divided into four parts—for there being no fixed rule as to the value of bargains, people cannot always carry on their transactions with whole kārshāpānas only—, (so, in order to facilitate pious meditation on the part of less intelligent people, four feet, &c., are ascribed to Brahman).

34. (The statements concerning connexion and difference) are due to difference of place; in the manner of light and so on.

The present Sūtra refutes the allegation that something different from Brahman exists, firstly, because things are said to be connected with Brahman, and secondly, because things are said to be separate from it. The fact is, that all those statements regarding connexion and difference are made with a view to difference of place. When the cognition of difference which is produced by the Self’s connexion with different places, i.e. with the buddhi and the other limiting adjuncts, ceases on account of the cessation of those limiting adjuncts themselves, connexion with the highest Self is metaphorically said to take place; but that is done with a view to the limiting adjuncts only, not with a view to any limitation on the part of the Self.—In the same way, all statements regarding difference have reference to the difference of Brahman’s limiting adjuncts only, not to any difference affecting Brahman’s own nature.—All this is analogous to the case of light and the like. For the light of the sun or the moon also is differentiated by its connexion with limiting adjuncts, and is, on account of these adjuncts, spoken of as divided, and, when the adjuncts are removed, it is said to enter into connexion (union). Other instances of the effect of limiting adjuncts are furnished by the ether entering into connexion with the eyes of needles and the like.

35. And because (only such a connexion) is possible.

Moreover, only such a connexion as described above is possible. For scriptural passages, such as 'He is gone to his Self' (Kh. Up. VI, 8, 1), declare that the connexion of the soul with the highest Self is one of essential nature. But as the essential nature of a thing is imperishable, the connexion cannot be analogous to that of the inhabitants with the town, but can only be explained with reference to an obscuration, owing to Nescience, of the soul's true nature.—Similarly the difference spoken of by scripture cannot be real, but only such as is due to Nescience; for many texts declare that there exists only one Lord. Analogously, scripture teaches that the one ether is made manifold as it were by its connexion with different places 'The ether which is outside man is the ether which is inside man, and the ether within the heart' (Kh. Up. III, 12, 7 ff.).

36. (The same thing follows) from the express denial of other (existences).

Having thus refuted the arguments of the pûrvapakshin, the Sûtrakâra in conclusion strengthens his view by a further reason. A great number of Vedic passages—which, considering the context in which they stand, cannot be explained otherwise—distinctly deny that there exists anything apart from Brahman; 'He indeed is below; I am below; the Self is below' (Kh. Up. VII, 25, 1; 2); 'Who-soever looks for anything elsewhere than in the Self was abandoned by everything' (Bri. Up. II, 4, 6); 'Brahman alone is all this' (Mu. Up. II, 2, 11); 'The Self is all this' (Kh. Up. VII, 25, 2); 'In it there is no diversity' (Bri. Up. IV, 4, 19); 'He to whom there is nothing superior, from whom there is nothing different' (Svet. Up. III, 9); 'This is the Brahman without cause and without effect, without anything inside or outside' (Bri. Up. II, 5, 19).—And that there is no other Self within the highest Self, follows from that scriptural passage which teaches Brahman to be within everything (Bri. Up. II, 5, 19).

37. Thereby the omnipresence (of Brahman is established), in accordance with the statements about (Brahman's) extent.

The preceding demonstration that the texts calling Brahman a bank, and so on, are not to be taken literally, and that, on the other hand, the texts denying all plurality must be accepted as they stand, moreover, serves to prove that the Self is omnipresent. If the former texts were taken literally, banks and the like would have to be looked upon as belonging to the Self, and thence it would follow that the Self is limited. And if the texts of the latter class were not accepted as valid, there would be substances exclusive of each other, and thus the Self would again be limited.—That the Self is omnipresent follows from the texts proclaiming its extent, &c., cp. Kh. Up. VIII, 1, 3, 'As large as this ether is, so large is that ether within the heart'; 'Like the ether, he is omnipresent and eternal'; 'He is greater than the sky, greater than the ether' (Sat. Br. X, 6, 3, 2); 'He is eternal, omnipresent, firm, immoveable' (Bha. Gitā II, 24); and other similar passages from Sruti and Smṛiti.

38. From him (i.e. the Lord, there comes) the fruit (of works); for (that only) is possible.

We now turn to another characteristic belonging to Brahman, in so far as it is connected with the every-day world in which we distinguish a ruler and the objects of his rule.—There arises the question whether the threefold fruits of action which are enjoyed by the creatures in their samsāra-state—viz. pain, pleasure, and a mixture of the two—spring from the actions themselves or come from the Lord.—The Sūtrakāra embraces the latter alternative, on the ground that it is the only possible one. The ruler of all who by turns provides for the creation, the subsistence and the reabsorption of the world, and who knows all the differences of place and time, he alone is capable of effecting all those modes of requital which are in accordance with the merit of the agents; actions, on the other hand, which pass away as soon as done, have no power of bringing about results at some future time, since nothing can spring from nothing. Nor can the latter difficulty be overcome by the assumption that an action passes away only after having produced some result according to its nature, and that the agent will at some future time enjoy that fruit of his action. For the fruit of an action is such only through being enjoyed by the agent; only at the moment when some pleasure or some pain—the result of some deed—is enjoyed by the doer of the deed people understand it to be a ‘fruit.’—Nor, in the second place, have we the right to assume that the fruit will, at some future time, spring from the so-called supersensuous principle (apūrva), which itself is supposed to be a direct result of the deed; for that so-called supersensuous principle is something of non-intelligent nature, comparable to a piece of wood or metal, and as such cannot act unless moved by some intelligent being. And moreover there is no proof whatever for the existence of such an apūrva.—But is it not proved by the fact that deeds are actually requited?—By no means, we reply; for the fact of requital may be accounted for by the action of the Lord.

39. And because it is declared by scripture.

We assume the Lord to bring about the fruits of actions, not only because no other assumption appears plausible, but also because we have direct scriptural statement on our side. Cp. e.g. the passage, ‘This indeed is the great, unborn Self, the giver of food, the giver of wealth’ (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 24).

40. Gaimini (thinks) for the same reasons that religious merit (is what brings about the fruits of actions).

Gaimini bases a contrary opinion on the reasons specified in the last two Sūtras. Scripture, he argues, proclaims injunctions such as the following one, 'He who is desirous of the heavenly world is to sacrifice.' Now as it is admitted that such scriptural injunctions must have an object, we conclude that the sacrifice itself brings about the result, i. e. the obtainment of the heavenly world ; for if this were not so, nobody would perform sacrifices and thereby scriptural injunctions would be rendered purposeless.—But has not this view of the matter already been abandoned, on the ground that an action which passes away as soon as done can have no fruit?—We must, the reply is, follow the authority of scripture and assume such a connexion of action and fruit as agrees with scriptural statement. Now it is clear that a deed cannot effect a result at some future time, unless, before passing away, it gives birth to some unseen result ; we therefore assume that there exists some result which we call apūrva, and which may be viewed either as an imperceptible after-state of the deed or as an imperceptible antecedent state of the result. This hypothesis removes all difficulties, while on the other hand it is impossible that the Lord should effect the results of actions. For in the first place, one uniform cause cannot be made to account for a great variety of effects ; in the second place, the Lord would have to be taxed with partiality and cruelty ; and in the third place, if the deed itself did not bring about its own fruit, it would be useless to perform it at all.—For all these reasons the result springs from the deed only, whether meritorious or non-meritorious.

41. Bādārayana, however, thinks the former (i. e. the Lord, to be the cause of the fruits of action), since he is designated as the cause (of the actions themselves).

The teacher Bādārayana thinks that the previously-mentioned Lord is the cause of the fruits of action. The word 'however' sets aside the view of the fruit being produced either by the mere deed or the mere apūrva.—The final conclusion then is that the fruits come from the Lord acting with a view to the deeds done by the souls, or, if it be so preferred, with a view to the apūrva springing from the deeds. This view is proved by the circumstance of scripture representing the Lord not only as the giver of fruits but also as the causal agent with reference to all actions whether good or evil. Compare the passage, Kau. Up. III, 8, 'He makes him whom he wishes to lead up from these worlds do a good deed; and the same makes him whom he wishes to lead down from these worlds do a bad deed.' The same is said in the Bhagavadgītā (VII, 21), 'Whichever divine form a devotee wishes to worship with faith, to that form I render his faith steady. Holding that faith he strives to propitiate the deity and obtains from it the benefits he desires, as ordained by me.'

All Vedānta-texts moreover declare that the Lord is the only cause of all creation. And his creating all creatures in forms and conditions corresponding to—and retributive of—their former deeds, is just what entitles us to call the Lord the cause of all fruits of actions. And as the Lord has regard to the merit and demerit of the souls, the objections raised above—as to one uniform cause being inadequate to the production of various effects, &c.—are without any foundation.

THIRD PĀDA.

REVERENCE TO THE HIGHEST SELF!

1. (The cognitions) intimated by all the Vedānta-texts (are identical), on account of the non-difference of injunction and so on.

In the preceding part of this work we have explained the nature of the object of cognition, i.e. Brahman. We now enter on the discussion of the question whether the cognitions of Brahman, which form the subject of the different Vedānta-texts, are separate cognitions or not.

But, an objection may here be raised, so far we have determined that Brahman is free from all distinctions whatever, one, of absolutely uniform nature like a lump of salt; hence there appears to be no reason for even raising the question whether the cognitions of Brahman are separate cognitions or constitute only one cognition. For as Brahman is one and of uniform nature, it certainly cannot be maintained that the Vedānta-texts aim at establishing a plurality in Brahman comparable to the plurality of works (inculcated by the karmakāṇḍa of the Veda). Nor can it be said that although Brahman is uniform, yet it may be the object of divers cognitions; for any difference in nature between the cognition and the object known points to a mistake committed. If, on the other hand, it should be assumed that the different Vedānta-texts aim at teaching different cognitions of Brahman, it would follow that only one cognition can be the right one while all others are mistaken, and that would lead to a general distrust of all Vedānta.—Hence the question whether each individual Vedānta-text teaches a separate cognition of Brahman or not cannot even be raised.—Nor, supposing that question were raised after all, can the non-difference of the cognition of Brahman be demonstrated (as the Sūtra attempts) on the ground that all Vedānta-texts are equally injunctions, since the cognition of Brahman is not of the nature of an injunction. For the teacher has proved at length (I, 1, 4) that the knowledge of Brahman is produced by passages which treat of Brahman as an existing accomplished thing and thus do not aim at enjoining anything.—Why then begin at all this discussion about the difference or non-difference of the cognitions of Brahman?

To all this we reply that no objection can be raised against a discussion of that kind, since the latter has for its object only the qualified Brahman and prāṇa and the like. For devout meditations on the qualified Brahman may, like acts, be either identical or different. Scripture moreover teaches that, like acts, they have various results; some of them have visible results, others unseen results, and others again—as conducive to the springing up of perfect knowledge—have for their result release by successive steps. With a view to those meditations, therefore, we may raise the question whether the individual Vedānta-texts teach different cognitions of Brahman or not.

The arguments which may here be set forth by the pûrvapakshin are as follows. In the first place it is known that difference may be proved by names, as e.g. in the case of the sacrificial performance called 'light' (gyotis)¹. And the cognitions of Brahman which are enjoined in the different Vedānta-texts are connected with different names such as the Taittirīyaka, the Vāgasaneyaka, the Kauthumaka, the Kaushītaka, the Sātyāyanaka, &c.—In the second place the separateness of actions is proved by the difference of form (characteristics; rûpa). So e.g. with reference to the passage, 'the milk is for the Viśvedevas, the water for the vâgins'².

¹ See the samgṛāhṇakarmabhedādhikaraṇa, Pû. Mî. Sû. II, 2, 22, where the decision is that the word gyotis (in 'athaisha gyotir' &c.) denotes not the gyotishoma but a separate sacrificial performance.

² See Pû. Mî. Sû. II, 2, 23. The offering of water made to the divinities called vâgin is separate from the offering of milk to the Viśvedevas; for the material offered as well as the divinity to which the offering is made (i.e. the two rûpa of the sacrifice) differs in the two cases.

Now similar differences of form are met with in the Vedānta-texts; the followers of one Sākhā, e.g. mention, in the chapter called 'the knowledge of the five fires,' a sixth fire, while other Sākhās mention five only; and in the colloquy of the prāṇas some texts mention a lesser, others a greater number of organs and powers of the body.—In the third place differences in qualifying particulars (dharma) are supposed to prove difference of acts, and such differences also are met with in the Vedānta-texts; only in the Mundaka-Upanishad, e.g. it is said that the science of Brahman must be imparted to those only who have performed the rite of carrying fire on the head (Mu. Up. III, 2, 10).—In the same way the other reasons which are admitted to prove the separateness of actions, such as repetition and so on, are to be applied in a suitable manner to the different Vedānta-texts also.—We therefore maintain that each separate Vedānta-text teaches a different cognition of Brahman.

To this argumentation of the pūrvapakshin we make the following reply.—The cognitions enjoined by all the Vedānta-texts are the same, owing to the non-difference of injunction and so on. The 'and so on' refers to the other reasons proving non-difference of acts which are enumerated in the Siddhānta-sūtra of the adhikaraṇa treating of the different Sākhās (Pū. Mī. II, 4, 9, '(the act) is one on account of the non-difference of connexion of form, of injunction, and of name'). Thus, as the agnihotra though described in different Sākhās is yet one, the same kind of human activity being enjoined in all by means of the words, 'He is to offer;' so the injunction met with in the text of the Vāgasaneyins (Bṛi. Up. VI, 1, 1), 'He who knows the oldest and the best,' &c., is the same as that which occurs in the text of the Khândogas, 'He who knows the first and the best' (Kh. Up. V, 1, 1). The connexion of the meditation enjoined with its aim is likewise the same in both texts, 'He becomes the first and best among his people.' In both texts again the cognition enjoined has the same form. For in both the object of knowledge is the true nature of the prāṇa which is characterised by certain qualities such as being the first and best, and just as the material and the divinity constitute the form of the sacrifice, so the object known constitutes the form of the cognition. And finally both cognitions have the same name, viz. the knowledge of the prāṇa.—For these reasons we declare that the different Vedānta-texts enjoin identical cognitions.—A similar line of reasoning applies to other cognitions which are met with in more than one Vedānta-text, so e.g. to the knowledge of the five fires, the knowledge of Vaisvānara, the knowledge of Sāṇḍilya and so on.—Of the apparent reasons on the ground of which the pūrvapakshin above tried to show that the meditations are not identical but separate a refutation is to be found in the Pūrvā Mīmāṃsā-sūtras II, 4, 10 ff.

The next Sūtra disposes of a doubt which may remain even after the preceding discussion.

2. (If it be said that the vidyās are separate) on account of the difference (of secondary matters), we deny that, since even in one and the same vidyā (different secondary matters may find place).

In spite of the preceding argumentation we cannot admit that the different cognitions of Brahman are equally intimated by all Vedānta-texts, because we meet with differences in secondary matters (guṇa). Thus the Vāgasaneyins mention in their text of the knowledge of the five fires a sixth fire ('And then the fire is indeed fire,' Bṛi. Up. VI, 2, 14), while the Kṛandogas mention no sixth fire but conclude their text of the pañcāgnividyā with the express mention of five fires ('But he who thus knows the five fires,' Kṛ. Up. V, 10, 10).

Now it is impossible to admit that the cognition of those who admit that particular qualification (i.e. the sixth fire) and of those who do not should be one and the same. Nor may we attempt to evade the difficulty by saying that the sixth fire may be tacitly included in the vidyā of the Kṛandogas; for that would contradict the number 'five' expressly stated by them.—In the colloquy of the prāṇas again the Khândogas mention, in addition to the most important prâṇa, four other prâṇas, viz. speech, the eye, the ear, and the mind ; while the Vâgasaneyins mention a fifth one also, 'Seed indeed is generation. He who knows that becomes rich in offspring and cattle' (Bri. Up. VI, 1, 6).—Now a difference of procedure in the point of addition and omission effects a difference in the object known, and the latter again effects a difference in the vidyâ, just as a difference in the point of material and divinity distinguishes one sacrifice from another.

To this we make the following reply.—Your objection is without force, since such differences of qualification as are met with in the above instances are possible even in one and the same vidyâ. In the Khândogya-text a sixth fire is indeed not included ; yet, as five fires, beginning with the heavenly world, are recognised as the same in both texts the mentioned difference cannot effect a split of the vidyâ ; not any more than the atirâtra-sacrifice is differentiated by the shodasin-rite being either used or not-used. Moreover, the Khândogya-text also actually mentions a sixth fire, viz. in the passage, V, 9, 2, 'When he has departed, his friends carry him, as appointed, to the fire.'—The Vâgasaneyins, on the other hand, mention their sixth fire ('and then the fire is indeed fire, the fuel fuel,' &c.) for the purpose of cutting short the fanciful assumption regarding fuel, smoke, and so on, which runs through the description of the five fires with which the heavenly world and so on are imaginatively identified. Their statement regarding the sixth fire (has therefore not the purpose of enjoining it as an object of meditation but) is merely a remark about something already established (known)¹. And even if we assume that the statement about the sixth fire has the purpose of representing that fire as an object of devout meditation, yet the fire may be inserted in the vidyâ of the Khândogas without any fear of its being in conflict with the number five mentioned there ; for that number is not an essential part of the injunction¹, but merely makes an additional statement regarding something known already from the text, viz. the five fires with which the heavenly world and so on are identified². Similarly nothing stands in the way of some additional qualification being included in the vidyā concerning the colloquy of the prāṇas and so on. The addition or omission of some particular qualification is unable to introduce difference into the object of knowledge and thereby into the knowledge itself; for although the objects of knowledge may differ partly, yet their greater part and at the same time the knowing person are understood to be the same. Hence the vidyā also remains the same.

¹ Viz. the real fire in which the dead body is burned and which is known from perception.

3. (The rite of carrying fire on the head is an attribute) of the study of the Veda (of the Ātharvanikas); because in the Samākāra (it is mentioned) as being such. (This also follows) from the general subject-matter, and the limitation (of the rite to the Ātharvanikas) is analogous to that of the libations.

With reference to the pūrvapakshin's averment that the rite of carrying fire on the head is connected with the vidyā of the followers of the Atharva-veda only, not with any other vidyā, and that thereby the vidyā of the Ātharvanikas is separated from all other vidyās, the following remarks have to be made.—The rite of carrying fire on the head is an attribute not of the vidyā, but merely of the study of the Veda on the part of the Ātharvanikas. This we infer from the circumstance that the Ātharvanikas, in the book called 'Samākāra' which treats of Vedic observances, record the above rite also as being of such a nature, i.e. as constituting an attribute of the study of the Veda. At the close of the Upanishad moreover we have the following sentence, 'A man who has not performed the rites does not read this;’ here we conclude from the word ‘this’ which refers to the subject previously treated, and from the fact of ‘reading’ being mentioned, that the rite is an attribute of the study of the Upanishad of the Ātharvavikās (but has nothing to do with the Upanishad itself).—But what about the immediately preceding passage, ‘Let a man tell this science of Brahman to those only by whom the rite of carrying fire on the head has been performed according to rule?’ Here the rite in question is connected with the science of Brahman, and as all science of Brahman is one only, it follows that the rite has to be connected with all science of Brahman!—Not so, we reply; for in the above passage also the word ‘this’ refers back to what forms the subject of the antecedent part of the Upanishad, and that subject is constituted by the science of Brahman only in so far as depending on a particular book (viz. the Mundaka-Upanishad); hence the rite also is connected with that particular book only.—The Sūtra adds another illustrative instance in the words ‘and as in the case of the libations there is limitation of that.’ As the seven libations—from the saurya libation up to the sataudana libation—since they are not connected with the triad of fires taught in the other Vedas, but only with the one fire which is taught in the Atharvan, are thereby enjoined exclusively on the followers of the Atharvan; so the rite of carrying fire on the head also is limited to the study of that particular Veda with which scriptural statements connect it.—The doctrine of the unity of the vidyās thus remains unshaken.

¹ I.e. the Khândogya-text contains no injunction that five fires only are to be meditated upon.

² So that there stands nothing in the way of our amplifying our meditation by the addition of a sixth fire.

4. (Scripture) also declares this.

The Veda also declares the identity of the vidyās; for all Vedānta-texts represent the object of knowledge as one; cp. e.g. Kā. Up. I, 2, 15, ‘That word which all the Vedas record;’ Ait. Ār. III, 2, 3, 12, ‘Him only the Bahvrikās consider in the great hymn, the Adhvaryus in the sacrificial fire, the Khandogas in the Mahāvratā ceremony.’—To quote some other instances proving the unity of the vidyās: Kā. Up. I, 6, 2, mentions as one of the Lord’s qualities that he causes fear; now this very same quality is referred to in the Taitt. Up. II, 7, in order to intimate disapprobation of those who are opposed to the absolute unity of that which is, 'For if he makes but the smallest distinction in it (the Self), there is fear for him. But that fear is only for him who knows (a difference) and does not know (the oneness).'—Similarly the Vaisvânara, who in the Vâgasaneyaka is imaginatively represented as a span long, is referred to in the Khândogya as something well known, 'But he who worships that Vaisvânara Self which is a span long,' &c. (Kh. Up. V, 18, 1).

And as, on the ground of all Vedânta-texts intimating the same matters, hymns and the like which are enjoined in one place are employed in other places (where they are not expressly enjoined) for the purposes of devout meditation, it follows that all Vedânta-texts intimate also (identical) devout meditations.

5. In the case of (a devout meditation) common (to several Sâkhâs) (the particulars mentioned in each Sâkhâ) have to be combined, since there is no difference of essential matter; just as in the case of what is complementary to injunctions.

[This Sûtra states the practical outcome of the discussion carried on in the first four Sûtras.] It having been determined that the cognitions of Brahman are equally intimated by all Vedânta-texts, it follows that as long as the cognition is one and the same its specific determinations mentioned in one text are to be introduced into other texts also where they are not mentioned. For if the matter of these determinations subserves some particular cognition in one place, it subserves it in another place also, since in both places we have to do with one and the same cognition. The case is analogous to that of the things subordinate to some sacrificial performance, as, e.g. the agnihotra. The agnihotra also is one performance, and therefore its subordinate members, although they may be mentioned in different texts, have to be combined into one whole.—If the cognitions were separate, the particulars mentioned in different texts could not be combined; for they would be confined each to its own cognition and would not stand to each other in that relation in which the typical form of a sacrifice stands to its modifications¹. But as the cognitions are one, things lie differently.—The above Sūtra will be explained and applied at length further on, in Sūtra 10 ff.

6. If it be said that (the udgītha vidyā of the Bṛi. Up. and that of the Khând. Up.) are separate on account (of the difference) of the texts; we deny this on the ground of their (essential) non-difference.

We read in the Vāgasaneyaka I, 3, 1, 'The Devas said, well, let us overcome the Asuras at the sacrifices by means of the Udgītha. They said to speech: Do thou sing out for us.—Yes, said speech,' &c. The text thereupon relates how speech and the other prāṇas were pierced by the Asuras with evil, and therefore unable to effect what was expected from them, and how in the end recourse was had to the chief vital air, 'Then they said to the breath in the mouth: Do thou sing for us.—Yes, said the breath, and sang.'—A similar story is met with in the Khândogya I, 2. There we read at first that 'the devas took the udgītha, thinking they would vanquish the Asuras with it;' the text then relates how the other prāṇas were pierced with evil and thus foiled by the Asuras, and how the Devas in the end had recourse to the chief vital air, 'Then comes this chief vital air; on that they meditated as udgītha.'—As both these passages glorify the chief vital air, it follows that they both are injunctions of a meditation on the vital air. A doubt, however, arises whether the two vidyās are separate vidyās or one vidyā only.

Here the pūrvapakshin maintains that for the reasons specified in the first adhikaraṇa of the present pāda the two vidyās have to be considered as one.—But, an objection is raised, there is a difference of procedure which contradicts the assumption of unity. The Vāgasaneyins represent the chief vital air as the producer of the udgītha ('Do thou sing out for us'), while the Khândogas speak of it as itself being the udgītha ('on that they meditated as udgītha'). How can this divergence be reconciled with the assumption of the unity of the vidyās?—The difference pointed out, the pūrvapakshin replies, is not important enough to bring about a separation of the two vidyās, since we observe that the two both agree in a plurality of points. Both texts relate that the Devas and the Asuras were fighting; both at first glorify speech and the other prāṇas in their relation to the udgītha, and thereupon, finding fault with them, pass on to the chief vital air; both tell how through the strength of the latter the Asuras were scattered as a ball of earth is scattered when hitting a solid stone. And, moreover, the text of the Vāgasaneyaka also co-ordinates the chief vital air and the udgītha in the clause, 'He is udgītha' (Bṛi. Up. I, 3, 23). We therefore have to assume that in the Khândogya also the chief prāṇa has secondarily to be looked upon as the producer of the udgītha.—The two texts thus constitute one vidyā only.

¹ The Pūrvā Mīmāṃsā teaches that all subordinate things which the Veda prescribes for some typical sacrifice are eo ipso prescribed for the modified forms of the sacrifice also.

7. Or rather there is no (unity of the vidyās), owing to the difference of subject-matter.

Setting aside the view maintained by the pūrvapakshin, we have rather to say that, owing to the difference of subject-matter, the two vidyās are separate.—In the Khândogya the introductory sentence (I, 1, 1), 'Let a man meditate on the syllable Om (as) the udgītha,' represents as the object of meditation the syllable Om which is a part of the udgītha; thereupon proceeds to give an account of its qualities such as being the inmost essence of all ('The full account, however, of Om is this,' &c.); and later on tells, with reference to the same syllable Om which is a part of the udgītha, a story about the Gods and Asuras in which there occurs the statement, 'They meditated on the udgītha as that breath¹. If now we should assume² that the term 'udgītha' denotes here the whole act of worship (not only the syllable Om which is a part of the udgītha), and that (in the passage, 'they meditated on the udgītha as that breath') the performer of that worship, i.e. the Udgātri-priest, is said to be meditated upon as breath; our interpretation would be open to two objections: in the first place it would be opposed to the introductory sentence (which directly declares the syllable Om to be the object of devotion); and in the second place it would oblige us to take the word udgītha (in 'they meditated on the udgītha'), not in its direct sense, but as denoting by implication the udgātri. But the rule is that in one and the same connected passage the interpretation of later passages has to adapt itself to the earlier passages. We therefore conclude the passage last quoted to teach that the syllable Om which is a part of the udgītha is to be meditated upon as prāṇa.—In the Vāgasaneyaka on the other hand there is no reason for taking the word udgītha to denote a part of the udgītha only, and we therefore must interpret it to denote the whole; and in the passage, 'Do thou sing out for us,' the performer of the worship, i.e. the Udgātri-priest, is described as prāṇa. In reply to the pūrvapakshin's remark that in the Vāgasaneyaka also the udgītha and the prāṇa occur in co-ordination (in the passage, 'He is udgītha'), we point out that that statement merely aims at showing that the Self of all is that prāṇa which the text wishes to represent as udgātri. The statement, therefore, does not imply the unity of the two vidyās. Moreover, there also the term udgītha denotes the whole act of worship (while in the Khândogya it denotes the omkāra only). Nor must it be said that the prāṇa can

¹ From which it appears that the Khândogya enjoins throughout a meditation on the syllable Om which is only a part of the udgītha; while the object of meditation enjoined in the Bṛihad-āraṇyaka is the whole udgītha.

² Viz. for the purpose of making out that the object of meditation is the same in the Khândogya and the Bṛihad-āraṇyaka.

impossibly be an udgâtri, and that on that account our interpretation of the Bṛihad-Āraṇyaka passage is erroneous; for with a view to pious meditation scripture may represent the prâṇa as udgâtri as well as udgîtha. And, moreover, the Udgâtri actually performs his work by the strength of his breath; hence the prâṇa may be called udgâtri. In accordance with this the text says (I, 3, 24), 'He sang it indeed as speech and breath.'—And if we understand that the text clearly intends to convey a difference of matter we have no right to conclude from merely apparent similarities of expression that only one matter is intended to be expressed. To quote an analogous instance from the karmakāṇḍa: In the section relative to the unexpected rising of the moon during the darsa-sacrifice, as well as in the section about the offering to be made by him who is desirous of cattle, we meet with identical injunctions such as the following one, 'He is to divide the grains into three portions, and to make those of medium size into a cake offered on eight potsherds to Agni the Giver,' &c.; nevertheless it follows from the difference of the introductory passages of the two sections that the offerings to be made on account of the moon's rising are indeed not connected with the divinities of the darsa-sacrifice (but do not constitute a new sacrifice separate from the darsa), while the section about him who is desirous of cattle enjoins a separate sacrificial performance¹.—Analogously a difference in the nature of the introductory clauses effects a difference of the vidyās, 'As in the case of that which is greater than great.' That means: Just as the meditation on the udgîtha enjoined in the passage, 'Ether is greater than these, ether is their rest; he is indeed the udgîtha, greater than great, he is without end' (Kh. Up. I, 9, 1), and the other meditation on the udgîtha as possessing the qualities of abiding within the eye and the sun, &c. (Kh. Up. I, 6), are separate meditations, although in both the udgîtha is identified with the highest Self; so it is with vidyās in general. The special features of different vidyās are not to be combined even when the vidyās belong to one and the same Sākhā ; much less then when they belong to different Sākhās.

¹ Cp. Taitt. Samh. II, 5, 5, 2; Pû. Mî. Sû. VI, 5, 1.

8. If it be said (that the vidyās are one) on account of (the identity of) name ; (we reply that) that is explained (already) ; moreover that (identity of name) is (found in the case of admittedly separate vidyās).

Here it might be said that after all the unity of the two vidyās discussed must be admitted, since they are called by one and the same name, viz. 'the science of the udgītha.'—But this argument is of no avail against what has been said under the preceding Sūtra. The decision there advocated has the advantage of following the letter of the revealed text ; the name 'udgītha-vidyā' on the other hand is not a part of the revealed text, but given to the vidyās for convenience sake by ordinary men for the reason that the word 'udgītha' is met with in the text.—Moreover, we observe that admittedly separate meditations such as the two mentioned under the last Sūtra have one and the same name. Similarly altogether separate sacrificial performances, such as the agnihotra, the darsapūṛṇamāsa, and so on, are all comprised under the one name Kāṭhaka, merely because they are recorded in the one book called Kāṭhaka.—Where, on the other hand, there is no special reason for assuming the difference of vidyās, their unity may be declared on the ground of identity of name ; as, e.g. in the case of the Saṃvargavidyās.

9. And on account of the (omkāra) extending over the whole (Veda), (the view that the term udgītha expresses a specialisation) is appropriate.

In the passage, 'Let a man meditate on the syllable Om (as) the udgītha,' the two words 'omkāra' and 'udgītha' are placed in co-ordination¹. The question then arises whether the relation in which the ideas conveyed by these two words stand to each other is the relation of superimposition (adhyāsa) or sublation (apavāda) or unity (ekatva) or specification (viśeṣaṇa); for primā facie each of these relations may present itself to the mind.—Adhyāsa takes place when the idea of one of two things not being dismissed from the mind, the idea of the second thing is superimposed on that of the first thing; so that together with the superimposed idea the former idea remains attached to the thing on which the second idea is superimposed. When e.g. the idea of (the entity) Brahman superimposes itself upon the idea of the name, the latter idea continues in the mind and is not driven out by the former. A similar instance is furnished by the superimposition of the idea of the god Viṣṇu on a statue of Viṣṇu. So, in the case under discussion also, the idea of the udgītha may be superimposed on the omkāra or the idea of the omkāra on the udgītha.—We, in the second place, have apavāda when an idea previously attached to some object is recognised as false and driven out by the true idea springing up after the false one. So e.g. when the false idea of the body, the senses, and so on being the Self is driven out by the true idea springing up later—and expressed by judgments such as ‘Thou art that’—that the idea of the Self is to be attached to the Self only. Or, to quote another example, when a previous mistaken notion as to the direction of the points of the compass is replaced by the true notion. So here also the idea of the udgītha may drive out the idea of the omkāra or vice versa.—The relation would, in the third place, be that of ‘unity’ if the terms ‘omkāra’ and ‘udgītha’ were co-extensive in meaning; just as the terms, ‘the Best of the Twice-born,’ ‘the Brāhmaṇa,’ ‘the god among men,’ all denote an individual of the noblest caste.—The relation will, finally, be that of specification if, there being a possibility of our understanding the omkāra in so far as co-extensive with all the Vedas, the term ‘udgītha’ calls up the idea of the sphere of action of the udgātṛi. The passage would then mean, ‘Let a man meditate on that omkāra which is the udgītha,’ and would be analogous to an injunction such as 'Let him bring that lotus-flower which is blue.'

¹ Sāmānādhikaranyā, i.e. literally, 'the relation of abiding in a common substratum.'—The two words are shown to stand in that relation by their being exhibited in the same case.

All these alterations present themselves to the mind, and as there is no reason for deciding in favour of any one, the question must remain an unsettled one.

To this pûrvapaksha-view the Sûtra replies, 'And on account of extending over the whole, it is appropriate.'

The word 'and' stands here in place of 'but,' and is meant to discard the three other alternatives. Three out of the four alternatives are to be set aside as objectionable; the fourth, against which nothing can be urged, is to be adopted.—The objections lying against the first three alternatives are as follows. In the case of adhyâsa we should have to admit that the word which expresses the idea superimposed is not to be taken in its direct sense, but in an implied sense¹; and we should moreover have to imagine some fruit for a meditation of that kind². Nor can it be said that we need not imagine such a fruit, as scripture itself mentions it in the passage, 'He becomes indeed a fulfiller of desires' (I, 1, 7); for this passage indicates the fruit, not of the ideal superimposition of the udgîtha on the omkâra, but of the meditation in which the omkâra is viewed as the fulfilment of desires.—Against the hypothesis of an apavâda there likewise lies the objection that no fruit is to be seen. The cessation of wrong knowledge can certainly not be alleged as such; for we see no reason why the cessation of the idea that the omkâra is udgîtha and not omkâra or vice versâ should be beneficial to man. Sublation of the one idea by the other is moreover not even possible in our case; for to the omkâra the idea of the omkâra remains always attached, and so to the udgîtha the idea of the udgîtha. The passage, moreover, does not aim at teaching the true nature of something, but at enjoining a meditation of a certain kind.—The hypothesis of unity again is precluded by the consideration that as in that case one term would suffice to convey the intended meaning, the employment of two terms would be purposeless. And moreover the term ‘udgîtha’ is never used to denote the omkāra in its connexion with the Rîg-veda and Yagur-veda; nor is the word ‘omkāra’ used to denote that entire second subdivision of a sâman which is denoted by the word ‘udgîtha.’ Hence it cannot be said that we have to do with different words only denoting one and the same thing.—There thus remains the fourth alternative, ‘On account of its comprising all the Vedas.’ That means: In order that the omkāra may not be understood here as that one which comprises all the Vedas, it is specified by means of the word ‘udgîtha,’ in order that that omkāra which constitutes a part of the udgîtha may be apprehended.—But does not this interpretation also involve the admission of implication, as according to it the word ‘udgîtha’ denotes not the whole udgîtha but only a part of it, viz. the omkāra?—True, but we have to distinguish those cases in which the implied meaning is not far remote from the direct meaning and those in which it is remote. If, in the present case, we embrace the alternative of adhyâsa, we have to assume an altogether remote implication, the idea of one matter being superimposed on the idea of an altogether different matter. If, on the other hand, we adopt the alternative of specification, the implication connected therewith is an easy one, the word which in its direct sense denotes the whole being understood to denote the part. And that words denoting the whole do duty for words denoting the part is a matter of common occurrence; the words ‘cloth,’ ‘village,’ and many others are used in this fashion¹.—For all these reasons we declare that the appropriate view of the Khândogya-passage is to take the word ‘udgîtha’ as specialising the term ‘omkāra’².

¹ I.e. in the present case we should have to assume that the word udgîtha means, by implication, the omkâra.—Recourse may be had to implied meanings only when the direct meaning is clearly impossible.

² For a special adhyâsa-meditation must be attended with a special result.

¹ We say, e.g. ‘the cloth is burned,’ even if only a part of the cloth is burned.

² We therefore, according to Saṅkara, have to render the passage

10. Those (qualities which are attributed to the subject of a vidyā in one Sākhā only) (are to be inserted) in other places (also), since (the vidyās) are non-different on the whole.

In the colloquy of the prāṇas recorded by the Vāgasaneyins and the Kāṇḍogas the prāṇa, endowed with various qualities such as being the best and so on, is represented as the object of meditation, and various qualities such as being the richest and the like are ascribed to speech and the other organs. And these latter qualities are in the end attributed to the prāṇa also, 'If I am the richest thou art the richest,' &c. Now in other Sākhās also, as e.g. that of the Kaushītakins, the former set of qualities such as being the best and so on is ascribed to the prāṇa (cp. Kau. Up. II, 14, 'Now follows the Nisṛeyasādāna,' &c.), but at the same time the latter set of attributes, viz. being the richest and so on, is not mentioned.—The question then is whether those qualities which are mentioned in some places only are, for the purposes of meditation, to be inserted there also where nothing is said about them.

They are not so to be inserted, the pūrvapakshin maintains, on account of the employment of the word 'thus.' In the Kaushītakin-text we meet with the clause, 'He who knows thus, having recognised the pre-eminence in prāṇa.' Now the word 'thus' which here indicates the object of knowledge always refers to something mentioned not far off, and cannot therefore denote a set of qualities mentioned in other Sākhās only. We therefore maintain that each of the colloquies of the prāṇas must be considered complete with the qualities stated in itself.

To this we make the following reply. The qualities mentioned in one text are to be inserted in the other corresponding texts also, 'Since on the whole they are non-different,' i.e. because the prāṇa-vidyās are recognised to be the same in all essential points. And if they are the same, under discussion as follows, 'Let a man meditate on the syllable Om which is (i.e. which is a part of) the udgītha.'

why should the qualities stated in one not be inserted in the others also?—But how about the objection founded by the pûrvapakshin on the employment of the word ‘thus?’—Although it is true, we reply, that the word ‘thus’ in the Kaushitakin-brāhmaṇa does not denote the set of qualities mentioned in the Vāgasaneyin-brāhmaṇa, yet that set of qualities is denoted by the ‘thus’ met with in the Vāgasaneyin-brāhmaṇa, while the vidyā is, as proved by us, one and the same; hence no difference has to be made between qualities mentioned in one’s own Sākhā and qualities mentioned in another Sākhā, as long as the vidyā is one and the same. Nor does this by any means imply a disregard of the text of scripture, and the assumption of things not warranted by the text. The qualities declared in one Sākhā are valid for all scripture as long as the thing to which the qualities belong is the same. Devadatta, who in his own country is known to possess valour and certain other qualities, does not lose those qualities by going to a foreign land, although the inhabitants of that land may know nothing about them. And through better acquaintance his qualities will become manifest to the people of the foreign country also. Similarly the qualities stated in one Sākhā may, through special application, be inserted in another Sākhā.—Hence the attributes belonging to one and the same subject have to be combined wherever that subject is referred to, although they may be expressly stated in one place only.

11. Bliss and other (qualities) as belonging to the subject of the qualities (have to be attributed to Brahman everywhere).

Those scriptural texts which aim at intimating the characteristics of Brahman separately ascribe to it various qualities, such as having bliss for its nature, being one mass of knowledge, being omnipresent, being the Self of all and so on. Now the doubt here presents itself whether in each place where Brahman is spoken of we have to understand only those qualities which actually are mentioned there, or whether we have to combine all qualities of Brahman mentioned anywhere.

The pûrvapakshin maintains that only the attributes actually stated are to be understood as referred to in each particular scriptural text.—But this view the Sûtrakâra discards by declaring that delight and all the other qualities which belong to the subject, i.e. Brahman, are all of them to be understood in each place. The reason for this conclusion is the one given in Sûtra 10. In all the passages treating of Brahman the subject to which the qualities belong is one, non-different; hence, as explained at length under the preceding Sûtra, the qualities attributed to Brahman in any one place have to be combined wherever Brahman is spoken of.

But in that case also such qualities as having joy for its head, &c., would have to be ascribed to Brahman everywhere; for we read in the Taittiriyaka with reference to the Self consisting of Bliss, 'Joy is its head, satisfaction is its right arm, great satisfaction its left arm, bliss is its trunk, Brahman is its tail, its support' (II, 5).

To this objection the next Sûtra replies.

12. (Such qualities as) joy being its head and so on have no force (for other passages); for increase and decrease belong to plurality (only).

Attributes such as having joy for its head and so on, which are recorded in the Taittiriyaka, are not to be viewed as having force with regard to other passages treating of Brahman, because the successive terms, 'Joy,' 'Satisfaction,' 'Great Satisfaction,' 'Bliss,' indicate qualities possessing lower and higher degrees with regard to each other and to other enjoyers. Now for higher and lower degrees there is room only where there is plurality; and Brahman is without all plurality, as we know from many scriptural passages ('One only, without a Second').—Moreover, we have already demonstrated under I, 1, 12, that having joy for one's head and so on are qualities not of Brahman, but of the so-called involucrum of delight. And further, those qualities are attributed to the highest Brahman merely as means of fixing one's mind on it, not as themselves being objects of contemplation, and from this also it follows that they are not valid everywhere¹.—That the Âkârya refers to them, in the Sûtra, as attributes of Brahman (while in reality they are attributes of the ânandamaya kosa) is merely done for the purpose of establishing a general principle to be extended to all attributes of Brahman—also the undoubted ones—which are stated with a view to a special form of meditation only; such as the quality of being that towards which all blessings go (Kh. Up. IV, 15, 2), or he whose desires are true (Kh. Up. VIII, 7, 1). For those passages may all indeed have to do with the one Brahman as the object of meditation, but as owing to the different nature of the opening sentences the meditations are different ones, the attributes mentioned in any one are not valid for the others. The case is analogous to that of two wives ministering to one king, one with a fly-flap, the other with an umbrella; there also the object of their ministrations is one, but the acts of ministration themselves are distinct and have each their own particular attributes. So in the case under discussion also. Qualities in which lower and higher degrees can be distinguished belong to the qualified Brahman only in which plurality is admitted, not to the highest Brahman raised above all qualification. Such attributes therefore as having true desires and the like which are mentioned in some particular place only have no validity for other meditations on Brahman.

13. But other (attributes are valid for all passages relative to Brahman), the purport being the same.

Other attributes, however, such as bliss and so on which scripture sets forth for the purpose of teaching the true nature of Brahman are to be viewed as valid for all passages referring to Brahman; for their purport, i.e. the Brahman whose nature is to be taught, is one. Those attributes are mentioned with a view to knowledge only, not to meditation.

¹ For if they are not real attributes of Brahman there is all the less reason to maintain them to be universally valid. The mere means of fixing the mind, moreover, are special to each separate upâsana.

14. (The passage, Kāṇḍaka I, 3, 10, gives information about the person) for the purpose of pious meditation, as there is no use (of the knowledge of the objects being higher than the senses and so on).

We read in the Kāṇḍaka (I, 3, 10), 'Higher than the senses are the objects, higher than the objects there is the mind, &c. &c.; higher than the person there is nothing—this is the goal, the highest road.'—Here the doubt arises whether the purport of the passage is to intimate that each of the things successively enumerated is higher than the preceding one, or only that the person is higher than all of them.

The pūrvapakshin maintains the former alternative, for the reason that the text expressly declares the objects to be higher than the senses, the mind higher than the objects and so on.

The objection that the assumption of the passage intending to represent many things as successively superior to their antecedents would involve a so-called split of the sentence, he meets by the remark that the passage may be viewed as containing a plurality of sentences. Many sentences may represent many things as superior to their antecedents, and hence each clause of the passage must be viewed as containing a separate statement of the superiority of something to other things.

To this we reply as follows.

We must assume that the whole passage aims at intimating only that the person is higher than everything. Any information as to the relative superiority of the preceding members of the series would be devoid of all purpose; for of the knowledge derived from such observation a use is neither to be seen nor declared by scripture. Of the knowledge, on the other hand, of the person being higher than the senses and everything else, raised above all evil, we do see a purpose, viz. the accomplishment of final release. And so scripture also says, 'He who has perceived that is freed from the jaws of death' (I, 3, 15). Moreover, the text by declaring that nothing is higher than the person and that he is the highest goal intimates reverence for the person, and thereby shows that the whole series of objects is enumerated only to the end of giving information about the person.—'For the purpose of pious meditation,' i.e. for the purpose of perfect knowledge which has pious meditation for its antecedent. For the passage under consideration does not teach pious meditation by itself.

15. And on account of the word 'Self.'

The above conclusion is confirmed by the circumstance that the person under discussion is called the Self in I, 3, 12, 'That Self is hidden in all beings and does not shine forth, but it is seen by subtle seers through their sharp and subtle intellect.' From this we conclude that the text wishes to represent the other beings enumerated as the Non-Self. The passage quoted, moreover, indicates that the person is hard to know, and to be reached by sharp minds only.—Again, the passage (I, 3, 13), 'A wise man should keep down speech and mind,' enjoins pious meditation as a means of the knowledge of the highest person, as we have explained under I, 4, 1.—It thus follows that scripture indicates various excellences in the case of the purusha only, and not in that of the other beings enumerated.—The passage, moreover, 'He reaches the end of his journey and that is the highest place of Vishṇu,' suggests the question as to who is the end of the journey and so on, and we therefore conclude that the enumeration of the senses, objects, &c., has merely the purpose of teaching the highest place of Vishṇu (not of teaching anything about the relation of the senses, objects, and so on).

16. The (highest) Self has to be understood (in Ait. Âr. II, 4, 1), as in other places; on account of the subsequent (qualification).

We read in the Aitareyaka (II, 4, 1), 'Verily, in the beginning all this was Self, one only; there was nothing else blinking whatsoever. He thought, shall I send forth worlds? He sent forth these worlds, the (heavenly) waters, the rays, the mortal (earth), and water.'—Here the doubt presents itself whether the term 'Self' denotes the highest Self or some other being.

The pûrvapakshin maintains the latter view, which is borne out, he says, by an examination of the connected sense of the whole passage.—But, an objection is raised, an examination of that kind rather leads to the conclusion that the highest Self is meant; for the passage says that before the creation the Self only existed and that the creation was preceded by thought.—No such conclusion is possible, the pûrvapakshin replies, since the passage relates the creation of the worlds. If it aimed at representing the highest Self as the creator, it would speak of the creation of the elements, of which the worlds are only certain combinations. That the worlds are meant by the terms 'water,' &c., appears from the subsequent clause (4), 'That water is above the heaven,' &c.—Now Sruti and Smṛiti teach that the creation of the worlds is accomplished by some inferior Lord different from—and superintended by—the highest Self; cp. e.g. Bṛi. Up. I, 4, 1, 'In the beginning this was Self alone, in the shape of a person,' and the Smṛiti-passage, 'He is the first embodied soul, he is called the person; he the prime creator of the beings was in the beginning evolved from Brahman.' And the Aitareyins themselves record in a previous prakaraṇa (II, 1, 3, 1, 'Next follows the origin of seed. The seed of Pragâpati are the Devas') that this manifold creation was accomplished by Pragâpati. That to the latter being the word 'Self' is sometimes applied appears from the passage quoted above from the Bṛi. Up. And Pragâpati also may be spoken of as being before the creation one only, if we consider that then his products did not yet exist; and thought also may be ascribed to him as he, of course, is of an intelligent nature. Moreover, the passages, 'He led a cow towards them; he led a horse towards them; he led man towards them; then they said,' &c. (II, 4, 2, 2), which are in agreement with what is known about the various activities of particular qualified Selfs belonging to the apparent world, show that in the Aitareyaka also some such qualified Self is meant.

To this we reply that the highest Self is meant in the Aitareyaka 'as in other places.' As in other accounts of the creation ('From that Self ether was produced,' Taitt. Up. II, 1, &c.) the highest Self has to be understood, and, as in other cases where the term 'Self' is applied to particular Selves, the 'Self within' (i.e. the highest Self) has to be understood in the first place; so it is here also.—In those passages, on the other hand, where the Self is qualified by some other attribute, such as 'having the shape of a person,' we must understand that some particular Self is meant.—In the Aitareyaka, however, we meet with a qualification, subsequent to the first reference to the Self, which agrees only with the highest Self; we mean the one implied in the passage, 'He thought, shall I send forth worlds? He sent forth these worlds.'—Hence we maintain that the highest Self is meant.

17. Should it be said that on account of the connected meaning (of the whole passage) (the highest Self cannot be meant); (we reply that) it is so, on account of the assertion.

We now have to refute the objection, made above by the pûrvapakshin, that the highest Self cannot be meant 'on account of the connected meaning of the passage.'—The Sûtrakâra remarks, 'It is so, on account of the assertion.' That means: It is appropriate to understand the passage as referring to the highest Self, because thus the assertion that the Self, previously to the creation, was one only, gives a fully satisfactory sense, while on the other interpretation it would be far from doing so. The creation of the worlds recorded in the Aitareyaka we connect with the creation of the elements recorded in other Vedic texts, in that way that we understand the worlds to have been created subsequently to the elements; just as we showed above (II, 4, 1) that the passage, 'It sent forth fire,' must be understood to say that the creation of fire followed on the creation of ether and air as known from other texts. For, as proved by us before, particulars mentioned in one scriptural text have to be combined with particulars mentioned in other texts, if only the chief subject of the passages is the same.—The details about the activity of the Self referred to by the pûr-vapakshin have likewise to be understood in such a way as to agree with the general matter about which the text desires to make assertions. For we must by no means assume that the text is interested in setting forth all the details of the story on their own account; the knowledge of them would be in no way beneficial to man. The only thing the text really means to teach is the truth that Brahman is the Self of everything. Hence it first relates how the different worlds and the guardians of the worlds, viz. Agni and so on, were created; explains thereupon the origination of the organs and the body, their abode; and shows how the creator having thought, 'How can all this be without me?' (II, 4, 3, 4), entered into this body, 'Opening the suture of the skull he got in by that door' (7). Then again the text relates how the Self after having considered the activities of all the organs ('if speech names,' &c.; 6) asked himself the question, 'What am I?' and thereupon 'saw this person as the widely spread Brahman' (10). The aim of all which is to declare that Brahman is the universal Self. The same truth is inculcated in a subsequent passage also, viz. II, 6, 1, 5; 6, where the text at first enumerates the whole aggregate of individual existences together with the elements, and then continues, 'All this is led by knowledge (i.e. the highest Self); it rests on knowledge. The world is led by knowledge, knowledge is its rest, knowledge is Brahman.'—For all these reasons the view that the highest Brahman is meant in the Aitareyaka is not open to any objections.

The two preceding Sûtras may also be explained with reference to some other Vedic passages. We read in the Vâgasaneyaka (Bri. Up. IV, 3, 7), 'Who is that Self?—He who is within the heart, surrounded by the prāṇas, consisting of knowledge, the person of light.' Of the Self here first mentioned the text goes on to show that it is free from all contact and thus proves it to have Brahman for its Self, the concluding statement being, 'This great unborn Self undecaying, undying, immortal, fearless is indeed Brahman' (IV, 4, 25).—In the Khândogya again we have a chapter in which the introductory statement does not use the term 'Self' ('Being only this was in the beginning, one, without a second'), while at the conclusion the term 'Self' is used in the declaration of identity ('That is the Self. Thou art that').—A doubt here arises whether these two scriptural texts treat of the same matter or not.

They do not, the pûrvapakshin maintains, since they are not equal. Since the determination of the sense depends on the letter of the text, we have no right to maintain equality of sense where the texts differ. In the Vâgasaneyaka the initial statement about the Self shows that the whole passage conveys instruction about the true nature of the Self. In the Khândogya, on the other hand, the initial clause is of a different kind, and we therefore must assume that the whole passage imparts instruction differing in nature from that of the Vâgasaneyaka.—But has it not been said that the Khândogya-passage also teaches in the end the doctrine of universal identity with the Self?—That has been said indeed (but wrongly); for as the concluding passage must be made to agree with the initial passage (which latter does not say anything about the identity of the Self and Brahman), we assume that the concluding passage merely enjoins an imaginative combination (sampatti) of the Self and Brahman.

To this we reply that also the passage, 'Being only this was in the beginning,' has to be understood as referring to the Self; 'as other places,' i.e. in the same way as the passage quoted from the Vâgasaneyaka. For what reason?—'On account of the subsequent (statement),' viz. the statement as to identity. And if it be said that 'on account of the connected meaning' of the initial passage in which no mention is made of the Self, the chapter cannot be understood to refer to the Self; we reply 'that it may be so understood on account of the assertion' made in the passage about that 'by which we hear what is not heard, perceive what is not perceived, know what is not known.' For this passage asserts that through the knowledge of one thing all things become known, and to make good this assertion the text later on declares that 'Being only this was,' &c. Now this knowledge of all things through one thing is possible only if we understand the passage last quoted to refer to the Self; for if the principal Self were not known, how could all things be known? Moreover the assertion that, before creation, there existed one thing only, and the reference to the individual soul by means of the word 'Self,' and the statement that in deep sleep the soul becomes united with the True, and the repeated inquiries on the part of Svetaketu, and the repeated assertions, 'Thou art that,'—all this is appropriate only if the aim of the whole section is not to enjoin an imaginative meditation on all things as identical with the Self, but to teach that the Self really is everything.—Nor must it be said that, in the section under discussion, the concluding passage must be interpreted so as to agree with the introductory clause (and cannot on that account teach anything about the Self); for the introductory passage declares neither that the Self is everything, nor that the Non-self is everything (but merely makes a statement regarding what is in general), and such an altogether general statement cannot be in conflict with any particular statement made in a supplementary passage, but rather is in want of some such particular statement whereby to define itself¹.—And moreover (to view the matter from a different point of view), the word 'Being' if looked into closely can denote nothing else but the principal Self, since we have proved, under II, 1, 14, the unreality of the whole aggregate of being different from the Self.—Nor, finally, does a difference of expression necessarily imply a difference of sense; not any more than in ordinary language the two phrases, 'Bring that vessel over there,' and, 'That vessel over there, bring it,' have different meanings.—It therefore remains a settled conclusion that in texts such as discussed above, the matter of instruction is the same, however much the mode may vary in which the instruction is conveyed.

¹ I.e. the definite statement about the Self in the concluding passage may be used for defining the sense of the indefinite initial statement about that which is. 'That which is' comprises the Self as well as the Not-Self.

18. As (scripture where speaking of the rinsing of the mouth with water) makes a reference to an act (established by Smṛiti), (that act is not enjoined by Sruti, but rather) the new (act of meditation on the water viewed as the dress of prāṇa).

The Kṛandogas as well as the Vāgasaneyins record, in the colloquy of the prāṇas, that the food of Breath comprises everything even unto dogs and birds, and that water is its dress. To this the Kṛandogas add, 'Therefore when going to eat food they surround it before and after with water' (Kṛ. Up. V, 2, 2). And the Vāgasaneyins add (Bṛi. Up. VI, 1, 14), 'Srotṛiyas who know this rinse the mouth with water when they are going to eat and rinse the mouth with water after they have eaten, thinking that thereby they make the breath dressed. Therefore a man knowing this is to rinse the mouth with water when going to eat and after having eaten; he thereby makes that breath dressed.'—These texts intimate two things, rinsing of the mouth and meditation on the breath as dressed. The doubt then arises whether the texts enjoin both these matters, or only the rinsing of the mouth, or only the meditation on breath as dressed.

The pūrvapakshin maintains that the text enjoins both, since the one as well as the other is intimated by the text, and since both matters not being settled by any other means of knowledge are worthy of being enjoined by the Veda.—Or else, he says, the rinsing of the mouth only is enjoined, since with reference to the latter only the text exhibits the particular injunctive verbal form ('he is to rinse'). In this latter case the mention made in the text of the meditation on breath as dressed has merely the purpose of glorifying the act of rinsing.

To this we make the following reply.—The rinsing of the mouth cannot possibly be enjoined by the quoted passages ‘since they merely contain references to an act,’ i.e. since they merely contain remarks concerning the purificatory act of rinsing the mouth which is known from and settled by Smṛiti.—But are not the very Sruti-passages under discussion to be looked upon as the fundamental texts on which the Smṛiti-injunctions regarding the rinsing of the mouth are based?—This is not possible, we reply, since the Sruti and Smṛiti-passages refer to different matters. All the Smṛiti-passages enjoin the act of rinsing the mouth only in so far as it purifies man; while the quoted Sruti texts which occur in prāṇa-vidyās, if enjoining the rinsing of the mouth at all, enjoin it with reference to the knowledge of prāṇa. And a Sruti-passage cannot constitute the basis of a Smṛiti-passage referring to an altogether different matter. Nor can it be maintained that the Sruti-passage enjoins some altogether new rinsing of the mouth connected with the prāṇa-vidyā, as we recognise the rinsing mentioned in Sruti as the ordinary rinsing performed by men for the sake of purification.—The preceding argumentation already precludes the alternative of two matters being enjoined, which would moreover lead to a so-called split of the sentence.—We therefore conclude that the text—with reference to the rinsing of the mouth before and after eating which is enjoined by Smṛiti—enjoins (by means of the passage, ‘thinking that thereby they make the breath dressed’) a new mental resolve with regard to the water used for rinsing purposes, viz. that that water should act as a means for clothing the prāṇa. The statement about the clothing of the prāṇa cannot (as suggested by the pūrvapakshin) be taken as a glorification of the act of rinsing the mouth; for in the first place the act of rinsing is not enjoined in the Vedic passage¹, and in the second place we apprehend that the passage itself conveys an injunction, viz. of the mental resolve to provide clothing for the prāṇa. Nor must the objection be raised that in that case two purposes are admitted for the one act of rinsing the mouth, viz. the purpose of purification and the purpose of providing the prāṇa with clothing. For we have actually to do not with one action, but with two separate actions. For one action is the rinsing of the mouth which serves the purpose of purifying man, and another action is the mental resolve that that water should serve the purpose of clothing the prāṇa. Similarly the preceding passage, 'Whatever there is, even unto dogs, &c., that is thy food,' does not enjoin the promiscuous use of food of all kinds—for that would be contrary to scripture and impossible in itself—but merely enjoins the meditation on all food as food of the prāṇa. We therefore conclude that also the passage, 'Water is thy dress,' which forms the immediate continuation of the passage last quoted does not enjoin the act of rinsing the mouth but merely the act of meditating on the rinsing-water as constituting the dress of the prāṇa.

¹ A glorifying arthavāda-passage would be in its place only if it were preceded by some injunction; for the glorification of certain acts is meant to induce men to comply with the injunctions concerning those acts.

Moreover the mere present-form, 'they rinse the mouth with water,' has no enjoining force.—But also in the passage, 'They think that thereby they make the breath dressed,' we have a mere present-form without injunctive power (and yet you maintain that that passage conveys an injunction)!—True; but as necessarily one of the two must be enjoined¹, we assume, on the ground of what the text says about the making of a dress, that what is enjoined is the meditation on water being the dress of prāṇa; for this is something 'new,' i.e. not established by other means of knowledge². The rinsing of the mouth with water, on the other hand, is already established by other means (i.e. Smṛiti), and therefore need not be enjoined again.—The argument founded by the pūrvapakshin on the circumstance that, in the Bṛi. Up., the verb 'to rinse' is found in the injunctive form ('therefore a man, &c., is to rinse'), is already refuted by our showing that the act of rinsing the mouth is not a new one (and therefore requires no Vedic injunction).

¹ Because otherwise we should have only arthavādas. But arthavādas have a meaning only in so far as connected with an injunction.

² The above argumentation avails itself of the Sūtra, putting a new construction on it.—Tarhi dvayor avidheyatvam ity āraṅkyānuvādamātrasyā kiñchitkaratvād anyataravidher āvasyakatve samkalpanam eva vidheyam iti vidhāntarena sūtram yogayati. Ān. Gi.

For the very reason that the text does not aim at enjoining the rinsing of the mouth, the Kāṇvas (in their recension of the Bṛi. Up.) conclude the chapter with the clause, 'They think,' &c., and do not add the concluding clause of the Mādhyandinas, 'Therefore a man,' &c. From this we have to conclude that what is enjoined in the text of the Mādhyandinas also is 'the knowledge of that,' i.e. the knowledge of the water being the dress of the previously mentioned prāṇa.—Nor finally can it be maintained that in one place (i.e. the Mādhyandina-sākhā) the rinsing of the mouth is enjoined, and in other places the knowledge of water as the dress of prāṇa; for the introductory passage, 'Water is the dress,' is the same everywhere.—We are therefore entitled to conclude that what is enjoined in all Sākhās is the cognition of water being the dress of the prāṇa.

19. In the same (Sākhā also) it is thus (i.e. there is unity of vidyā), on account of the non-difference (of the object of meditation).

In the Agnirahasya forming part of the Vāgasaneyi-sākhā there is a vidyā called the Sāṇḍilya-vidyā, in which we meet with the following statement of particulars, 'Let him meditate on the Self which consists of mind, which has the prāṇa for its body and light for its form,' &c.—In the Bṛihad-āraṇyaka again, which belongs to the same Sākhā, we read (V, 10, 6), 'That person consisting of mind, whose being is light, is within the heart, small like a grain of rice or barley. He is the ruler of all, the Lord of all—he rules all this whatsoever exists.'—A doubt here presents itself whether these two passages are to be taken as one vidyā in which the particulars mentioned in either text are to be combined or not.

The pūrvapakshin maintains that we have to do with two separate vidyās whose particulars cannot be combined. For otherwise, he argues, the text could not be cleared from the reproach of useless repetition. As long as we have to do with texts belonging to different Sākhās we can rebut the charge of useless repetition by pointing to the fact that the texts are read and known by separate classes of men ; we can then ascertain the unity of the vidyās and combine the particulars mentioned in one text only with those mentioned in the others ; so e.g. in the colloquy of the prāṇas. On the other hand, texts belonging to one and the same Sākhā cannot be freed from the reproach of tautology as the same persons study and know them, and passages occurring in different places cannot therefore be combined into one vidyā. Nor can we make out a separate position for each of the texts of the latter kind by saying that it is the task of one text to enjoin the vidyā and that of the other to enjoin the particulars of the vidyā. For in that case each of the two passages would mention only such particulars as are not mentioned in the other one ; while as a matter of fact particulars common to both as well as not common to both are mentioned in each. Hence the particulars of the one passage are not to be combined with those of the other.

To this we make the following reply. Just as passages met with in different Sākhās form one vidyā in which the different particulars are to be combined, so the two passages under discussion also, although belonging to one and the same Sākhā, constitute one vidyā only, since the object of meditation is the same in both. For as such we recognise Brahman possessing certain qualities such as consisting of mind and so on. Now we know that the object constitutes the character of a meditation ; as long as there is no difference of character we cannot determine difference of vidyā ; and if there is no difference of vidyā the particulars mentioned in different places cannot be held apart.—But has it not been demonstrated above that the vidyās have to be held apart, as otherwise tautology would arise ?—Tautology does not result, we reply, because the two passages may be understood to have each its particular meaning, one of them enjoining the vidyā, and the other the particulars of the vidyā.—But in that case the Bṛihad-Āraṇyaka ought to mention only those points which are not mentioned in the Agnirahasya, as e.g. 'he is the Lord of all;' while it ought not to mention what is already mentioned in the Agnirahasya, as e.g. the Self's consisting of mind!—Not so, we reply. Only the repetition, in one passage, of what is already mentioned in the other passage enables us to recognise the vidyâ. The Bṛihad-âraṇyaka-passage, by mentioning some common qualities, first enables us to recognise the Sândilya-vidyâ, and then teaches certain particulars with reference to the latter; how otherwise should we know that the Bṛi-passage is meant to enjoin particulars for the Sândilya-vidyâ? Moreover, as in a passage which has a purpose of its own in so far as it teaches something not yet established, a reference to something already established is justified on the ground of its being a (so-called) nityānuvâda, we cannot overlook the recognition (of the identity of the passage with another one) which is rendered possible through that anuvâda. Hence, although the two passages belong to one and the same Sâkhâ, they yet constitute one vidyâ only, and their particulars have to be combined into one whole.

20. Thus in other cases also, on account of the connexion (of particulars with one and the same vidyâ).

We read in the Bṛihad-âraṇyaka (V, 5), 'The true is Brahman,' and, further on, 'Now what is the true, that is the Âditya, the person that dwells in yonder orb, and the person in the right eye.' Having thus declared the different abodes of that true Brahman with reference to the gods and with reference to the body, and having, in what follows, identified its body with the sacred syllables (bhûh, &c.), the text teaches its two secret names (upanishad), 'Its secret name is ahar' with reference to the gods; and 'its secret name is aham' with reference to the body.—A doubt here arises whether these two secret names are both to be applied to the deva-abode of Brahman as well as to its bodily abode, or only one name to each.

The above Sûtra maintains the pûrvapaksha view. Just as certain particulars though recorded elsewhere are yet to be combined with the Sāṇḍilya-vidyā, so we have to proceed in other cases also, as e.g. the one under discussion, because the particulars mentioned are all connected with one vidyā. The vidyā of the True with its double reference to the Devas and to the body is one only, as we infer from the fact of its having one exordium only ('The true is Brahman'), and from the way in which the text interconnects Āditya and the person in the eye. Why then should an attribute belonging to one of the latter not belong to the other also? For, to quote an analogous case, certain rules of life which are prescribed for a teacher—as e.g. having a following of pupils—remain equally valid whether the teacher be in a village or in a wood. For these reasons both secret names equally belong to the Āditya as well as to the person within the eye. This view the next Sūtra refutes.

21. Or this is not so, on account of the difference (of place).

The two secret names do not apply quite equally to the two persons mentioned, because they are connected with different places in the vidyā. For the clause, 'Its secret name is ahar,' the text exhibits in connexion with the person in the solar orb, while the clause, 'Its secret name is aham,' occurs in connexion with the person in the eye. Now the pronoun 'its' always refers to something mentioned close by; we therefore conclude that the text teaches each secret name as belonging to one special abode of Brahman only. How then can both names be valid for both?—But, an objection is raised, the person within the orb of the sun and the person within the eye are one only; for the text teaches them both to be abodes of the one true Brahman!—True, we reply; but as each secret name is taught only with reference to the one Brahman as conditioned by a particular state, the name applies to Brahman only in so far as it is in that state. We on our part also illustrate the case by a comparison. The teacher always remains the teacher; yet those kinds of services which the pupil has to do to the teacher when sitting have not to be done when he stands ; and vice versâ.—The comparison, on the other hand, instituted by the pūrvapakshin is ill chosen, since the duties of the disciple towards his teacher depend on the latter's character as teacher, and that is not changed by his being either in the village or the forest.—Hence the two secret names have to be held apart.

22. (Scripture) also declares that.

Scripture moreover contains a distinct intimation that the attributes under discussion are to be held apart. We read, Kh. Up. I, 8, 5, 'The form of that person is the same as the form of the other person, the joints of the one are the joints of the other, the name of the one is the name of the other.'—But how does this passage convey the desired intimation?—By expressly transferring the attributes of the person within the sun to the person within the eye ; for this express transfer shows that the text looks upon the attributes of the two as separated by the difference of abode and therefore not to be combined (unless specially enjoined to be so combined).—The conclusion therefore is that the two secret names are to be held apart.

23. And for the same reason the holding together and the pervading the sky (attributed to Brahman in the Rânâyanīya-khila) (are not to be inserted in other vidyās).

In the khilas (supplementary writings) of the Rânâyanīyas we meet with a passage, 'Held together are the powers among which Brahman is the best ; the best Brahman in the beginning stretched out the sky¹, which mentions certain energies of Brahman, such as holding together its powers, entering into the sky, &c. And in the

¹ *Vîryâ vîryâni parâkramabhedâh, anye hi purushâh sahayân apekshya vikramân bibhrati tena tatparâkramânâm na ta eva niyat-apūrvatvarūpakāraṇatvena gyesh/hā bhavanti kim tu tatsahakāriṇo
-pi, brahmavîryânâm tu brahmaiva gyesh/ham brahma gyesh/ham yeshâm tâni tathâ brahma khalv ananyâpeksham gagagganmâdi karoti. Kim kânyeshâm parâkramânâm balavadbhir madhye bhaṅga sambhavati tena te svavîryâni na bibhrati, brahmavîryâni tu brahmanâ sambhritâni avighnena sambhritâny ity arthaḥ. Âṇ. Gi.*

Upanishad of the same (i. e. the Rânâyanaîyas) we meet with vidyās of Brahman among which the Sândilya-vidyā is the first.—The question then arises whether the energies of Brahman just mentioned are to be inserted in those Brahma-vidyās or not. To the pûrvapaksha view that they are to be so inserted because they are connected with Brahman, the Sûtrakâra replies that the holding together and pervading the sky are not to be inserted in the Sândilya-vidyā and other vidyās, for the same reason, i. e. on account of their being connected with different abodes. In the Sândilya-vidyā, Brahman is said to have its abode in the heart, ‘He is the Self within the heart’ (Kh. Up. III, 14, 3); the same statement is made in the dahara-vidyā, ‘There is the palace, the small lotus (of the heart), and in it that small ether’ (VIII, 1, 1). In the Upakosala-vidyā again, Brahman is said to reside within the eye, ‘That person that is seen in the eye’ (IV, 15, 1). In all these vidyās Brahman is described as residing within the body; it is therefore impossible to insert into them the energies of Brahman which the khila of the Rânâyanaîyas mentions, and which are connected with the Devas (i. e. external nature).—But the vidyās of the Khândogya likewise mention such powers of Brahman as are connected with the Devas; cp. e. g. III, 14, 3, ‘He is greater than the heaven, greater than these worlds;’ IV, 15, 4, ‘He is also Bhâmanî, for he shines in all worlds;’ VIII, 1, 3, ‘As large as this ether is, so large is that ether within the heart. Both heaven and earth are contained within it.’ And again there are other vidyās of Brahman, such as the one which represents Brahman as comprising sixteen parts, in which not any special abode is mentioned.—True; but there is a special reason why the attributes stated in the Rânâyanaîya-khila cannot be introduced into the other vidyās. Particulars mentioned in one place can indeed be inserted in vidyās met with in another place if the latter are suggested to the mind by containing some reference to agreeing particulars; the qualities of holding together, however, on one side and those mentioned in the Sândilya-vidyā, &c., on the other side are of such a nature as to exclude each other, and therefore do not mutually suggest each other. The mere circumstance of all the particulars being connected with Brahman does not suffice to suggest vidyās occurring in other places; for even in vidyās which are avowedly separate, all the particulars may be connected with Brahman. And it is an established fact that Brahman, although one only, is, owing to the plurality of its powers, meditated upon in more than one way, as shown under Sūtra 7.—The conclusion therefore is that the attributes of holding together its powers and so on are not to be inserted in the Sāṇḍilya and similar vidyās.

24. And as the record of others (viz. the Taittirīyaka) is not such as in the purusha-vidyā (of the Khândogya), (the two purusha-vidyās are not to be combined).

In the Rahasya-brāhmaṇa of the Tāṇḍins and the Paīṅins (the Khândogya) there is a vidyā treating of man, in which man is fancifully identified with the sacrifice, the three periods of his life with the three libations, his hunger and so on, with the dikshā, &c. And other particulars also are mentioned there, such as formulas of prayer, use of mantras and so on.—A similar fanciful assimilation of the sacrifice and man the Taittirīyakas exhibit, 'For him who knows thus the Self of the sacrifice is the sacrificer, Faith is the wife of the sacrificer,' and so on (Taitt. Ār. X, 64).—The doubt here arises whether the particulars of the man-sacrifice given in the Khândogya are to be inserted in the Taittirīyaka or not.

Against the view of the pūrvapakshin that they are so to be inserted because in both places we have a purusha-yagñā, we maintain that they are not to be inserted because the characteristics of the purusha-yagñā of the Khândogya are not recognised in the Taittirīya-text. This the Sūtra-kāra expresses by saying, 'As (the record of the followers of some Sākhās, viz. the Tāṇḍins and Paīṅins, is) in the purusha-vidyā, not such is the record of others,' viz. the Taittirīyakas. For the latter exhibit an identification of man with the sacrifice, in which the wife, the sacrificer, the Veda, the vedi, the sacrificial grass, the post, the butter, the sacrificial animal, the priest, &c., are mentioned in succession; none of which particulars are mentioned in the Khândogya. The use also to which the Taittirîyaka turns the three libations is different from the Khândogya. And the few points in which the two texts agree, such as the identification of the Avabrîtha-ceremony with death, lose their significance side by side with the greater number of dissimilarities, and are therefore not able to effect the recognition of the vidyâ.—Moreover the Taittirîyaka does not represent man as the sacrifice (as the Khândogya does); for the two genitives ('of him who thus knows' and 'of the sacrifice') are not co-ordinate, and the passage therefore cannot be construed to mean, 'The knowing one who is the sacrifice, of him the Self is,' &c. For it cannot be said that man is the sacrifice, in the literal sense of the word¹. The two genitives are rather to be taken in that way, that one qualifies the other, 'The sacrifice of him who thus knows, of that sacrifice,' &c. For the connexion of the sacrifice with man (which is expressed by the genitive, 'the sacrifice of him') is really and literally true; and to take a passage in its literal meaning, if possible at all, is always preferable to having recourse to a secondary metaphorical meaning². Moreover the words next following in the Taittirîyaka-passage, 'the Self is the sacrificer,' declare that man (man's Self) is the sacrificer, and this again shows that man's relation to the sacrifice is not that of co-ordination³. Moreover as the section beginning with 'Of him who thus knows' forms an anuvâda of something previously established (and as such forms one vākya to which one sense only must be ascribed), we must not bring about 'a split of the sentence' by interpreting it as teaching in the first place that man is the sacrifice, and in the second place that the Self and the other beings enumerated are the sacrificer and so on. And as we see that the passage, 'Of him who thus knows,' &c., follows upon some instruction about the knowledge of the Self coupled with saṁnyāsa, we apprehend that the Taittirīyaka-chapter is not an independent vidyā but merely supplementary to the instruction previously given. In agreement with this conclusion we observe that the Taittirīyaka promises only one result for both chapters, viz. the one stated in the passage, 'He obtains the greatness of Brahman.'—On the other hand the text embodying the puruṣa-vidyā in the Khândogya is an independent text; for we see that an independent result is attached to it, viz. an increase of length of life, 'He who knows this lives on to a hundred and sixteen years.'—Hence the particulars mentioned in the puruṣa-vidyā of another Sākhā, such as formulas of prayer, mantras and so on, are not to be combined with the Taittirīya-text of the vidyā.

¹ And therefore we are not warranted in taking the two genitives as co-ordinate, as otherwise they might be taken.

² Which latter would be the case if we should take the two genitives as co-ordinate and therefore expressing an imaginative identification of the man and the sacrifice.

³ If man is the sacrificer he cannot be identified with the sacrifice; he is rather the Lord of the sacrifice.

25. Because the matter (of certain mantras) such as piercing and so on is different (from the matter of the approximate vidyās) (the former have not to be combined with the latter).

At the beginning of an Upanishad of the Ātharvanikas the following mantra is recorded, 'Pierce him (the enemy) whole, pierce his heart: crush his veins, crush his head; thrice crushed,' &c. At the beginning of the Upanishad of the Tāndins we have the mantra, 'O God Savitar, produce the sacrifice.' At the beginning of that of the Sātyāyanins, 'Thou hast a white horse and art green as grass,' &c.; at the beginning of that of the Kāthas and the Taittirīyakas, 'May Mitra be propitious to us and Varuṇa,' &c. At the beginning of the Upanishad of the Vāgasaneyins we have a Brāhmaṇa-passage about the pravargya-ceremony, 'The gods indeed sat down to a sattra;' and at the beginning of that of the Kaushītakins there is a Brāhmaṇa-passage about the agnishṭoma, 'Brahman indeed is the Agnishṭoma, Brahman is that day; through Brahman they pass into Brahman, immortality those reach who observe that day.'—The point to be inquired into with reference to all these mantras and the sacrifices referred to in the Brâhmaṇa-passages is whether they are to be combined with the vidyâs (contained in the Upanishads) or not.

The pûrvapakshin maintains that they are so to be combined, because the text exhibits them in proximity to the Upanishad-portions of the Brâhmaṇas whose chief contents are formed by the vidyâs.—But we do not observe those mantras and sacrifices to be actually enjoined as subordinate members of the vidyâs!—True, but in spite of this we, on the ground of proximity, infer them to be connected with the vidyâs. For we have no right to set aside the fact of proximity as irrelevant as long as an inference can be established on it.—But we are unable to see that the mantras have anything to do with the vidyâs, and how can it be assumed that ceremonies, such as the pravargya which scripture enjoins with reference to other occasions, sacrifices, and so on, stand in any relation to the vidyâs!—Never mind, the pûrvapakshin replies. In the case of mantras we can always imagine some meaning which connects them with the vidyâs; the first mantra quoted, e.g. may be viewed as glorifying the heart. For the heart and other parts of the body are often represented, in the vidyâs, as abodes of meditation, and hence mantras glorifying the heart, &c., may appropriately form subordinate members of those vidyâs. Some mantras, moreover, we clearly see to be enjoined with reference to vidyâs, so, e.g. the mantra, 'I turn to Bhûh with such and such' (Kh. Up. III, 15, 3). Sacrificial acts again may indeed be enjoined in connexion with other occasions; yet there is no reason why they should not also be applied to the vidyâs, just as the offering called Brîhaspatisava is a subordinate part of the Vâgapeya-sacrifice¹.

To this we make the following reply. The mantras and

¹ The Brîhaspatisava, although enjoined with special reference to him who is desirous of Brahmavarṇas, is yet at the same time a subordinate part of the Vâgapeya-sacrifice. Cp. Pû. Mî. Sû. IV, 3, 29.

ceremonies mentioned cannot be drawn into connexion with the vidyās, 'because their matter, such as piercing the heart, &c., is different (from the matter of the vidyās),' and therefore cannot be connected with the latter.—But has it not been said above that the mantras may be connected with the meditations enjoined in the vidyās, on the ground of their coming of use in meditations on the heart, &c. ?—The mantras, we reply, might be so employed, if their entire contents were glorification of the heart, and the like ; but this is by no means the case. The mantra first quoted, e.g. clearly expresses hostility to somebody, and is therefore to be connected, not with the vidyās of the Upanishads, but with some ceremony meant to hurt an enemy. The mantra of the Tāṇḍins again, 'O God Savitar, produce the sacrifice,' indicates by its very words that it is connected with some sacrifice ; with what particular sacrifice it is connected has to be established by other means of proof. Similarly other mantras also—which, either by 'indication' (liṅga), or 'syntactical connexion' (vākya), or some other means of proof, are shown to be subordinate to certain sacrificial actions—cannot, because they occur in the Upanishads also, be connected with the vidyās on the ground of mere proximity. For that 'proximity,' as a means of proof regarding the connexion of subordinate matters with principal matters, is weaker than direct enunciation (Śruti), and so on, is demonstrated in the former science (i.e. in the Pūrva Mīmāṃsā) under III, 3, 14. Of sacrificial works also, such as the pravargya, which are primarily enjoined with reference to other occasions, it cannot be demonstrated that they are supplementary to vidyās with which they have nothing in common. The case of the Bṛhaspatisava, quoted by the pūrvapakshin, is of an altogether different kind, as there we have an injunction clearly showing that that oblation is a subordinate member of the Vāgapeya, viz. 'Having offered the Vāgapeya he offers the Bṛhaspatisava.' And, moreover, if the one pravargya-ceremony has once been enjoined for a definite purpose by a means of proof of superior strength, we must not, on the strength of an inferior means of proof, assume it to be enjoined for some different purpose. A proceeding of that kind would be possible only if the difference of the means of proof were not apprehended; but in our case this latter possibility is excluded since the relative strength and weakness of the various means of proof is fully apprehended (on the ground of the conclusions arrived at in the Pûrva Mîmâṃsā).—For these reasons the mentioned mantras and acts are not, on the ground of mere textual collocation, to be viewed as supplementary to the vidyās of the Upanishads. To account for the fact of their textual collocation with the latter we must keep in view that the mantras, &c. as well as the vidyās have to be studied, &c. in the woods.

26. Where the getting rid (of good and evil) is mentioned (the obtaining of this good and evil by others has to be added) because the statement about the obtaining is supplementary (to the statement about the getting rid of), as in the case of the kuṣās, the metres, the praise and the singing. This (i.e. the reason for this) has been stated (in the Pûrva Mîmâṃsā).

In the text of the Tāṇḍîns we meet with the following passage: 'Shaking off all evil as a horse shakes his hair, and shaking off the body as the moon frees herself from the mouth of Râhu, I obtain self made and satisfied the uncreated world of Brahman' (Kh. Up. VIII, 13). Again, in the text of the Âtharvavîkas, we read, 'Then knowing, shaking off good and evil he reaches the highest oneness, free from passion' (Mu. Up. III. 1, 3). The Sâtyâyanins read, 'His sons obtain his inheritance, his friends the good, his enemies the evil he has done.' And the Kaushîtakins, 'He shakes off his good and his evil deeds. His beloved relatives obtain the good, his unbeloved relatives the evil he has done' (Kau. Up. I, 4).—Of these texts two state that the man who has reached true knowledge rids himself of his good and evil deeds; one, that his friends and enemies obtain his good and evil deeds respectively; and one finally declares that both things take place.

This latter text calls for no remark ; nor again that one which refers only to his friends and enemies obtaining his good and evil deeds ; for in order that they may obtain those he must necessarily first have got rid of them, and the act of getting rid of them has therefore to be supplied in the text. Those passages, however, which merely mention a man's shaking off his deeds, give rise to a discussion whether those deeds, when shaken off, are obtained by his friends and enemies, or not. Here the pūrvapakshin maintains that the latter circumstance is not to be supplied in the two passages mentioned—firstly because the text does not state it ; secondly because what other Sākhās say about it falls within the sphere of a different vidyā ; and thirdly because the getting rid of the evil and good deeds is something done by the man himself, while the obtaining of them is the work of others. As thus there is no necessary connexion between the two, we have no right to supply the latter on the basis of the former.

To this we make the following reply. Although the text mentions only the getting rid of the deeds, yet the obtaining of them by others must necessarily be added, because the statement concerning the latter is merely supplementary to the statement about the former, as appears from the text of the Kaushītakins.—In reply to the arguments brought forward by the pūrvapakshin we offer the following remarks.

The separation of the different passages would indeed have to be insisted upon, if anybody intended to introduce an injunction about something to be done, which is contained in one text only, into some other text also. But in the passages under discussion the act of getting rid of—and the act of obtaining—the good and evil deeds are not mentioned as something to be performed, but merely as implying a glorification of knowledge ; the intended sense being, 'Glorious indeed is that knowledge through whose power the good and evil deeds, the causes of the samsāra, are shaken off by him who knows, and are transferred to his friends and enemies.' The passage thus being glorificatory only, the teacher is of opinion that, to the end of strengthening the glorification, the obtaining of the good and evil deeds by the friends and enemies—which in some passages is represented as the consequence of their being shaken off by the man who knows—must be supplied in those passages also which mention only the shaking off. That one arthavâda-passage often depends on another arthavâda-passage is a well-known fact; the following passage, e.g. ‘The twenty-first indeed from this world is that sun,’ would be unintelligible if no regard were paid to the other passage, ‘Twelve are the months, five the seasons, three these worlds; that sun is the twenty-first.’ Similarly the passage, ‘The two Trishubh verses are for strengthening,’ necessarily requires to be taken in connexion with the other passage, ‘Strength of the senses indeed is Trishubh.’ And as the statement about the obtaining of the good and evil deeds has only the purpose of glorifying knowledge (and is not made on its own account), we need not insist too much on the question how the results of actions done by one man can be obtained by others. That the obtaining of the deeds by others is connected with their being got rid of by the man who knows, merely for the purpose of glorifying knowledge, the Sûtrakâra moreover indicates by making use of the expression, ‘because the statement about obtaining is supplementary to,’ &c.; for if he wished to intimate that the actual circumstance of other persons obtaining a man’s good and evil deeds is to be inserted in those vidyâs where it is not mentioned he would say, ‘because the fact of obtaining,’ &c. The Sûtra therefore, availing itself of the opportunity offered by the discussion of the combination of particular qualities, shows how mere glorificatory passages have to be inserted in texts where they are wanting.

The remaining part of the Sûtra, ‘Like the kusâs, the metres, the praise and the singing,’ introduces some analogous instances.—The case under discussion is analogous to the case of the kusâs¹. Those, a mantra of the Bhâllavins ('You kuśās are the children of the tree, do you protect me!') represents as coming from trees in general, without any specification. The corresponding mantra of the Sātyāyanins on the other hand is, 'You kuśās are the children of the Udumbara-tree;' a particularizing statement which must be considered as valid for the kuśās in general.—Another analogous case is that of the metres. In some places no special statement is made about their order of succession; but the text of the Pañḍins, 'The metres of the Devas come first,' determines the general priority of the metres of the Devas to those of the *Asuras*¹.—Similarly the time of the stotra accompanying the performance of the Shoḍaśin-rite which in some texts is left undefined is settled by the text of the Rig-vedins (ārkhāh), 'when the Sun has half risen.'—And similarly a particularizing text of the Bhāllavins defines what priests have to join in the singing; a point left unsettled in other *Srutis*².—As in these parallel cases, so we have to proceed in the case under discussion also. For if we refused to define a general text by another more particular one, we should be driven to assume optional procedure (vikalpa), and that the latter is if possible to be avoided is a well-known principle. This is stated in the Pūrva Mīmāṃsā-sūtras X, 8, 15.

¹ I.e. according to the commentators, small wooden rods used by the Udgâtrîs in counting the stotras.

The passages about the shaking (off) can be viewed as giving rise to a different discussion also, and the Sūtra can accordingly be explained in a different manner. The question can be raised whether the 'shaking' means the getting rid of one's good and evil deeds or something else.—The pūrvapaksha will in that case have to be established in the following manner. Shaking (dhû) here does not mean 'getting rid of,' since the root 'dhû' according to grammar means shaking in an intransitive sense or trembling; of flags streaming in the wind we say, for instance, 'the flags are shaking' (dodhûyante). We therefore take the word in the same sense in the passages under discussion and understand by the 'trembling' of the good and evil deeds the fact of their not meeting, for a certain time, with their results.

¹ Metres of less than ten syllables belong to the Asuras, those of ten and more to the Devas.

² The general text is, according to the commentators, 'The priests join in the singing;' the defining text of the Bhāllavins, 'The adhvaryu does not join in the singing.'

To this pûrvapaksha we make the following reply. The word 'shaking' has to be taken in the sense of 'getting rid of,' because it is supplemented by the statement of others obtaining the good and evil deeds. For those deeds cannot be obtained by others unless they are got rid of by their former owner. Hence although it is not easily imaginable that the deeds got rid of by one man should be obtained by others, we yet, on the ground of its being mentioned, may determine accordingly that 'shaking' means 'getting rid of.' And although only in some passages the statement about the obtaining is actually found in proximity to the statement about the shaking, it yet has, on the ground of the latter, to be supplied everywhere and thus becomes a general reason of decision (viz. that 'shaking' means 'getting rid of'). Against the pûrvapakshin's view we further remark that good and evil deeds cannot be said to 'tremble' in the literal sense of the word, like flags in the wind, since they are not of substantial nature.—(Nor must it be said that of the horse which exemplifies the shaking, the text only says that it shakes its hair, not that it casts anything off, for) the horse when shaking itself shakes off dust and also old hairs. And with that shaking (which at the same time is a shaking off) the text expressly compares the shaking (off) of evil.—Nor do we when assigning different meanings to one and the same root enter thereby into conflict with Smṛiti (grammar). The clause 'this has been stated' we have already explained.

27. At the (moment of) departing (he frees himself from his works), there being nothing to be reached (by him, on the way to Brahman, through those works); for thus others (declare, in their sacred texts).

The Kaushîtakins record in the paryaṅka-vidyâ how the man (who possesses true knowledge) when approaching Brahman seated on the couch frees himself on the way from his good and evil deeds, 'He having reached the path of the gods comes to the world of Agni,' &c. (Kau. Up. I, 3), and later on (I, 4), 'He comes to the river Vigarâ and crosses it by the mind alone and there shakes off his good and evil deeds.'—The question here arises whether in strict agreement with the text we have to understand that the deceased man frees himself from his good and evil deeds on the way to Brahman, or rather that he does so at the outset when he departs from his body.

The letter of the text favouring the former alternative, the Sûtrakâra rebuts it by declaring 'at the going,' i.e. at the time of departing from the body the man frees himself, through the strength of his knowledge, from his good and evil deeds. The reason for this averment is assigned in the words, 'On account of the absence of anything to be reached.' For when the man possessing true knowledge has departed from the body and is, through his knowledge, about to reach Brahman, there exists nothing to be reached by him on the way through his good and evil works, and we therefore have no reason to assume the latter to remain uneffaced during a certain number of moments. We rather have to conclude that as the results of his good and evil works are contrary to the result of knowledge, they are destroyed by the power of the latter; and that hence the moment of their destruction is that moment in which he sets out toward the fruit of his knowledge (i.e. the world of Brahman).—The conclusion thus is that the deliverance of the man from his works takes place early, and is only mentioned later on in the text of the Kaushîtakins.—Thus other Sâkhâs also, as that of the Tâṇḍins and Sâtyâyânins, declare that he frees himself from his deeds at an earlier stage; cp. the passages, 'Shaking off all evil as a horse shakes his hair,' and 'His sons obtain his inheritance, his friends the good, his enemies the evil he has done.'

28. And because (on the above interpretation)

there is no contradiction to both (i.e. man's making an effort to free himself from his deeds and actually freeing himself) according to his liking.

Moreover if we assumed that the man frees himself from his good and evil deeds on the way—after having departed from the body and having entered on the path of the gods—we should implicate ourselves in impossibilities; for after the body has been left behind, man can no longer accomplish, according to his liking, that effort which consists in self-restraint and pursuit of knowledge, and which is the cause of the obliteration of all his good and evil deeds, and consequently that obliteration also cannot take place. We therefore must assume that the requisite effort is made—and its result takes place—at an earlier moment, viz. in the state in which man is able to effect it, and that in consequence thereof man rids himself of his good and evil deeds.

Nothing then stands in the way of the conditioning and the conditioned events taking place, and the assumption moreover agrees with the statements of the Tândins and Sâtyâyanins.

29. A purpose has to be attributed to the going (on the path of the gods) in a twofold manner; otherwise there would be contradiction of scripture.

In some scriptural texts the (dead man's) going on the path of the gods is mentioned in connexion with his freeing himself from good and evil; in other texts it is not mentioned. The doubt then arises whether the two things go together in all cases or only in certain cases.—The pûrva-pakshin maintains that the two are to be connected in all cases, just as the man's freeing himself from his good and evil deeds is always followed by their passing over to his friends and enemies.

To this we make the following reply. That a man's going on the path of the gods has a purpose is to be admitted in a twofold manner, i.e. with a distinction only. His going on that path has a sense in certain cases, in others not. For otherwise, i.e. if we admitted that men, in all cases, proceed on that path, we should have to assume that even the passage, Mu. Up. III, 1, 3, 'Shaking off good and evil, free from passions, he reaches the highest unity,' refers to actual going through which another place is reached, and that would clearly be contrary to reason. For a person free from all desire and therefore non-moving does not go to another place, and the highest unity is not to be reached by a man transporting himself to another locality.

30. (The twofold view taken above) is justified because we observe a purpose characterised thereby (i.e. a purpose of the going); as in ordinary life.

Our view of the matter, viz. that a man's proceeding on the path of the gods has a meaning in certain cases but not in others, is justified by the following consideration. In meditations on the qualified Brahman such as the paryaṅka-vidyā we see a reason for the man's proceeding on the path of the gods; for the text mentions certain results which can be reached only by the man going to different places, such as his mounting a couch, his holding a colloquy with Brahman seated on the couch, his perceiving various odours and so on. On the other hand we do not see that going on the path of the gods has anything to do with perfect knowledge. For those who have risen to the intuition of the Self's unity, whose every wish is fulfilled, in whom the potentiality of all suffering is already destroyed here below, have nothing further to look for but the dissolution of the abode of activity and enjoyment of former deeds, i.e. the body; in their case therefore to proceed on the road of the gods would be purposeless.—The distinction is analogous to what is observed in ordinary life. If we want to reach some village we have to proceed on a path leading there; but no moving on a path is required when we wish to attain freedom from sickness.—The distinction made here will be established more carefully in the fourth adhyāya.

31. There is no restriction (as to the going on the path of the gods) for any vidyā; nor any contradiction (of the general subject-matter), according to scripture and inference (i.e. Smṛiti).

We have shown that the going on the path of the gods is valid only for the vidyās of the qualified Brahman, not for the knowledge of the highest Brahman which is destitute of all qualities.—Now we observe that the going on the path of the gods is mentioned only in some of the qualified vidyās, such as the paryāṅka-vidyā, the pañkāgni-vidyā, the upakośala-vidyā, the dahara-vidyā; while it is not mentioned in others, such as the madhu-vidyā, the śāṇḍilya-vidyā, the shoḍaśakala-vidyā, the vaisvānara-vidyā.—The doubt then arises whether the going on the path of the gods is to be connected with those vidyās only in which it is actually mentioned or generally with all vidyās of that kind.

The pūrvapakshin maintains the former view; for, he says, the limitative force of the general subject-matter of each particular section compels us to connect the going on the path of the gods with those vidyās only which actually mention it. If we transferred it to other vidyās also, the authoritativeness of scripture would suffer; for then anything might be the sense of anything. Moreover, the details about the path of the gods beginning with light and so on are given equally in the upakośala-vidyā and the pañkāgni-vidyā, which would be a useless repetition if as a matter of course the going on the path of the gods were connected with all vidyās.

To this we make the following reply. The going on the path of the gods is not to be restricted but to be connected equally with all those qualified vidyās which have exaltation (abhyudaya) for their result. The objection above raised by the pūrvapakshin that thereby we contradict the general subject-matter, we refute by appealing to scripture and Smṛiti. Scripture in the first place declares that not only those 'who know this,' i.e. the pañkāgni-vidyā (Kh. Up. V, 10, 1), proceed on the path of the gods, but also those who understand other vidyās, 'and also those who in the forest follow faith and austerities.'—But how do we know that the latter passage refers to those who are conversant with other vidyās? The text certainly speaks of those only who are intent on faith and austerities!—Not by faith and austerities alone, we reply, unaided by knowledge, can that path be attained; for another scriptural passage says, 'Through knowledge they mount to that place from which all wishes have passed away; those who are skilled in works only do not go there, nor penitents devoid of knowledge' (Sat. Brā. X, 5, 4, 16). We therefore conclude that faith and austerities denote at the same time other vidyās.—The Vāgasaneyins again read in the Pañkâgni-vidyâ, 'Those who thus know this and those who in the forest worship faith and the True.' The latter part of this passage we must explain to mean, 'Those who in the forest with faith worship the True, i.e. Brahman;' the term 'the True' being often employed to denote Brahman. And as those who know the pañkâgni-vidyâ are in the above passage referred to as 'those who thus know this,' we must understand the clause, 'and those who in the forest,' &c., as referring to men in the possession of other vidyās. And, moreover, also the passage, 'Those, however, who know neither of these two paths become worms, birds, and creeping things' (VI, 2, 16), which teaches that those who miss the two paths have to go downwards, intimates that those who possess other vidyās have to proceed either on the path of the gods or that of the fathers, and as their vidyās are as such not different from the pañkâgni-vidyâ, we conclude that they proceed on the path of the gods (not on that of the fathers)¹.

In the second place Smṛiti also confirms the same doctrine, 'These two, the white and the black path, are known as the eternal paths of the world; on the one man goes not to return, on the other he again returns' (Bha. Gī. VIII, 26).

With regard, finally, to the circumstance that the details about the path of the gods are given in the Upakosala- vidyâ as well as the Pañikâgni-vidyâ, we remark that the repetition is meant to assist reflection.

¹ Itas ka vidyântarasīlinām gatir iti līngadarsanam samukhīnoti atheti, etān iti vidyāntaraparā grīhyante, tathāpi katham devayānayogas teshām ity āraṅkya yogyatayety āha tatrāpīti. Ān. Gī.

For all these reasons the going on the path of the gods is not limited to those vidyâs in which it is actually mentioned.

32. Of those who have a certain office there is subsistence (of the body) as long as the office lasts.

The question here is whether for him who has reached true knowledge a new body originates after he has parted with the old one or not.—But, an objection is here raised at the outset, there is really no occasion for inquiring whether knowledge when reaching its perfection brings about its due effect, viz. complete isolation of the Self from all bodies or not ; not any more than there is room for an inquiry whether there is cooked rice or not, after the process of cooking has reached its due termination ; or, for an inquiry whether a man is satisfied by eating or not.—Not so, we reply. There is indeed room for the inquiry proposed, as we know from itihâsa and purâna that some persons although knowing Brahman yet obtained new bodies. Tradition informs us, e.g. that Apântaratamas, an ancient rishi and teacher of the Vedas, was, by the order of Vishnu, born on this earth as Krishna Dvaipâyana at the time when the Dvâparayuga was succeeded by the Kaliyuga. Similarly Vasishtha, the son of Brahman's mind, having parted from his former body in consequence of the curse of Nimi, was, on the order of Brahman, again procreated by Mitra and Varuna. Smṛiti further relates that Bhrigu and other sons of Brahman's mind were again born at the sacrifice of Varuna. Sanatkumâra also, who likewise was a son of Brahman's mind, was, in consequence of a boon being granted to Rudra, born again as Skanda. And there are similar tales about Daksha, Nârada, and others having, for various reasons, assumed new bodies. Stories of the same kind are met with in the mantras and arthavâdas of Sruti. Of some of the persons mentioned it is said that they assumed a new body after the old body had perished ; of others that they assumed, through their supernatural powers, various new bodies, while the old body remained intact all the while. And all of them are known to have completely mastered the contents of the Vedas.

On the ground of all this the pûrvapakshin maintains that the knowledge of Brahman may, indifferently, either be or not be the cause of final release.

This we deny, for the reason that the continuance of the bodily existence of Aparântamas and others—who are entrusted with offices conducive to the subsistence of the worlds, such as the promulgation of the Vedas and the like—depends on those their offices. As Savitar (the sun), who after having for thousands of yugas performed the office of watching over these worlds, at the end of that period enjoys the condition of release in which he neither rises nor sets, according to Kh. Up. III, 11, 1, ‘When from thence he has risen upwards, he neither rises nor sets. He is alone, standing in the centre;’ and as the present knowers of Brahman reach the state of isolation after the enjoyment of those results of action, which have begun to operate, has come to an end, according to Kh. Up. VI, 14, 2, ‘For him there is only delay so long as he is not delivered from the body;’ so Aparântamas and other Lords to whom the highest Lord has entrusted certain offices, last—although they possess complete knowledge, the cause of release—as long as their office lasts, their works not yet being exhausted, and obtain release only when their office comes to an end. For gradually exhausting the aggregate of works the consequences of which have once begun, so as to enable them to discharge their offices; passing according to their free will from one body into another, as if from one house into another, in order to accomplish the duties of their offices; preserving all the time the memory of their identity; they create for themselves through their power over the material of the body and the sense organs new bodies, and occupy them either all at once or in succession. Nor can it be said that when passing into new bodies they remember only the fact of their former existence (not their individuality); for it is known that they preserve the sense of their individuality¹. Smṛiti tells us, e.g. that Sulabhā, a woman conversant with Brahman, wishing to dispute with Ganaka, left her own body, entered into that of Ganaka, carried on a discussion with him, and again returned into her own body. If in addition to the works the consequences of which are already in operation, other works manifested themselves, constituting the cause of further embodiments, the result would be that in the same way further works also, whose potentiality would in that case not be destroyed, would take place, and then it might be suspected that the knowledge of Brahman may, indifferently, either be or not be the cause of final release. But such a suspicion is inadmissible since it is known from Sruti and Smṛiti that knowledge completely destroys the potentiality of action. For Sruti says, 'The fetter of the heart is broken, all doubts are solved, all his works perish when He has been beheld who is high and low' (Mu. Up. II, 2, 8); and, 'When the memory remains firm, then all the ties are loosened' (Kh. Up. VII, 26, 2). And Smṛiti similarly says, 'As a fire well kindled, O Arguna, reduces fuel to ashes, so the fire of knowledge reduces all actions to ashes;' and, 'As seeds burned by fire do not sprout again, so the Self is not again touched by the afflictions which knowledge has burned.' Nor is it possible that when the afflictions such as ignorance and the like are burned, the aggregate of works which is the seed of affliction should be partly burned, but partly keep the power of again springing up; not any more than the seed of the Sāli, when burned, preserves the power of sprouting again with some part. The aggregate of works, however, whose fruits have once begun to develop themselves comes to rest through effecting a delay which terminates with the death of the body, just as an arrow discharged stops in the end owing to the gradual cessation of its impetus; this in agreement with Kh. Up. VI, 14, 2, 'For him there is only delay,' &c. We have thus shown that persons to whom an office is entrusted last as long as their office lasts, and that nevertheless there is absolutely only one result of true knowledge.—In accordance with this, scripture declares that the result of knowledge on the part of all beings is equally final release, cp. ‘So whatever Deva was awakened he indeed became that, and the same with Rīshis and men’ (Bṛi. Up. I, 4, 10). Moreover¹ it may be the case that (some) great rīshis had attached their minds to other cognitions whose result is lordly power and the like, and that later on only when they became aware of the transitory nature of those results they turned from them and fixed their minds on the highest Self, whereby they obtained final release. As Smṛiti says, ‘When the mahāpralaya has arrived and the highest (i.e. Hiranyagarbha) himself comes to an end, then they all, with well-prepared minds, reach together with Brahman the highest place.’—Another reason precluding the suspicion that true knowledge may be destitute of its result is that that result is the object of immediate intuition. In the case of such results of action as the heavenly world and the like which are not present to intuitional knowledge, there may be a doubt; but not so in the case of the fruit of true knowledge, with regard to which scripture says, ‘The Brahman which is present to intuition, not hidden’ (Bṛi. Up. III, 4, 1), and which in the passage, ‘That art thou,’ is referred to as something already accomplished. This latter passage cannot be interpreted to mean, ‘Thou wilt be that after thou hast died;’ for another Vedic passage declares that the fruit of complete knowledge, viz. union with the universal Self, springs up at the moment when complete knowledge is attained, ‘The Rīshi Vāmadeva saw and understood it, singing, “I was Manu, I was the sun.”’

¹ Utpadyamānānām aparimushitasmaratve-pi gâtismaratvam eva na vasish/hâdinânatvam ity âraṅkyâha na kēti. Ān. Gi.

For all these reasons we maintain that those who possess true knowledge reach in all cases final release.

33. But the (denials of) conceptions concerning the akshara are to be comprehended (in all meditations on the akshara), on account of the equality and of the object being the same, as in the case of the upasad; this has been explained (in the Pûrva Mîmâmsâ).

¹ Api ka nādhikāravatām sarveshām rīshīnām āmatattvagñānam tenāvyāpako'py ayam pūrvapaksha ity āha gñānāntareshu kēti. Bhā.

We read in the Vâgasaneyaka, 'O Gârî, the Brâhmanas call this the Akshara. It is neither coarse, nor fine, nor short, nor long,' &c. (Bri. Up. III, 8, 8). Similarly the Âtharvâna says, 'The higher knowledge is that by which the Indestructible is apprehended. That which cannot be seen nor seized, which has no family and no caste,' &c. (Mu. Up. I, 1, 5; 6). In other places also the highest Brahman, under the name of Akshara, is described as that of which all qualities are to be denied. Now in some places qualities are denied of Brahman which are not denied in other places, and hence a doubt arises whether the mental conception of these particular denials is to form part of all those passages or not.

To the assertion of the pûrvapakshin that each denial is valid only for that passage in which the text actually exhibits it, we make the following reply.—The conceptions of the akshara, i.e. the conceptions of the particular denials concerning the akshara, are to be included in all those passages, 'on account of the equality and on account of the same object being referred to.' The equality consists therein that all the texts alluded to convey an idea of Brahman in the same way, viz. by denying of it all attributes; and we recognise in all of them the same object of instruction, viz. the one undivided Brahman. Why then should the conceptions stated in one passage not be valid for all others also? To the present case the same argumentation applies which had been made use of under III, 3, 11. There positive attributes were discussed; here we are concerned with negative ones. The division of the discussion into two (instead of disposing of positive and negative attributes in one adhikarâna) is due to the wish of explaining the differences in detail.—The clause, 'as in the case of the upasads,' introduces a parallel case. For the *Gāmadagnya-ahina-sacrifice*¹ the text enjoins that the upasad offerings are to consist of puroḍāsas. Now although the mantras accompanying the offering of the puroḍāsas are originally enjoined in the Veda of the Udgātrīs (Tāndya Brā. XXI, 10, 11, 'Agni, promote the hotra,' &c.), yet they are to be enounced by the adhvaryu; for the offering of the puroḍāsas is the work of the adhvaryu, and subordinate matters (i.e. here, the mantras) are governed by the principal matter (i.e. the offering of the puroḍāsa). Similarly, in the case under discussion, the attributes of the akshara have, because they are subordinate to the akshara itself, to be connected with the latter everywhere, in whatever places the text may originally state them.—The principle of decision employed is explained in the Pūrva Mīmāṃsā-sūtras III, 3, 9.

34. On account of (the same) number being recorded.

The Ātharvanikas exhibit, with reference to the Self, the following mantra, 'Two birds, inseparable friends, cling to the same tree. One of them eats the sweet fruit, the other looks on without eating' (Mu. Up. III, 1, 1). The same mantra is found in the text of the Svetāsvatara (IV, 6). The Kaṭhas again read, 'There are the two drinking their reward in the world of their own works, entered into the cave, dwelling on the highest summit. Those who know Brahman call them shade and light, likewise those householders who perform the Trināṭiketa-sacrifice.'—The doubt here arises whether the two sections introduced by these mantras constitute one vidyā or two vidyās. Here the pūrvapakshin maintains that we have to do with two separate vidyās, because the texts exhibit certain differences. For the mantra of the Mundaka and Svetāsvatara Upanishads represents one bird as enjoying and the other as not enjoying; while in the mantra of the Kaṭhas both are said to enjoy.—As thus the objects of knowledge differ in character, the vidyâs themselves must be looked upon as separate.

¹ I.e. a sacrifice lasting four days, called Gāmadagnya, because first offered by Gamadagni. Cp. Taitt. Samh. VII, 1, 9.

To this we make the following reply. The vidyâ is one only because both mantras exhibit the character of the objects of knowledge as one and the same, viz. as defined by the number two.—But has not the pûrvapakshin shown that there exists a certain difference of character?—By no means, we reply. Both texts intimate one and the same matter, viz. the Lord together with the individual soul. In the Mundaka-text the clause, 'The other looks on without eating,' intimates the highest Self which is raised above all desire; the same highest Self forms also the subject of the complementary passage, 'But when he sees the other Lord contented.' And the Kaṭha-text intimates the same highest Self which is raised above all desire; only, as it is mentioned together with the enjoying individual soul, it is itself metaphorically spoken of as enjoying; just as we speak of the 'men with the umbrella,' although only one out of several carries an umbrella. For that in the Kaṭha-text also the highest Self forms the general subject-matter we have to conclude from the preceding passage, 'That which thou seest as neither this nor that' (I, 2, 14), and from the complementary passage referring to the same Self, 'Which is a bridge for sacrificers, which is the highest imperishable Brahman' (I, 3, 2). All this has been explained at length under I, 2, 11. As therefore there is one object of knowledge only, the vidyâ also is one.—Moreover, if we carefully examine the context of the three mantras quoted, we observe that they are concerned merely with the knowledge of the highest Self, and that they mention the individual soul not as a new object of instruction but merely to show its identity with the highest Self. And that, as far as the knowledge of the highest Self is concerned, the question as to the oneness or separateness of vidyâs cannot be even raised, we have already shown above. The present Sûtra therefore merely aims at a fuller discussion of the matter, the practical outcome of which is that any particulars stated in one of the texts only have to be supplied in the others also.

35. As the Self is within all, as in the case of the aggregate of the elements, (there is oneness of vidyâ).

The Vāgasaneyins record, in the questions asked by Ushasta and by Kahola, the same passage twice in succession, 'Tell me the Brahman which is present to intuition, not hidden ; the Self who is within all' (Bṛi. Up. III, 4, 1 ; 5, 1).—The question here presents itself whether the two sections introduced by the questions constitute one vidyâ only or two separate vidyâs.

Two separate vidyâs, the pūrvapakshin maintains ; owing to the force of repetition. For if the second passage added nothing to—or took nothing away from—the contents of the first, the repetition would be altogether meaningless. We therefore conclude that the repetition intimates the separateness of the two vidyâs, just as in the Pūrvā Mīmāṃsā repetition shows two sacrificial actions to be separate.

To this we make the following reply. As both texts equally declare the Self to be within all, they must be taken as constituting one vidyâ only. In both passages question and answer equally refer to a Self which is within everything. For in one body there cannot be two Selves, each of which is inside everything else. One Self indeed may without difficulty be within everything, but of a second one this could not be predicated, not any more than of the aggregate of the elements ; i.e. the case of that second Self is analogous to that of the aggregate of the five elements, i.e. the body. In the body the element of water is indeed within the element of earth, and the element of fire within the element of water ; but each of these elements is 'within all' in a relative sense only, not in the literal sense of the phrase.—Or else the 'like the aggregate of the elements (or beings)' of the Sūtra has to be taken as pointing to another scriptural passage, viz. Sve. Up. VI, 11, 'He is the one god, hidden in all beings, all-pervading, the Self within all beings.' As this mantra records that one Self lives within the aggregate of all beings, the same holds good with regard to the two Brāhmaṇa-passages. And the object of knowledge being one, the vidyā also is one only.

36. If it be said that otherwise the separation (of the statements) cannot be accounted for; we reply that it is (here) as in the case of other instructions.

We yet have to refute the remark made by the pūrva-pakshin that, unless the separateness of the two vidyās be admitted, the separation of the two statements cannot be accounted for. We do this by pointing to analogous cases. In the sixth prapāṭhaka of the upanishad of the Tāndins the instruction conveyed in the words, 'That is the Self, thou art that, O Svetaketu,' is repeated nine times, and yet the one vidyā is not thereby split into many. Similarly in our case.—But how do you know that the vidyā remains one and the same in spite of the ninefold repetition?—Because, we reply, the introductory and concluding clauses show that all those passages have the same sense. For the repeated request on the part of Svetaketu, 'Please, Sir, inform me still more,' shows that one and the same matter is again and again proposed for further discussion, and further instruction regarding it is repeatedly given by means of new doubts being removed. Similarly, in the case under discussion, the sameness of form of the two introductory questions and the equality of the concluding clauses, 'Everything else is of evil,' show that both sections refer to one and the same matter.—Moreover, in the second question the text adds the word 'just' (eva), 'Tell me just that Brahman,' &c., which shows that the second question refers to the same matter as the first one. That the matter of the two sections is really the same, we establish by pointing out that the former section declares the existence of the highest Self which is neither cause nor effect, while the latter qualifies it as that which transcends all the attributes of the Samsāra state, such as hunger, thirst, and so on.—The two sections, therefore, form one vidyā only.

37. There is exchange (of meditation), for the texts distinguish (two meditations); as in other cases.

The Aitareyins declare with reference to the person in the sun, 'What I am, that is he; what he is, that am I' (Ait. Âr. II, 2, 4, 6). And the Gābālas say, 'I am thou indeed, O reverend divinity, and thou art I indeed.'—The doubt here arises whether the reflection founded upon this text is to be a double one 'by means of exchange' (i.e. whether the soul is to be meditated upon as āditya and āditya as the soul), or a simple one (the soul only being meditated upon as āditya).

The pūrvapakshin maintains the latter view; for, he says, the text cannot possibly propose as matter of meditation anything but the oneness of the individual soul with the Lord. For if we assumed that two different forms of meditation are intended, viz. firstly the soul's being the Self of the Lord, and, secondly, the Lord's being the Self of the soul, the soul indeed would be exalted by the former meditation, but the Lord, at the same time, be lowered by the latter one. We therefore conclude that the meditation is to be of one kind only, and that the double form, in which the text exhibits it, merely aims at confirming the oneness of the Self.

To this we make the following reply. 'Exchange' is expressly recorded in the text for the purposes of meditation, just as other qualities (of the Self), such as its being the Self of all, &c., are recorded for the same purpose. For both texts make the distinctive double enunciation, 'I am thou,' and 'Thou art I.' Now this double enunciation has a sense only if a twofold meditation is to be based upon it; otherwise it would be devoid of meaning, since one statement would be all that is required.—But has not the pūrvapakshin urged above that this your explanation involves a lowering of the Lord, who is thereby represented as having the transmigrating soul for his Self?—Never mind, we reply; even in that way only the unity of the Self is meditated upon.—But does your explanation then not come to that of the pûrvapakshin, viz. that the double statement is merely meant to confirm the oneness of the Self?—We do not, our reply is, deny that the text confirms the oneness of the Self; we only want to prove that, on the ground of the text as it stands, a twofold meditation has to be admitted, not a simple one. That this virtually confirms the unity of the Self we admit; just as the instruction about (the Lord's) possessing such qualities as having only true wishes, and so on—which instruction is given for the purpose of meditation—at the same time proves the existence of a Lord endowed with such qualities.—Hence the double relation enounced in the text has to be meditated upon, and is to be transferred to other vidyâs also which treat of the same subject.

38. For the True and so on are one and the same (vidyâ).

The text of the Vâgasaneyaka, after having enjoined the knowledge of the True, together with a meditation on the syllables of its name ('Whosoever knows this great glorious first-born as the true Brahman,' &c., Bri. Up. V, 4, 1), continues, 'Now what is the True, that is the Âditya, the person that dwells in yonder orb, and the person in the right eye' (V, 5, 2).—The doubt here arises whether the text enjoins two vidyâs of the True or one only.

Two, the pûrvapakshin maintains. For the text declares two different results, one in the earlier passage, 'He conquers these worlds' (V, 4, 1); the other one later on, 'He destroys evil and leaves it' (V, 5, 3). And what our opponent may call a reference to the subject-matter under discussion¹, is merely due to the circumstance of the object of meditation being the same (in the two vidyâs).

To this we make the following reply.—There is only one vidyâ of the True, because the clause, 'That which is the True,' &c., refers back to that True which is treated of in V, 4.—But has not the pûrvapakshin shown that the clause alluded to can be accounted for even on the supposition of there being two vidyâs?—The reasoning of the pûrvapakshin, we reply, would be admissible only if the separateness of the two vidyâs were established by some other clear and undoubted reason; in our case, however, there is a general possibility of both (viz. of the vidyâs being separate or not), and the very circumstance that the mentioned clause contains a back reference to the True spoken of in V, 4, determines us to conclude that there is only one vidyâ of the True.—To the remark that there must be two vidyâs because the text states two different results, we reply that the statement of a second result merely has the purpose of glorifying the new instruction given about the True, viz. that its secret names are ahar and aham. Moreover, as in the case under discussion, the fruit of the vidyâ has really to be supplied from its arthavâda part¹, and as there is unity of vidyâ, all those fruits which the text states in connexion with the single parts of the vidyâ are to be combined and put in connexion with the vidyâ taken as a whole.—The conclusion therefore is that the text records only one vidyâ of the True, distinguished by such and such details, and that hence all the qualities mentioned, such as Truth and so on, are to be comprehended in one act of meditation.

¹ Viz. the clause in V, 5, 2, 'That which is the true,' which apparently—or really—connects the vidyâ of V, 5 with that of V, 4.

Some commentators are of opinion that the above Sûtra refers (not to the question whether Brî. Up. V, 4 and V, 5 constitute one vidyâ but) to the question whether the Vâgasaneyaka-passage about the persons in the sun and in the eye, and the similar Khândogya-passage (I, 6, 6, 'Now that golden person who is seen within the sun,' &c.) form one vidyâ or not. They conclude that they do so, and that hence truth and the other qualities mentioned in the Vâgasaneyaka are to be combined with the Khândogya-text also.—But this interpretation of the Sûtra appears objectionable. For the Khândogya-vidyâ refers to the udgîtha and is thus connected with sacrificial acts, marks of which connexion are exhibited in the beginning, the middle, and the end of the vidyâ. Thus we read at the beginning, 'The Rik is the earth, the Sâman is fire;' in the middle, 'Rik and Sâman are his joints and therefore he is udgîtha;' and in the end, 'He who knowing this sings a Sâman' (Kh. Up. I, 6, 1; 8; I, 7, 7). In the Vâgasaneyaka, on the other hand, there is nothing to connect the vidyâ with sacrificial acts. As therefore the subject-matter is different, the vidyâs are separate and the details of the two are to be held apart.

¹ For the vidyâ contains no explicit statement that a man desirous of such and such a fruit is to meditate on the True in such and such a way.—That in cases where the fruit is not stated in a vidhi-passage it must be supplied from the arthavâda-passages, is taught in the Pû. Mî. Sû. IV, 3, eighth adhikaraṇa.

39. (Having true) wishes and other (qualities) (have to be combined) there and here, on account of the abode and so on.

In the chapter of the Khândogya which begins with the passage, 'There is this city of Brahman and in it the palace, the small lotus, and in it that small ether' (VIII, 1, 1), we read, 'That is the Self free from sin, free from old age, from death and grief, from hunger and thirst, whose desires are true, whose imaginations are true.' A similar passage is found in the text of the Vâgasaneyins, 'He is that great unborn Self who consists of knowledge, is surrounded by the Prâṇas, the ether within the heart. In it there reposes the ruler of all' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 22).

A doubt here arises whether these two passages constitute one vidyâ, and whether the particulars stated in one text are to be comprehended within the other text also.

There is oneness of vidyâ¹.—Here (the Sûtrakâra) says, 'Wishes and so on,' i. e. 'The quality of having true wishes and so on' (the word kâma standing for satyakâma, just as people occasionally say Datta for Devadatta and Bhāmā for Satyabhāmā). This quality and the other qualities, which the Khândogya attributes to the ether within the heart, have to be combined with the Vâgasaneyaka-passage, and vice versâ the qualities stated in the Vâgasaneyaka, such as being the ruler of all, have also to be ascribed to the Self free from sin, proclaimed in the Khândogya. The reason for this is that the two passages display a number of common features. Common to both is the heart viewed as abode, common again is the Lord as object of knowledge, common also is the Lord being viewed as a bank preventing these worlds from being confounded; and several other points.—But, an objection is raised, there are also differences. In the Khândogya the qualities are attributed to the ether within the heart, while in the Vâgasaneyaka they are ascribed to Brahman abiding in that ether.—This objection, we reply, is unfounded, for we have shown under I, 3, 14 that the term ‘ether’ in the Khândogya designates Brahman.

¹ This clause must apparently be taken as stating the siddhânta-view, although later on it is said that the two vidyâs are distinct (that, however, in spite of their distinctness, their details have to be combined).

There is, however, the following difference between the two passages. The Khândogya-vidyâ has for its object the qualified Brahman, as we see from the passage VIII, 1, 6, ‘But those who depart from hence after having discovered the Self and those true desires,’ in which certain desires are represented as objects of knowledge equally as the Self. In the Vâgasaneyaka, on the other hand, the highest Brahman devoid of all qualities forms the object of instruction, as we conclude from the consideration of the request made by Ganaka, ‘Speak on for the sake of emancipation,’ and the reply given by Yâgñavalkya, ‘For that person is not attached to anything’ (Bri. Up. IV, 3, 14; 15). That the text ascribes to the Self such qualities as being the Lord of all and the like is (not for the purpose of teaching that the Self really possesses those qualities, but is) merely meant to glorify the Self. Later on also (IV, 5, 15) the chapter winds up with a passage clearly referring to the Self devoid of all qualities, ‘That Self is to be described by No, no!’ But as the qualified Brahman is (fundamentally) one (with the unqualified Brahman), we must conclude that the Sūtra teaches the combination of the qualities to the end of setting forth the glory of Brahman, not for the purpose of devout meditation.

40. On account of (the passage showing) respect, there is non-omission (of the prāṇāgnihotra) (even when the eating of food is omitted).

We read in the Khândogya under the heading of the Vaisvânara-vidyâ, 'Therefore the first food which comes is in the place of Homa. And he who offers that first oblation should offer it to Prâṇa, saying Svâhâ' (Kh. Up. V, 19, 1). The text thereupon enjoins five oblations, and later on applies to them the term 'Agnihotra;' 'He who thus knowing this offers the agnihotra,' and 'As hungry children here on earth sit round their mother, so do all beings sit round the agnihotra' (V, 24, 2 ; 4).

Here the doubt arises whether the agnihotra offered to the prâṇas is to be omitted when the eating itself is omitted or not.—As, according to the clause, 'The first food which comes,' &c., the oblation is connected with the coming of food, and as the coming of food subserves the eating, the agnihotra offered to the prâṇas is omitted when the eating is omitted.—Against this conclusion the Sūtra (embodying the pûrvapaksha) declares, 'It is not omitted.'—Why?—'On account of the respect.' This means: In their version of the Vaisvânara-vidyâ the Gâbâlas read as follows: 'He (i.e. the host) is to eat before his guests; for (if he would make them eat first) it would be as if he without having himself offered the agnihotra offered that of another person.' This passage, which objects to the priority of the eating on the part of the guests and establishes priority on the part of the host, thereby intimates respect for the agnihotra offered to the prâṇas. For as it does not allow the omission of priority it will allow all the less the omission of that which is characterised by priority, viz. the agnihotra offered to the prâṇas.—But (as mentioned above) the connexion—established by the Khândogya-passage—of the oblation with the coming of food—which subserves the eating—establishes the omission of the oblation in the case of the eating being omitted!—Not so, the pûrvapakshin replies. The purpose of that passage is to enjoin some particular material (to be offered). For the fundamental agnihotra certain materials, such as milk and so on, are exclusively prescribed. Now, as through the term 'agnihotra' (which the text applies to the offering to the prâṇas) all the particulars belonging to the fundamental agnihotra are already established for the secondary agnihotra also (viz. the oblation made to the prâṇas), just as in the case of the ayana of the *Kundapâyins*¹; the clause, 'the first food which comes,' &c., is meant to enjoin, for the prâṇagnihotra, some particular secondary matter, viz. the circumstance of food constituting the material of the oblation². Hence, considering the Mīmāṃsā principle that the omission of a secondary matter does not involve the omission of the principal matter, we conclude that even in the case of the omission of eating, the agnihotra offered to the prâṇas has to be performed by means of water or some other not altogether unsuitable material, according to the Mīmāṃsā principle that in the absence of the prescribed material some other suitable material may be substituted.

To this pûrvapaksha the next Sûtra replies.

41. When (eating) is taking place, (the prâṇagnihotra has to be performed) from that (i.e. the food first eaten); on the ground of the passage declaring this.

When eating is actually taking place, 'from that,' i.e. with that material of food which first presents itself, the agnihotra offered to the prâṇas is to be effected.—On what ¹ For one of the great sacrifices lasting a whole year—called the ayana of the Kundapâyins—the texts enjoin the offering of the 'agnihotra' during a full month (cp. e.g. Tândya Mahâbrâhmana XXV, 4). Now from the term 'agnihotra' we conclude that all the details of the ordinary agnihotra are valid for the agnihotra of the ayana also.

² Whereby the materials offered in the ordinary agnihotra are superseded.

ground?—‘On the ground of the passage declaring this.’ For the clause, ‘The first food which a man may take is in the place of a homa,’ enjoins the circumstance of the oblations to the prâṇas being effected by means of a material (primarily) subserving another purpose (viz. eating), as appears from its referring to the presentation of food as something accomplished (i. e. accomplished independently of the oblations; not tending to accomplish the oblations). How then should these oblations—which are characterised as not having any motive power with regard to the employment of the food—be capable of causing us to substitute, in the absence of eating, some other material (than food)?—Nor is it true that there are already established, for the *prâṇâgni*hotra, all the details belonging to the fundamental *agni*hotra. In the case of the ayana of the Kundâpâyins, the term ‘*agni*hotra’ forms part of the injunctive passage, ‘They offer the *agni*hotra during a month,’ and therefore may have the force of enjoining a general character of the sacrifice identical with that of the fundamental *agni*hotra; and it is therefore appropriate to consider the details of the latter as valid for the *agni*hotra of the Kundâpâyins also. In the case of the so-called *prâṇâgni*hotra, on the other hand, the term ‘*agni*hotra’ occurs in an arthavâda-passage only, and does not therefore possess an analogous injunctive force. If, again, we admitted that the details of the fundamental *agni*hotra are valid for the *prâṇâgni*hotra also, such details as the transference of the fire (from the gârhapatya fire to the two other fires) would be likewise valid. But this is impossible, as the transference of the fire is made for the purpose of establishing a fire-place in which the oblations are made; in our case, on the other hand, the oblations are not made in the fire at all—because that would interfere with their being used as food, and because they are connected with a material procured for the purpose of eating,—but are made in the mouth (of the eater). Thus the text of the Gâbâlas also, ‘He is to eat before the guests,’ shows that the accomplishment of the oblation has the mouth for its abode. For the same reason (i. e. because the details of the fundamental *agni*hotra are not valid for the *prâṇāgni*hotra) the text declares the subordinate members of the *agni*hotra to be present here (i.e. in the *prâṇāgni*hotra) in the way of fanciful combination only, 'the chest is the vedi, the hairs the sacrificial grass, the heart the Gârhapatya fire, the mind the Anvâhârya-pakana fire, the mouth the Âhavanîya fire.' By the vedi mentioned in this passage we have to understand a levelled spot, as in the fundamental *agni*hotra there is no vedi, and as the intention of the passage is to effect a fanciful combination of the members of the fundamental *agni*hotra (with members of the *prâṇāgni*hotra).—And as the *prâṇāgni*hotra is connected with eating which has its definite times, it is also not possible that it should be restricted to the time enjoined for the fundamental *agni*hotra. In the same way other particulars also of the fundamental *agni*hotra, such as the so-called upasthâna, cannot be reconciled with the requirements of the *prâṇāgni*hotra. From all this it follows that the five oblations, as connected with their respective mantras, materials, and divinities, have to be performed only in the case of food being eaten.—With reference to the passage showing 'respect,' we remark that it is meant to intimate priority (of the host), in the case of food being actually eaten. But the passage has no power to declare that the offering of the *prâṇāgni*hotra is of permanent obligation.—It therefore is a settled conclusion that the *prâṇāgni*hotra is omitted when the eating of food is omitted.

42. There is non-restriction of the assertions concerning them (i.e. the assertions made concerning certain sacrificial acts are not permanently connected with those acts), because this is seen (in scripture); for a separate fruit, viz. non-obstruction (of the success of the sacrifice), (belongs to them).

We meet in the Vedânta-texts with certain vidyâs which are founded on matters subordinate to sacrificial acts. To this class belongs, e.g. the first vidyâ of the Khândogya Upanishad, 'Let a man meditate on the syllable Om as udgîtha.'—We now enter on an inquiry whether those vidyās are permanently connected with the acts in the same way as the circumstance of being made of parṇa-wood is permanently connected with all sacrifices in which the guhû (the sacrificial ladle) is used; or if they are non-permanent like the vessel called *godohana*¹. The pûrva-pakshin maintains that the meditations are permanently connected with the sacrificial acts, because they also are comprised within the scriptural enouncements concerning performances. For they also do not stand under some special heading², and as they are connected with the sacrifice through the udgîtha and so on, they combine themselves, like other subordinate members, with the scriptural statements as to the performance of the sacrifice.

If against the doctrine of the meditations forming permanent parts of the sacrificial performances it should be urged, that in the chapters containing them special results are mentioned (which seem to constitute the meditations into independent acts), as e.g. in the passage, 'he indeed becomes a fulfiller of desires' (Kh. Up. I, 1, 7); we reply that those statements of results being given in the text in the present form only (not in an injunctive form), are mere arthavāda-passages—like the statement about him whose guhû is made of parna-wood hearing no evil sound—and thus do not aim at enjoining certain results.—Hence, just as the statement about being made of parna-wood—which does not occur under a definite prakaraṇa—connects itself, by means of the sacrificial ladle, with the sacrifice, and thus forms a permanent element of the latter no less than if it were actually made under the heading of the sacrifice ; so the meditations on the udgîtha, &c., also form permanent parts of the sacrifices.

¹ The question is raised whether the meditations, enjoined in the Upanishads, on certain parts or elements of sacrificial acts, are permanently connected with the latter, i.e. are to be undertaken whenever the sacrificial act is performed, or not.—In the former case they would stand to the sacrifice in the same relation as the parṇamayîta, i.e. the quality of being made of parṇa-wood, does. Just as the latter is connected with the sacrifice by means of the guhû—the sacrificial ladle,—so the meditation on the syllable Om, e.g. would be connected with the sacrifice by means of that syllable.—In the latter case, i.e. in the case of being connected with the sacrifice on certain occasions only, the upâsana is analogous to the godohana-vessel which is used in the darsapûrṇamâsa-sacrifice instead of the usual ṛamasa, only if the sacrificer specially wishes for cattle.—See Pû. Mî. Sû. III, 6, 1; IV, 1, 2.

² Like the statement about the parṇamayîta of the guhû which the sacred text does not exhibit under some particular prakaraṇa, but ex abrupto as it were; on which account it is to be connected with the sacrifice in general.

To this we make the following reply. 'There is non-restriction of the assertions concerning them.' That means : the assertions which the text makes concerning the nature of certain subordinate members of sacrificial acts such as the udgîtha and so on—as e. g. that the udgîtha is the best of all essences (Kh. Up. I, 1, 3), the fulfiller of desires (I, 1, 7), a gratifier of desires (I, 1, 8), the chief prâṇa (I, 2, 7), Âditya (I, 3, 1)—cannot be permanently connected with the sacrificial acts in the same way as other permanent members are, 'because that is seen,' i. e. because scripture shows that they are not so permanently connected. For scripture allows also such as are not acquainted with the details mentioned above to perform the sacrificial actions (cp. the passage I, 1, 10, 'Therefore both he who knows this, and he who does not, perform the sacrifice'), and declares that even those priests, Prastotri and so on, who are devoid of the knowledge of the divinities of the prastâva and the like, do perform the sacrifices 'Prastotri, if you without knowing the deity which belongs to the prastâva are going to sing it,' &c. (I, 10, 9 and ff.).—The sacred text moreover declares that the vidyâs founded on certain elements of sacrificial acts have results of their own, apart from those acts, viz. 'non-obstruction' in the accomplishment of the fruit of the sacrifice, i. e. a certain additional success of the sacrifice, cp. the passage I, 1, 10, 'Therefore he who knows this and he who does not perform the sacrifice. But knowledge and ignorance are separate. The sacrifice which a man performs with knowledge, faith, and the Upanishad is more powerful.' The declaration made in this passage that the performances of him who knows and of him who does not know are separate, and the employment of the comparative form ('more powerful') show that even the sacrifice destitute of the vidyā is powerful. But how would that be possible if the vidyā formed a permanent necessary part of the sacrifice? In the latter case a sacrifice devoid of that vidyā could never be admitted to be powerful; for it is an established principle that only those sacrifices are effective which comprise all subordinate members. Thus the text also teaches definite results for each meditation, in the section treating of the meditation on the Sāman as the worlds and others: 'The worlds in an ascending and in a descending line belong to him,' &c. (Kh. Up. II, 2, 3).—Nor must we understand those declarations of results to be mere arthavādas; for in that case they would have to be taken as stating a secondary matter only, while if understood to teach certain results they may be taken in their principal (i. e. direct, literal) sense¹. The case of the results which scripture declares to be connected with the prayāgas e.g. is of a different nature. For the prayāgas are enjoined with reference to a sacrifice (viz. the darsapūrṇamāsa) which requires certain definite modes of procedure (such as the offering of the prayāgas and the like), and hence subserve that sacrifice; so that the passage stating a fruit for the prayāgas has to be considered as a mere arthavāda-passage². In the case again of the quality of consisting of parṇa-wood—which quality is stated ex abrupto, not under a definite heading—no special result can be assumed; for as a quality is not an act it cannot be connected with any result unless it be joined to something to abide in. The use of the godohana indeed may have its own injunction of result, for it does possess such an abode—viz. the act of water being carried (in it)—with reference to which it is enjoined. So again a special fruit may be enjoined for the case of the sacrificial post being made of bilva-wood; for this latter quality likewise has an abode, viz. the sacrificial post with reference to which it is enjoined. But in the case of the quality of consisting of parṇa-wood there is no such established abode under the heading of which that quality is enjoined; and if we assumed that the sentence ('He whose guhû is made of parṇa-wood hears no evil sound') after intimating that the quality of consisting of parṇa-wood resides in the guhû is also meant to enjoin the fruit thereof, we should impute to the text the imperfection called 'split of the sentence.'—The meditations on the other hand are themselves acts, and as such capable of a special injunction; hence there is no reason why a special result should not be enjoined for those meditations which are based on sacrificial acts. The conclusion therefore is that the meditations on the udgîtha, &c., although based on sacrifices, are yet not necessary members of the latter, because they have results of their own like the use of the godohana-vessel. For this reason the authors of the Kalpa-sûtras have not represented such meditations as belonging to the sacrificial performances.

¹ The statement as to the result of an action is a 'statement of a principal matter' if it is really meant to inform us that a certain result will attend a certain action. It is a statement of a 'secondary matter' if it is only meant to glorify the action.

² Not as a passage enjoining a special result for the prayāgas; for the latter merely help to bring about the general result of the darsapūrṇamāsa and have no special result of their own.

43. As in the case of the offerings, (Vāyu and Prāṇa must be held apart). This has been explained (in the Pûrva Mîmāṃsā-sûtra).

The section of the Vâgasaneyaka which begins, 'Voice held, I shall speak' (Bri. Up. I, 5, 21), determines Prāṇa to be the best among the organs of the body, viz. speech and so on, and Vāyu to be the best among the Devas, viz. Agni and so on.—Similarly in the Kṛhândogya, Vāyu is affirmed to be the general absorber of the Devas, 'Vāyu indeed is the absorber' (IV, 3, 1), while Prāṇa is said to be the general absorber of the organs of the body, 'Breath indeed is the absorber' (IV, 3, 3).—The doubt here arises whether Vāyu and Prāṇa are to be conceived as separate or not.

As non-separate, the pûrvapakshin maintains; because in their true nature they do not differ. And as their true nature does not differ they must not be meditated upon separately. Another scriptural passage also declares that the organs of the body and the divinities are non-different in their true nature, 'Agni having become speech entered the mouth,' &c. (Ait. Âr. II, 4, 2, 4). Moreover, the passage Bri. Up. I, 5, 13, 'These are all alike, all endless,' declares that the powers of the Devas constitute the Self of the organs of the body. And various other passages also testify to the fundamental non-difference of the two. In some places we have even a direct identification of the two, 'What Prâna is, that is Vâyu.' And in the sloka concluding the Vâgasaneyaka-chapter to which the passage under discussion belongs, the text refers to prâna only ('He verily rises from the breath and sets in the breath'), and thus shows the breath to be one with the previously mentioned Vâyu. This conclusion is moreover confirmed by the fact that the observance enjoined in the end refers to prâna only, 'Therefore let a man perform one observance only, let him breathe up and let him breathe down' (Bri. Up. I, 5, 23). Similarly, the Khândogya-passage, IV, 3, 6, 'One god swallowed the four great ones,' intimates that there is one absorber only, and does not say that one god is the absorber of the one set of four, and another the absorber of the other set of four.—From all this it follows that Vâyu and Prâna are to be conceived as one.

To this we make the following reply. Vâyu and Prâna are to be conceived separately, because the text teaches them in separation. The separate instruction given by the text with reference to the organs and the Devas for the purposes of meditation would be meaningless if the meditations were not held apart.—But the pûrvapakshin maintains that owing to the essential non-difference of Vâyu and Prâna the meditations are not to be separated!—Although, we reply, there may be non-difference of true nature, yet there may be difference of condition giving rise to difference of instruction, and, through the latter, to difference of meditation. And although the introduction of the concluding sloka may be accounted for on the ground of its showing the fundamental non-difference of the two, it yet has no power to sublimate the previously declared difference of the objects of meditation. Moreover, the text institutes a comparison between Vāyu and Prāṇa, which again shows that the two are different, 'And as it was with the central breath among the breaths, so it was with Vāyu, the wind among those deities' (Bṛi. Up. I, 5, 22).—This explains also the mention made of the observance (I, 5, 23). The word 'only' (in 'Let a man perform one observance only') has the purpose of establishing the observance with regard to Prāṇa, by sublimating the observances with regard to speech and so on, regarding which the text had remarked previously that they were disturbed by Death ('Death having become weariness took them'), and does not by any means aim at sublimating the observance with regard to Vāyu; for the section beginning 'Next follows the consideration of the observances' distinctly asserts that the observances of Vāyu and Prāṇa were equally unbroken.—Moreover, the text, after having said, 'Let a man perform one observance only,' declares in the end that the fruit of that observance is the obtaining of (union with) Vāyu ('Then he obtains through it union and oneness with that deity'), and thus shows that the observance with regard to Vāyu is not to be considered as sublimated. That by that 'deity' we have to understand Vāyu, we conclude from the circumstance that what the worshipper wishes to obtain is non-limitation of his Self¹, and that previously the term 'deity' had been applied to Vāyu, 'Vāyu is the deity that never sets.'—Analogously in the Khândogya-passage the text represents Vāyu and Prāṇa as different, 'These are the two absorbers, Vāyu among the Devas, Prāṇa among the prāṇas,' and in the concluding paragraph also (IV, 3, 8) refers to them as distinct, 'These five and the other five make ten, and that is the Kṛita.'—For these reasons Vāyu and Prāṇa are to be conceived as different.

The Sūtra compares the case under discussion to a parallel one from the karmakāṇḍa, by means of the clause, 'as in the case of the offerings.' With regard to the ishṛī comprising three sacrificial cakes, which is enjoined in the passage, Taitt. Samh. II, 3, 6, 'A puroḍāsa on eleven potsherds to Indra the ruler, to Indra the over-ruler, to Indra the self-ruler,' it might be supposed that the three cakes are to be offered together because they are offered to one and the same Indra, and because the concluding sentence says, 'conveying to all (gods) he cuts off to preclude purposelessness.' But as the attributes (viz. 'ruler' and so on) differ, and as scripture enjoins that the yāgyā and anuvākyāmantras are to exchange places with regard to the different cakes¹, the divinity is each time a different one according to the address, and from this it follows that the three offerings also are separate.—Thus, in the case under discussion, Vāyu and Prāṇa, although fundamentally non-different, are to be held apart as objects of meditation, and we have therefore to do with two separate meditations.—This is explained in the Saṅkarsha-kāṇḍa, 'The divinities are separate on account of their being cognized thus.'

¹ Agnyādīn apekshyānavakṣhinno devo vāyus te tu tenaivāvakṣhinnā iti samvargaguno vāyur anavakṣhinnā devatā. Ān. Gi.

But while in the case of the three puroḍāsas the difference of material and divinity involves a difference on the part of the oblations, we have in the case under discussion to do with one vidyā only; for that the text enjoins one vidyā only we conclude from the introductory and concluding statements. There is contained, however, in this one vidyā a double meditative activity with regard to the bodily organs and the divinities, just as the agnihotra which is offered in the morning as well as in the evening requires a double activity. In this sense the Sūtra says, 'as in the case of the offerings.'

44. On account of the majority of indicatory marks (the fire-altars built of mind, &c. do not form elements of any act); for this (i. e. the indicatory mark) is stronger (than the general subject-matter) ; this also (has been explained in the Pū. Mī. Sūtras).

¹ The yāgyā-mantra of the first offering being used as anuvākyā in the second one and so on.

In the Agnirahasya of the Vāgasaneyins, in the Brāhmaṇa beginning 'for in the beginning indeed this was not existent,' we read with reference to mind (manas), 'It saw thirty-six thousand shining fire-altars, belonging to itself, made of mind, built of mind.' And, further on, the text makes similar statements about other fanciful fire-altars built of speech, built of breath, built of sight, built of hearing, built of work, built of fire.—A doubt here arises whether these fire-altars built of mind and so on are connected with the act (i.e. the construction of the fire-altar made of bricks), and supplementary to it, or whether they are independent, constituting a mere vidyā.

Against the primâ facie view that those agnis are connected with the sacrificial act under whose heading the text records them, the Sūtra maintains their independence, 'on account of the majority of indicatory marks.' For we meet in that Brāhmaṇa with a number of indicatory marks confirming that those agnis constitute a mere vidyā ; cp. e.g. the following passages : 'Whatever these beings conceive in their minds, that is a means for those fire-altars,' and 'All beings always pile up those fire-altars for him who thus knows, even when he sleeps,' and so on¹.—And that indicatory marks (līṅga) are of greater force than the leading subject-matter (prakaraṇa) has been explained in the Pūrva Mimāṃsā (III, 3, 14).

45. (The agni built of mind, &c.) is a particular form of the preceding one (i.e. the agni built of bricks), on account of the leading subject-matter ; it is (part of) the act ; as in the case of the mānasa cup.

Your supposition, the pūrvapakshin objects, as to those fire-altars being not supplementary to the sacrificial act, but altogether independent of it, is untenable. The influence of the leading subject-matter rather compels us to conclude that the instruction given by the text about the agni made of mind and so on, enjoins some particular mode of the same agni which the preceding sections describe as the outcome of a real act¹.—But are not indicatory marks stronger than the leading subject-matter?—True in general; but indicatory marks such as those contained in the passages quoted above are by no means stronger than the general subject-matter. For as those passages are of the nature of glorifications of the fanciful fire-altars, the līngas (have no proving power in themselves but) merely illustrate some other matter (viz. the injunction to which those passages are arthavādas); and as they are of that nature they may, there being no other proof, be taken as mere gunavādas, and as such are not able to sublate the influence of the prakaraṇa. On the ground of the latter, therefore, all those fanciful agnis must be viewed as forming parts of the sacrificial action.

¹ For something which forms part of an act cannot be brought about by something so indefinite as 'whatever these beings conceive in their minds,' nor can it be accomplished indifferently at any time by any beings.

The case is analogous to that of the 'mental' (cup). On the tenth day of the Soma sacrifices occupying twelve days—which day is termed avivākya—a soma cup is offered mentally, the earth being viewed as the cup, the sea as the Soma and Pragāpati as the divinity to which the offering is made. All rites connected with that cup, viz. taking it up, putting it down in its place, offering the liquid in it, taking up the remaining liquid, the priests inviting one another to drink the remainder, and the drinking, all these rites the text declares to be mental only, i.e. to be done in thought only². Yet this mental quasi-cup, as standing under the heading of a sacrificial act, forms part of that act.—The same then holds good with regard to the quasi-agnis made of mind and so on.

46. And on account of the transfer (of particulars).

That those agnis enter into the sacrificial action follows

¹ I.e. of the agni made of bricks which is the outcome of the agnikāyana.—Ān. Gi. explains vikalpavishesha by prakārabhedha.

² Cp. Tāndya Brāh. IV, 9; Taitt. Samh. VII, 3, 1.

moreover from the fact that the text extends to them (the injunctions given about the agni made of bricks). Compare the passage, 'Thirty-six thousand shining Agnis; each one of them is as large as the previously mentioned Agni.' Such extension of injunctions is possible only where there is general equality. The text therefore by extending the determinations relative to the previous agni, i.e. the agni built of bricks, which forms a constituent element of the sacrificial action, to the fanciful agnis, intimates thereby that they also form part of the sacrificial performance.

47. But (the agnis rather constitute) a vidyâ, on account of the assertion (made by the text).

The word 'but' sets aside the pûrvapaksha.—The agnis built of mind and so on are to be viewed not as complementary to a sacrificial action, but as independent and constituting a vidyâ of their own. For the text expressly asserts that 'they are built of knowledge (vidyâ) only,' and that 'by knowledge they are built for him who thus knows.'

48. And because (indicatory marks of that) are seen (in the text).

And that there are to be observed indicatory marks leading to the same conclusion, has already been declared in Sûtra 44.—But, under Sûtra 45, it was shown that indicatory marks unaided by other reasons cannot be admitted as proving anything, and it was consequently determined that, owing to the influence of the leading subject-matter, the Agnis form part of the sacrificial action!—To this objection the next Sûtra replies.

49. (The view that the agnis constitute an independent vidyâ) cannot be refuted, owing to the greater force of direct enunciation and so on.

Our opponent has no right to determine, on the ground of prakaraṇa, that the agnis are subordinate to the sacrificial action, and so to set aside our view according to which they are independent. For we know from the Pûrvâ Mīmāṃsâ that direct enunciation (Sruti), indicatory mark (liṅga), and syntactical connexion (vākya) are of greater force than leading subject-matter (prakaraṇa), and all those three means of proof are seen to confirm our view of the agnis being independent. In the first place we have the direct enunciation, 'These agnis are indeed knowledge-piled only.' In the second place we have the indicatory mark supplied by the passage, 'All beings ever pile for him sleeping,' &c. And in the third place we have the sentence, 'By knowledge indeed those (agnis) are piled for him who thus knows.'

In the first of these passages the emphatical expression, 'built by knowledge only,' would be contradicted if we admitted that the agnis form part of the sacrificial action.—But may this emphatical phrase not merely have the purpose of indicating that those agnis are not to be accomplished by external means?—No, we reply, for if that were intended, it would be sufficient to glorify the fact of knowledge constituting the character of the agnis by means of the word 'knowledge-piled,' and the emphatical assertion (implied in the addition of the word 'only') would be useless. For it is the nature of such agnis to be accomplished without any external means. But, although the agnis are clearly to be accomplished without external means, yet it might be supposed that, like the mental cup, they form part of the sacrificial action, and the object of the emphatical assertion implied in 'only' is to discard that suspicion.—So likewise (to pass over to liṅga) the continuity of action implied in the passage, 'For him who thus knows whether sleeping or waking all beings always pile these agnis,' is possible only on the supposition of those agnis being independent. The case is analogous to that of the imaginary agnihotra consisting of speech and breath, with reference to which the text says at first, 'He offers his breath in his speech, he offers his speech in his breath,' and then adds, 'These two endless and immortal oblations he offers always whether waking or sleeping' (Kau. Up. II, 6).—If, on the other hand, the imaginary agnis were parts of the sacrificial action it would be impossible for them to be accomplished continually, since the accomplishment of the sacrificial action itself occupies only a short time.—Nor may we suppose the passage (which contains the līṅga) to be a mere arthavāda-passage (in which case, as the pūrvapakshin avers, the līṅga would be unable to refute prakaraṇa). For in those cases where we meet with an unmistakeable injunctory passage—marked out as such by the use of the optative or imperative form—there indeed we may assume a glorificatory passage (met with in connexion with that injunctory passage) to be an arthavāda. In the present case, however, we observe no clear injunctory passage, and should therefore be obliged to construct one enjoining the knowledge of the various fanciful agnis, merely on the basis of the arthavāda-passage. But in that case the injunction can be framed only in accordance with the arthavāda, and as the arthavāda speaks of the continual building of the agnis, the latter item would have to appear in the injunction also. But, if so, it follows (as shown above) that the mental construction of those agnis constitutes an independent vidyā (and does not form part of the actual agnikāyana).—The same argumentation applies to the second līṅga-passage quoted above, ‘Whatever those beings conceive in their minds,’ &c.—And the sentence finally shows, by means of the clause, ‘For him who thus knows,’ that those agnis are connected with a special class of men (viz. those who thus know), and are therefore not to be connected with the sacrificial action.—For all these reasons the view of those agnis constituting an independent vidyā is preferable.

50. On account of the connexion and so on (the agnis built of mind, &c. are independent); in the same way as other cognitions are separate. And there is seen (another case of something having to be withdrawn from the leading subject-matter); this has been explained (in the Pūva Mīmāṃsā-sūtras).

Independence has, against the general subject-matter, to be assumed for the fire-altars built of mind and so on, for that reason also that the text connects the constituent members of the sacrificial action with activities of the mind, &c.; viz. in the passage, 'With mind only they are established, with mind only they are piled, with mind only the cups were taken, with mind the udgâtrîs praised, with mind the hotrîs recited; whatever work is done at the sacrifice, whatever sacrificial work, was done as consisting of mind, by mind only, at those fire-altars made of mind, piled by mind,' &c. For that connexion has for its result an imaginative combination (of certain mental energies with the parts of the sacrifice), and the obtainment of the parts of the sacrifice which are objects of actual perception cannot be made dependent on such imaginative combination¹. Nor must it be supposed that, because here also, as in the case of the meditation on the udgîtha, the vidyâ is connected with members of the sacrificial action, it enters into that action as a constituent part; for the statements of the text differ in the two cases. For in our case scripture does not say that we are to take some member of a sacrificial action and then to superimpose upon it such and such a name; but rather takes six and thirty thousand different energies of the mind and identifies them with the fire-altars, the cups, and so on, just as in some other place it teaches a meditation on man viewed as the sacrifice. The number given by the text is originally observed as belonging to the days of a man's life, and is then transferred to the mental energies connected therewith.—From the connexion (referred to in the Sûtra) it therefore follows that the agnis piled of mind, &c. are independent.—The clause 'and so on' (met with in the Sûtra) must be explained as comprehending 'transference' and the like as far as possible. For if the text says, 'Each of those Agnis is as great as that prior one,' it transfers the glory of the fire-altar consisting of the work (i.e. the real altar piled of bricks) to the altars consisting of knowledge and so on, and thereby expresses want of regard for the work. Nor can it be said that if there is connexion (of all the agnis) with the sacrificial action, the later ones (i.e. those made of mind) may optionally be used instead of the original agnis made of bricks (as was asserted by the pūrvapakshin in Sūtra 45). For the later agnis are incapable of assisting the sacrificial action by means of those energies with which the original agni assists it, viz. by bearing the āhavanīya fire and so on.—The assertion, again, made by the pūrvapakshin (Sūtra 46) that 'transference' strengthens his view in so far as transference is possible only where there is equality, is already refuted by the remark that also on our view transference is possible, since the fanciful fire-altars are equal to the real fire-altar in so far as both are fire-altars.—And that direct enunciation and so on favour our conclusion has been shown.—From connexion and so on it therefore follows that the agnis piled of mind, &c. are independent.—'As in the case of the separateness of other cognitions.' As other cognitions, such as e. g. the Sāṇḍilya-vidyā, which have each their own particular connexion, separate themselves from works and other cognitions and are independent ; so it is in our case also.—Moreover 'there is seen' an analogous case of independence from the leading subject-matter. The offering called aveshṭi which is mentioned in the sacred texts under the heading of the rāgasūya-sacrifice, is to be taken out from that heading because it is connected with the three higher castes, while the rāgasūya can be offered by a member of the warrior caste only. This has been explained in the first section (i.e. in the Pūrva Mīmāṃsā-sūtras).

¹ Kimartham idam anubandhakaraṇam tad āha, sampad iti, upāstyartha hy anubandhas tathāpi manasā dādānām akriyāṅgatve kim āyātam tad āha, na kēti, teshām kriyāṅgatve sākshād evādhānā diprasiddher anarthikā sampad ity arthaḥ. Ân. Gi.

51. Not also on account of its resembling (the mānasa cup) (can the fires constitute parts of an action); for it is observed (on the ground of Śruti, &c., that they are independent); as in the case of death; for the world does not become (a fire) (because it resembles a fire in some points).

Against the allegation made by the pūrvapakshin that the present case is analogous to that of the mānasa cup, we remark that the fire-altars made of mind and so on cannot be assumed to supplement a sacrificial action although they may resemble the mānasa cup, since on the ground of direct enunciation &c. they are seen to subserve the purpose of man only (not the purpose of some sacrificial action). Anything indeed may resemble anything in some point or other; but in spite of that there remains the individual dissimilarity of each thing from all other things. The case is analogous to that of death. In the passages, 'The man in that orb is death indeed' (Sat. Brā. X, 5, 2, 3), and 'Agni indeed is death' (Taitt. Samh. V, 1, 10, 3), the term 'death' is applied equally to Agni and the man in the sun; all the same the two are by no means absolutely equal. And if the text says in another place, 'This world is a fire indeed, O Gotama; the sun is its fuel,' &c. (Kh. Up. V, 4, 1), it does not follow from the similarity of fuel and so on that the world really is a fire. Thus also in our case.

52. And from the subsequent (Brāhmaṇa) it follows that being of that kind (i.e. injunction of a mere vidyā) (is the aim) of the text. The connexion (of the fanciful agnis with the real one) is due to the plurality (of details of the real agni which are imaginatively connected with the vidyā).

With regard to a subsequent Brāhmaṇa also, viz. the one beginning, 'That piled agni is this world indeed,' we apprehend that what is the purpose of the text is 'being of that kind,' i.e. injunction of a mere vidyā, not injunction of the member of a mere action. For we meet there with the following sloka, 'By knowledge they ascend there where all wishes are attained. Those skilled in works do not go there, nor those who destitute of knowledge do penance.' This verse blames mere works and praises knowledge. A former Brāhmaṇa also, viz. the one beginning, 'What that orb leads' (Sat. Brā. X, 5, 2, 23), concludes with a statement of the fruit of knowledge ('Immortal becomes he whose Self is death'), and thereby indicates that works are not the chief thing.—The text connects the vidyā (of the agnis built of mind) with the real agni built of bricks, not because those agnis are members of the act of building the real agni, but because many of the elements of the real agni are imaginatively combined with the vidyā.

All this establishes the conclusion that the fire-altars built of mind and so on constitute a mere vidyā.

53. Some (maintain the non-existence) of a (separate) Self, on account of the existence (of the Self) where a body is (only).

At present we will prove the existence of a Self different from the body in order to establish thereby the qualification (of the Self) for bondage and release. For if there were no Self different from the body, there would be no room for injunctions that have the other world for their result ; nor could it be taught of anybody that Brahman is his Self.—But, an objection is raised, already in the first pāda which stands at the head of this Sāstra (i. e. the first pāda of the Pūrva Mīmāṃsā-sūtras) there has been declared the existence of a Self which is different from the body and hence capable of enjoying the fruits taught by the Sāstra.—True, this has been declared there by the author of the bhāṣya, but there is in that place no Sūtra about the existence of the Self. Here, on the other hand, the Sūtrakāra himself establishes the existence of the Self after having disposed of a preliminary objection. And from hence the teacher Sabara Svāmin has taken the matter for his discussion of the point in the chapter treating of the means of right knowledge. For the same reason the reverend Upavarsha remarks in the first tantra—where an opportunity offers itself for the discussion of the existence of the Self—‘ We will discuss this in the Sārīraka,’ and allows the matter to rest there. Here, where we are engaged in an inquiry into the pious meditations which are matter of injunction, a discussion of the existence of the Self is introduced in order to show that the whole Sāstra depends thereon.

Moreover, in the preceding adhikāraṇa we have shown that passages may be exempted from the influence of the leading subject-matter, and that for that reason the firealtars built of mind and so on subserve the purpose of man (not of the sacrifice). In consequence thereof there naturally arises the question who that man is whose purposes the different fire-altars subserve, and in reply to it the existence of a Self which is separate from the body is affirmed.—The first Sûtra embodies an objection against that doctrine; according to the principle that a final refutation of objections stated in the beginning effects a stronger conviction of the truth of the doctrine whose establishment is aimed at.

Here now some materialists (lokâyatika), who see the Self in the body only, are of opinion that a Self separate from the body does not exist; assume that consciousness (kāitanya), although not observed in earth and the other external elements—either single or combined—may yet appear in them when transformed into the shape of a body, so that consciousness springs from them; and thus maintain that knowledge is analogous to intoxicating quality (which arises when certain materials are mixed in certain proportions), and that man is only a body qualified by consciousness. There is thus, according to them, no Self separate from the body and capable of going to the heavenly world or obtaining release, through which consciousness is in the body; but the body alone is what is conscious, is the Self. For this assertion they allege the reason stated in the Sûtra, ‘On account of its existence where a body is.’ For wherever something exists if some other thing exists, and does not exist if that other thing does not exist, we determine the former thing to be a mere quality of the latter; light and heat, e. g. we determine to be qualities of fire. And as life, movement, consciousness, remembrance and so on—which by the upholders of an independent Self are considered qualities of that Self—are observed only within bodies and not outside bodies, and as an abode of those qualities, different from the body, cannot be proved, it follows that they must be qualities of the body only. The Self therefore is not different from the body.—To this conclusion the next Sûtra replies.

54. There is separation (of the Self from the body) because its existence does not depend on the existence of that (viz. the body), but there is not (non-separation); as in the case of perceptive consciousness.

The assertion that the Self is not separate from the body cannot be maintained. The Self rather must be something separate from the body, 'because the existence (of the Self) does not depend on the existence of that (i.e. the body).' For if from the circumstance that they are where the body is you conclude that the qualities of the Self are qualities of the body, you also must conclude from the fact that they are not where the body is that they are not qualities of the body, because thereby they show themselves to be different in character from the qualities of the body. Now the (real) qualities of the body, such as form and so on, may be viewed as existing as long as the body exists; life, movement, &c., on the other hand, do not exist even when the body exists, viz. in the state of death. The qualities of the body, again, such as form and so on, are perceived by others; not so the qualities of the Self, such as consciousness, remembrance, and so on. Moreover, we can indeed ascertain the presence of those latter qualities as long as the body exists in the state of life, but we cannot ascertain their non-existence when the body does not exist; for it is possible that even after this body has died the qualities of the Self should continue to exist by passing over into another body. The opposite opinion is thus precluded also for the reason of its being a mere hypothesis.—We further must question our opponent as to the nature of that consciousness which he assumes to spring from the elements; for the materialists do not admit the existence of anything but the four elements. Should he say that consciousness is the perception of the elements and what springs from the elements, we remark that in that case the elements and their products are objects of consciousness and that hence the latter cannot be a quality of them, as it is contradictory that anything should act on itself. Fire is hot indeed but does not burn itself, and the acrobat, well trained as he may be, cannot mount on his own shoulders. As little could consciousness, if it were a mere quality of the elements and their products, render them objects of itself. For form and other (undoubted) qualities do not make their own colour or the colour of something else their objects; the elements and their products, on the other hand, whether external or belonging to the Self (the organism) are rendered objects by consciousness. Hence in the same way as we admit the existence of that perceptive consciousness which has the material elements and their products for its objects, we also must admit the separateness of that consciousness from the elements. And as consciousness constitutes the character of our Self, the Self must be distinct from the body. That consciousness is permanent, follows from the uniformity of its character (and we therefore may conclude that the conscious Self is permanent also; as also follows) from the fact that the Self, although connected with a different state, recognises itself as the conscious agent—a recognition expressed in judgments such as ‘I saw this,’—and from the fact of remembrance and so on being possible¹.

The argumentation that consciousness is an attribute of the body because it is where a body is, is already refuted by the reasons stated above. Moreover, perceptive consciousness takes place where there are certain auxiliaries such as lamps and the like, and does not take place where those are absent, without its following therefrom that perception is an attribute of the lamp or the like. Analogously the fact that perception takes place where there is a body, and does not take place where there is none, does not imply that it is an attribute of the body ; for like lamps and so on the body may be used (by the Self) as a mere auxiliary. Nor is it even true that the body is absolutely required as an auxiliary of perception ; for in the state of dream we have manifold perceptions while the body lies motionless.—The view of the Self being something separate from the body is therefore free from all objections.

¹ The ‘nityatvam ka’ of the text might perhaps be connected directly with ‘âtmano.’ Ânanda Giri on the entire passage: Bhavatu tarhi bhûtebhyo-tiriktâ svâtantryopalabdhis tathâpi katham âtmasiddhis tatrâha upalabdhitî, ksharikatvât tasyâ nityâtmarûpatvam ayuktam ity âraṅkyâgânatas tadbhedâbhâvâd vishayoparâgât tadbhânâd asâv eva nityopalabdhir ity âha nityatvam keti, kim ka sthûladehâbhimânâhînasya svapne pratyabhigñânâd atiriktâtma-siddhir ity âha aham iti, svapne sthûladehântarasyaivopalabdhritvam ity âraṅkyâha smṛityâditi, upalabdhri-smartor bhedo saty anyopalabdhe-nyasya smṛtir ikkâdayas ka neti na tayoṛ anyatety arthaḥ.

55. But the (meditations) connected with members (of sacrificial acts are) not (restricted) to (particular) Sākhās, according to the Veda (to which they belong).

The above occasional discussion being terminated, we return to the discussion of the matter in hand.—We meet in the different Sākhās of each Veda with injunctions of vidyās connected with certain members of sacrificial acts, such as the udgītha and the like. Cp. e.g. ‘Let a man meditate on the syllable Om (as) the udgītha’ (Kṛ. Up. I, 1, 1) ; ‘Let a man meditate on the fivefold Sāman as the five worlds’ (Kṛ. Up. II, 2, 1) ; ‘People say : “Hymns, hymns !” the hymn is truly this earth’ (Ait. Ār. II, 1, 2, 1) ; ‘The piled up fire-altar truly is this world’ (Sat. Brā. X, 5, 4. 1). A doubt here arises whether the vidyās are enjoined with reference to the udgītha and so on as belonging to a certain Sākhā only or as belonging to all Sākhās. The doubt is raised on the supposition that the udgītha and so on differ in the different Sākhās because the accents, &c. differ.

Here the pûrvapakshin maintains that the vidyās are enjoined only with reference to the udgītha and so on which belong to the particular Sākhā (to which the vidyā belongs).—Why?—On account of proximity. For as such general injunctions as ‘Let a man meditate on the udgītha’ are in need of a specification, and as this need is satisfied by the specifications given in the same Sākhā which stand in immediate proximity, there is no reason for passing over that Sākhā and having recourse to specifications enjoined in other Sâkhâs. Hence the vidyâs are to be held apart, according to the Sâkhâs to which they belong.

To this the Sûtra replies 'but those connected with members,' &c.—The word 'but' discards the primâ facie view. The meditations are not restricted to their own Sâkhâs according to the Veda to which they belong, but are valid for all Sâkhâs.—Why?—Because the direct statements of the texts about the udgîtha and so on enounce no specification. For to such general injunctions as 'Let a man meditate on the udgîtha'—which say nothing about specifications—violence would be done, if on the ground of proximity we restricted them to something special belonging to its own Sâkhâ, and that would be objectionable because direct statement has greater weight than proximity. There is, on the other hand, no reason why the vidyâ should not be of general reference. We therefore conclude that, although the Sâkhâs differ as to accents and the like, the vidyâs mentioned refer to the udgîtha and so on belonging to all Sâkhâs, because the text speaks only of the udgîtha and so on in general.

56. Or else there is no contradiction (implied in our opinion) ; as in the case of mantras and the like.

Or else we may put the matter as follows. There is no reason whatever to suspect a contradiction if we declare certain vidyâs enjoined in one Sâkhâ to be valid for the udgîtha and so on belonging to other Sâkhâs also ; for there is no more room for contradiction than in the case of mantras. We observe that mantras, acts, and qualities of acts which are enjoined in one Sâkhâ are taken over by other Sâkhâs also. So e.g. the members of certain Yagur-veda Sâkhâs do not exhibit in their text the mantra, 'Thou art the kuṛaru¹,' which accompanies the taking of the stone (with which the rice-grains are ground) ; all the same we meet in their text with the following injunction of application, 'Thou art the cock, with this mantra he takes the stone ; or else with the mantra, Thou art the kuṛaru.'

¹ Maitrâyaṇīya Saṃhitâ I, 1, 6.

Again, the text of some Sākhā does not contain a direct injunction of the five offerings called prayāgas which are made to the fuel and so on, but it contains the injunction of secondary matters connected with the prayāgas, viz. in the passage, 'the seasons indeed are the prayāgas; they are to be offered in one and the same spot¹.'—Again, the text of some Sākhā does not contain an injunction as to the species of the animal to be sacrificed to Agnīshomau—such as would be 'a he-goat is sacrificed to Agnīshomau²;'—but in the same Sākhā we meet with a mantra which contains the required specification, 'Hotri, recite the anuvākyā, for the fat of the omentum of the he-goat³.' Similarly mantras enjoined in one Veda only, such as 'O Agni, promote the hautra, promote the sacrifice,' are seen to be taken over into other Vedas also. Another example (of the transference of mantras) is supplied by the hymn, 'He who as soon as born showed himself intelligent,' &c. (Rik. Samh. II, 12), which although read in the text of the Bahvrikas is employed in the Taittirīya Veda also, according to Taitt. Samh. VII, 5, 5, 2, 'The Sāganiya hymn is to be recited.'—Just as, therefore, the members of sacrificial actions on which certain vidyās rest are valid everywhere, so the vidyās themselves also which rest on those members are valid for all Sākhās and Vedas.

57. There is pre-eminence of the (meditation on) plenitude (i.e. Agni Vaisvānara in his aggregate form), as in the case of sacrifices; for thus scripture shows.

In the legend beginning 'Prākīnasāla Aupamanyava,' the text speaks of meditations on Vaisvānara in his distributed as well as his aggregate condition. References to him in his distributed state are made in the passage, 'Aupamanyava, whom do you meditate on as the Self? He replied : Heaven only, venerable king. He said : The Self which you meditate on is the Vaisvânara Self called Sutegas ;' and in the following passages (Kh. Up. V, 12-17). A meditation on him in his aggregate state, on the other hand, is referred to in the passage (V, 18), 'Of that Vaisvânara Self the head is Sutegas, the eye Visvarûpa, the breath Prithagvartman, the trunk Bahula, the bladder Rayi, the feet the earth,' &c.—A doubt here arises whether the text intimates a meditation on Vaisvânara in both his forms or only in his aggregate form.

¹ As this passage states the number of the prayāgas (viz. five, which is the number of the seasons) and other secondary points, we conclude that the injunction of the offering of the prayāgas, which is given in other Sākhās, is valid also for the Sākhā referred to in the text (the Maitrāyaṇīyas, according to the commentators).

² But only says 'they offer an animal to Agnīshomau.'

³ Wherefrom we infer that not any animal may be offered to Agnīshomau, but only a he-goat.

The pûrvapakshin maintains that we have to do with meditations on Vaisvânara in his distributed form, firstly, because the text exhibits a special verb, viz. 'you meditate on,' with reference to each of the limbs, Sutegas and so on ; and secondly because the text states special fruits (connected with each special meditation) in the passage, 'Therefore every kind of Soma libation is seen in your house,' and the later similar passages.

To this we make the following reply. We must suppose that the entire section aims at intimating 'the pre-eminence,' i. e. at intimating as its pre-eminent subject, a meditation on 'plenitude,' i. e. on Vaisvânara in his aggregate state, who comprises within himself a plurality of things ; not a number of special meditations on the limbs of Vaisvânara. 'As in the case of sacrifices.' In the same way as the Vedic texts referring to sacrifices such as the darsapûrnâmâsa aim at enjoining the performance of the entire sacrifice only, i. e. of the chief sacrificial action together with its members—and not in addition the performance of single subordinate members such as the prayâgas, nor again the performance of the chief action together with some of its subordinate members ; so it is here also.—But whence do you know that 'plenitude' is the pre-eminent topic of the passage?—It is shown by scripture, we reply, since we apprehend that the entire section forms a connected whole. For on examining the connexion of the parts we find that the entire section has for its subject the knowledge of Vaisvānara. The text at first informs us that six Rīshis—Prāñinasāla, &c., up to Uddālaka—being unable to reach a firm foundation in the knowledge of Vaisvānara, went to the king Asvapati Kaikeya; goes on to mention the object of each Rīshi's meditation, viz. the sky and so on; determines that the sky and so on are only the head and so on of Vaisvānara—in the passage 'he said: that is but the head of the Self,' and the later similar passages;—and thereupon rejects all meditations on Vaisvānara in his distributed form, in the passage, 'Your head would have fallen if you had not come to me,' and so on. Finally having discarded all distributed meditation it turns to the meditation on the aggregate Vaisvānara and declares that all results rest on him only, 'he eats food in all worlds, in all beings, in all Selves.'—That the text mentions special fruits for the special meditations on Sutegas and so on we have, in accordance with our view, to explain as meaning that the results of the subordinate meditations are to be connected in their aggregate with the principal meditation. And that the text exhibits a special verb—'you do meditate'—in connexion with each member is not meant to enjoin special meditations on those members, but merely to make additional remarks about something which has another purpose (i. e. about the meditation on the aggregate Vaisvānara).—For all these reasons the view according to which the text enjoins a meditation on the aggregate Vaisvānara only is preferable.

Some commentators here establish the conclusion that the meditation on the aggregate Vaisvānara is the preferable alternative, but assume, on the ground of the Sūtra employing the term 'pre-eminence' only, that the Sūtra-kāra allows also the alternative of distributed meditation. But this is inadmissible, since it is improper to assume a 'split of the sentence' (i. e. to ascribe to a passage a double meaning), as long as the passage may be understood as having one meaning only. Their interpretation, moreover, contradicts those passages which expressly blame distributed meditations; such as 'Thy head would have fallen.' And as the conclusion of the section clearly intimates a meditation on the aggregate Vaisvānara, the negation of such meditation could not be maintained as pūrvapaksha¹. The term 'pre-eminence' which the Sūtra employs may moreover be explained as meaning (not mere preferability, but exclusive) authoritativeness.

58. (The vidyās are) separate, on account of the difference of words and the like.

In the preceding adhikaraṇa we have arrived at the conclusion that a meditation on Vaisvānara as a whole is the pre-eminent meaning of the text, although special results are stated for meditations on Sutejas and so on. On the ground of this it may be presumed that other meditations also which are enjoined by separate scriptural texts have to be combined into more general meditations. Moreover, we cannot acknowledge a separation of vidyās (acts of cognition; meditations) as long as the object of cognition is the same; for the object constitutes the character of a cognition in the same way as the material offered and the divinity to which the offering is made constitute the character of a sacrifice. Now we understand that the Lord forms the only object of cognition in a number of scriptural passages, although the latter are separate in enunciation; cp. e.g. 'He consisting of mind, whose body is prāṇa' (Kh. Up. III, 14, 2); 'Brahman is Ka, Brahman is Kha' (Kh. Up. IV, 10, 5); 'He whose wishes are true, whose purposes are true' (Kh. Up. VIII, 7, 3). Analogously one and the same Prāṇa is referred to in different texts; cp. 'Prāṇa indeed is the end of all' (Kh. Up. IV, 3, 3); 'Prāṇa indeed is the oldest and the best' (Kh. Up. V, 1, 1); 'Prāṇa is father, Prāṇa is mother' (Kh. Up. VII, 15, 1). And from the unity of the object of cognition there follows unity of cognition. Nor can it be said that, on this view, the separateness of the different scriptural statements would be purposeless, since each text serves to set forth other qualities (of the one pradhāna which is their common subject). Hence the different qualities which are enjoined in one's own and in other Sākhās, and which all belong to one object of knowledge, must be combined so that a totality of cognition may be effected.

¹ Yadobhayatropāstisiddhāntas tadā vyastopāstir evātra samastopāstir eva vā pūrvapakshaḥ syān nādyā ity āha, spashṇe kēti, dvitīyas ka tatrāyukto vākyopakramasthavyastopāstidhivirodhāt. Ān. Gi.

To this conclusion we reply, 'Separate,' &c. Although the object of cognition is one, such cognitions must be considered as separate 'on account of the difference of words and the like.'—For the text exhibits a difference of words such as 'he knows,' 'let him meditate,' 'let him form the idea' (cp. Kh. Up. III, 14, 1). And difference of terms is acknowledged as a reason of difference of acts, according to Pūrva Mīmāṃsā-sūtras II, 2, 1.—The clause 'and the like' in the Sūtra intimates that also qualities and so on may be employed, according to circumstances, as reasons for the separateness of acts.—But, an objection is raised, from passages such as 'he knows' and so on we indeed apprehend a difference of words, but not a difference of sense such as we apprehend when meeting with such clauses as 'he sacrifices' and the like (yagate, guhōti, dadāti). For all these words (viz. veda, upāsīta, &c.) denote one thing only, viz. a certain activity of the mind, and another meaning is not possible in their case¹. How then does difference of vidyā follow from difference of words?—This objection is without force, we reply; for although all those words equally denote a certain activity of the mind only, yet a difference of vidyā may result from a difference of connexion. The Lord indeed is the only object of meditation in the passages quoted, but according to its general purport each passage teaches different qualities of the Lord; and similarly, although one and the same Prāṇa is the object of meditation in the other series of passages, yet one of his qualities has to be meditated upon in one place and another in another place. From difference of connexion there thus follows difference of injunction, and from the latter we apprehend the separateness of the vidyās. Nor can it be maintained (as the pūrvapakshin did) that one of those injunctions is the injunction of the vidyā itself, while the others enjoin mere qualities; for there is no determining reason (as to which is the vidyā-vidhi and which the guṇavidhis), and as in each passage more than one quality are mentioned it is impossible that those passages should enjoin qualities with reference to a vidyā established elsewhere¹. Nor should, in the case of the pūrvapakshin's view being the true one, the qualities which are common to several passages, such as 'having true wishes,' be repeated more than once. Nor can the different sections be combined into one syntactical whole, because in each one a certain kind of meditation is enjoined on those who have a certain wish, whence we understand that the passage is complete in itself². Nor is there in the present case an additional injunction of a meditation on something whole—such as there is in the case of the cognition of the Vaisvānara—owing to the force of which the meditations on the single parts which are contained in each section would combine themselves into a whole. And if on the ground of the object of cognition being one we should admit unity of vidyā without any restriction, we should thereby admit an altogether impossible combination of all qualities (mentioned anywhere in the Upanishads). The Sūtra therefore rightly declares the separateness of the vidyās.—The present adhikāraṇa being thus settled, the first Sūtra of the pāda has now to be considered³.

¹ Vedopāśītetyādisabdhānām kvaṅig gñānam kvaṅid dhyānam ity arthabhedam āśaṅkya gñānasyāvidheyatvād vidhīyamānam upāśānam evetyāha arthāntareti. Ān. Gi.

¹ For to enjoin in one passage several qualities—none of which is established already—would involve an objectionable vākyabheda.

² A sentence is to be combined with another one into a larger whole only if the sentences are not complete in themselves but evince an ākaṅkshā, a desire of complementation.

³ I.e. the present adhikāraṇa ought in reality to head the entire pāda.

59. There is (restriction to) option (between the vidyās), on account of their having non-differing results.

The difference of the vidyās having been determined, we now enter on an inquiry whether, according to one's liking, there should be cumulation of the different vidyās or option between them; or else restriction to an optional proceeding (to the exclusion of cumulation). For restriction to cumulation (which might be mentioned as a third alternative) there is no reason, because the separation of the vidyās has been established.—But we observe that in the case of the sacrifices, agnihotra, darsapûrnamâsa and so on, there is restriction to cumulation (i. e. that those sacrifices have all of them to be performed, not optionally one or the other) although they are different from each other.—True; but the reason for the obligatory cumulation of those sacrifices lies therein that scripture teaches them to be of absolute obligation. No scriptural passage, on the other hand, teaches the absolute obligatoriness of the vidyās, and it cannot therefore be a rule that they must be cumulated.—Nor can it be a rule that there must be option between them, because a person entitled to one vidyâ cannot be excluded from another vidyâ. It therefore only remains to conclude that one may proceed as one likes.—But—an objection is raised—we must rather conclude that option between them is the rule, because their fruits are non-different. For vidyās such as 'He who consists of mind, whose body is prâna;' 'Brahman is Ka, Brahman is Kha;' 'He whose wishes are true, whose purposes are true,' have all of them equally the obtaining of the Lord for their fruit.—This does not affect our conclusion; for we see that it is allowed to proceed as one likes also with regard to certain sacrificial acts which are the means of obtaining the heavenly world, and thus have all of them the same result. It therefore remains a settled conclusion that in the case of vidyās one may proceed as one likes.

To this we reply as follows. There must be option between the vidyās, not cumulation, because they have the same fruit. For the fruit of all of them is the intuition of the object meditated upon, and when this object, e.g. the Lord, has once been intuited through one meditation a second meditation would be purposeless. It would, moreover, be impossible even to effect an intuition through the cumulation of several meditations, since that would cause distraction of attention. And that the fruit of a vidyâ is to be effected through intuition various scriptural passages declare; cp. Kh. Up. III, 14, 4, 'He who has this faith and no doubt;' Bri. Up. IV, 1, 3, 'Having become a god he goes to the gods,' and others. Also Smṛiti-passages such as Bha. Gîtâ VIII, 6, and others.—One therefore has to select one of those vidyâs the fruit of which is the same, and to remain intent on it until, through the intuition of the object to be meditated upon, the fruit of the vidyâ is obtained.

60. But (vidyâs) connected with wishes may, according to one's liking, be cumulated or not; on account of the absence of the former reason.

The above Sûtra supplies a counter-instance to the preceding Sûtra.—We have, on the other hand, vidyâs connected with definite wishes; as e.g. Kh. Up. III, 15, 2, 'He who knows that the wind is the child of the regions never weeps for his sons;' Kh. Up. VII, 1, 5, 'He who meditates on name as Brahman, walks at will as far as name reaches.' In these vidyâs which, like actions, effect their own special results by means of their 'unseen' Self, there is no reference to any intuition, and one therefore may, according to one's liking, either cumulate them or not cumulate them; 'on account of the absence of the former reason,' i.e. because there is not the reason for option which was stated in the preceding Sûtra.

61. With the (meditations on) members (of sacrificial acts) it is as with their abodes.

Are those meditations—enjoined in the three Vedas—which rest on members of sacrificial actions such as the udgītha to be superadded to each other, or may we proceed with regard to them as we like?—To this doubt the Sūtra replies, 'it is according to the abodes.' As the abiding-places of those meditations, viz. the Stotra and so on, are combined (for the performance of the sacrifice), so those meditations also. For a meditation is subject to what it rests on.

62. And on account of the teaching.

As the Stotra and the other members of the sacrifice on which the meditations under discussion rest are taught in the three Vedas, so also the meditations resting on them. The meaning of this remark is that also as far as the mode of information is concerned there is no difference between the members of a sacrificial act and the meditations referring to them.

63. On account of the rectification.

The passage, 'From the seat of the Hotri he sets right any mistake committed in the udgītha' (Kh. Up. I, 5, 5), declares that, owing to the might of the meditation on the unity of praṇava and udgītha, the Hotri sets right any mistake he may commit in his work, by means of the work of the Hotri.

Now, as a meditation mentioned in one Veda is connected (with what is mentioned in another Veda) in the same way as a thing mentioned in another Veda, the above passage suggests the conclusion that all meditations on members of sacrificial acts—in whatever Veda they may be mentioned—have to be combined¹.

64. And because the text states a quality (of the vidyā) to be common (to the three Vedas).

The text states that the syllable Om which is a quality,

¹ A 'thing' belonging to the Rig-veda, viz. the praṇava, is, according to the Khândogya-passage, connected with the Sâma-veda meditation on the udgītha. Hence meditations also which belong to different Vedas may be combined; for there is no difference between them and things as far as connexion is concerned.

i.e. the abode of a meditation, is common to the three Vedas, 'By that syllable the threefold knowledge proceeds. With Om the Adhvaryu gives orders, with Om the Hotṛi recites, with Om the Udgâṭṛi sings.' This suggests that, as the abode of the vidyâ (viz. the Omkâra) is common, the vidyâs which abide in it are common also.—Or else the Sûtra may be explained as follows. If the udgîtha and so on, which are matters qualifying the sacrificial action, were not all of them common to all sacrificial performances, the vidyâs resting on them would not go together. But the scriptural passages which teach the sacrificial performances and extend over all subordinate matters, state that the udgîtha and so on are common to all performances. As thus the abodes of the vidyâs go together, the vidyâs abiding in them go together likewise.

65. (The meditations on members of sacrificial actions are) rather not (to be combined), as the text does not state their going together.

The words 'rather not' discard the pûrvapaksha. The meditations resting on members of actions are not to be treated like what they rest on, because scripture does not state their going together. Scripture actually states the going together of the Stotras and other subordinate members of sacrificial action which are enjoined in the three Vedas; cp. passages such as 'After the taking of the graha or the raising of the kamasa he performs the Stotra;' 'After the Stotra he recites;' 'Prastotṛi sing the Sâman;' 'Hotṛi recite the Yâgyâ for this;' and so on. But, on the other hand, there are no analogous texts expressly teaching the going together of the meditations.—But the going together of the meditations is established by those texts which intimate the successive performance of the different constituent members of a sacrifice!—By no means, we reply. The meditations subserve the end of man, while the texts referred to by you establish only the going together of the udgîtha and the like which subserve the purpose of the sacrifice. That the meditations on the udgîtha and so on—although resting on members of sacrificial acts—yet subserve the end of man only in the same way as the godohana vessel does, we have already explained under III, 3, 42.—And this very difference between members of sacrificial action and the meditations resting on them, viz. that the former subserve the purpose of the sacrifice while the latter subserve the end of man, is founded on the express teaching of scripture¹.—And the further two indicatory marks (pointed out by the pûrvapakshin in Sûtras 63 and 64) supply no reason for the going together of the meditations, because no direct scriptural statement may be constructed from them. Nor² does the fact that in each sacrificial performance all foundations of meditations are comprised, enable us to conclude that the meditations founded on them are to be combined also; for the meditations are not caused by what they rest on. The meditations, as resting on their foundations, would, it may be admitted, not exist if those foundations did not exist. But therefrom it does not follow that the going together of the foundations implies a necessary going together of the meditations; for as to this we have no direct scriptural statement.—From all this it results that the meditations may be performed according to one's liking.

66. And because (scripture) shows it.

Scripture moreover shows that the meditations do not go together, viz. in the following passage, 'A Brahman priest who knows this saves the sacrifice, the sacrificer, and all the priests' (Kh. Up. IV, 17, 10). For if all meditations were to be combined, all priests would know them all, and the text could not specially announce that the Brahman priest possessing a certain knowledge thereby saves the others.—The meditations may therefore, according to one's liking, be either combined or optionally employed.

¹ A remark refuting the averment made in Sûtra 62.

² And this is meant to refute the second interpretation given of Sûtra 64.

FOURTH PĀDA.

REVERENCE TO THE HIGHEST SELF !

1. The purpose of man (is effected) thence (i. e. through the mere knowledge of Brahman), thus Bādarāyaṇa opines.

The Sūtrakāra at present enters on an inquiry whether the knowledge of the Self which is derived from the Upanishads, is connected with works through him who is entitled to perform the works¹, or is an independent means to accomplish the purpose of man. He begins by stating the final view in the above Sūtra, 'Thence' &c. The teacher Bādarāyaṇa is of opinion that thence, i. e. through the independent knowledge of Brahman enjoined in the Vedānta-texts, the purpose of man is effected.—Whence is this known?—'From scripture,' which exhibits passages such as the following: 'He who knows the Self overcomes grief' (Kh. Up. III, 4, 1); 'He who knows that highest Brahman becomes even Brahman' (Mu. Up. III, 2, 9); 'He who knows Brahman attains the Highest' (Taitt. Up. II, 1); 'For him who has a teacher there is delay only so long as he is not delivered; then he will be perfect' (Kh. Up. VI, 14, 2); 'He who has searched out and understands the Self which is free from sin, &c. &c., obtains all worlds and all desires' (Kh. Up. VIII, 7, 1); 'The Self is to be seen' &c. up to 'Thus far goes immortality' (Bri. Up. IV, 5, 6–15). These and similar texts declare that mere knowledge effects the purpose of man.—Against this the opponent raises his voice as follows.

2. On account of (the Self) standing in a supplementary relation (to action), (the statements as to the fruits of the knowledge of the Self) are arthavādas, as in other cases, thus Gaimini opines.

¹ The pūrvapakshin (see next Sūtra) maintains that the knowledge of the Self is subordinate to (sacrificial) action through the mediation of the agent, i. e. in so far as it imparts to the agent a certain qualification.

As the Self, in consequence of its being the agent, stands in a supplementary relation to action, the knowledge of the Self also is connected with action through the mediation of its object, analogously to the case of the sprinkling of the rice-grains with water; hence as the purpose of the knowledge of the Self is understood thereby, the statements of the text about the fruits of that knowledge are mere arthavādas. Such is the opinion of the teacher Gaimini¹. The case is analogous to that of other textual statements as to the fruits of certain materials, samskāras and works; which statements have likewise to be understood as arthavādas. Cp. the passage, 'He whose sacrificial ladle is made of parṇa-wood hears no evil sound;' 'By anointing his eye he wards off the eye of the enemy;' 'By making the prayāga and anuyāga-oblations he makes an armour for the sacrifice, an armour for the sacrificer so that he overcomes his enemies².'—But how can it be supposed that ¹ The contention of the pūrvapakshin—Gaimini—is that the knowledge of the Self has no independent fruit of its own, because it stands in a subordinate relation to sacrificial action. This relation is mediated by the Self—the object of knowledge—which is the agent in all action, and therefore itself stands in a subordinate relation to action. By learning that his Self will outlive the body the agent becomes qualified for actions, the fruit of which will only appear after death. The qualification the Self thus acquires is analogous to that which the rice-grains acquire by being sprinkled with water; for only through this latter act of ceremonial modification (or purification, samskāra) they become fit to be used in the sacrifice.—As the knowledge of the Self thus has no independent position, it cannot have an independent fruit of its own, and consequently the passages which state such fruits cannot be taken as 'injunctions of fruits,' but merely as arthavādas, making some additional statement about the fruit of the sacrificial actions to which the knowledge of the Self is auxiliary.

² The material, i. e. the ladle made of parṇa-wood, is auxiliary to the sacrifice, and the fruit which the text ascribes to it (viz. hearing no evil sound) therefore has to be viewed as a fruit of the knowledge of the Self which the text does not exhibit under any special heading can enter into sacrificial action as a subordinate member, without the presence of any of the means of proof—general subject-matter and so on—which determine such subordinate relation?—The pūrvapakshin may reply that the knowledge of the Self enters into sacrificial action through the mediation of the agent, on the ground of the means of proof called vākya (sentence; syntactical unity)¹. But this we deny because in the present case 'sentence' has no force to teach the application (of the knowledge of the Self to the sacrifices, as a subordinate member of the latter). Things which the text states under no particular heading may indeed be connected with the sacrifice on the ground of 'sentence,' through some intermediate link which is not of too wide an application²; but the agent is an intermediate link of too wide an application, since it is common to all action whether worldly or based on the Veda. The agent cannot therefore be used as a mediating link to establish the connexion of the knowledge of the Self with the sacrifice.—Your objection is not valid, the pūrvapakshin replies, since the knowledge of a Self different from the body is of no use anywhere but in works based on the Veda. For such knowledge is of no use in worldly works, in all of which the activity may be shown to be guided by visible purposes; with reference to Vedic works, on the other hand, whose fruits manifest themselves only after the death of this body no activity would be possible the entire sacrifice. Analogously in the case of the samskāra—the anointing—which fits the sacrificer for performing the sacrifice, and in the case of the prayāgas and anuyāgas which are merely subordinate members of the darsapūṇamāsa.

¹ The entire Veda constituting an extended syntactical whole, in which the agent is the same.

² Thus the quality of being made of parṇa-wood is connected with the sacrifices on the ground of the vākya implied in 'yasya parṇamayī guhūr bhavati,' because here we have as an intermediate link the guhū, i. e. a special implement which is used at sacrifices only, and therefore is not of too wide an application.

were it not for the knowledge of a Self separate from the body, and such knowledge therefore has its uses there.—But, another objection is raised, from attributes given to the Self, such as ‘free from sin,’ and the like, it appears that the doctrine of the Upanishads refers to that Self which stands outside the samsāra and cannot therefore be subordinate to activity.—This objection too is without force; for what the Upanishads teach as the object of cognition is just the transmigrating Self, which is clearly referred to in such terms as ‘dear’ (Bṛi. Up. II, 4, 5). Attributes such as being free from sin, on the other hand, may be viewed as aiming merely at the glorification of that Self.—But in more than one place Brahman, the cause of the world, which is additional to the transmigrating Self and itself not subject to transmigration has been established, and the Upanishads teach that this very Brahman constitutes the real nature of the transmigrating Self!—True, that has been established; but in order to confirm that doctrine, objections and their refutation are again set forth with reference to the question as to the fruit (of the knowledge of the Self).

3. On account of scripture showing (certain lines of) conduct.

‘Ganaka the king of the Videhas sacrificed with a sacrifice at which many presents were given to the priests’ (Bṛi. Up. III, 1, 1); ‘Sirs, I am going to perform a sacrifice’ (Kh. Up. V, 11, 5); these and similar passages—which occur in sections that have another purport—show that those who know Brahman are connected with sacrificial action also. And similarly we apprehend from the fact that according to scripture Uddālaka and others taught their sons and so on, that they were connected with the condition of life of householders. If mere knowledge could effect the purpose of man, why should the persons mentioned have performed works troublesome in many respects? ‘If a man would find honey in the Arka tree why should he go to the forest?’

4. Because scripture directly states that.

‘What a man does with knowledge, faith and the Upanishad is more powerful’ (Kh. Up. I, 1, 10); this passage directly states that knowledge is subordinate to work¹, and from this it follows that mere knowledge cannot effect the purpose of man.

5. On account of the taking hold together.

‘Then both his knowledge and his work take hold of him’ (Bri. Up. IV, 4, 2); as this passage shows that knowledge and work begin together to manifest their fruits, it follows that knowledge is not independent.

6. And because scripture enjoins (works) for such (only as understand the purport of the Veda).

‘He who has learnt (lit. “read”) the Veda from a family of teachers, according to the sacred injunction, in the leisure time left from the duties to be performed for the Guru ; who after having received his discharge has settled in his own house, studying his sacred texts in some sacred spot’ (Kh. Up. VIII, 15); such passages also show that those who know the purport of the whole Veda are qualified for sacrificial action, and that hence knowledge does not independently bring about a result.—But the expression ‘who has read’ directly states only that the Veda is read, not that its purport is understood!—Not so, we reply. The reading of the Veda extends up to the comprehension of its purport, as thus the reading has a visible purpose².

7. And on account of definite rules.

‘Performing works here (i. e. in this life) let a man wish to live a hundred years ; thus work will not cling to thee, man ; there is no other way than that’ (Īśa. Up. 2); ‘The

¹ For the instrumental case ‘vidyayâ’ directly represents knowledge as a means of work.

² According to the Mîmāṃsâ principle that, wherever possible, actions enjoined must be understood to have a visible purpose (a supersensuous result being admitted only where no visible result can be made out).

Agnihotra is a sattra lasting up to old age and death ; for through old age one is freed from it or through death' (Sat. Brā. XII, 4, 1, 1); from such definite rules also it follows that knowledge is merely supplementary to works.

Against all these objections the Sūtrakāra upholds his view in the following Sūtra.

8. But on account of (scripture teaching) the additional one (i.e. the Lord), (the view) of Bādarāyana (is valid) ; as that is seen thus (in scriptural passages).

The word 'but' discards the pūrvapaksha.—The assertion made in Sūtra 2 cannot be maintained 'on account of the text teaching the additional one.' If the Vedānta-texts taught that the transmigrating embodied Self which is an agent and enjoyer is something different from the mere body, the statements as to the fruit of the knowledge of the Self would, for the reasons indicated above, be mere arthavādas. But what the Vedānta-texts really teach as the object of knowledge is something different from the embodied Self, viz. the non-transmigrating Lord who is free from all attributes of transmigratory existence such as agency and the like and distinguished by freedom from sin and so on, the highest Self. And the knowledge of that Self does not only not promote action but rather cuts all action short, as will be declared in Sūtra 16. Hence the view of the reverend Bādarāyana which was stated in Sūtra 1 remains valid and cannot be shaken by fallacious reasoning about the subordination of knowledge to action and the like. That the Lord who is superior to the embodied Self is the Self many scriptural texts declare; compare 'He who perceives all and knows all' (Mu. Up. I, 1, 9); 'From terror of it the wind blows, from terror the sun rises' (Taitt. Up. II, 8); 'It is a great terror, a raised thunderbolt' (Ka. Up. II, 6, 2); 'By the command of that imperishable one, O Gārgi' (Bṛi. Up. III, 8, 9); 'It thought, may I be many, may I grow forth. It sent forth fire' (Kā. Up. VI, 2, 3). There are indeed passages in which the transmigrating Self—hinted at by such terms as ‘dear’—is referred to as the object of knowledge, such as ‘But for the love of the Self everything is dear. Verily the Self is to be seen’ (Bri. Up. II, 4, 5); ‘He who breathes in the up-breathing he is thy Self and within all’ (Bri. Up. III, 4, 1); ‘The person that is seen in the eye that is thy Self,’ up to ‘But I shall explain him further to you’ (Kh. Up. VIII, 7 ff.). But as there are at the same time complementary passages connected with the passages quoted above—viz. ‘There has been breathed forth from this great Being the Rîg-veda, Yagur-veda,’ &c. (Bri. Up. II, 4, 10); ‘He who overcomes hunger and thirst, sorrow, passion, old age and death’ (Bri. Up. III, 5, 1); ‘Having approached the highest light he appears in his own form. That is the highest person’ (Kh. Up. VIII, 12, 3)—which aim at giving instruction about the superior Self; it follows that the two sets of passages do not mean to teach an absolute difference of the two Selves and that thus contradiction is avoided. For the Self of the highest Lord is the real nature of the embodied Self, while the state of being embodied is due to the limiting adjuncts, as appears from scriptural passages such as ‘Thou art that;’ ‘There is no other seer but he.’ All which has been demonstrated by us at length in the earlier parts of this commentary in more than one place.

9. But the declarations (of scripture) are equal (on the other side).

In reply to the averment made in Sûtra 3, we point out that there are declarations of scripture, of equal weight, in favour of the view that knowledge is not complementary to action. For there are scriptural passages such as, ‘Knowing this the rîshis descended from Kavasha said: For what purpose should we study the Veda? for what purpose should we sacrifice? Knowing this indeed the Ancient ones did not offer the Agnihotra;’ and ‘When Brâhmaṇas know that Self and have risen above the desire for sons, wealth, and worlds, they wander about as mendicants’ (Bri. Up. III, 5). Scripture moreover shows that Yāgñavalkya and others who knew Brahman did not take their stand on works. 'Thus far goes immortality. Having said so Yāgñavalkya went away into the forest' (Bri. Up. IV, 5, 15). With reference to the indicatory sign (as to the dependence of knowledge to work) which is implied in the passage, 'Sirs, I am going to perform a sacrifice,' we remark that it belongs to a section which treats of Vaisvānara. Now, the text may declare that a vidyā of Brahman as limited by adjuncts is accompanied by works; but all the same the vidyā does not stand in a subordinate relation to works since 'leading subject-matter' and the other means of proof are absent.

We now reply to the averment made in Sūtra 4.

10. (The direct statement is) non-comprehensive.

The direct scriptural statement implied in 'What a man does with knowledge' &c. does not refer to all knowledge, as it is connected with the knowledge forming the subject-matter of the section. And the latter is the knowledge of the udgītha only, 'Let a man meditate on the syllable Om (as) the udgītha.'

11. There is distribution (of the work and knowledge) as in the case of the hundred.

In reply to the averment (Sūtra 5) that the passage, 'Then both his knowledge and his work take hold of him,' indicates the non-independence of knowledge, we point out that the passage must be understood in a distributed sense, knowledge taking hold of one man and work of another. The case is analogous to that of the 'hundred.' When it is said, 'Let a hundred be given to these two men,' the hundred are divided in that way that fifty are given to one man and fifty to the other.—Moreover what the text says about the laying hold does not refer to him who is about to obtain final release; for the concluding passage, 'So much for the man who desires,' indicates that the whole section refers to the soul implicated in the samsāra, and a new beginning is made for him who is about to be released, in the clause, 'But as to the man who does not desire.' The clause about the laying hold thus comprises all knowledge which falls within the sphere of the transmigrating soul whether it be enjoined or prohibited¹, since there is no reason for distinction, and to all action whether enjoined or prohibited, the clause embodying a reference to knowledge and work as established elsewhere. And on this interpretation there is room for the clause even without our having recourse to the distribution of knowledge and work.

The next Sûtra replies to the averment made in Sûtra 6.

12. Of him who has merely read the Veda (there is qualification for works).

As the clause, 'Having learnt (read) the Veda from a family of teachers,' speaks only of the reading, we determine that acts are there enjoined for him who has only read the Veda.—But from this it would follow that on account of being destitute of knowledge such a person would not be qualified for works!—Never mind; we do not mean to deny that the understanding of sacrificial acts which springs from the reading of the texts is the cause of qualification for their performance; we only wish to establish that the knowledge of the Self derived from the Upanishads is seen to have an independent purpose of its own and therefore does not supply a reason of qualification for acts. Analogously a person who is qualified for one act does not require the knowledge of another act.

Against the reasoning of Sûtra 7 we make the following remark.

13. There being no specification (the rule does) not (specially apply to him who knows).

In passages such as 'Performing works here let a man live' &c., which state definite rules, there is no specification of him who knows, since the definite rule is enjoined without any such specification.

¹ Pratishiddhâ ka ragnastrîdarsanâdirûpâ. Ân. Gi. — Pratishiddhâ ka yathâsaktîhâstrâdhigamanalaksharâ (not 'yathâ saktîhâstra' as in the Biblioth. Indica edition). Bhâmatî.

14. Or else the permission (of works) is for the glorification (of knowledge).

The passage 'Performing works here' may be treated in another way also. Even if, owing to the influence of the general subject-matter, only he who knows is to be viewed as he who performs works, yet the permission to perform works must be viewed as aiming at the glorification of knowledge; as appears from the subsequent clause, 'no work clings to the man.' The meaning of the entire passage thus is: To a man who knows no work will cling, should he perform works during his whole life even, owing to the power of knowledge. And this clearly glorifies knowledge.

15. Some also by proceeding according to their liking (evince their disregard of anything but knowledge).

Moreover some who know, having obtained the intuition of the fruit of knowledge, express, in reliance thereon, the purposelessness of the means of all other results, viz. by proceeding according to their liking (and abandoning those means). A scriptural text of the Vāgasaneyins runs as follows: 'Knowing this the people of old did not wish for offspring. What shall we do with offspring, they said, we who have this Self and this world' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 22). And that the fruit of knowledge, being present to intuition, does not manifest itself at a later time only as the fruits of actions do, we have explained more than once. From this also it follows that knowledge is not subordinate to action, and that the scriptural statements as to the fruit of knowledge cannot be taken in any but their true sense.

16. And (scripture teaches) the destruction (of the qualification for works, by knowledge).

Moreover scripture teaches that this whole apparent world—which springs from Nescience, is characterised by actions, agents and results of actions and is the cause of all qualification for works—is essentially destroyed by the power of knowledge. Compare such passages as ‘But when all has become the Self of him, wherewith should he see another, wherewith should he smell another?’ (Bri. Up. IV, 5, 15). For him now who should teach that the qualification for works has for its necessary antecedent the knowledge of the Self which the Vedânta-texts teach, it would follow that the qualification for works is cut short altogether. From this also it follows that knowledge is independent.

17. And (knowledge belongs) to those who are bound to chastity; for in scripture (that condition of life is mentioned).

Scripture shows that knowledge is valid also for those stages of life for which chastity is prescribed. Now in their case knowledge cannot be subordinate to work because work is absent; for the works prescribed by the Veda such as the Agnihotra are no longer performed by men who have reached those stages.—But, an objection is raised, those stages of life are not even mentioned in the Veda!—This is not so, we reply. Certain Vedic passages clearly intimate them; so e.g. ‘There are three branches of the law’ (Kh. Up. II, 23, 1); ‘Those who in the forest practise faith and austerity’ (Kh. Up. V, 10, 1); ‘Those who practise penance and faith in the forest’ (Mu. Up. I, 10, 11); ‘Wishing for that world only mendicants wander forth’ (Bri. Up. IV, 4, 22); ‘Let him wander forth at once from the state of studentship.’—That the stages requiring chastity are open to men whether they have reached householdership or not, and whether they have paid the debts (of procreating a son, &c.) or not, is known from scripture and Smṛiti. Herefrom also follows the independence of knowledge.

18. Gaimini (considers that scriptural passages mentioning those stages of life in which chastity is obligatory, contain) a reference (only to those stages); they are not injunctions ; for (other scriptural passages) forbid (those stages).

The Vedic texts which have been quoted to the end of showing the existence of the stages of life on which chastity is binding—such as ‘ There are three branches of the law ’ and so on—have no power to establish those stages. For the teacher Gaimini is of opinion that those passages contain only a reference to the other stages of life, not an injunction (of them).—Why?—Because they contain no words expressive of injunction such as imperative verbal forms, and because each of them is seen to have some other purport. In the passage, ‘ There are three ’ &c., the text at first refers to three stages of life (‘ Sacrifice, study, and charity are the first ’ &c. &c.), thereupon declares them not to have unbounded results (‘ All these obtain the world of the blessed ’), and finally glorifies ‘ the state of being grounded on Brahman ’ as having unbounded results (‘ the Brahmasamsthā obtains immortality ’).—But is not a mere reference even sufficient to intimate the existence of those stages of life?—True ; but they are established (enjoined) not by direct scriptural statements, but only by Smṛiti and custom, and therefore when contradicted by direct scriptural statement¹ are either to be disregarded or else to be viewed as concerning those who (for some reason or other) are disqualified (for active worship, sacrifices and the like).—But together with the stages demanding chastity the text refers to the condition of the householder also². (‘ Sacrifice, study, and charity are the first. ’)—True ; but the existence of the state of the householder is established (not by that passage but) by other scriptural passages, viz. those which enjoin on the householder certain works such as the Agnihotra. Hence the reference in the passage under discussion aims at glorification only, not at injunction.

¹ Such as that concerning the permanent obligation of the Agnihotra and so on.

² And we therefore may conclude that those stages are as valid as the—notoriously valid—state of householdership.

Moreover, direct scriptural enunciations forbid other stages of life ; cp. 'A murderer of the gods is he who removes the fire ;' 'After having brought to thy teacher his proper reward do not cut off the line of children' (Taitt. Up. I, 11, 1) ; 'To him who is without a son the world does not belong ; all beasts even know that.'—Similarly the passages, 'Those who in the forest practise faith and austerity' (Kh. Up. V, 10, 1), and the analogous passage (from the Mundaka), contain instruction not about the other stages of life but about the going on the path of the gods. And of clauses such as 'austerity is the second' it is doubtful whether they speak of a stage of life at all. And a passage like 'Wishing for that world only mendicants wander forth,' does not enjoin the wandering forth but merely glorifies that world.—But there is at any rate one scriptural text which directly and unambiguously enjoins the condition of life of the wandering mendicant, viz. the one of the Gâbâlas, 'Let him wander forth at once from the state of studentship.'—True, but our discussion is carried on without reference to that passage.

19. (The other stage of life) is to be accomplished, (according to) Bâdarâyana ; on account of the scriptural statement of equality.

The teacher Bâdarâyana is of opinion that that other stage of life is something to be accomplished. The view that there is a contradiction because the other stage of life is stated in the Veda and, on the other hand, works such as the Agnihotra must necessarily be performed, and that, in order to remove this contradiction, that other stage of life must be entered upon by those only who are not qualified for active worship, he rejects ; being of opinion that that other stage is to be entered upon, in the same way as the state of the householder, even by him who does not wish to do so.—On what ground ?—'On account of the scriptural statement of equality.' For we have a passage (viz. 'There are three branches of the law,' &c.) which refers equally to that other stage as to the state of the householder. As the state of the householder which is enjoined in other passages only is here referred to, so also that other stage of life. The case is analogous to the reference made to the wearing of the sacrificial thread round the neck or on the right shoulder—which two modes are established in other scriptural passages—in a passage the purpose of which it is to enjoin the wearing of the thread on the left shoulder. The other stage must therefore be entered upon in the same way as the state of the householder.—Analogously in the passage, ‘Wishing for that world only mendicants leave their homes,’ the last stage of life is mentioned together with the study of the Veda, sacrifice and so on, and in the passage, ‘Those who in the forest,’ &c., with the knowledge of the five fires.—The remark, made above by the pûrvapakshin, that in such passages as ‘austerity is the second’ there is unambiguous reference to a further stage of life, is without force, since there is a reason enabling us to determine what is meant. The text proclaims in the beginning that there are three subdivisions (‘There are three branches of the law’). Now the sacrifice and the other duties (which the text enumerates subsequently to the introductory clause) can, because they are more than three, and rest on separate originative injunctions, be comprised within the three branches only if they are connected with one of the stages of life. Now the terms ‘sacrifice’ and so on indicate that the stage of householdership constitutes one branch of the law, and the term ‘Brahmakârin’ clearly denotes another stage; what then remains but to assume that the term ‘austerity’ also denotes a stage of life, viz. the one in which austerity is the chief thing? Analogously the reference to the forest—in the passage, ‘Those who in the forest,’—indicates that by the austerity and faith mentioned there we have to understand that stage of life in which austerity and faith are the chief thing.—From all this it follows that the further stage of life has to be gone through, even if the passage under discussion should do nothing but refer to it.

20. Or (the passage rather is) an injunction, as in the case of the carrying (of the firewood).

Or the passage is rather to be understood as containing an injunction, not a mere reference.—But, an objection is raised, if we assume it to be an injunction we thereby oppose the conception of the entire passage as a coherent whole, while yet the passage has clearly to be conceived as constituting such a whole, viz. as meaning that while the three branches of the law have for their result the world of the blessed, the condition of being grounded in Brahman has immortality for its result.—True, but all the same we must set aside the conception of the passage as a whole—well founded as it is—and assume it to be an injunction. For it is a new injunction because no other injunction is observed, and as the conception of the other stage of life clearly arises from the passage it is impossible to interpret it as a coherent whole by means of the assumption that it is a mere gunavāda ¹.

The case is analogous to that of the ‘carrying.’ There is a scriptural text (relating to the Agnihotra which forms part of the mahāpitṛiyagñā), ‘Let him approach carrying the firewood below (the ladle holding the offering); for above he carries it for the gods.’ Now this passage may be conceived as an unbroken whole if we view it as referring to the carrying below only; nevertheless we determine that it enjoins the carrying above because that is not enjoined anywhere else¹. This is explained in the chapter treating of 'complement,' in the Sūtra, 'But it is an injunction,' &c. (Pū. Mīm. Sū.). In the same way we assume that our passage referring to the different āśramas is an injunctory passage only.

¹ In the clause ‘vidhyantarādarsanāt’ I can see nothing more than an explanation of—or reason for—the ‘apūrvatvāt.’ If we viewed the passage as glorifying the brahmasamsthātā compared to the three branches of the law through the statement of its super-sensuous results (so that it would constitute an arthavāda of the kind called gunavāda), we should indeed preserve the unity of the passage—which is destroyed if we view it as enjoining the different stages of life. But all the same the latter explanation is the true one; for a glorificatory passage presupposes an injunctive one, and as no such injunctive passage is met with elsewhere, it is simpler to assume that the present passage is itself injunctive than to construe (on the basis of it if viewed as a gunavāda) another injunctive passage. (In Ānanda Giri’s gloss on this passage—Biblioth. Indica edition—read ‘vihitatvopagamaprasaktyā’ and ‘stutilakṣaṇayaika’.)

Even if (to state an alternative conclusion) the passage contains references only to the other āśramas, it must be viewed as enjoining at any rate the condition of being grounded in Brahman, owing to the glorification of that condition. The question here arises whether that state belongs to any one comprised within the four āśramas, or only to the wandering mendicant. If now a reference to the mendicant also is contained within the references to the āśramas up to the Brahma-kārin (i.e. the three āśramas the text refers to before the passage about the brahmasaṁstha); then, as all four āśramas are referred to equally and as somebody not belonging to any āśrama could not possibly be called brahmasaṁstha, it follows that the term 'brahmasaṁstha' denotes any one standing within one of the four āśramas. If, on the other hand, the mendicant is not comprised within the references to the three āśramas, he alone remains, and this establishes the conclusion that the brahmasaṁstha is the mendicant only. (We therefore have to inquire which of the two alternatives stated has to be adopted.)—Here some maintain that the term 'austerity' which denotes the hermit in the woods implies a reference to the mendicant also. But this is wrong. For as long as any other explanation is possible, we must not assume that a term which expresses a distinctive attribute of the hermits living in the forest comprises the wandering mendicants also. Both the Brahma-kārin and the householder are referred to by distinctive terms applying to them only, and we therefore expect that the mendicant and the hermit also should be referred to by analogous terms. Now 'austerity' is a distinctive attribute of the hermits living in the woods; for the principal conventional meaning of the word 'austerity' is mortification of the body. The distinctive attribute of the mendicant, on the other hand, viz. restraint of the senses and so on, cannot be denoted by the term 'austerity.' Moreover it would be an illegitimate assumption that the âsramas which are known to be four should here be referred to as three. And further the text notifies a distinction, viz. by saying that those three reach the world of the blessed, while one enjoys immortality. Now there is room for such a distinction if the hermits and the mendicants are separate; for we do not say 'Devadatta and Yagñadatta are stupid, but one of them is clever,' but we say 'Devadatta and Yagñadatta are stupid, but Vishnumitra is clever.' The passage therefore has to be understood in that sense, that those belonging to the three former âsramas obtain the world of the blessed, while the remaining one, i. e. the wandering mendicant, enjoys immortality.—But how can the term 'brahmasamstha,' which according to its etymological meaning may be applied to members of all âsramas, be restricted to the mendicant? and, if we agree to take it in its conventional meaning, it follows that immortality may be reached by merely belonging to an âsrama, and hence that knowledge is useless!—To these objections we make the following reply. The term 'brahmasamstha' denotes fulfilment in Brahman, a state of being grounded in Brahman to the exclusion of all other activity. Now such a state is impossible for persons belonging to the three former âsramas, as scripture declares that they suffer loss through the non-performance of the works enjoined on their âsrama. The mendicant, on the other hand, who has discarded all works can suffer no loss owing to non-performance. Such duties as are incumbent on him, viz. restraint of the senses and the like, are not opposed to the state of being grounded in Brahman, but rather helpful to it. For the only work enjoined on him by his āsrama is the state of being firmly grounded in Brahman, wherein he is strengthened by restraint of the senses and so on—just as sacrifices and the like are prescribed for the other āśramas—and loss he incurs only by neglecting that work. In agreement herewith texts from scripture and Smṛiti declare that for him who is grounded in Brahman there are no works. Compare ‘Renunciation is Brahman; for Brahman is the highest; for the highest is Brahman; above those lower penances, indeed, there rises renunciation;’ ‘Those anchorites who have well ascertained the object of the knowledge of the Vedānta and have purified their nature by the Yoga of renunciation’ (Mu. Up. III, 2, 6); and similar scriptural passages. And Smṛiti-texts to the same effect, such as ‘They whose minds are fixed on him, who have their Self in him, their stand on him, their end in him’ (Bha. Gītā V, 17). All these passages teach that for him who is founded on Brahman there are no works. From this there also follows the non-validity of the second objection raised above, viz. that the mendicant’s reaching immortality through the mere stage of life in which he stands would imply the uselessness of knowledge.—In this way we understand that, although there is a reference to the other stages of life, that which is indicated by the quality of being grounded in Brahman is the state of the wandering mendicant.

¹ The ekavākyatā is preserved if we take the clause from 'above' as an arthavāda meant to give the reason why in sacrifices offered to the Fathers the firewood has to be carried below. Nevertheless the clause must be taken as a vidhi enjoining the carrying above in all sacrifices offered to the gods, because this particular is not enjoined elsewhere.

This whole discussion has been carried on by the teacher without taking into account the text of the Gābālas, which enjoins the other stage of life. But there exists that text which directly enjoins the other stage, ‘Having completed his studentship he is to become a householder; having been a householder he is to become a dweller in the forest; having been a dweller in the forest he is to wander forth; or else he may wander forth from the student’s state; or from the house; or from the forest.’ Nor can this text be interpreted as referring to those who are not qualified for works; for it states no difference, and there is a separate injunction (of the pārvirāgya-state) for those who are not qualified, viz. in the passage, ‘May he have taken vows upon himself or not, may he be a snātaka or not, may he be one whose fire has gone out or one who has no fire,' &c. That the text does not refer to such only as are not qualified for works, further follows from the fact that the state of the mendicant is meant to subserve the development of the knowledge of Brahman¹, as scripture declares, 'The wandering mendicant, with colourless dress, shaven, wifeless, pure, guileless, living on alms, qualifies himself for the intuition of Brahman.'—From all this it follows that the stages of life for which chastity is obligatory are established by scripture, and that knowledge—because enjoined on persons who have entered on those stages—is independent of works.

21. If it be said that (texts such as the one about the udgītha are) mere glorification, on account of their reference (to parts of sacrifices); we deny that, on account of the newness (of what they teach, if viewed as injunctions).

'That udgītha is the best of all essences, the highest, holding the highest place, the eighth' (Kh. Up. I, 1, 3); 'This earth is the Rik, the fire is Sāman' (Kh. Up. I, 6, 1); 'This world in truth is that piled-up fire-altar' (Sat. Brā. X, 1, 2, 2); 'That hymn is truly that earth' (Ait. Ār. II, 1, 2, 1); with reference to these and other similar passages a doubt arises whether they are meant to glorify the udgītha and so on, or to enjoin devout meditations.

The pūrvapakshin maintains that their aim is glorification, because the text exhibits them with reference to subordinate members of sacrificial actions, such as the udgītha and so on. They are, he says, analogous to passages such as 'This earth is the ladle;' 'the sun is the tortoise;' 'the heavenly world is the Āhavanīya,' whose aim it is to glorify the ladle and so on. To this the Sūtra-kāra replies as follows. We have no right to consider the purpose of those passages to be mere glorification, on account of the newness. If they aim at injunction, a new matter is enjoined by them; if, on the other hand, they aimed at glorification they would be devoid of meaning. For, as explained in the Pū. Mīm. Sū., glorificatory passages are of use in so far as entering into a complementary relation to injunctive passages; but the passages under discussion are incapable of entering into such a relation to the udgītha and so on which are enjoined in altogether different places of the Veda, and would therefore be purposeless as far as glorification is concerned. Passages such as 'This earth is the ladle' are not analogous because they stand in proximity to injunctive passages.—Therefore texts such as those under discussion have an injunctive purpose.

¹ Which has to be acquired in the regular prescribed way of Brahmanical studentship.

22. And on account of the words expressive of becoming.

Moreover the text exhibits words of clearly injunctive meaning, in connexion with the passages quoted above, viz. 'Let him meditate on the udgītha' (Kh. Up. I, 1, 1); 'Let him meditate on the Sāman' (Kh. Up. II, 2, 1); 'Let him think: I am the hymn' (Ait. Ār. II, 1, 6). Now these injunctive forms would be rendered futile by the assumption of the texts under discussion aiming at glorification only. Compare the following saying of those who know Nyāya, 'Let him do, let it be done, it is to be done, let it become, let it be; these forms are in all Vedas the settled signs of injunction.' What they mean thereby is that injunction is the sense of all potential, imperative, &c., verbal forms.—Moreover in each of the sections to which the passages under discussion belong the text states special fruits, 'He becomes indeed a fulfiller of desires' (Kh. Up. I, 1, 7); 'He is able to obtain wishes through his song' (Kh. Up. I, 7, 9); 'The worlds in an ascending and a descending line belong to him' (Kh. Up. II, 2, 3). For this reason also the texts about the udgîtha and so on are meant to enjoin devout meditations.

23. (The stories told in the Upanishads) are for the purpose of the pâriplava; we deny this on account of (certain stories only) being specified.

‘Yâgñavalkya had two wives, Maitreyî and Kâtyâyanî’ (Bri. Up. IV, 5, 1); ‘Pratardana, forsooth, the son of Divodâsa came to the beloved abode of Indra’ (Kau. Up. III, 1); ‘There lived once upon a time Gânasruti Pautrâyana, who was a pious giver, giving much and keeping open house’ (Kh. Up. IV, 1, 1); with regard to these and similar stories met with in the Vedânta portions of scripture there arises a doubt whether they are meant to subserve the performance of the pâriplava¹, or to introduce the vidyâs standing in proximity to them.

The pûrvapakshin maintains that those scriptural stories subserve the pâriplava because they are stories like others, and because the telling of stories is enjoined for the pâriplava. And from this it follows that the Vedânta-texts do not chiefly aim at knowledge, because like mantras they stand in a complementary relation to sacrificial performances.

This conclusion we deny ‘on account of the specification.’ Under the heading ‘he is to recite the pâriplava,’ scripture specifies certain definite stories such as that of ‘Manu Vivasvat’s son the king.’ If, now, for the reason that all tales as such are alike, all tales were admitted for the pâriplava, the mentioned specification would be devoid of meaning. We therefore conclude that those scriptural stories are not meant to be told at the pâriplava.

24. This follows also from the connexion (of the stories with the vidyâs) in one coherent whole.

And as thus the stories do not subserve the pâriplava it is appropriate to assume that they are meant to bring nearer to our understanding the approximate vidyās with which they are seen to form connected wholes; for they serve to render the latter more acceptable and facilitate their comprehension.

¹ I. e. have to be recited at stated intervals during the year occupied by the arvamedha sacrifice.

In the Maitreyī-brāhmaṇa we see that the story forms a whole with the vidyā beginning, 'The Self indeed is to be seen,' &c.; in the account of Pratardana with the vidyā, 'I am prāṇa, the conscious Self;,' in the legend of Gāṇasruti with the vidyā, 'Air indeed is the end of all.' The case of all these stories is analogous to that of stories met with in scriptural texts referring to works, whose purpose is the glorification of injunctions standing in proximity; as e.g. 'He cut out his own omentum.'—The stories under discussion therefore do not subserve the pāriplava.

25. For this very reason there is no need of the lighting of the fire and so on.

The expression 'For this very same reason' must be viewed as taking up Sūtra III, 4, 1, because thus a satisfactory sense is established. For this very same reason, i.e. because knowledge subserves the purpose of man, the lighting of the sacrificial fire and similar works which are enjoined on the different āśramas are not to be observed, since man's purpose is effected through knowledge.

The Sūtrakāra thus sums up the result of the first adhikaraṇa, intending to make some further remarks.

26. And there is need of all (works), on account of the scriptural statement of sacrifices and the like; as in the case of the horse.

We now consider whether knowledge has absolutely no need of the works enjoined on the different āśramas, or whether it has some need of them. Under the preceding Sūtra we have arrived at the conclusion that as knowledge effects its own end the works enjoined on the āśramas are absolutely not required. With reference to this point the present Sūtra now remarks that knowledge has regard for all works enjoined on the âśramas, and that there is not absolute non-regard.—But do not the two Sûtras thus contradict each other?—By no means, we reply. Knowledge having once sprung up requires no help towards the accomplishment of its fruit, but it does stand in need of something else with a view to its own origination.—Why so?—On account of the scriptural statements of sacrifices and so on. For the passage, ‘Him Brâhmanas seek to know by the study of the Veda, by sacrifice, by gifts, by penance, by fasting’ (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 22), declares that sacrifices and so on are means of knowledge, and as the text connects them with the ‘seeking to know,’ we conclude that they are, more especially, means of the origination of knowledge. Similarly the passage, ‘What people call sacrifice that is really brahma-kārya’ (Kh. Up. VIII, 5, 1), by connecting sacrifices and so on with brahma-kārya which is a means of knowledge, intimates that sacrifices &c. also are means of knowledge. Again the passage, ‘That word which all the Vedas record, which all penances proclaim, desiring which men live as religious students, that word I tell thee briefly, it is Om’ (Ka. Up. I, 2, 15), likewise intimates that the works enjoined on the âśramas are means of knowledge. Similarly Smṛiti says, ‘Works are the washing away of uncleanness, but knowledge is the highest way. When the impurity has been removed, then knowledge begins to act.’

The phrase, ‘as in the case of the horse,’ supplies an illustration on the ground of suitability. As the horse, owing to its specific suitability, is not employed for dragging ploughs but is harnessed to chariots; so the works enjoined on the âśramas are not required by knowledge for bringing about its results, but with a view to its own origination.

27. But all the same he (who is desirous of knowledge) must be possessed of calmness, subjection of the senses, &c., since those (states) are enjoined as auxiliaries to that (viz. knowledge), and must (on that account) necessarily be accomplished.

Perhaps somebody might think that we have no right to look upon sacrifices and the like as means of knowledge because there is no injunction to that effect. For a passage like 'By sacrifice they seek to know' is of the nature of an anuvāda, and therefore does not aim at enjoining sacrifices but rather at glorifying knowledge, 'so glorious is knowledge that they seek to obtain it through sacrifices and the like.'

But even should this be so the seeker for knowledge must possess calmness of mind, must subdue his senses and so on ; for all this is enjoined as a means of knowledge in the following scriptural passage, 'Therefore he who knows this, having become calm, subdued, satisfied, patient, and collected, sees self in Self' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 23). And what is enjoined must necessarily be carried out.—But in the above passage also we observe only a statement as to something actually going on—'Having become calm, &c., he sees,' not an injunction!—Not so, we reply. The introductory word 'therefore' which expresses praise of the subject under discussion makes us understand that the passage has an injunctive character¹.

Moreover the text of the Mādhyandinas directly reads 'let him see' (not 'he sees'). Hence calmness of mind and so on are required even if sacrifices, &c., should not be required.—Sacrifices and so on, however, are required likewise, because (as said in Sūtra 26) scripture teaches them.—But it has been said that in the passage, 'Him they seek to know by sacrifices,' no injunction is observed!—True ; but nevertheless we must assume the passage to be an injunction, because the connexion of the search for knowledge with sacrifices and so on is something new ; i.e. is not established by another text, and therefore the passage under discussion cannot be an anuvāda referring to it. The case is analogous to that of passages such as 'therefore Pūshan¹ receives a well-crushed share of food, for he is toothless.' There also no injunction is directly stated ; but as the matter of the passage is new we assume an injunction and understand that the grains for Pūshan are to be crushed at all vikṛitis of the darsapūrṇamāsa ; as was explained in the Pūrva Mīmāṃsā.

¹ For if there were no injunction, the praise would be without meaning. The 'therefore' connects the passage with the preceding clause, 'he is not sullied by any evil deed.' The sense then is, 'Because he who knows the Self as described before is not sullied by any evil deed, therefore let him, after having become calm, &c., see the Self, and so on.'

An analogous conclusion was arrived at under Sūtra 20.—Smṛitis also such as the Bhagavadgītā explain that sacrifices and the like if undertaken without a view to their special results become for him who is desirous of final release a means of knowledge. Hence sacrifices and the like, on the one hand, and calmness of mind and so on, on the other hand, according to the āśramas, i.e. all works enjoined on the āśramas must be had regard to with a view to the springing up of knowledge. Calmness of mind, &c., are, on account of the expression 'he who knows this' connecting them with knowledge, to be viewed as approximate—direct—means of knowledge, while sacrifices and so on which scripture connects with the search of knowledge are to be looked upon as remote—indirect—means.

28. And there is permission of all food, (only) in the case of danger of life ; on account of this being shown (by scripture).

In the colloquy of the prānas the *Kṛh*andogas record, 'To him who knows this there is nothing which is not food' (Kṛh. Up. V, 1, 2) ; and the Vāgasaneyins, 'By him nothing is eaten that is not food, nothing is received that is not food' (Bṛi. Up. VI, 1, 14). The sense of the two passages is that anything may be eaten by him.—A doubt here arises whether the texts enjoin the permission of eating anything as an auxiliary to knowledge—as calmness of mind, &c., are—or mention them for the purpose of glorification.—The pûrvapakshin maintains that the passages are injunctions because thus we gain an instruction which causes a special kind of activity. What, therefore, the text teaches is the non-operation of a definite rule, in so far as auxiliary to the knowledge of the prâṇas in proximity to which it is taught.—But this interpretation implies the sublation of the scriptural rules as to the distinction of lawful and unlawful food!—Such sublation, we reply, is possible, because the present case is one of general rule and special exception. The prohibition of doing harm to any living creature is sublated by the injunction of the killing of the sacrificial animal; the general rule which distinguishes between such women as may be approached and such as may not, is sublated by the text prescribing, with reference to the knowledge of the Vâmadevya, that no woman is to be avoided ('Let him avoid no woman, that is the vow,' Kh. Up. II, 13, 2); analogously the passage which enjoins, with reference to the knowledge of the prâṇas, the eating of all food may sublate the general rule as to the distinction of lawful and unlawful food.

¹ The passage quoted occurs in the Veda under the heading of the darsapūrṇamāsa. But as Pūshan has no share in the fundamental form of that sacrifice, we conclude that the injunction implied in the passage is valid for those vikṛitis of the darsapūrṇamāsa in which offerings are made to Pūshan.

To this we reply as follows. The permission to eat any food whatever is not enjoined, since the passages do not contain any word of injunctive power; for the clause, 'To him who knows this there is nothing,' &c., expresses only something actually going on. And where the conception of an injunction does not naturally arise we may not assume one from the mere wish of something causing a special line of activity. Moreover the text says that 'for him who knows this there is nothing that is not food,' only after having said that everything even unto dogs and the like is food for the Prâṇa. Now food such as dogs and the like cannot be enjoyed by the human body; but all this can be thought of as food of the Prâṇa. From this it follows that the passage is an arthavâda meant to glorify the knowledge of the food of the Prâṇa, not an injunction of the permission of all food.—This the Sûtra indicates in the words, 'and there is permission of all food in danger of life.' That means: Only in danger of life, in cases of highest need, food of any kind is permitted to be eaten. 'On account of scripture showing this.' For scripture shows that the rishi Kâkrâyana when in evil plight proceeded to eat unlawful food. In the brâhmaṇa beginning, 'when the Kurus had been destroyed by hail-stones,' it is told how the rishi Kâkrâyana having fallen into great wretchedness ate the beans half eaten by a chief, but refused to drink what had been offered on the ground of its being a mere leaving; and explained his proceeding as follows: 'I should not have lived if I had not eaten them; but water I can drink wherever I like.' And again on the following day he ate the stale beans left by himself and another person. Scripture, in thus showing how the stale leaving of a leaving was eaten, intimates as its principle that in order to preserve one's life when in danger one may eat even unlawful food. That, on the other hand, in normal circumstances not even a man possessing knowledge must do this, appears from Kâkrâyana's refusing to drink.—From this it follows that the passage, 'For to him who knows this,' &c., is an arthavâda.

29. And on account of the non-sublation.

And thus those scriptural passages which distinguish lawful and unlawful food,—such as Kh. Up. VII, 26, 2, 'When the food is pure the whole nature becomes pure,'—are non-sublated.

30. And this is said in Smṛiti also.

That in cases of need both he who knows and he who does not know may eat any food Smṛiti also states; compare e.g. 'He who being in danger of his life eats food from anywhere is stained by sin no more than the lotus leaf by water.'—On the other hand, many passages teach that unlawful food is to be avoided. 'Intoxicating liquor the Brâhmaṇa must permanently forego;' 'Let them pour boiling spirits down the throat of the Brâhmaṇa who drinks spirits;' 'Spirit-drinking worms grow in the mouth of the spirit-drinking man, because he enjoys what is unlawful.'

31. And hence also a scriptural passage as to non-proceeding according to liking.

There is also a scriptural passage prohibiting unlawful food, the purpose of which it is to stop procedure therein according to one's liking, viz. in the Samhitā of the Kaṭhas, 'Therefore a Brāhmaṇa is not to drink spirits.' This text also is more appropriate if we take the passage, 'To him who knows this,' as an arthavāda.—Hence passages of that kind are arthavādas, not injunctions.

32. The works of the āśramas (are incumbent on him) also (who does not desire release); because they are enjoined.

Under Sūtra 26 it has been proved that the works enjoined on the āśramas are means of knowledge. Now we will consider whether those works have to be performed also by him who does not desire final release and therefore takes his stand on his āśrama merely without wishing for knowledge.—Here the pūrvapakshin maintains that as the works incumbent on the āśramas are enjoined as means of knowledge by the passage, 'Him the Brāhmaṇas seek to know by the study of the Veda' &c., the works of permanent obligation are not to be performed by him who, not desirous of knowledge, wishes for some other fruit. Or else they are to be performed by him also; but then they cannot be means of knowledge, since it would be contradictory to attribute to them a permanent and a non-permanent connexion¹.

Against this conclusion the Sūtrakāra remarks that the works of permanent obligation are to be performed by him only who, not desirous of release, takes his stand on the âśramas merely, because they are enjoined by texts such 'as long as his life lasts he is to offer the agnihotra.' For to such texts no excessive weight must be ascribed.—The next Sûtra replies to the objection raised above in the words, 'but then they cannot be means of knowledge.'

¹ I. e. we must not think that because they enjoy the 'nityatā' of certain works, other passages may not enjoy the same works as mere means of knowledge.

33. And through the co-operativeness (of the works towards the origination of knowledge).

Those works are also co-operative with knowledge just because they are enjoined as such, viz. in passages such as 'Him the Brâhmaṇas seek to know by the study of the Veda,' &c. This has been explained under Sûtra 26. Nor must you think that the texts stating the co-operation of the works of the âśramas towards knowledge refer to the fruit of knowledge, as e.g. the offerings called prayâgas co-operate towards the fruit of the darsapûṇamâsa of which they are auxiliary members; for knowledge is not characterised by injunction, and the fruit of knowledge is not to be effected by means. Means characterised by injunctions such as the darsapûṇamâsa-sacrifice which aim at bringing about certain fruits such as the heavenly world require other (subordinate) means co-operating towards the fruit (such as the prayâgas). But not so knowledge. Compare on this point Sûtra 25. Therefore texts stating the co-operation of works (with knowledge) have to be interpreted as stating that works are means for the origination of knowledge.—Nor need we fear that thus there arises a contradiction of permanent and non-permanent connexion. For there may be difference of connexion even where there is no difference of work. One connexion is permanent, resting on the texts about the life-long performance of the agnihotra and so on; of this knowledge is not the result. The other connexion is non-permanent, resting on texts such as 'Him the Brâhmaṇas seek to know,' &c.; of this knowledge is the result. The case is analogous to that of the one khadira, which through a permanent connexion serves the purpose of the sacrifice, and through a non-permanent connexion the purpose of man.

34. In any case the same (duties have to be performed) on account of the twofold indicatory marks.

In any case, i. e. whether viewed as duties incumbent on the āsramas or as co-operating with knowledge, the very same agnihotra and other duties have to be performed.—What, it may be asked, does the teacher wish to preclude by the emphatic expression ‘the very same?’—The suspicion, we reply, that those works might be separate works¹. In the ayana of the Kundapâyins indeed the injunctive statement, ‘They offer the agnihotra for a month²,’ enjoins a sacrifice different from the permanent (ordinary) agnihotra ; but in our present case there is no analogous separation of works.—Why?—On account of the twofold indicatory mark ; i. e. on account of both scripture and Smṛiti supplying indicatory marks. In the first place, the scriptural passage, ‘Him the Brāhmaṇas seek to know through the study of the Veda,’ &c., directs that sacrifices and the like—as things already established and the form of which is already in existence (viz. through previous injunctions)—are to be employed as means in the search for knowledge ; and does not originate a new form of those works, while the passage quoted above, ‘They offer the agnihotra for a month,’ does originate a new separate sacrifice.—In the second place the Smṛiti-passage, ‘He who performs the work to be done without aiming at the fruit of the work,’ shows that the very same work which is already known as something to be performed subserves the origination of knowledge. Moreover the Smṛiti-passage, ‘He who is qualified by those forty-eight purifications,’ &c., refers to the purifications required for Vedic works, with a view to the origination of knowledge in him who has undergone those purifications.—The Sūtrakāra therefore rightly emphasizes the non-difference of the works.

¹ That the works referred to in the Upanishads as means of knowledge, might be works altogether different from those enjoined in the karmakāṇḍa as means of bringing about certain special results such as the heavenly world.

² See above, p. 250.

35. And scripture also declares that (those performing works) are not overpowered (by passion and the like).

This Sûtra points out a further indicatory mark fortifying the conclusion that works co-operate towards knowledge. Scripture also shows that he who is furnished with such means as Brahma-karya, &c., is not overpowered by such afflictions as passion and the like. Compare the passage, 'That Self does not perish which they find out by Brahma-karya' (Kh. Up. VIII, 5, 3).—It is thus a settled conclusion that sacrifices and so on are works incumbent on the âśramas as well as co-operative towards knowledge.

36. But also (persons standing) between (are qualified for knowledge); for that is seen (in scripture).

A doubt arises whether persons in want who do not possess means, &c., and therefore are not able to enter one or the other of the âśramas, standing between as it were, are qualified for knowledge or not.—They are not qualified, the pûrvapakshin maintains. For we have ascertained that the works incumbent on the âśramas are the cause of knowledge, and those persons have no opportunity to perform those works.—To this the Sûtrakâra replies, 'But also between.' Even a person who because he does not belong to an âśrama stands between, as it were, is qualified for knowledge. 'For that is seen.' For we meet with scriptural passages declaring that persons of that class—such as Raikva and the daughter of Vâknu—possessed the knowledge of Brahman (Kh. Up. IV, 1; Bri. Up. III, 6, 8).

37. This is stated in Smṛiti also.

It is recorded in itihâsas also how Samvarta and others who paid no regard to the duties incumbent on the âśramas, in going naked and so on, became great Yogins all the same.—But the instances quoted from scripture and Smṛiti furnish merely indicatory marks; what then is the final conclusion?—That conclusion is stated in the next Sūtra.

38. And the promotion (of knowledge is bestowed on them) through special acts.

Also for widowers, &c., the favour of knowledge is possible through special acts of duty, such as praying, fasting, propitiation of divinities, &c., which are not opposed to their āsrama-less condition and may be performed by any man as such. Thus Smṛiti says, 'By mere prayer no doubt the Brāhmaṇa perfects himself. May he perform other works or not, the kindhearted one is called Brāhmaṇa' (Manu Samh. II, 87), which passage shows that where the works of the āsramas are not possible prayer qualifies for knowledge. Moreover knowledge may be promoted by āsrama works performed in previous births. Thus Smṛiti also declares, 'Perfectured by many births he finally goes the highest way' (Bha. Gītā VI, 45); which passage shows that the aggregate of the different purificatory ceremonies performed in former births promotes knowledge.—Moreover knowledge—as having a seen result (viz. the removal of ignorance)—qualifies any one who is desirous of it for learning and so on, through the mere absence of obstacles¹. Hence there is no contradiction in admitting qualification for knowledge on the part of widowers and the like.

39. Better than this is the other (state of belonging to an āsrama), on account of the indicatory marks.

'Than this,' i.e. 'than standing between,' a better means of knowledge it is to stand within one of the āsramas, since this is confirmed by Sruti and Smṛiti. For scripture supplies an indicatory mark in the passage, 'On that path goes whoever knows Brahman and who has done holy ¹ I.e. any one who wishes to learn may do so, if only there is no obstacle in the way. No special injunction is wanted.

works (as prescribed for the āśramas) and obtained splendour' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 9); and Smṛiti in the passage, 'Let a Brāhmaṇa stay not one day even outside the āśrama; having stayed outside for a year he goes to utter ruin.'

40. But of him who has become that (i.e. entered on a higher āśrama) there is no becoming not that (i.e. descending to a lower one), according to Gai-minī also, on account of restrictive rule, absence of such like (i.e. statements of descent), and non-existence (of good custom).

It has been established that there are stages of life for which chastity is obligatory. A doubt here arises whether one who has entered them may for some reason or other fall from them or not.—The pūrvapakṣhin maintains that as there is no difference a person may descend to a lower stage, either from the wish of well performing the duties of that stage, or influenced by passion and the like.—To this we reply as follows, 'Of him who has become that,' i.e. of him who has reached the stages for which chastity is obligatory, there is no 'becoming not that,' i.e. descending thence.—Why?—'On account of restrictive rule, absence of such like, and non-existence.' That means: there are, in the first place, restrictive rules declaring that a descent may not take place. Compare 'for life mortifying the body in the house of a tutor' (Kṛ. Up. II, 23, 2); 'He is to go into the forest, that is he is not to return thence, that is the Upanishad'; 'Having been dismissed by the teacher he is to follow one of the four āśramas, according to rule, up to release from the body.'—In the second place there are texts teaching the ascent to higher āśramas ('Having completed the Brahma-kārya state he is to become a householder; he may wander forth from the Brahma-kārya state'); but there are none teaching the descent to lower āśramas.—And in the third place there exists no good custom of that kind.—The descent to a lower āśrama can in no way be based on the wish of well performing the duties of that āśrama; for Smṛiti says, 'One's own duty, however badly performed, is better than another duty well carried out' (Bha. Gītā III, 35). And the principle is that whatever is enjoined on a certain person constitutes his duty, not what a person is able to perform well; for all duty is characterised by injunction. Nor is a descent allowed owing to the influence of passion, &c.; for restrictive rules are weightier than passion.—By the word 'also' the Sūtrakāra indicates the consensus of Gaimini and Bādarāyaṇa on this point, in order to confirm thereby the view adopted.

41. And not also (can the expiation take place) prescribed in the chapter treating of qualification, because on account of the inference of his lapse from Smṛiti he (the Naishṭhika) is not capable of it.

If a Brahmakārin for life breaks from inattention the vow of chastity, is he to perform the expiatory sacrifice enjoined by the text, 'A student who has broken the vow of chastity shall sacrifice an ass to *Nirṛiti*¹' or not?—He is not, the pūrvapakshin says. For although in the chapter which treats of qualification (Pū. Mīm. Sū. VI, 8, 22) that expiatory ceremony has been settled (for Brahmakārins in general), it does not yet hold good for the professed Brahmakārin. For Smṛiti declares that such sins cannot be expiated by him any more than a head once cut off can again be healed on to the body, 'He who having once entered on the duties of a Naishṭhika again lapses from them, for him—a slayer of the Self—I see no expiation which might make him clean again.' The Upakurvāna (i. e. he who is a Brahmakārin for a certain time only, not for life) on the other hand, about whose sin Smṛiti makes no similar declaration, may purify himself by the ceremony mentioned.

42. But some (consider the sin) a minor one, (and hence claim) the existence (of expiation for the Naishṭhika also); as in the case of the eating (of unlawful food). This has been explained (in the Pûrva Mîmâmsâ).

¹ Cp. e. g. Āpastamba Dharma-sūtra I, 9, 26, 8. The passage quoted in the text is, however, a scriptural one.

Some teachers, however, are of opinion that the transgression of the vow of chastity, even on the part of a professed Brahmaçârî, is a minor sin, not a mortal one, excepting cases where the wife of the teacher and so on are concerned. For they plead that that sin is not anywhere enumerated among the deadly ones such as violating a teacher's bed and so on. Accordingly they claim the expiatory ceremony to be valid for the Naishṭhika as well as the Upakurvâṇa; both being alike Brahmaçârîs and having committed the same offence. The case is analogous to that of eating. Just as Brahmaçârîs (in general) who have broken their vow by eating honey, flesh, and the like may again purify themselves by a ceremony, so here also.—The reason for this decision is that for those who assume the absence of all expiation on the part of the Naishṭhikas no scriptural passage supporting their view is met with; while those who admit expiation can base their view on the passage quoted above ('A student who has broken the vow' &c.), which makes no distinction between Upakurvâṇas and Naishṭhikas. It therefore is more appropriate to assume the validity of the ceremony for Naishṭhikas also. The principle guiding the decision has been explained in the chapter treating of the means of right knowledge (Pû. Mî. Sû. I, 3, 8).—On this view the Smṛiti-passage which declares that there is no expiation for the Naishṭhika must be explained as aiming at the origination of weighty effort on the Naishṭhika's part.—Similarly in the case of the mendicant and the hermit. The hermit, when he has broken his vows, undergoes the Krikkhra penance for twelve nights and then cultivates a place rich in plants. The mendicant proceeds like the hermit, with the exception of cultivating the Soma-plant, and undergoes the purifications prescribed for his state. The rules given by Smṛiti for those cases have to be followed.

43. But (they are to be kept outside) in either case, on account of Smṛiti and custom.

But whether lapses from the duties of one's order, committed by those who are bound to chastity, be mortal sins or minor sins, in either case such persons are to be excluded by honourable men (śiṣṭas). For Smṛiti refers to them in terms of the highest reproach; cp. passages such as the one quoted under Sūtra 41; and the following one, 'He who touches a Brāhmaṇa that has broken his vow and fallen from his order, or a hanged man or one gnawed by worms must undergo the Kāṇḍāyana penance.' And good custom also condemns them; for good men do not sacrifice, study, or attend weddings with such persons.

44. To the lord (of the sacrifice) only (the agent-ship in meditations belongs), because scripture declares a fruit; this is the view of Ātreya.

With regard to meditations on subordinate members of sacrificial actions there arises a doubt whether they are to be carried out by the sacrificer (i.e. him for whom the sacrifice is performed) or by the officiating priests.—By the sacrificer, the pūrvapakṣin maintains, because scripture declares fruits. For a fruit is declared in such texts as the following one, 'There is rain for him, and he brings rain for others who thus knowing meditates on the fivefold Sāman as rain' (Kh. Up. II, 3, 2); and we must conclude that that fruit goes to the Lord of the sacrifice, because it is he who is entitled to the sacrificial performance together with its subordinate members, and because such meditations fall within the sphere of that to which he is entitled. And that the fruit belongs to him who carries out the meditations scripture states when saying, 'There is rain for him who meditates.'—But scripture declares a fruit for the priest also, viz. in the passage, 'Whatever desire he may desire either for himself or for the sacrificer he obtains by his singing.'—That passage, we reply, is of no force because it expressly declares the fruit (as belonging to the priest in a special case only). Hence the lord of the sacrifice only is the agent in those meditations which have a fruit ; this is the opinion of the teacher Âtreya.

45. (They are) the work of the priest, this is the view of Audulomi ; since for that (i.e. the entire sacrificial work) he is feed.

The assertion that the meditations on subordinate members of the sacrifice are the work of the sacrificer is unfounded. They rather are the work of the priest, as the teacher Audulomi thinks. For the priest is rewarded for the work together with its subordinate members ; and the meditations on the udgîtha and so on fall within the performance of the work since they belong to the sphere of that to which the person entitled (viz. the lord of the sacrifice) is entitled. Hence they are to be carried out by the priests only, the case being analogous to that of the restrictive rule as to the work to be performed by means of the godohana vessel. In agreement herewith scripture declares the udgâtri to be the agent in knowledge, in the following passage, 'Him Vaka Dâlbhya knew. He was the udgâtri of the Naimishîya-sacrificers' (Kh. Up. I, 2, 13). With reference to the circumstance noted by the pûrvapakshin that scripture states the fruit to belong to the agent, we remark that this makes no difference ; for with the exception of cases expressly stated the priest cannot be connected with the sacrifice since he subserves the purposes (acts for) another (viz. the lord of the sacrifice).

46. And on account of scriptural statement.

'Whatever blessing the priests pray for at the sacrifice, they pray for the good of the sacrificer ; thus he said' (Sat. Brâ. I, 3, 1, 26) ; 'Therefore an udgâtri who knows this may say : what wish shall I obtain for you by my singing?' (Kh. Up. I, 7, 8). These scriptural passages also declare that the fruit of meditations in which the priest is the agent goes to the sacrificer.—All this establishes the conclusion that the meditations on subordinate parts of the sacrifice are the work of the priest.

47. There is the injunction of something else co-operating (towards knowledge) (which is) a third thing (with regard to bālya and pāṇḍitya), (which injunction is given) for the case (of perfect knowledge not yet having arisen) to him who is such (i. e. the Samnyâsin possessing knowledge); as in the case of injunctions and the like.

‘Therefore let a Brâhmana after he has done with learning wish to stand by a childlike state; and after he has done with the childlike state and learning (he is, or, may be) a Muni; and after he has done with what constitutes Muniship and non-Muniship (he is, or, may be) a Brâhmana’ (Bṛi. Up. III, 5). With reference to this passage a doubt arises whether it enjoins the state of a Muni or not.—The pûrvapakshin maintains that it does not enjoin it, since the injunction is completed with the clause, ‘Let him wish to stand by a childlike state.’ The following clause ‘then a Muni’ contains no verbal form of injunctive force and therefore must be viewed as a mere anuvâda (making a remark concerning the state of a Muni which is already established). Should it be asked how this conclusion is reached, we reply that Muniship is established by the clause ‘having done with learning’ (which forms part of the injunctive portion of the passage), as ‘Muni’ and ‘learned man’ both denote knowledge¹. It is, moreover, clear also that the last clause, ‘and after he has done with what constitutes Muniship and non-Muniship (he is) a Brâhmana,’ does not enjoin the condition of a Brâhmana, as that state is previously established (independently of that clause); but the words ‘then a Brâhmana’ are a mere glorificatory anuvâda. Now as the words ‘then a Muni’ show an analogous form of enunciation (to the clause ‘then a Brâhmana’), they also can embody a glorificatory anuvâda only.

¹ The state of a Muni is already enjoined by the clause ‘pāṇḍityam nirvidya’; the clause ‘atha muniḥ,’ therefore, may be viewed as an anuvâda (as which it could not be viewed, if there were no previous injunction of mauna).

To all this we reply as follows. 'There is an injunction of something else which co-operates.' The passage must be understood as enjoining the state of a Muni—which co-operates towards knowledge—in the same way as it enjoins learning and a childlike state, because that state is something new (not enjoined before).—But it has been said above that the word 'learning' already intimates Muniship!—This, we reply, does not invalidate our case since the word 'muni' denotes (not only knowledge as the term 'learned man' does, but) pre-eminence of knowledge, on the ground as well of its etymology from 'manana,' i.e. thinking, as of common use, shown in such phrases as 'I am the Vyāsa of Munis also.'—But the term 'Muni' is also seen to denote the last order of life; cp. passages such as 'Householdership, studentship, the order of Munis, the order of hermits in the woods.'—Yes, but it has not that meaning exclusively, as we see that it does not apply to phrases such as 'Valmīki is the foremost among Munis.' In the passage quoted (about the four orders) the last order is referred to, by the term 'Muni,' because there it stands in proximity to the other orders of life, and, as the state of the Ascetic is the only one which remains (after we have assigned the three other terms to the stages of life clearly denoted by them), the last order may be denoted 'mauna' because knowledge is its principal requirement.—We therefore conclude that in the passage under discussion the state of the Muni—whose characteristic mark is pre-eminence of knowledge—is enjoined as something third—with regard to the childlike state and learning.—Against the objection that the injunction terminates with the childlike state, we remark that all the same we must view the Muniship also as something enjoined, as it is something new, so that we have to supplement the clause as follows: 'then he is to be a Muni.' That the state of a Muni is something to be enjoined, in the same way as the childlike state and learning, also follows from its being referred to as something to be done with (like bālya and pāṇḍitya). It is enjoined 'on him who is such,' i.e. on the Samnyāsin possessing knowledge.—How do we know this latter point?—Because the Samnyâsin who possesses knowledge forms the topic, as we see from the preceding passage, 'Having cognized the Self and risen above the desire for sons, &c., they wander about as mendicants.'—But if the Samnyâsin possesses knowledge, pre-eminence of knowledge is already established thereby; what then is the use of the injunction of Muniship?—To this the Sûtra replies 'in the case of.' That means: in the case of pre-eminence of knowledge not being established owing to the prevailing force of the (erroneous) idea of multiplicity; for that case the injunction (of Muniship, i.e. of pre-eminence of knowledge) is given. 'As in the case of injunctions and the like.' With reference to sacrifices such as are enjoined in the passage, 'He who is desirous of the heavenly world is to offer the darsapûrna-mâsa-sacrifice,' the aggregate of subordinate members, such as the establishment of the sacred fires, is enjoined as something helpful; similarly in this text whose topic is knowledge and which therefore does not chiefly aim at injunction, Muniship is enjoined as something helpful to knowledge.

As thus the order of the ascetic, as distinguished by a childlike state and so on, is actually established by scripture, for what reason does the Khândogya Upanishad wind up with the householder, viz. in the passage, 'After having received his discharge from his teacher he settles in his own house,' &c.? For by concluding with the householder, scripture manifests special regard for him.—To this doubt the next Sûtra replies.

48. On account of his being all, however, there is winding up with the householder.

The word 'however' is meant to lay stress on the householder's being everything. For the performance of many works belonging to his own âsrama, such as sacrifices and the like, which involve not a little trouble, is enjoined on him by scripture; and at the same time the duties of the other âsramas—such as tenderness for all living creatures, restraint of the senses and so on—are incumbent on him also as far as circumstances allow. There is therefore nothing contradictory in the Khândogya winding up with the householder.

49. On account of there being injunction of the others also, in the same way as of the state of a Muni.

As the state of the Muni (Samnyâsin) and the state of the householder are enjoined in scripture, so also the two other orders, viz. that of the hermit and that of the student. For we have already pointed above to passages such as 'Austerity is the second, and to dwell as a student in the house of a teacher is the third.' As thus the four âśramas are equally taught by scripture, they are to be gone through equally, either in the way of option (between them) or in the way of comprehension (of all of them).—That the Sûtra uses a plural form (of 'the others') when speaking of two orders only, is due to its having regard either to the different sub-classes of those two, or to their different duties.

50. (The passage enjoining bālya means that the ascetic is to live) not manifesting himself; on account of the connexion (thus gained for the passage).

The passage, 'Therefore let a Brāhmaṇa after he has done with learning wish to stand by a childlike state,' speaks of the childlike state as something to be undertaken. Now by the 'childlike state' we have to understand either the nature or the actions of a child. Childhood in so far as it means a period of life cannot be brought about at will, and we therefore must take the 'childlike state' to mean either the behaviour of a child—such as attending to the calls of nature without any respect of place, &c.—or inward purity, i. e. absence of cunning, arrogance, force of the sensual passions, and so on¹.—With regard to the doubt thus arising the pûrvapakshin maintains that by 'childlike being' people more commonly understand behaving, talking, and eating according to one's liking, freely attending to the calls of nature and so on, and that therefore the word is to be understood here also in that sense.—But such free conduct is improper, because sinfulness and so on would follow from it!—Not so, the pûrvapakshin replies; for the Samnyâsin possessing knowledge is, through express scriptural statements, free from all sinfulness thus incurred; just as the sacrificer is declared to be free from the sin he might incur in slaying the sacrificial animal.

¹ I am doubtful as to the true reading in this place. The 'va' of the Calcutta edition (p. 1039, last line) has certainly to be struck

To this we reply that it is not so because the statement of the text may be understood in a different sense. For as long as another rational interpretation of the word 'bâlya' is possible we have no right to adopt an interpretation which involves the assumption of another injunction being rendered futile. Moreover subordinate matters are enjoined with a view to the furtherance of the principal matter, and what here is the principal matter is the endeavour after knowledge which ascetics have to take upon themselves. Now if we accepted the entire conduct of a child as what is enjoined here we could in no way show that the endeavour of knowledge is furthered thereby. We therefore understand by 'bâlya' the special inward state of a child, i. e. absence of strong sensual passions and the like. This the Sûtra expresses by saying 'Not manifesting.' The meaning of the clause under discussion thus is: Let him be free from guile, pride, and so on, not manifesting himself by a display of knowledge, learning, and virtuousness, just as a child whose sensual powers have not yet developed themselves does not strive to make a display of himself before others. For thus the passage gains a connexion with the entire chapter on the ground of co-operating towards the principal matter. In agreement herewith Smṛiti-writers have said, 'He whom nobody knows either out. Some good MSS. read:—*bâla*taritam antargatâ bhâvavirud-dhir aprarûḍhendriyatvam dambhâdirahitatvam vâ.—The 'antar-gatâ' seems to mean the same as the 'ântaraḥ,' p. 1041, ll. 1-2.

as noble or ignoble, as ignorant or learned, as well-conducted or ill-conducted, he is a Brāhmaṇa. Quietly devoted to his duty, let the wise man pass through life unknown; let him step on this earth as if he were blind, unconscious, deaf.' Another similar passage is, 'With hidden nature, hidden conduct,' and so on.

51. In this life also (the origination of knowledge takes place) if there is no obstruction of what is ready at hand; on account of this being seen (in scripture).

Beginning from Sūtra 26 of the present pāda we have discussed the various means of knowledge. We are now to consider whether knowledge—the fruit of those means—when accomplishing itself accomplishes itself only here in this life, or sometimes in the next life only.—The pūrva-pakshin maintains that it accomplishes itself here in this life only. For, he argues, knowledge has for its antecedent the learning of scripture and so on, and nobody applies himself to learning, &c., with the intention that knowledge should result therefrom in the next life only; we rather observe that men begin to learn with a view to knowledge already springing up in this life. And also sacrifices and the like produce knowledge only mediately through learning and so on; for knowledge can be produced (directly) through the means of right knowledge only¹. Hence the origination of knowledge takes place in this life only.—To this we reply, 'The origination of knowledge takes place in this life if there is no obstruction of that which is ready at hand.' That means: When the means of knowledge which is operative is not obstructed by some other work the results of which are just then reaching maturity, knowledge already reaches maturity in this life.

¹ Of which study is one.—Sacrifices indeed may bear their special fruits in the next life only; but in so far as they co-operate towards knowledge they are effective in this life. For their only action in that line is to purify the mind and thus to render it fitter to receive knowledge.

But when such an obstruction takes place, then in the next life. And a work's reaching maturity depends on place, time, and operative cause presenting themselves. Nor is there any binding rule according to which the same time, place, and operative cause which ripen one work should ripen another work also; for there are works the fruits of which are opposed to each other. And scripture also goes only so far as to teach what the fruit of each work is, without teaching the special conditions of place, time, and operative cause. And owing to the specific strength of the means employed the supersensuous power of one work manifests itself (i. e. the fruit of that work realizes itself), while that of another is obstructed thereby and comes to a standstill.

Nor is there any reason why a man should not form, with regard to knowledge, an unspecified intention¹; for we may freely form the intention that knowledge should spring up from us either in this life or in some subsequent life. And knowledge although springing up through the mediation of learning and so on, springs up only in so far as learning destroys the obstacles in the way of knowledge. Thus scripture also declares the difficulty of knowing the Self, 'He of whom many are not even able to hear, whom many even when they hear of him do not comprehend; wonderful is a man when found who is able to teach him; wonderful is he who comprehends him when taught by an able teacher' (Ka. Up. I, 2, 7).—Moreover scripture relates that Vāmadeva already became Brahman in his mother's womb, and thus shows that knowledge may spring up in a later form of existence through means procured in a former one; for a child in the womb cannot possibly procure such means in its present state.

The same is shown by Smṛiti. Vāsudeva being asked by Arguna, 'What will be the fate of him, O Kṛishṇa, who has not reached perfection?' replies, 'None who performs good works undergoes an evil fate;' declares thereupon that such a man reaches the world of the blessed and is, later on, born again in a good family; and finally states just what we at present maintain in the passage beginning, 'There he obtains that knowledge which corresponds to his former bodily existence,' and closing, 'Perfected by many states of existence he then goes the highest way.'—It therefore is an established conclusion that knowledge originates, either in the present or in a future life, in dependence on the evanescence of obstacles.

¹ I. e. there is no reason for the assertion made by the pūrva-pakshin that men form a specified intention only, viz. that knowledge should spring up in this life only.

52. No such definite rule (exists) as to the fruit which is release, on account of the assertions as to that condition, on account of the assertions as to that condition.

We have seen that in the case of persons desirous of release who rely upon the means of knowledge there exists a definite difference of result, in so far as the knowledge resulting springs up either in this life or a future life according to the degree of strength of the means employed. It might now be supposed that there exists a similar definite difference with regard to the fruit characterised as final release, owing to the superior or inferior qualification of the persons knowing.

With reference to this possible doubt the Sûtra now says, 'No such definite rule as to that fruit which is release.' That means: We must not suppose that in the case of that fruit which is release there exists an analogous definite rule of difference.—Why?—'On account of the assertions (by scripture) about that condition.' For all Vedânta-texts assert the state of final release to be of one kind only. The state of final release is nothing but Brahman, and Brahman cannot be connected with different forms since many scriptural passages assert it to have one nature only. Compare e.g. 'It is neither coarse nor fine' (Bri. Up. III, 8, 8); 'That Self is to be described by No, no' (Bri. Up. III, 9, 26); 'Where one sees nothing else' (Kh. Up. VII, 24, 1); 'That immortal Brahman is before' (Mu. Up. II, 2, 11); 'This everything is that Self' (Bri. Up. II, 4, 6);

'This great unborn Self, undecaying, undying, immortal, fearless, is indeed Brahman' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 25); 'When the Self only is all this how should he see another?' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 5, 15).—Moreover the means of knowledge might perhaps, according to their individual strength, impart a higher (or lower) degree to their result, viz. knowledge, but not to the result of knowledge, viz. release; for, as we have explained more than once, release is not something which is to be brought about, but something whose nature is permanently established, and is reached through knowledge. Nor does, in reality, knowledge admit of lower or higher degree; for it is, in its own nature, high only, and would not be knowledge at all if it were low. Although therefore knowledge may differ in so far as it originates after a long or short time, it is impossible that release should be distinguished by a higher or lower degree. And from the absence of difference of knowledge also there follows absence of definite distinction on the part of the result of knowledge (viz. release). The whole case is analogous to that of the results of works. In that knowledge which is the means of release there is no difference as there is between works. In those cognitions, on the other hand, which have the qualified Brahman for its object—such as 'he who consists of mind, whose body is prāṇa'—a difference is possible according to the addition or omission of qualities, and hence there may be a definite distinction of results, just as there is between the results of actions. This is also indicated by the passage, 'according as they meditate on him they become.' But in meditations on Brahman devoid of qualities it is otherwise. Thus Smṛiti also says, 'No higher road is possible for any one; for they speak of inequality only where there are qualities.'—The repetition of the clause 'on account of the assertions as to that condition' indicates the termination of the adhyāya.

FOURTH ADHYĀYA.

FIRST PĀDA.

REVERENCE TO THE HIGHEST SELF!

1. Repetition (of the mental functions of knowing, meditating, &c., is required) on account of the text giving instruction more than once.

The third adhyāya was taken up chiefly with a discussion of the means of knowledge as related to the higher and lower vidyās. In the fourth adhyāya we shall now discuss the fruits of knowledge, and as occasion suggests some other topics also.—In the beginning, however, we shall carry on, in a few adhikaraṇas, a special discussion connected with the means of knowledge. ‘Verily the Self is to be seen, to be heard, to be thought, to be reflected on’ (Bṛi. Up. II, 4, 5); ‘Let a wise Brāhmaṇa after he has discovered him practise wisdom’ (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 21); ‘That it is which we must search out, that it is which we must try to understand’ (Kh. Up. VIII, 7, 1).

Concerning these and similar passages a doubt arises whether the mental action referred to in them is to be performed once only or repeatedly.—Once only, the pūrva vapakshin says; as in the case of the prayāga-offerings and the like. For thereby the purpose of scripture is accomplished; while to practise repetitions not demanded by scripture would be to accomplish what is not the purpose of scripture.—But passages have been quoted which teach repetition ‘it is to be heard, to be thought, to be reflected on,’ &c. !—Let us then repeat exactly as scripture says, i. e. let us hear the Self once, let us think it once, let us reflect on it once, and nothing more. But where scripture teaches something once only—viz. in such passages as ‘He knows,’ ‘Let him meditate,’ &c.—no repetition has to be practised.—To this we reply as follows. Repetition is to be performed because scripture gives repeated instruction. For the repeated instruction contained in passages such as 'He is to be heard, to be thought, to be reflected on' intimates the repetition of the required mental acts.—But the pûrvapakshin has said above that the repetition is to extend exactly to what scripture says and not to go further!—This is wrong, we reply, because all those mental activities have for their end intuition. For hearing and so on when repeated terminate in intuition, and thus subserve a seen purpose, just as the action of beating, &c., terminates in freeing the rice grains from their husks. Moreover also such terms as 'meditating,' 'being devoted to,' and 'reflecting' denote actions in which repetition is implied as a quality. Thus we say in ordinary life that a person 'is devoted' to a teacher or a king if he follows him with a mind steadily set on him; and of a wife whose husband has gone on a journey we say that she thinks of him, only if she steadily remembers him with longing. And (that also 'knowing' implies repetition, follows from the fact that) in the Vedānta-texts the terms 'knowing' and 'meditating' are seen to be used one in the place of the other. In some passages the term 'knowing' is used in the beginning and the term 'meditating' in the end; thus e.g. 'He who knows what he knows is thus spoken of by me,' and 'Teach me, sir, the deity which you meditate on' (Kh. Up. IV, 1, 4; 2, 2). In other places the text at first speaks of 'meditating' and later on of 'knowing'; thus e.g. 'Let a man meditate on mind as Brahman,' and 'He who knows this shines and warms through his celebrity, fame, and glory of countenance' (Kh. Up. III, 18, 1; 6).—From this it follows that repetition has to be practised there also, where the text gives instruction once only. Where, again, the text gives repeated instruction, repeated performance of the mental acts is directly intimated.

2. And on account of an indicatory mark.

An indicatory mark also gives to understand that repetition is required. For, in the section treating of meditation on the udgîtha, the text rejects the meditation on the udgîtha viewed as the sun, because its result is one sun only, and (in the clause 'Do thou resolve his rays,' &c.) enjoins a meditation on his manifold rays as leading to the possession of many suns (Kh. Up. I, 5, 1; 2); which shows that the repetition of meditations is something well known. Now as other meditations are meditations no less than the one referred to, it follows that repetition holds good for all of them.

Here the following objection may be raised. With regard to those meditations whose fruit is something to be effected repetition may hold good, because thereby superior strength may be imparted to them. But of what use can repetition be with regard to the meditations having for their object the highest Brahman, which present to us Brahman as the universal Self characterised by eternal purity, thought, and freedom? Should it be said that repetition has to be allowed because the knowledge of Brahman being the Self cannot spring up on hearing a text once only, we reply that in that case it will not spring up even when it is heard repeatedly. For if a text such as 'Thou art that' does not originate the true notion of Brahman if heard once, what hope is there that the desired effect should be produced by its repetition?—Perhaps it will be said that a sentence alone is not able to lead to the intuition of a thing; but that a sentence assisted by reasoning may enable us to intuit Brahman as the universal Self. But even in that case repetition would be useless; for the reasoning will lead to the desired intuition even if gone through once only.—Again it will perhaps be said that the sentence and reasoning together effect only a cognition of the generic nature of the object known, not of its specific individual character. When, to exemplify this, a man says that he feels a pain in his heart another person can infer from this statement—and certain accompanying symptoms such as trembling of the limbs—only that there exists a pain in general but is unable to intuit its specific character; all he knows is 'This man suffers a pain.' But what removes ignorance is (not a general knowledge but) the intuitive knowledge of the specific character of something. And repetition serves to produce such knowledge.—This also is not so. For if so much only is done repeatedly even, no specific knowledge can spring up. When a specific character is not cognized through scripture and reasoning being applied once, it will not be cognized through them if applied a hundred times even. Hence whether scripture and reasoning produce specific knowledge or general knowledge, in either case they will do so even if acting once only; and repetition therefore is of no use. Nor can it be laid down as a binding rule that scripture and reasoning, applied once, in no case produce intuitive knowledge; for their effect will after all depend on the various degrees of intelligence of those who wish to learn. Moreover a certain use of repetition may be admitted in the case of worldly things which consist of several parts and possess generic character as well as individual difference; for there the student may grasp by one act of attention one part of the object, and by another act another part; so e.g. in the case of long chapters to be studied. But in order to reach a true knowledge of Brahman whose Self is mere intelligence and which therefore is destitute of generic character as well as specific difference there clearly is no need of repetition.

To this we make the following reply. Repetition would indeed be useless for him who is able to cognize the true nature of Brahman even if enounced once only in the sentence 'Thou art that.' But he who is not able to do that, for him repetition is of use. For this reason the teacher in the Khândogya, having given instruction in the sentence 'Thou art that, O Svetaketu,' and being again and again asked by his pupil—'Please, sir, inform me still more'—removes his pupil's reasons for doubt, and again and again repeats the instruction 'Thou art that.' We have already given an analogous explanation of the passage 'The Self is to be heard, to be thought, to be reflected upon.'—But has not the pûrvapakshin declared that if the first enunciation of the sentence 'Thou art that' is not able to effect an intuition of its sense, repetition will likewise fail of the desired effect?—This objection, we reply, is without force, because the alleged impossibility is not confirmed by observation. For we observe that men by again and again repeating a sentence which they, on the first hearing, had understood imperfectly only, gradually rid themselves of all misconceptions and arrive at a full understanding of the true sense.—Moreover the sentence ‘Thou art that’ teaches that what is denoted by the term ‘thou’ is identical with what is denoted by ‘that.’ Now the latter term denotes the subject of the entire section, viz. the thinking Brahman which is the cause of the origin and so on of the world; which is known from other passages such as ‘Brahman which is true knowledge, infinite’ (Taitt. Up. II, 1); ‘Brahman that is knowledge and bliss’ (Bri. Up. III, 9, 28); ‘That Brahman is unseen, but seeing; unknown, but knowing’ (Bri. Up. III, 8, 11); ‘not produced’ (Mu. Up. II, 1, 2); ‘not subject to old age, not subject to death’ (Bri. Up. IV, 4, 25); ‘not coarse, not fine; not short, not long’ (Bri. Up. III, 8, 8). In these passages terms such as ‘not produced’ deny the different phases of existence such as origination; such terms as ‘not coarse’ deny of it the qualities of substances such as coarseness; and such terms as ‘knowledge’ declare that the luminousness of intelligence constitutes its nature. The entity thus described—which is free from all the qualities of transmigratory existence, has consciousness for its Self and is called Brahman—is known, by all students of the Vedânta, as what is denoted by the term ‘that.’ They likewise know that what is denoted by the term ‘thou’ is the inward Self (pratyagâtman); which is the agent in seeing and hearing, is (successively) apprehended as the inward Self of all the outward involucra beginning with the gross body (cp. Taitt. Up.), and finally ascertained as of the nature of intelligence. Now in the case of those persons for whom the meaning of these two terms is obstructed by ignorance, doubt, and misconception, the sentence ‘Thou art that’ cannot produce a right knowledge of its sense, since the knowledge of the sense of a sentence presupposes the knowledge of the sense of the words; for them therefore the repetition of the scriptural text and of reasoning must be assumed to have a purpose, viz. the discernment of the true sense of the words.—And although the object to be known, viz. the Self, does not consist of parts, yet men wrongly superimpose upon it the attribute of being made up of many parts, such as the body, the senses, the manas, the buddhi, the objects of the senses, the sensations, and so on. Now by one act of attention we may discard one of these parts, and by another act of attention another part; so that a successively progressing cognition may very well take place. This however is merely an antecedent of the (true) knowledge of the Self (in which there can be no successive stages).

Those quick-witted persons, on the other hand, in whose mind the sense of the words is not obstructed by ignorance, doubt, and misconception, are able to intuit the sense of the sentence 'Thou art that' on its first enunciation even, and for them therefore repetition is not required. For the knowledge of the Self having once sprung up discards all ignorance; so that in this case no progressive process of cognition can be acknowledged.—All this might be so—an objection is raised—if cognition did spring up in any mind in the way described. (But this is not the case); for the cognition of the Self being subject to pain and so on has such strength that nobody ever reaches the cognition of all absence of pain and so on.—This objection, we reply, is without force; for it can be shown that the conceit of the Self being subject to pain, &c., is a wrong conceit, no less than the conceit of the body being the Self. For we clearly observe that when the body is cut or burned a wrong notion springs up, 'I am being cut,' 'I am being burned;' and similarly we observe that when sons, friends, &c.—who are even more external to the Self than one's own body—suffer affliction, that affliction is wrongly attributed to the Self. Analogous to these cases is the conceit of the Self being subject to pain, &c.; for like the body and so on, the condition of being subject to pain is observed as something external to intelligence. This moreover follows from its not being continued in such states as dreamless sleep and the like; while scripture expressly declares that in deep sleep intelligence suffers no interruption, 'And when there he does not see, yet he is seeing,' &c. (Bri. Up. IV, 3, 22). Hence the intuition of the Self consists in the knowledge, 'My Self is pure intelligence free from all pain.' For him who possesses that knowledge there remains no other work. Thus scripture says, 'What shall we do with offspring, we who have this Self and this world' (Bri. Up. IV, 4, 22). And Smṛiti also says, 'But that man who loves the Self, is satisfied by the Self and has all his longings stilled by the Self only, for him there is no further work' (Bha. Gîtâ III, 12).—For him, on the other hand, who does not reach that intuition all at once, we admit repetition, in order that the desired intuition may be brought about. He also, however, must not be moved towards repetition in such a way as to make him lose the true sense of the teaching, 'Thou art that.' In the mind of one on whom repetition is enjoined as a duty, there arise infallibly notions opposed to the true notion of Brahman, such as 'I have a claim on this (knowledge of the Self) as an agent; this is to be done by me¹.' But if a learner, naturally slow-minded, is about altogether to dismiss from his mind the purport of the sentence, because it does not reveal itself to him, it is permissible to fortify him in the understanding of that sense by means of reasoning on the texts relative to repetition and so on.—All this establishes the conclusion that, also in the case of cognitions of the highest Brahman, the instruction leading to such cognition may be repeated.

3. But as the Self (scriptural texts) acknowledge and make us comprehend (the Lord).

The Sûtrakâra now considers the question whether the highest Self whose characteristics scripture declares is to be understood as the 'I' or as different from me.—But how can a doubt arise, considering that scripture exhibits the term 'Self' whose sphere is the inward Self?—This term 'Self'—a reply may be given—may be taken in its primary sense, provided it be possible to view the individual soul and the Lord as non-different; but in the other case the term has to be taken in a secondary (metaphorical) sense only¹.

¹ Care must be taken not to engender in the mind of such a learner the notion that the repeated acts of reflection are incumbent on him as a duty; for such notions would only obstruct the end aimed at, i. e. the intuition that the Self of the meditating man is identical with Brahman's Self, to which no notions of duty or action apply.

The pûrvapakshin maintains that the term 'Self' is not to be taken as meaning the 'I.' For that which possesses the qualities of being free from all evil, &c., cannot be understood as possessing qualities of a contrary nature, nor can that which possesses those contrary qualities be understood as being free from all evil and so on. But the highest Lord possesses the qualities of being free from all evil, &c., and the embodied Self is characterised by qualities of a contrary nature.—Moreover, if the transmigrating soul constituted the Self of the Lord, it would follow that he is no Lord, and thus scripture would lose its meaning; while, if the Lord constituted the Self of the individual soul, the latter would not be entitled (to works and knowledge), and scripture would thus also lose its meaning. The latter assumption would moreover run counter to perception and the other means of proof.—Should it be said that, although the Lord and the soul are different, they yet must be contemplated as identical, on the basis of scripture, just as Vishṇu and other divinities are contemplated in images and so on; the answer is that this contemplation may take place, but that therefrom we must not conclude that the Lord is the real Self of the transmigrating soul.

To all this we make the following reply. The highest Lord must be understood as the Self. For in a chapter treating of the highest Lord the Gābālas acknowledge him to be the Self, 'Thou indeed I am, O holy divinity; I indeed thou art, O divinity!'—In the same light other

¹ And in that case the identity of the highest Self and the 'I' would not follow from the term 'Self.'

texts have to be viewed, which also acknowledge the Lord as the Self, such as 'I am Brahman' (Bri. Up. I, 4, 10). Moreover certain Vedânta-texts make us comprehend the Lord as the Self, 'Thy Self is this which is within all' (Bri. Up. III, 4, 1); 'He is thy Self, the ruler within, the immortal' (Bri. Up. III, 7, 3); 'That is the True, that is the Self, thou art that' (Kh. Up. VI, 8, 7).—Nor can we admit the truth of the assertion, made by the pûrvapakshin, that all these passages teach merely a contemplation (of the Lord) in certain symbols, analogous to the contemplation of Vishnu in an image. For that would firstly involve that the texts have not to be understood in their primary sense¹; and in the second place there is a difference of syntactical form. For where scripture intends the contemplation of something in a symbol, it conveys its meaning through a single enunciation such as 'Brahman is Mind' (Kh. Up. III, 18, 1), or 'Brahman is Âditya' (Kh. Up. III, 19, 1). But in the passage quoted above, scripture says, 'I am Thou and thou art I.' As here the form of expression differs from that of texts teaching the contemplation of symbols, the passage must be understood as teaching non-difference. This moreover follows from the express prohibition of the view of difference which a number of scriptural texts convey. Compare e.g. 'Now if a man worships another deity, thinking the deity is one and he another, he does not know' (Bri. Up. I, 4, 10); 'From death to death goes he who here perceives any diversity' (Bri. Up. IV, 4, 19); 'Whosoever looks for anything elsewhere than in the Self is abandoned by everything' (Bri. Up. II, 4, 6).—Nor is there any force in the objection that things with contrary qualities cannot be identical; for this opposition of qualities can be shown to be false.—Nor is it true that from our doctrine it would follow that the Lord is not a Lord. For in these matters scripture alone is authoritative, and we, moreover, do not at all admit that scripture teaches the Lord to be the Self of the transmi-grating soul, but maintain that by denying the transmigrating character of the soul it aims at teaching that the soul is the Self of the Lord. From this it follows that the non-dual Lord is free from all evil qualities, and that to ascribe to him contrary qualities is an error.—Nor is it true that the doctrine of identity would imply that nobody is entitled to works, &c., and is contrary to perception and so on. For we admit that before true knowledge springs up, the soul is implicated in the transmigratory state, and that this state constitutes the sphere of the operation of perception and so on. On the other hand texts such as ‘But when the Self only has become all this, how should he see another?’ &c., teach that as soon as true knowledge springs up, perception, &c., are no longer valid.—Nor do we mind your objecting that if perception, &c., cease to be valid, scripture itself ceases to be so; for this conclusion is just what we assume. For on the ground of the text, ‘Then a father is not a father’ up to ‘Then the Vedas are not Vedas’ (Bri. Up. IV, 3, 22), we ourselves assume that when knowledge springs up scripture ceases to be valid.—And should you ask who then is characterised by the absence of true knowledge, we reply: You yourself who ask this question!—And if you retort, ‘But I am the Lord as declared by scripture,’ we reply, ‘Very well, if you have arrived at that knowledge, then there is nobody who does not possess such knowledge.’—This also disposes of the objection, urged by some, that a system of non-duality cannot be established because the Self is affected with duality by Nescience.

¹ And this is objectionable as long as it has not been demonstrated that the primary meaning is altogether inadmissible.

Hence we must fix our minds on the Lord as being the Self.

4. Not in the symbol (is the Self to be contemplated); for he (the meditating person) (may) not (view symbols as being the Self).

‘Let a man meditate on mind as Brahman; this is said with reference to the body. Let a man meditate on ether as Brahman; this is said with reference to the Devas’ (Kh. Up. III, 18, 1); ‘Āditya is Brahman, this is the doctrine’

(Kk. Up. III, 19, 1); 'He who meditates on name as Brahman' (Kk. Up. VII, 1, 5). With regard to these and similar meditations on symbols a doubt arises whether the Self is to be apprehended in them also, or not.

The pûrvapakshin maintains that it is right to apprehend the Self in them also because Brahman is known from scriptural passages as the (universal) Self. For those symbols also are of the nature of Brahman in so far as they are effects of it, and therefore are of the nature of the Self as well.

We must not, our reply runs, attach to symbols the idea of Brahman. For he, i.e. the meditating person, cannot comprehend the heterogeneous symbols as being of the nature of the Self.—Nor is it true that the symbols are of the nature of the Self, because as being effects of Brahman they are of the nature of Brahman; for (from their being of the nature of Brahman) there results the non-existence of (them as) symbols. For the aggregate of names and so on can be viewed as of the nature of Brahman only in so far as the individual character of those effects of Brahman is sublated; and when that character is sublated how then can they be viewed as symbols, and how can the Self be apprehended in them? Nor does it follow from the fact of Brahman being the Self that a contemplation of the Self can be established on the ground of texts teaching a contemplation on Brahman (in certain symbols), since a contemplation of the latter kind does not do away with agentship and the like. For the instruction that Brahman is the Self depends on the doing away with agentship and all other characteristics of transmigratory existence; the injunction of meditations, on the other hand, depends on the non-removal of those characteristics. Hence we cannot establish the apprehension of the Self (in the symbols) on the ground of the meditating person being the same as the symbols. For golden ornaments and figures made of gold are not identical with each other, but only in so far as gold constitutes the Self of both. And that from that oneness (of symbol and meditating person) which depends on Brahman being the Self of all there results non-existence of the symbols (and hence impossibility of the meditations enjoined), we have explained above.—For these reasons the Self is not contemplated in symbols.

5. A contemplation of Brahman (is to be superinduced on symbols of Brahman), on account of the exaltation (thereby bestowed on the symbols).

With regard to the texts quoted above there arises another doubt, viz. whether the contemplation of Āditya and so on is to be superimposed on Brahman, or the contemplation of Brahman on Āditya and so on¹.—But whence does this doubt arise?—From the absence of a decisive reason, owing to the grammatical co-ordination. For we observe in the sentences quoted a co-ordination of the term 'Brahman' with the terms 'Āditya,' &c. 'Āditya is Brahman,' 'Prāṇa is Brahman,' 'Lightning is Brahman ;' the text exhibiting the two members of each clause in the same case. And here there is no obvious occasion for co-ordination because the words 'Brahman' on the one hand, and 'Āditya' and so on on the other hand, denote different things; not any more than there exists a relation of co-ordination which could be expressed by the sentence 'The ox is a horse.'—But cannot Brahman and Āditya and so on be viewed as co-ordinated on the basis of the relation connecting a causal substance and its effects, analogously to the case of clay and earthen vessels?—By no means, we reply. For in that case dissolution of the effect would result from its co-ordination with the causal substance, and that—as we have already explained—would imply non-existence of the symbol. Moreover, the scriptural passages would then be statements about the highest Self, and thereby the qualification for meditations would be sublated²; and further the mention of a limited effect would be purposeless³. It follows herefrom that we have ¹ I. e. whether Brahman is to be meditated upon as Āditya, or Āditya as Brahman.

² While, as a matter of fact, scripture enjoins the meditations.

³ It would serve no purpose to refer to limited things, such as to do here with the superimposition of the contemplation of one thing on another thing—just as in the case of the text, ‘The Brâhmana is Agni Vaisvânara,’—and the doubt therefore arises the contemplation of which of the two things is to be superimposed on the other.

The pûrvapakshin maintains that there exists no fixed rule for this case, because we have no scriptural text establishing such a rule.—Or else, he says, contemplations on Âditya and so on are exclusively to be superimposed on Brahman. For in this way Brahman is meditated upon by means of contemplations on Âditya, and scripture decides that meditations on Brahman are what is productive of fruits. Hence contemplations on Brahman are not to be superimposed on Âditya and so on.

To this we make the following reply. The contemplation on Brahman is exclusively to be superimposed on Âditya and so on.—Why?—‘On account of exaltation.’ For thus Âditya and so on are viewed in an exalted way, the contemplation of something higher than they being superimposed on them. Thereby we also comply with a secular rule, viz. the one enjoining that the idea of something higher is to be superimposed upon something lower, as when we view—and speak of—the king’s charioteer as a king. This rule must be observed in worldly matters, because to act contrary to it would be disadvantageous; for should we view a king as a charioteer, we should thereby lower him, and that would be no ways beneficial.—But, an objection is raised, as the whole matter rests on scriptural authority, the suspicion of any disadvantage cannot arise; and it is, further, not appropriate to define contemplations based on scripture by secular rules!—That might be so, we reply, if the sense of scripture were fully ascertained; but as it is liable to doubt, there is no objection to our having recourse to a secular rule whereby to ascertain it. And as by means of that rule we decide that what scripture means the sun and so on, as being resolved into their causal substance, i.e. Brahman. True knowledge is concerned only with the resolution of the entire world of effects into Brahman.

is the superimposition of a higher contemplation on something lower, we should incur loss by superimposing a lower contemplation upon something higher.—As moreover in the passages under discussion the words 'Āditya' and so on stand first, they must, this being not contradictory, be taken in their primary sense. But, as our thought is thus defined by these words taken in their true literal sense, the word 'Brahman,' which supervenes later on, cannot be co-ordinated with them if it also be taken in its true literal sense, and from this it follows that the purport of the passages can only be to enjoin contemplations on Brahman (superinduced on Āditya and so on).—The same sense follows from the circumstance that the word 'Brahman' is, in all the passages under discussion, followed by the word 'iti,' 'thus¹.' 'He is to meditate (on Āditya, &c.) as Brahman.' The words 'Āditya' and so on, on the other hand, the text exhibits without any such addition. The passages therefore are clearly analogous to such sentences as 'He views the mother o' pearl as silver,' in which the word 'mother o' pearl' denotes mother o' pearl pure and simple, while the word 'silver' denotes, by implication, the idea of silver; for the person in question merely thinks 'this is silver' while there is no real silver. Thus our passages also mean, 'He is to view Āditya and so on as Brahman.'—The complementary clauses, moreover, which belong to the passages under discussion ('He who knowing this meditates (upon) Āditya as Brahman;,' 'Who meditates (on) speech as Brahman;,' 'Who meditates (on) will as Brahman'), exhibit the words 'Āditya' and so on in the accusative case, and thereby show them to be the direct objects of the action of meditation².—Against the remark that in all the mentioned cases Brahman only has to be meditated upon in order that a fruit may result from the meditation, we point out that from the mode of proof used above we infer that (not Brahman but) only Âditya and so on have to be meditated upon. But as in the case of hospitality shown to guests, Brahman, that is the supreme ruler of all, will give the fruit of meditations on Âditya and so on as well. This we have already shown under III, 2, 28. And, after all, Brahman also is meditated upon (in the cases under discussion) in so far as a contemplation on Brahman is superinduced on its symbols, analogously as a contemplation on Vishnu is superinduced on his images.

¹ Which in the translations given above of the texts under discussion is mostly rendered by 'as' before the words concerned.

² While the word 'Brahman' does not stand in the accusative case.

6. And the ideas of Âditya and so on (are to be superimposed) on the members (of the sacrificial action); owing to the effectuation (of the result of the sacrifice).

‘He who burns up these, let a man meditate upon him as udgîtha’ (Kh. Up. I, 3, 1); ‘Let a man meditate on the fivefold Sâman in the worlds’ (Kh. Up. II, 2, 1); ‘Let a man meditate on the sevenfold Sâman in speech’ (Kh. Up. II, 8, 1); ‘This earth is the Rik, fire is Sâman’ (Kh. Up. I, 6, 1).—With regard to these and similar meditations limited to members of sacrificial action, there arises a doubt whether the text enjoins contemplations on the udgîtha and so on superinduced on Âditya and so on, or else contemplations on Âditya, &c., superinduced on the udgîtha and so on.

No definite rule can here be established, the pûrvapakshin maintains, since there is no basis for such a rule. For in the present case we are unable to ascertain any special pre-eminence, while we were able to do so in the case of Brahman. Of Brahman, which is the cause of the whole world and free from all evil and so on, we can assert definitively that it is superior to Âditya and so on; the udgîtha and so on, on the other hand, are equally mere effects, and we cannot therefore with certainty ascribe to any of them any pre-eminence.—Or else we may decide that the ideas of the udgîtha and so on are to be superinduced exclusively on Âditya and so on. For the udgîtha and so on are of the nature of sacrificial work, and as it is known that the fruit is attained through the work, Âditya and so on if meditated upon as udgītha and so on will themselves become of the nature of work and thereby be causes of fruit.—Moreover, the text, ‘This earth is the Rik, the fire is the Sāman,’ is followed by the complementary passage, ‘this Sāman is placed upon this Rik,’ where the word ‘Rik’ denotes the earth and the word ‘Sāman’ the fire. Now this (viz. this calling the earth ‘Rik’ and calling the fire ‘Sāman’) is possible only if the meaning of the passage is that the earth and the fire have to be viewed as Rik and Sāman; not if the Rik and the Sāman were to be contemplated as earth and fire. For the term ‘king’ is metaphorically applied to the charioteer—and not the term ‘charioteer’ to the king—the reason being that the charioteer may be viewed as a king.—Again in the text, ‘Let a man meditate upon the fivefold Sāman in the worlds,’ the use of the locative case ‘in the worlds’ intimates that the meditation on the Sāman is to be superimposed on the worlds as its locus. This is also proved by the analogous passage, ‘This Gāyatra Sāman is woven on the vital airs’ (Kh. Up. II, 11, 1).—Moreover (as proved before), in passages such as ‘Āditya is Brahman, this is the instruction,’ Brahman, which is mentioned last, is superimposed on Āditya, which is mentioned first. In the same way the earth, &c., are mentioned first, and the hīnkāra, &c., mentioned last in passages such as ‘The earth is the hīnkāra’ (Kh. Up. II, 2, 1).—For all these reasons the idea of members of sacrificial action has to be transferred to Āditya and so on, which are not such members.

To this we make the following reply. The ideas of Āditya and so on are exclusively to be transferred to members of sacrificial action, such as the udgītha and so on. For what reason?—‘On account of effectuation’—that means: Because thus, through their connexion with the supersensuous result (of the sacrificial work under discussion), when the udgītha and so on are ceremonially qualified by being viewed as Āditya and so on, the sacrificial work is successful¹. A scriptural passage—viz. Kh.

¹ Certain constituent members of the sacrificial action—such as

Up. I, 1, 10, 'Whatever one performs with knowledge, faith, and the Upanishad is more powerful'—moreover expressly declares that knowledge causes the success of sacrificial work.—Well then, an objection is raised, let this be admitted with regard to those meditations which have for their result the success of certain works; but how is it with meditations that have independent fruits of their own? Of this latter nature is e.g. the meditation referred to in Kh. Up. II, 2, 3, 'He who knowing this meditates on the fivefold Sâman in the worlds (to him belong the worlds in an ascending and a descending scale).—In those cases also, we reply, the meditation falls within the sphere of a person entitled to the performance of a certain work, and therefore it is proper to assume that it has a fruit only through its connexion with the supersensuous result of the work under the heading of which it is mentioned; the case being analogous to that of the godohana-vessel¹.—And as Âditya and so on are of the nature of fruits of action, they may be viewed as superior to the udgîtha and so on which are of the nature of action only. Scriptural texts expressly teach that the reaching of Âditya (the sun) and so on constitutes the fruit of certain works.—Moreover the initial passages, 'Let a man meditate on the syllable Om as the udgîtha,' and 'Of this syllable the full account is this' (Kh. Up. I, 1, 1), represent the udgîtha only as the object of meditation, and only after that the the udgîtha—undergo a certain ceremonial purification (sam-skâra) by being meditated upon as Âditya and so on. The meditations therefore contribute, through the mediation of the constituent members, towards the apûrva, the supersensuous result of the entire sacrifice.

¹ The sacred text promises a special fruit for the employment of the milking-pail (instead of the ordinary kamasa), viz. the obtainment of cattle; nevertheless that fruit is obtained only in so far as the godohana subserves the accomplishment of the apûrva of the sacrifice. Analogously those meditations on members of sacrificial works for which the text promises a separate fruit obtain that fruit only in so far as they effect a mysterious sam-skâra in those members, and thereby subserve the apûrva of the sacrifice.

text enjoins the contemplations on Āditya and so on.—Nor can we accept the remark that Āditya and so on being meditated upon as udgītha, &c., assume thereby the nature of work and thus will be productive of fruit. For pious meditation is in itself of the nature of work, and thus capable of producing a result. And if the udgītha and so on are meditated upon as Āditya, &c., they do not therefore cease to be of the nature of work.—In the passage, ‘This Sâman is placed upon this Rik,’ the words ‘Rik’ and ‘Sâman’ are employed to denote the earth and Agni by means of implication (lakṣhaṇā), and implication may be based, according to opportunity, either on a less or more remote connexion of sense. Although, therefore, the intention of the passage is to enjoin the contemplation of the Rik and the Sâman as earth and Agni, yet—as the Rik and the Sâman are mentioned separately and as the earth and Agni are mentioned close by—we decide that, on the ground of their connexion with the Rik and Sâman, the words ‘Rik’ and ‘Sâman’ are employed to denote them (i. e. earth and Agni) only. For we also cannot altogether deny that the word ‘charioteer’ may, for some reason or other, metaphorically denote a king.—Moreover the position of the words in the clause, ‘Just this (earth) is Rik,’ declares that the Rik is of the nature of earth; while if the text wanted to declare that the earth is of the nature of Rik, the words would be arranged as follows, ‘this earth is just Rik.’—Moreover the concluding clause, ‘He who knowing this sings the Sâman,’ refers only to a cognition based on a subordinate member (of sacrificial action), not to one based on the earth and so on.—Analogously in the passage, ‘Let a man meditate (on) the fivefold Sâman in the worlds,’ the worlds—although enounced in the locative case—have to be superimposed on the Sâman, as the circumstance of the ‘Sâman’ being exhibited in the objective case indicates it to be the object of meditation. For if the worlds are superimposed on the Sâman, the Sâman is meditated upon as the Self of the worlds; while in the opposite case the worlds would be meditated upon as the Self of the Sâman.—The same remark applies to the passage, ‘This Gâyatra Sâman is woven on the prâṇas' (Kh. Up. II, 11, 1).—Where again both members of the sentence are equally exhibited in the objective case, viz. in the passage, 'Let a man meditate on the sevenfold Sâman (as) the sun' (Kh. Up. II, 9, 1), we observe that the introductory passages—viz. 'Meditation on the whole Sâman is good;' 'Thus for the fivefold Sâman;' 'Next for the sevenfold Sâman' (Kh. Up. II, 1, 1; 7, 2; 8, 1)—represent the Sâman only as the object of meditation, and therefrom conclude that Âditya has to be superinduced on it, and not the reverse.—From this very circumstance of the Sâman being the object of meditation, it follows that even in cases where the two members of the sentence have a reverse position—such as 'The earth (is) the hîṅkāra,' &c.—the hîṅkāra, &c., have to be viewed as earth and so on; and not the reverse.—From all this it follows that reflections based on things not forming constituent members of the sacrifice, such as Âditya and so on, are to be superimposed on the udgîtha and the like which are such constituent members.

7. Sitting (a man is to meditate), on account of the possibility.

As meditations connected with members of sacrificial action depend on action, we need not raise the question whether they are to be carried on in a sitting, or any other posture. The same holds good in the case of perfect intuition, since knowledge depends on its object only. With regard to all other meditations, on the other hand, the author of the Sûtras raises the question whether they may be undertaken indifferently by a person standing, sitting, or lying down; or only by a person sitting.

The pûrvapakshin here maintains that as meditation is something mental there can be no restriction as to the attitude of the body.—No, the author of the Sûtras rejoins; 'Sitting' only a man is to meditate.—Why?—'On account of the possibility.' By meditation we understand the lengthened carrying on of an identical train of thought; and of this a man is capable neither when going nor when running, since the act of going and so on tends to distract the mind.

The mind of a standing man, again, is directed on maintaining the body in an erect position, and therefore incapable of reflection on any subtle matter. A man lying down, finally, is unawares overcome by slumber. A sitting person, on the other hand, may easily avoid these several untoward occurrences, and is therefore in a position to carry on meditations.

8. And on account of thoughtfulness.

Moreover also the word 'thoughtfulness' denotes a lengthened carrying on of the same train of ideas. Now 'thoughtfulness' we ascribe to those whose mind is concentrated on one and the same object, while their look is fixed and their limbs move only very slightly. We say e.g. that the crane is thoughtful, or that a wife whose husband has gone on a journey is thoughtful. Now such thoughtfulness is easy for those who sit; and we therefore conclude herefrom also that meditation is the occupation of a sitting person.

9. And with reference to immobility (scripture ascribes thought to the earth, &c.).

Moreover, in the passage 'The earth thinks as it were' scripture ascribes thought to the earth, with regard to its immobility. This also helps us to infer that meditation is the occupation of one who is sitting.

10. And Smṛiti-passages say the same.

Authoritative authors also teach in their Smṛitis that a sitting posture subserves the act of meditation: cp. e.g. Bha. Gītā VI, 11, 'Having made a firm seat for one's self on a pure spot.' For the same reason the Yogasāstra teaches different sitting postures, viz. the so-called lotus position and so on.

11. Where concentration of mind (is possible), there (meditation may be carried on), on account of there being no difference.

A doubt here arises with regard to direction, place, and time, viz. whether any restrictive rules exist or not.—Against the view of those who maintain that such rules exist because we have analogous rules concerning the locality, &c., of Vedic works, the Sâtrakâra remarks that all rules concerning direction, place, and time depend on the aim merely ; that is to say : Let a man meditate at whatever time, in whatever place and facing whatever region, he may with ease manage to concentrate his mind. For while scripture prescribes an easterly direction, the time of forenoon, and a spot sloping towards the east for certain sacrifices, no such specific rules are recorded for meditation, since the requisite concentration may be managed indifferently anywhere.—But, an objection is raised, some passages record such specific rules, as e.g. the following one, ‘Let a man apply himself (to meditation) in a level and clean place, free from pebbles, fire and dust, noises, standing water, and the like, favourable to the mind, not infested by what hurts the eyes, full of caves and shelters’ (Svet. Up. II, 10).—Such particular rules are met with indeed ; but the teacher being friendly-minded says that there is no binding rule as to the particulars mentioned therein. The clause ‘favourable to the mind’ moreover shows that meditation may be carried on wherever concentration of the mind may be attained.

12. Up to death (meditations have to be repeated); for then also it is thus seen in scripture.

The first adhikarâṇa (of the present adhyâya) has established that repetition is to be observed with regard to all meditations. But now a distinction is made. Those meditations which aim at complete knowledge, terminate—in the same way as the beating of the rice grains is terminated by the husks becoming detached from the grains—with their effect being accomplished ; for as soon as the effect, i.e. perfect knowledge, has been obtained, no further effort can be commanded, since scriptural instruction does not apply to him who knows that Brahman—which is not the object of injunction—constitutes his Self. On the other hand a doubt arises whether the devotee is to repeat those meditations which aim at certain forms of exaltation for a certain time only and then may stop ; or whether he is to repeat them again and again as long as he lives.

Here the pûrvapakshin maintains that such meditations are to be carried on for some time only and then to be given up, since this satisfies the demands of those scriptural passages which teach meditations distinguished by repetition.

To this we make the following reply. The devotee is to reiterate those meditations up to his death, since the supersensuous result (of such meditations) is reached by means of the extreme meditation. For such works also as originate a fruit to be enjoyed in a future state of existence presuppose, at the time of death, a creative cognition analogous to the fruit to be produced ; as appears from such passages as, ' Endowed with knowledge (i.e. the conception of the fruit to be obtained) he (i.e. the individual soul) goes after that (viz. the fruit) which is connected with that knowledge' (Bri. Up. IV, 4, 2) ; ' Whatever his thought (at the time of death), with that he goes into Prâna, and the Prâna united with light, together with the individual Self, leads on to the world as conceived (at the moment of death)' (Pr. Up. IV, 2, 10). This also follows from the comparison to the caterpillar (Bri. Up. IV, 4, 3). But the meditations under discussion do not, at the time of death, require any other creative cognition but a repetition of themselves. Such meditations therefore as consist in the creative conception of a fruit to be obtained must be repeated up to the moment of death. Analogously the scriptural text, Sat. Brâ. X, 6, 3, 1—' With whatever thought he passes away from this world'—declares that the meditation extends up to the time of death. Similarly Smṛiti says, ' Remembering whatever form of being he in the end leaves this body, into that same form he ever passes, assimilated to its being' (Bha. Gîtâ VIII, 6) ; and ' At the time of death with unmoved mind' (Bha. Gîtâ VIII, 10). And that at the moment of death also there remains something to be done, the scriptural passage (Kh. Up. III, 17, 6) also proves, ' Let a man, at the time of death, take refuge with this triad.'

13. On the attainment of this (viz. Brahman) (there take place) the non-clinging and the destruction of later and earlier sins; this being declared (by scripture).

The supplement to the third adhyāya is finished herewith, and an inquiry now begins concerning the fruit of the knowledge of Brahman.—The doubt here presents itself whether, on the attainment of Brahman, sins the results of which are opposed in nature to such attainment are extinguished or not. They cannot possibly be extinguished, the pūrvapakshin maintains, before they have given their results, because the purpose of all works is their result. For we understand from scripture that work possesses the power of producing results; if, therefore, the work would perish without the enjoyment of its result, scripture would thereby be rendered nugatory. Smṛiti also declares that 'works do not perish.'—But from this it would follow that all scriptural instruction regarding expiatory ceremonies is meaningless!—This objection is without force, we reply, because expiatory ceremonies may be viewed as merely due to certain special occurrences; as is the case with the offering enjoined on the occasion of the house (of one who has established the sacred fire-place) being burned¹.—Let us moreover admit that expiatory ceremonies, because enjoined on account of a person being afflicted by some mischief, may be meant to extinguish that mischief. But there is no analogous injunction of the knowledge of Brahman.—But if we do not admit that the works of him who knows Brahman are extinguished, it follows that he must necessarily enjoy the fruits of his works and thus cannot obtain release!—This follows by no means; but in the same way as the results of works, release will take place in due dependence on place, time, and special causes.—For these reasons the obtainment of Brahman does not imply the cessation of (the consequences of) misdeeds.

¹ Scripture enjoins the ishā in question merely on the occasion of the house being burned, not as annulling the mischief done.

To this we make the following reply. On the obtainment of Brahman there take place the non-clinging (to the agent) of the posterior sins and the annihilation of anterior ones.—‘On account of this being declared.’ For in a chapter treating of the knowledge of Brahman scripture expressly declares that future sins which might be presumed to cling to the agent do not cling to him who knows: ‘As water does not cling to a lotus-leaf, so no evil deed clings to him who knows this’ (Kh. Up. IV, 14, 3). Similarly scripture declares the destruction of previously accumulated evil deeds: ‘As the fibres of the Ishikā reed when thrown into the fire are burned, thus all his sins are burned’ (Kh. Up. V, 24, 3). The extinction of works the following passage also declares, ‘The fetter of the heart is broken, all doubts are solved, extinguished are all his works when He has been beheld who is high and low’ (Mu. Up. II, 2, 8).—Nor is there any force in the averment that the assumption of works being extinguished without their fruits having been enjoyed would render scripture futile. For we by no means deny the fruit-producing power of works; this power actually exists; but we maintain that it is counteracted by other causes such as knowledge. Scripture is concerned only with the existence of this power in general, not with its obstruction and non-obstruction. Thus also the Smṛiti passage, ‘For work is not extinguished,’ expresses the general rule; for as fruition of the result is the purpose of work, work is not extinguished without such fruition. But it is assumed that evil deeds are extinguished through expiatory ceremonies and the like, on account of scriptural and Smṛiti passages such as ‘All sins transcends he, the murder of a Brāhmaṇa transcends he who offers the asvamedha-sacrifice and who knows it thus’ (Tai. Samh. V, 3, 12, 1).—Nor is there any truth in the assertion that expiatory ceremonies are due to certain special occurrences (without possessing the power of extinguishing the evil inherent in such occurrences). For as these expiatory acts are enjoined in connexion with evil events, we may assume that they have for their fruit the destruction of such evil, and are therefore not entitled to assume any other fruit. —Against the objection that knowledge is not actually enjoined with reference to the destruction of evil while expiatory acts are so enjoined, we make the following remark. In the case of the meditations on the qualified Brahman there exists such injunction, and the corresponding complementary passages declare that he who possesses such knowledge obtains lordly power and cessation of all sin. Now there is no reason why the passages should not expressly aim at declaring these two things¹, and we therefore conclude that the fruit of those vidyâs is the acquisition of lordly power, preceded by the annulment of all sin. In the case of vidyâs referring to Brahman devoid of qualities we indeed have no corresponding injunction; nevertheless the destruction of all works follows from the cognition that our true Self is not an agent. (With relation to these vidyâs about Brahman as devoid of qualities) the term 'non-clinging' shows that, as far as future works are concerned, he who knows Brahman does not enter at all into the state of agency. And as to works past, although he has entered as it were into that state owing to wrong knowledge, yet those works also are dissolved when, through the power of knowledge, wrong cognition comes to an end; this is conveyed by the term 'destruction.' 'That Brahman whose nature it is to be at all times neither agent nor enjoyer, and which is thus opposed in being to the (soul's) previously established state of agency and enjoyment, that Brahman am I; hence I neither was an agent nor an enjoyer at any previous time, nor am I such at the present time, nor shall I be such at any future time;' this is the cognition of the man who knows Brahman. And in this way only final release is possible; for otherwise, i.e. if the chain of works which have been running on from eternity could not be cut short, release could never take place.—Nor can final release be dependent on locality, time, and special causes, as the fruit of works is; for therefrom it would follow that the fruit of knowledge is non-permanent and cannot be.

¹ I. e. there is no reason to assume that those passages mention the acquisition of lordly power and the cessation of sin merely for the purpose of glorifying the injunction, and not for the purpose of stating the result of our compliance with the injunction.

It therefore is an established conclusion that on attaining Brahman there results the extinction of all sin.

14. Of the other (i. e. good works) also there is, in the same way, non-clinging; but at death.

In the preceding adhyakṣaṇa it has been shown that, according to scriptural statements, all natural sin—which is the cause of the soul's bondage—does, owing to the power of knowledge, either not cling to the soul or undergo destruction. One might now think that works of religious duty which are enjoined by scripture are not opposed to knowledge also founded on scripture. In order to dispel this notion the reasoning of the last adhyakṣaṇa is formally extended to the case under discussion. For him who knows there is 'in the same way,' i. e. as in the case of sin, 'non-clinging' and destruction 'of the other also,' i. e. of good works also; because such works also, as productive of their own results, would be apt to obstruct thereby the result of knowledge. Scripture also—in passages such as 'He overcomes both' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 22)—declares that good works are extinguished no less than evil ones, and the extinction of works which depends on the cognition of the Self not being an agent is the same in the case of good and of evil works, and moreover there is a passage making a general statement without any distinction, viz. 'And his works are extinguished' (Mu. Up. II, 2, 8). And even there where the text mentions evil works only, we must consider good works also to be implied therein, because the results of the latter also are inferior to the result of knowledge. Moreover scripture directly applies the term 'evil works' to good works also, viz. in the passage, Kṛ. Up. VIII, 4, 1, 'Day and night do not pass that bank,' where good works are mentioned together with evil works, and finally the term 'evil' is without any distinction applied to all things mentioned before, 'All evil things turn back from it.'—'But at death.' The word 'but' is meant for emphatical assertion. As it is established that good as well as evil works—which are both causes of bondage—do, owing to the strength of knowledge, on the one hand not cling and on the other hand undergo destruction, there necessarily results final release of him who knows as soon as death takes place.

15. But only those former (works) whose effects have not yet begun (are destroyed by knowledge); because (scripture states) that (i. e. the death of the body) to be the term.

In the two preceding adhikaraṇas it has been proved that good as well as evil works are annihilated through knowledge. We now have to consider the question whether this annihilation extends, without distinction, to those works whose effects have already begun to operate as well as to those whose effects have not yet begun; or only to works of the latter kind.

Here the pûrvapakshin maintains that on the ground of scriptural passages such as 'He thereby overcomes both,' which refer to all works without any distinction, all works whatever must be considered to undergo destruction.

To this we reply, 'But only those whose effects have not begun.' Former works, i. e. works, whether good or evil, which have been accumulated in previous forms of existence as well as in the current form of existence before the origination of knowledge, are destroyed by the attainment of knowledge only if their fruit has not yet begun to operate. Those works, on the other hand, whose effects have begun and whose results have been half enjoyed—i. e. those very works to which there is due the present state of existence in which the knowledge of Brahman arises—are not destroyed by that knowledge. This opinion is founded on the scriptural passage, 'For him there is delay only as long as he is not delivered (from the body)' (Kh. Up. VI, 14, 2), which fixes the death of the body as the term of the attainment of final release. Were it otherwise, i.e. were all works whatever extinguished by knowledge, there would be no reason for the continuance of the current form of existence, and the rise of knowledge would therefore be immediately followed by the state of final release ; in which case scripture would not teach that one has to wait for the death of the body.—But, an objection is raised, the knowledge of the Self being essentially non-active does by its intrinsic power destroy (all) works ; how then should it destroy some only and leave others unaffected ? We certainly have no right to assume that when fire and seeds come into contact the germinative power of some seeds only is destroyed while that of others remains unimpaired !—The origination of knowledge, we reply, cannot take place without dependence on an aggregate of works whose effects have already begun to operate, and when this dependence has once been entered into, we must—as in the case of the potter's wheel—wait until the motion of that which once has begun to move comes to an end, there being nothing to obstruct it in the interim. The knowledge of our Self being essentially non-active destroys all works by means of refuting wrong knowledge ; but wrong knowledge—comparable to the appearance of a double moon—lasts for some time even after it has been refuted, owing to the impression it has made.—Moreover it is not a matter for dispute at all whether the body of him who knows Brahman continues to exist for some time or not. For how can one man contest the fact of another possessing the knowledge of Brahman—vouched for by his heart's conviction—and at the same time continuing to enjoy bodily existence ? This same point is explained in scripture and Smṛiti, where they describe him who stands firm in the highest knowledge.—The final decision therefore is that knowledge effects the destruction of those works only—whether good or evil—whose effects have not yet begun to operate.

16. But the Agnihotra and the like (tend) towards the same effect ; scripture showing this.

The reasoning as to evil deeds has been extended to the non-clinging and destruction of good deeds also. Against a notion which now might present itself, viz. that this extension comprehends all good works alike, the Sûtrakâra remarks, 'But the Agnihotra and so on.'—The word 'but' is meant to set that notion aside. Works of permanent obligation enjoined by the Veda, such as the Agnihotra, tend 'towards the same effect,' i. e. have the same effect as knowledge. For this is declared by texts such as the following one, 'Brâhmanas seek to know him by the study of the Veda, by sacrifices, by gifts' (Bri. Up. IV, 4, 22).—But, an objection is raised, as knowledge and works have different effects, it is impossible that they should have one and the same effect!—It is observed, we reply, that sour milk and poison whose ordinary effects are fever and death have for their effects satisfaction and a flourishing state of the body, if the sour milk is mixed with sugar and the poison taken while certain mantras are recited; in the same way works if joined with knowledge may effect final release.—But final release is something not to be effected at all; how then can you declare it to be the effect of works?—Works, we reply, may subserve final release mediately. For in so far as furthering knowledge, work may be spoken of as an indirect cause of final release. For the same reason the equality of effect spoken of above extends only to works past (at the time when knowledge springs up). Because for him who knows Brahman no future Agnihotras and the like are possible, since the attainment of the Self of Brahman—which Brahman is not subject to injunction—lies outside the sphere of sacred precept. In those meditations, on the other hand, which refer to the qualified Brahman, the Self does not cease to be an agent, and consequently future Agnihotras and the like are not excluded. Such works also—because they have no other effect if undertaken without a view to reward—may be brought into connexion with knowledge.

To what works then, it may be asked, does the statement refer made above about the non-clinging and the destruction, and to what works the following statement made in some Sâkhâ about the application of works, 'His sons enter upon his inheritance, his friends on his good works, his enemies upon his evil works?'—To this question the next Sūtra replies.

17. For (there is) also (a class of good works) other than this, according to some. (There is agreement) of both (teachers) (as to the fate of those works.)

'For also one other than this,' i. e. there is also a class of good works different from works of permanent obligation, viz. those good works which are performed with a view to a fruit. Of those latter works the passage quoted above from some Sākhā ('His friends enter on his good works') teaches the application. And first of those works Sūtra 14 teaches that, in the same way as evil deeds, they do not cling to the doer or else are destroyed. Both teachers, Gaimini as well as Bādarāyana, are agreed that such works, undertaken for the fulfilment of some special wish, do not contribute towards the origination of true knowledge.

18. For (the text) 'whatever he does with knowledge' (intimates that).

In the preceding adhikaraṇa the following conclusion has been established:—Works of permanent obligation such as the Agnihotra, if performed by a person desirous of release with a view to release, lead to the extinction of evil deeds committed, thus become a means of the purification of the mind, and thereby cause the attainment of Brahman, which leads to final release; they therefore operate towards the same effect as the knowledge of Brahman. Now the Agnihotra and similar works are either connected with a special knowledge based on the constituent members of the sacrificial work, or absolute (non-connected with such knowledge). This appears from scriptural texts such as 'He who knowing this sacrifices; he who knowing this makes an offering; he who knowing this recites; he who knowing this sings; therefore let a man make him who knows this his Brahman-priest (Kṛ. Up. IV, 17, 1); therefore both perform the work, he who knows this and he who does not know it' (Kṛ. Up. I, 1, 10).—We have now to consider the question whether only such Agnihotras and so on as are connected with knowledge cause knowledge on the part of him who desires release and thus operate towards the same effect as knowledge; or whether both kinds of works—those connected with knowledge and those not so connected—equally act in that way. The doubt concerning this point arises on the one hand from scriptural passages such as 'That Self they seek to know by sacrifice' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 22), which represent sacrifices and the like, without difference, as auxiliary to the knowledge of the Self; and on the other hand from our observing that a superiority is conceded to Agnihotras, &c., if connected with knowledge.

Here the pûrvapakshin maintains that only such sacrificial works as are connected with knowledge are helpful towards the cognition of the Self, since we understand from various scriptural and Smṛiti passages that works connected with knowledge are superior to those destitute of knowledge; cp. e. g. 'On the very day on which he sacrifices on that day he overcomes death again, he who knows this' (Bṛi. Up. I, 5, 2); and 'Possessor of this knowledge thou wilt cast off the bonds of action;' 'Action is far inferior to concentration of mind' (Bha. Gitā II, 39; 49).

To this the Sûtrakâra replies, 'For what with knowledge only.' It is true that works such as the Agnihotra if joined with knowledge are superior to works destitute of knowledge, in the same way as a Brâhmaṇa possessed of knowledge is superior to one devoid of knowledge. Nevertheless works such as the Agnihotra even if not connected with knowledge are not altogether ineffective; for certain scriptural texts declare that such works are, all of them without any difference, causes of knowledge; so e. g. the passage, 'That Self they seek to know through sacrifices.'—But, as we understand from scripture that works connected with knowledge are superior to those destitute of knowledge, we must suppose that the Agnihotra and the like if unaccompanied by knowledge are inoperative towards the cognition of the Self!—By no means, we reply. The proper assumption is that the Agnihotra and so on, if accompanied by knowledge, possess a greater capability of originating knowledge and therefore are of superior causal efficiency with regard to the cognition of the Self; while the same works if devoid of knowledge possess no such superiority. We cannot, however, admit that the Agnihotra and similar works which scripture, without making any distinction, declares to subserve knowledge (cp. 'they seek to know through sacrifices') should not subserve it. With this our conclusion agrees the scriptural text, 'Whatever he performs with knowledge, faith, and the Upanishad that is more powerful' (Kh. Up. I, 1, 10); for this text—in speaking of the greater power of work joined with knowledge and thus proclaiming the superiority of such work with regard to its effect—intimates thereby that work destitute of knowledge possesses some power towards the same effect. By the 'power' of work we understand its capacity of effecting its purpose. We therefore accept as settled the following conclusion: All works of permanent obligation, such as the Agnihotra—whether joined with or devoid of knowledge—which have been performed before the rise of true knowledge, either in the present state of existence or a former one, by a person desirous of release with a view to release; all such works act, according to their several capacities, as means of the extinction of evil desert which obstructs the attainment of Brahman, and thus become causes of such attainment, subserving the more immediate causes such as the hearing of and reflecting on the sacred texts, faith, meditation, devotion, &c. They therefore operate towards the same effect as the knowledge of Brahman.

19. But having destroyed by fruition the two other (sets of work) he becomes one with Brahman.

It has been shown that all good and evil deeds whose effects have not yet begun are extinguished by the power of knowledge. 'The two others,' on the other hand, i. e. those good and evil works whose effects have begun, a man has at first to exhaust by the fruition of their consequences, and then he becomes one with Brahman. This appears from scriptural passages such as 'For him there is delay so long as he is not delivered (from the body), then he will become one with Brahman' (Kh. Up. VI, 14, 2); and 'Being Brahman he goes to Brahman' (Bri. Up. IV, 4, 6).—But, an objection is raised, even when perfect intuition has risen the practical intuition of multiplicity may continue after the death of the body, just as it continued before death; analogously to the visual appearance of a double moon (which may continue even after it has been cognized as false).—Not so, we reply. After the death of the body there no longer exists any cause for such continuance; while up to death there is such a cause, viz. the extinction of the remainder of works to be enjoyed.—But a new aggregate of works will originate a new fruition!—Not so, we reply; since the seed of all such fruition is destroyed. What, on the death of the body, could originate a new period of fruition, is only a new set of works, and works depend on false knowledge; but such false knowledge is completely destroyed by perfect intuition. When therefore the works whose effects have begun are destroyed, the man who knows necessarily enters into the state of perfect isolation.

SECOND PĀDA.

REVERENCE TO THE HIGHEST SELF!

1. Speech (is merged) in mind, on account of this being seen, and of the scriptural statement.

Being about to describe the path of the gods which leads those who possess the lower kind of knowledge towards the attainment of their reward, the Sūtrakāra begins by explaining, on the basis of scriptural statements, the successive steps by which the soul passes out of the body; for, as will be stated later on, the departure of the soul is the same in the case of him who possesses the (lower) knowledge and of him who is devoid of all knowledge.

About the process of dying we have the following passage, 'When a man departs from hence his speech merges in his mind, his mind in his breath, his breath in fire, fire in the highest deity' (Kh. Up. VI, 6, 1). A doubt here arises whether the passage means to say that speech itself, together with its function, is merged in the mind, or only the function of speech.

The pûrvapakshin maintains that speech itself is merged in the mind. For this explanation only is in agreement with the direct statement of the sacred text, while the other alternative compels us to have recourse to an implied meaning; now wherever direct enunciation and implied meaning are in conflict the preference has to be given to the former, and we therefore maintain that speech itself is merged in the mind.

To this we reply that only the function of speech is merged in the mind.—But how can this interpretation be maintained, considering that the teacher (in the Sūtra) expressly says 'Speech in the mind?'—True, we reply; but later on he says 'There is non-division, according to scriptural statement' (Sūtra 16), and we therefrom conclude that what is meant in the present Sūtra is merely cessation of the function of speech. For if the intention were to express absorption of the thing (i.e. the organ of speech) itself, there would be 'non-division' in all cases, and for what reason then should 'non-division' be specially stated in another case (i.e. in the case of which Sûtra 16 treats)? The meaning therefore is that the different functions are retracted, and that while the function of the mind continues to go on the function of speech is retracted first.—Why so?—'Because this is seen.' It is a matter of observation that while the mind continues to act the function of speech comes to an end; nobody, on the other hand, is able to see that the organ of speech itself, together with its function, is merged in the mind.—But are we not justified in assuming such a merging of speech in the mind, on the ground of scriptural statement?—This is impossible, we reply, since mind is not the causal substance of speech. We are entitled to assume only that a thing is merged in what is its causal substance; a pot e.g. (when destroyed) is merged in clay. But there is no proof whatever for speech originating from mind. On the other hand we observe that functions originate and are retracted even where they do not inhere in causal substances. The function of fire, e.g. which is of the nature of heat, springs from fuel which is of the nature of earth, and it is extinguished in water.—But how do you, on this interpretation, account for the scriptural statement that 'speech is merged in the mind?'—'And on account of the scriptural statement,' the Sûtrakâra replies. The scriptural statement also may be reconciled with our interpretation, in so far as the function and the thing to which the function belongs are viewed as non-different.

2. And for the same reason all (sense-organs) (follow) after (mind).

'Therefore he whose light has gone out comes to a new birth with his senses merged in the mind' (Pr. Up. III, 9); this passage states that all senses without difference are merged in the mind. 'For the same reason,' i.e. because there also as in the case of speech, it is observed that the eye and so on discontinue their functions, while the mind together with its functions persists, and because the organs themselves cannot be absorbed, and because the text admits of that interpretation ; we conclude that the different organs follow after, i. e. are merged in, the mind only as far as their functions are concerned.—As all organs¹ without difference are merged in the mind, the special mention made of speech (in Sūtra 1) must be viewed as made in agreement with the special example referred to by scripture, 'Speech is merged in mind.'

3. That mind (is merged) in breath, owing to the subsequent clause.

It has been shown that the passage, 'Speech is merged in mind,' means a merging of the function only.—A doubt here arises whether the subsequent clause, 'mind in breath,' also means to intimate a merging of the function only or of that to which the function belongs.—The pūrvapakṣin maintains the latter alternative. For that, he says, agrees with scripture, and moreover breath may be viewed as the causal substance of mind. For scripture—'Mind is made of earth, breath of water' (Kh. Up. VI, 6, 5)—states that mind comes from earth and breath from water, and scripture further states that 'Water sent forth earth' (Kh. Up. VI, 2, 4). When mind therefore is merged in breath, it is the same as earth being merged in water ; for mind is earth and breath is water, causal substance and effect being non-different.

To this we reply as follows. 'The subsequent clause' intimates that the mind, after having absorbed within itself the functions of the outer senses, is merged in breath only in the way of its function being so merged. For we observe in the case of persons lying in deep sleep or about to die that, while the function of breath persists, the functions of the mind are stopped. Nor is the mind capable of being itself merged in breath, since breath does not constitute its causal substance.—But it has been shown above that breath is the causal substance of mind !—This is not valid, we reply. For the relation of causality, made out in such an indirect way, does not suffice to show that mind is really merged in breath. Were it so, then mind would also be merged in earth, earth in water, breath in water. Nor is there, on the alternative contemplated, any proof of mind having originated from that water which had passed over into breath.—Mind cannot therefore, in itself, be merged in breath. And that the scriptural statement is satisfied by a mere merging of the function—the function and that to which the function belongs being viewed as identical—has been shown already under the preceding Sûtra.

¹ I. e. the functions of all organs.

4. That (viz. breath) (is merged) in the ruler (i. e. the individual soul), on account of the (statements as to the prâṇas) coming to it and so on.

We have ascertained that a thing which has not originated from another is not itself merged in the latter, but only through its functions. A doubt now arises whether, according to the word of scripture, the function of breath is merged in heat, or in the individual soul which is the ruler of the body and senses.—According to the pûrvapakshin we must conclude that the breath is merged in heat only, since the scriptural statement allows no room for doubt and we are not entitled to assume something not declared by scripture. The breath under discussion persists 'in the ruler,' i. e. the intelligent Self (the individual soul) which possesses nescience, work, and former knowledge as limiting adjuncts; i. e. the function of breath has that soul for its substratum.—Why so?—'On account of (the prâṇas) going towards him,' &c.—Another scriptural passage declares that all prâṇas without any difference go to the soul, 'All the prâṇas go to the Self at the time of death when a man is thus going to expire' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 3, 38). Another passage again specially declares that the prâṇa with its five functions follows the individual soul, 'After him thus departing the prâṇa departs,' and that the other prâṇas follow that prâṇa, 'And after the prâṇa thus departing all the other prâṇas depart' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 2). And the text, 'He is furnished with intelligence' (ibid.), by declaring the individual soul to be of intimately intelligent nature, suggests that in it, viz. the soul, the prāṇa—into which the different organs of knowledge have been merged—has taken its abode.—But scripture also says, ‘The prāṇa (is merged) in heat;’ why then make the addition implied in the doctrine—that breath is merged in the individual soul?—We must make that addition, we reply, because in the process of departure &c. the soul is the chief agent, and because we must pay regard to specifications contained in other scriptural passages also.—How then do you explain the statement, ‘Breath is merged in heat?’—To this question the next Sūtra replies.

5. To the elements (the soul, with prāṇa, goes), on account of the subsequent scriptural clause.

The soul joined by the prāṇa takes up its abode within the subtle elements which accompany heat and form the seed of the (gross) body. This we conclude from the clause, ‘Breath in heat.’—But this passage declares, not that the soul together with the prāṇa takes up its abode in heat, but only that the prāṇa takes up its abode!—No matter, we reply; since the preceding Sūtra intercalates the soul in the interval (between prāṇa and tejas). Of a man who first travels from Srughna to Mathurā and then from Mathurā to Pāṭaliputra, we may say shortly that he travels from Srughna to Pāṭaliputra. The passage under discussion therefore means that the soul together with the prāṇa abides in the elements associated with heat.—But how are you entitled to draw in the other elements also, while the text only speaks of heat?—To this question the next Sūtra replies.

6. Not to one (element) (the soul goes); for both (i. e. scripture and Smṛiti) declare this.

At the time of passing over into another body the individual soul does not abide in the one element of heat only; for we see that the new body consists of various elements. This matter is declared in the question and answer about the waters called man (Kh. Up. V, 3, 3); as explained by us in III, 1, 2.—Scripture and Smṛiti alike teach this doctrine; compare e.g. 'Consisting of earth, water, wind, ether, heat' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 5); and 'The subtle perishable parts of the five (elements) from them all this is produced in due succession' (Manu I, 27).—But is there not another scriptural text—beginning 'Where then is that person?'—which teaches that at the time of the soul attaining a new body, after speech and the other organs have been withdrawn within the soul, work constitutes the soul's abode, 'What those two said, as work they said it; what they praised, as work they praised it' (Bṛi. Up. III, 2, 13)?—That passage, we reply, describes the operation of bondage consisting of the senses and their objects—there called grahas and atigrahas—and therefore work is spoken of as the abode; here on the other hand the elements are said to be the abode because we have to do with the origination of a new body out of the matter of the elements. The expression 'they prayed' moreover intimates only that work occupies the chief place in the process, and does not exclude another abode. The two passages therefore do not contradict each other.

7. And common (to him who knows and him who does not know) (is the departure) up to the beginning of the way; and the immortality (of him who knows) (is relative only) without having burned (nescience and so on).

The question here arises whether the departure of the soul, as described hitherto, is the same in the case of him who knows and him who is destitute of knowledge; or whether there is any difference.—There is a difference, the pūrvapakshin maintains. For the departure as described has for its abode the elements, and this abiding in the elements is for the purpose of a new birth. But he who possesses true knowledge cannot be born again, since scripture declares that 'He who knows reaches immortality.' Hence only he who is devoid of knowledge departs in the way described.—But as that departure is described in chapters treating of knowledge it can belong only to him who knows!—Not so, the pūrvapakshin replies. In the same way as sleep and the like, the departure of the soul is only referred to in the texts as something established elsewhere (not as something to be taught as part of true knowledge). Passages such as ‘When a man sleeps,—is hungry,—is thirsty’ (Kh. Up. VI, 8), although forming part of chapters concerned with true knowledge, mention sleep and so on which are common to all living beings, because they assist the comprehension of the matter to be taught, but do not aim at enjoining them specially for those who know. Analogously the texts about the soul’s departure refer to that departure only in order to teach that ‘that highest deity in which the heat of the dying man is merged, that is the Self, that art thou.’ Now that departure is (in other scriptural passages) specially denied of him who knows; it therefore belongs to him only who does not know.

To this we make the following reply. That departure which is described in the passage, ‘speech is merged in mind,’ &c., must be ‘common’ to him who knows and him who does not know ‘up to the beginning of the way;’ because scripture records no distinction. The soul destitute of true knowledge having taken its abode in the subtle elements which constitute the seed of the body and being impelled by its works, migrates into a new body; while the soul of him who knows passes into the vein, revealed by true knowledge, which is the door of release. In this sense the Sūtra says ‘up to the beginning of the way.’—But he who knows reaches immortality, and immortality does not depend on a change of place; why then should the soul take its abode in the elements or set out on a journey?—That immortality, we reply, is ‘without having burned,’ i. e. for him who, without having altogether burned nescience and the other afflictions, is about to obtain, through the power of the lower knowledge, a relative immortality only, there take place the entering on the way and the abiding in the elements. For without a substratum the prāṇas could not move. There is thus no difficulty.

8. This (aggregate of the elements) (continues to exist) up to the (final absolute) union (with Brahman); on account of the declarations of the samsâra state (made by scripture).

With regard to the final clause, 'Heat in the highest deity,' the force of its connexion with what precedes shows that the meaning is 'the heat of the dying man is—together with the individual soul, the prâna, the aggregate of the organs and the other elements—merged in Brahman.'—We now have to consider of what kind that merging is.—The pûrvapakshin maintains that it is an absolute absorption of the things merged, since it is proved that those things have the highest deity for their causal matter. For it has been established that the deity is the causal substance of all things that have an origin. Hence that passing into the state of non-separation is an absolute one.

To this we reply as follows. Those subtle elements—heat and so on—which constitute the abode of hearing and the other organs persist up to the 'union,' i. e. up to final release from the samsâra, which is caused by perfect knowledge. 'On account of the declarations of the samsâra state' made in passages such as 'Some enter the womb, for embodied existence as organic beings; others go into inorganic matter, according to their work and according to their knowledge' (Ka. Up. II, 5, 7). Otherwise the limiting adjuncts of every soul would, at the time of death, be absorbed and the soul would enter into absolute union with Brahman; which would render all scriptural injunction and scriptural doctrine equally purportless. Moreover bondage, which is due to wrong knowledge, cannot be dissolved but through perfect knowledge. Hence, although Brahman is the causal substance of those elements, they are at the time of death—as in the case of deep sleep and a pralaya of the world—merged in it only in such a way as to continue to exist in a seminal condition.

9. And (heat is) subtle in measure; as this is thus observed.

The elementary matter of heat and the other elements which form the substratum for the soul when passing out of this body, must be subtle in its nature and extent. This follows from the scriptural passages, which declare that it passes out by the veins and so on. Their thinness renders them capable of passing out, and their transparency (permeability) is the cause of their not being stopped by any gross substance. For these reasons they, when passing out of the body, are not perceived by bystanders.

B b 2

10. For this reason (it is) not (destroyed) by the destruction (of the gross body).

On account of this very subtlety the subtle body is not destroyed by what destroys the gross body, viz. burning and the like.

11. And to that same (subtle body) that warmth (belongs), on account of the proof (which observation furnishes).

To that same subtle body belongs the warmth which we perceive in the living body by means of touch. That warmth is not felt in the body after death, while such qualities as form, colour and so on continue to be perceived; it is, on the other hand, observed as long as there is life. From this it follows that the warmth resides in something different from the body as ordinarily known. Scripture also says, 'He is warm if going to live, cold if going to die.'

12. Should you say that on account of the denial (made by scripture) (the soul of him who knows Brahman does not depart); we deny this, (because scripture means to say that the prāṇas do not depart) from the embodied soul.

From the distinction conveyed by the clause, 'and (relative) immortality without having burned' (Sūtra 7), it follows that in the case of absolute immortality being reached there is no going and no departure of the soul from the body.—The idea that for some reason or other a departure of the soul might take place in this latter case also, is precluded by the following scriptural passage, 'But as to the man who does not desire, who, not desiring, freed from desires, is satisfied in his desires, or desires the Self only, of him the vital spirits do not depart,—being Brahman, he goes to Brahman' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 6). From this express denial—forming part of the higher knowledge—it follows that the prâṇas do not pass out of the body of him who knows Brahman.

This conclusion the pûrvapakshin denies. For, he says, the passage quoted does not deny the departure of the prâṇas from the body, but from the embodied (individual) soul.—How is this known?—From the fact that in another Sâkhâ we have (not the sixth, genitive, case 'of him,' but) the fifth, ablative, case 'from him'—'From him the vital spirits do not depart' (Mâdhyandina Sâkhâ). For the sixth case which expresses only relation in general is determined towards some special relation by the fifth case met with in another Sâkhâ. And as the embodied soul which has a claim on exaltation and bliss is the chief topic of the chapter, we construe the words 'from him' to mean not the body but the embodied soul. The sense therefore is 'from that soul when about to depart the prâṇas do not depart, but remain with it.' The soul of him who dies therefore passes out of the body, together with the prâṇas. This view the next Sûtra refutes.

13. For (in the text) of some (the denial of the soul's departure) is clear.

The assertion that also the soul of him who knows Brahman departs from the body, because the denial states the soul (not the body) to be the point of departure, cannot be upheld. For we observe that in the sacred text of some there is a clear denial of a departure, the starting-point of which is the body.—The text meant at first records the question asked by Ârtabhâga, 'When this man dies, do the vital spirits depart from him or not?' then embraces the alternative of non-departure, in the words, No, replied Yâgñavalkya; thereupon—anticipating the objection that a man cannot be dead as long as his vital spirits have not departed—teaches the resolution of the prāṇas in the body 'in that very same place they are merged;' and finally, in confirmation thereof, remarks, 'he swells, he is inflated, inflated the dead man lies.' This last clause states that swelling, &c., affect the subject under discussion, viz. that from which the departure takes place (the 'tasmât' of the former clause), which subject is, in this last clause, referred to by means of the word 'He.' Now swelling and so on can belong to the body only, not to the embodied soul. And owing to its equality thereto¹ also the passages, 'from him the vital spirits do not depart;' 'in that very same place they are resolved,' have to be taken as denying a departure starting from the body, although the chief subject of the passage is the embodied soul. This may be done by the embodied soul and the body being viewed as non-different². In this way we have to explain the passage if read with the fifth case.—If again the passage is read with the sixth case ('of him the vital spirits do not depart'), it must be understood as denying the departure of him who knows, as its purport manifestly is to deny a departure established elsewhere. But what it denies can only be a departure from the body; for what is established (viz. for ordinary men not possessing the highest knowledge) is only the departure (of the soul, &c.) from the body, not the departure (of the prāṇas, &c.) from the embodied soul.—Moreover, after the passage, 'Either through the eye or through the skull or through other places of the body, him thus departing the prāṇa departs after, and after the departing prāṇa all prāṇas depart,' &c., has at length described the departure and transmigration of the soul as belonging to him who does not know, and after the account of him who does not know has been concluded with the words, 'So much for the man who has desires,' the text designates him who knows as 'he who has no desires;' a designation which would be altogether inappropriate if the text wanted to establish departure, &c., for that person also. The passage therefore has to be explained as denying of him who knows the going and departing which are established for him who does not know. For thus only the designation employed by the text has a sense.—And for him who knowing Brahman has become the Self of that omnipresent Brahman, and in whom all desires and works have become extinct, departing and going are not even possible, as there is not any occasion for them. And such texts as 'there he reaches Brahman' (Bri. Up. IV, 4, 7) indicate the absence of all going and departing.

¹ I. e. its belonging to the same chapter and treating of the same subject.

² The two being viewed as non-different, the pronoun (tasmât), which properly denotes the soul, the person, may be used to denote the body.—Abhedopa^kâreṇa dehadehinor dehiparâmarṣinâ sarva-nâmnâ deha eva parâmr̥śha iti. Bhā.

14. And Smṛiti also says that.

In the Mahābhārata also it is said that those who know do not go or depart, 'He who has become the Self of all beings and has a complete intuition of all, at his way the gods themselves are perplexed, seeking for the path of him who has no path.'—But, an objection is raised, other passages speak of men knowing Brahman as going, so e.g. 'Suka the son of Vyāsa being desirous of release travelled to the sphere of the sun; being called by his father who had followed him, he gave an answering shout.'—That passage, we reply, describes (not the effects of the highest knowledge but only) how an embodied person, through the power of Yoga (which is of the nature of the lower knowledge), reached some special place and freed himself from the body. This appears from it being mentioned that he was seen by all beings; for the beings could not see a person moving without a body. The conclusion of the story makes all this clear, 'Suka having moved through the air more rapidly than wind, and having shown his power, was known by all beings.'—It thus follows that he who knows Brahman neither moves nor departs. To what sphere the scriptural texts about going and so on refer we shall explain later on.

15. Those (elements, &c.) (are merged) in the highest Brahman; for thus (scripture) says.

Those, i. e. the sense organs—denoted by the term ‘prāṇa’—and the elements of him who knows the highest Brahman, are merged in that same highest Brahman.—Why?—Because scripture declares that ‘Thus these sixteen parts of the spectator that go towards the person, when they have reached the person, sink into him’ (Pr. Up. VI, 5).—But another text which refers to him who knows teaches that the parts also are merged in something different from the highest Self, ‘The fifteen parts enter into their elements’ (Mu. Up. III, 2, 7).—No, we reply. This latter passage is concerned with the ordinary view of the matter, according to which the parts of the body which consist of earth and so on are merged in their causal substances, earth and so on. The former passage, on the other hand, expresses the view of him who knows; according to which the whole aggregate of the parts of him who knows the highest Brahman is merged in Brahman only.—There is thus no contradiction.

16. (There is absolute) non-division (from Brahman, of the parts merged in it); according to scriptural declaration.

When the parts of him who knows are merged in Brahman, is there a remainder (which is not so merged), as in the case of other men; or is there no such remainder? As the merging of him also who knows falls under the general heading of merging, it might be assumed that of him also there remains a potential body, and the Sūtra-kāra therefore teaches expressly that the elements, &c., of him who knows enter into the relation of (absolute) non-division from Brahman.—On what ground?—Because scripture declares this. For after having taught the dissolution of the parts, the text continues, ‘Their name and form are broken, and people speak of the person only; and he becomes without parts and immortal’ (Pr. Up. VI, 5). And when parts that are due to nescience are dissolved through knowledge it is not possible that a remainder should be left. The parts therefore enter into absolute non-division from Brahman.

17. (There takes place) a lighting up of the point of its (the soul's) abode (viz. the heart); the door (of its egress) being illuminated thereby; owing to the power of knowledge and the application of meditation to the way which is part of that (knowledge); (the soul) favoured by him in the heart (viz. Brahman) (passes upwards) by the one that exceeds a hundred (i. e. by the hundred and first vein).

Having absolved the inquiry into a point of the higher knowledge into which we were led by a special occasion, we now continue the discussion connected with the lower knowledge.—It has been stated that up to the beginning of the way the departure of him who knows and him who does not know is the same. The present Sūtra now describes the soul's entering on the way. The abode of the soul, when—having taken within itself speech and the other powers—it is about to depart, is the heart, according to the text, 'He taking with him those elements of light descends into the heart' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 1). Of the heart the point becomes lighted up, and subsequent to that is the departure of the soul, starting from the eye or some other place, according to the passage, 'The point of his heart becomes lighted up, and by that light the Self departs, either through the eye or through the skull or through other places of the body' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 2). The question here arises whether that departure is the same for him who knows and him who does not know, or if there is a special limitation in the case of the former; and the primâ facie view might be upheld that there is no such limitation since scripture records no difference. Against this the teacher states that although, equally for him who does know and him who does not know, the point of the heart becomes shining and the door of egress thereby is lighted up, yet he who knows departs through the skull only, while the others depart from other places.—Why so? —‘On account of the power of knowledge.’ If also he who knows departed, like all others, from any place of the body, he would be unable to reach an exalted sphere; and then all knowledge would be purportless. ‘And on account of the application of meditation on the way forming a part of that.’ That means: in different vidyās there is enjoined meditation on the soul’s travelling on the way connected with the vein that passes through the skull;—which way forms a part of those vidyās. Now it is proper to conclude that he who meditates on that way should after death proceed on it¹. Hence he who knows, being favoured by Brahman abiding in the heart on which he had meditated, and thus becoming like it in nature departs by the vein which passes through the skull and ‘exceeds the hundred,’ i. e. is the hundred and first. The souls of other men pass out by other veins. For thus scripture says, in a chapter treating of the knowledge of Brahman dwelling in the heart, ‘There are a hundred and one veins of the heart; one of them penetrates the crown of the head; by that moving upwards a man reaches immortality; the others serve for departing in different directions’ (Kh. Up. VIII, 6, 5).

18. (The soul after having passed forth from the body) follows the rays.

There is the vidyā of him within the heart, which begins, ‘There is this city of Brahman and in it the palace, the small lotus, and in it that small ether’ (Kh. Up. VIII, 1, 1). A subsequent section of that chapter—beginning with the words, ‘Now these veins of the heart’—describes at length the connexion of the veins and the rays, and the text then continues, ‘When he departs from this body, he departs upwards by those very rays,’ and further on, ‘By that moving upwards he reaches immortality.' From this we understand that the soul passing out by the hundred and first vein follows the rays.—A doubt here arises as to whether the soul of him who dies by night as well as of him who dies by day follows the rays, or the soul of the latter only.—Since scripture mentions no difference, the Sûtra teaches that the souls follow the rays in both cases.

¹ For otherwise the meditation enjoined would be ‘adrishārtha’ only; an alternative not to be admitted anywhere as long as a ‘seen’ purpose can be demonstrated.

19. (Should it be said that the soul does) not (follow the rays) by night; (we reply) not so, because the connexion (of veins and rays) exists as long as the body; and (scripture) also declares this.

It might perhaps be said that the veins and rays are connected during the day, so that the soul of a person who dies during the day may follow those rays; but not the soul of one who dies by night when the connexion of the veins and rays is broken.—But this is a mistaken assumption, because the connexion of rays and veins lasts as long as the body exists. This scripture also declares, 'They (the rays) stretch out from yonder sun and slip into these veins; they stretch from these veins and slip into yonder sun' (Kh. Up. VIII, 6, 2). We moreover observe that the rays of the sun continue to exist in the nights of the summer season; for we feel their warmth and other effects. During the nights of the other seasons they are difficult to perceive because then few only continue to exist; just as during the cloudy days of the cold season.—This the following scriptural passage also shows, 'Day he makes in the night.'—If, moreover, he who dies at night mounted upwards without following the rays, the following of the rays would be generally meaningless. For the text gives no special direction to the effect that he who dies by day mounts upwards by means of the rays, while he who dies by night mounts without them.—Should, on the other hand, even he who knows be prevented from mounting upwards, by the mere mischance of dying by night, knowledge would in that case produce its fruit eventually only, and the consequence would be that—as the time of death is not fixed—nobody would apply himself to knowledge.—If, again, a man dying at night should wait for the dawn (to mount upwards), it might happen that, owing to the action of the funeral fire, &c., his body would, at the time of daybreak, not be capable of entering into connexion with the rays. Scripture moreover expressly says that he does not wait, ‘As quickly as he sends off the mind he goes to the sun’ (Kh. Up. VIII, 6, 5).—For all these reasons the soul follows the rays by night as well as by day.

20. And for the same reason (the departed soul follows the rays) also during the southern progress of the sun.

For the same reason, viz. because waiting is impossible, and because the fruit of knowledge is not a merely eventual one, and because the time of death is not fixed, also that possessor of true knowledge who dies during the southern progress of the sun obtains the fruit of his knowledge. Because dying during the northern progress of the sun is more excellent, and because Bhīṣma is known to have waited for that period, and because scripture says, ‘From the light half of the month (they go) to the six months when the sun goes to the north,’ it might be thought that the northern progress of the sun is needful for dying. This notion the Sūtra refutes. The greater excellence of the sun’s northern progress applies to those only who do not possess the highest knowledge.—Bhīṣma’s waiting for the sun’s northern progress was due to his wish of upholding good customs and of showing that by the favour of his father he could choose the time of his death.—And the sense of the scriptural passage quoted will be explained under IV, 3, 4.—But we have the following Smṛiti-text, ‘At what times the Yogins depart either not to return or to return, those times I will declare to thee’ (Bha. Gītā VIII, 23), which determines specially that to die by day and so on causes the soul not to return. How then can he who dies by night or during the sun’s southern progress depart not to return? Concerning this point the next Sūtra remarks :

21. (These details) are recorded by Smṛiti with reference to the Yogins; and both (Sāṅkhya and Yoga) are Smṛiti (only).

The rules as to dying by day and so on in order not to return are given by Smṛiti for the Yogins only. And those two, viz. Yoga and Sāṅkhya are mere Smṛiti, not of scriptural character. As thus it has a different sphere of application and is based on a special kind of authority, the Smṛiti rule as to the time of dying has no influence on knowledge based on scripture.—But, an objection is raised, we have such passages as the following one, ‘Fire, light, the day, the light half of the month, the six months of the northern progress; smoke, night, the dark half of the month, the six months of the southern progress’ (Bhā. Gītā VIII, 24; 25); in which though belonging to Smṛiti we recognise the path of the gods and the path of the fathers just as determined by scripture!—Our refutation, we reply, of the claims of Smṛiti applies only to the contradiction which may arise from the teaching of Smṛiti regarding the legitimate time of dying. ‘I will tell you the time,’ &c. In so far as Smṛiti also mentions Agni and the other divinities which lead on the departed soul, there is no contradiction whatever.

THIRD PĀDA.

REVERENCE TO THE HIGHEST SELF !

1. On the road beginning with light (the departed soul proceeds), on account of that being widely known.

It has been explained that up to the beginning of the way, the departure is the same. About the way itself, however, different texts make different declarations. One passage describes it as constituted by the junction of the veins and rays, 'Then he mounts upwards by just those rays' (Kh. Up. VIII, 6, 5). Another passage describes it as beginning with light, 'They go to the light, from light to day' (Kh. Up. V, 10, 1). Another way is described, Kau. Up. I, 3, 'Having reached the path of the gods, he comes to the world of Agni.' Another, Bṛi. Up. V, 10, 1, 'When the person goes away from this world, he comes to the wind.' Another again, Mu. Up. I, 2, 11, 'Free from passions they depart through the gate of the sun.' A doubt here arises whether these ways are different from each other, or whether there is only one road of which the different texts mention different particulars.—The pūrvapakshin embraces the former alternative, for the reason that those roads are referred to in different chapters and form parts of different meditations. If, moreover, we regarded the statements about light and so on, the emphatical assertion¹ made in the first of the passages quoted above would be contradicted; and the statement about the quickness of mounting, 'As quickly as he sends off the mind he goes to the sun,' would also be interfered with. We therefore conclude that the roads described are different roads. To this we reply, 'On the road beginning with light;'

¹ The emphasis lies in the word 'eva,' i.e. 'just' or 'only,' which seems to exclude any stages of the way but those rays.

i.e. we maintain that every one who desires to reach Brahman moves on the road beginning with light.—Why so?—‘On account of its being widely known.’ That road is known to all who possess knowledge. Thus the chapter of the vidyâ of the five fires (‘And those also who in the forest meditate on the True as faith,’ &c., Bri. Up. VI, 2, 15) expressly states that the road beginning with the light belongs to those also who practise other meditations.—That road, an objection is raised, may present itself to the mind in the case of those meditations which do not mention any road of their own; but why should it be accepted for such meditations as mention different roads of their own?—This objection would be valid, we reply, if the various roads mentioned were entirely different; but as a matter of fact there is only one road leading to the world of Brahman and possessing different attributes; and this road is designated in one place by one attribute and in another place by another attribute. For this relation of attributes and what possesses attributes is established by the circumstance that we recognise, in all the passages quoted, some part of the road¹. And if the chapters which mention the roads are different, we, as long as the meditation is one, have to combine the different attributes of the road (mentioned separately in the different chapters), in the same way as (in general) the different particulars of one meditation (which are stated in different chapters) have to be combined. And even if the meditations (in which the particulars of the road are mentioned) are different, the road must be viewed as one and the same, because we recognise everywhere some part of the road and because the goal is everywhere the same. For all the following passages declare one and the same result, viz. the obtainment of the world of Brahman: ‘In these worlds of Brahman they dwell for ever and ever’ (Bri. Up. VI, 2, 15); ‘There he dwells eternal years’ (Bri.

¹ Each passage mentions at least one of the stages of the road leading to the world of Brahman, and we thus conclude that the same road—of which the stations are the attributes—is meant everywhere.

Up. V, 10, 1); 'Whatever victory, whatever greatness belongs to Brahman, that victory he gives, that greatness he reaches' (Kau. Up. I, 2); 'Those who find the world of Brahman by Brahmatārya' (Kh. Up. VIII, 4, 3).—To the remark that the emphatical assertion (made in the passage, 'Just by those rays,' &c.) would be contradicted by our admitting light and so on as stages of the road, we reply that no such difficulty exists, because that passage aims only at establishing the rays (as part of the road). For the one word 'just' cannot at the same time establish the rays and discard light and so on. The passage therefore must be understood as only emphasising the connexion with the rays.—Nor does the regard paid by us to the statements about light and so on being stages of the way contradict what one passage says about speed; for that passage means to say that one goes (to the world of Brahman) more quickly than anywhere else, so that its sense is, 'In the twinkling of an eye one goes there¹.'—Moreover the passage, 'On neither of these two ways' (Kh. Up. V, 10, 8)—in teaching that there is a third inferior road for those who have missed the other two roads—shows that besides the road of the fathers there is only one further road, viz. the road of the gods, of which light and so on are stages. The text about light and so on mentioning a greater number of stages while other texts mention a smaller number, it stands to reason that the less numerous should be explained in conformity with the more numerous. For this reason also the Sūtra says, 'On the road beginning with light, on account of its being widely known.'

2. From the year to Vāyu; on account of the absence and presence of specification.

But by what special combination can we establish between the different attributes of the road the relation of what is determined by attributes and of determining attributes? The teacher out of kindness to us connects them as follows.—The Kaushîtakins describe the road of the gods as follows, ‘Having reached the path of the gods he comes to the world of Agni, to the world of Vāyu, to the world of Varuṇa, to the world of Indra, to the world of Pragâpati, to the world of Brahman’ (Kau. Up. I, 3). Now the world of Agni means the same as light, since both terms denote burning, and we therefore need not, with regard to them, search for the order in which they are to be combined. Vāyu, on the other hand, is not mentioned in the road beginning with light; in what place then is he to be inserted?—We read, Kh. Up. V, 10, 1, ‘They go to the light, from light to day, from day to the waxing half of the moon, from the waxing half of the moon to the six months when the sun goes to the north, from those months to the year, from the year to Âditya.’ Here they reach Vāyu after the year and before Âditya.—Why so?—‘On account of the absence and presence of specification.’ About Vāyu—concerning whom the passage, ‘He goes to the world of Vāyu,’ contains no specification—another passage does state such a specification, viz. Bṛi. Up. V, 10, 1, ‘When the person goes away from this world he comes to Vāyu. Then Vāyu makes room for him like the hole of a wheel, and through it he mounts higher, he comes to Âditya.’ On account of this specification which shows Vāyu to come before Âditya, Vāyu must be inserted between the year and Âditya.—But as there is a specification showing that Vāyu comes after Agni, why is he not inserted after the light?—There is no such specification, we reply.—But a scriptural passage has been quoted which runs as follows, ‘Having reached the path of the gods he comes to the world of Agni, to the world of Vāyu.’—In that passage, we reply, we have only two clauses, of which the text exhibits one before the other, but there is no word expressing order of succession. We have there only a simple statement of facts, ‘He goes to this and to that.’ But in the other text we perceive a regular order of succession; for it intimates that after having mounted on high through an opening as large as the wheel of a chariot, granted by Vāyu, he approaches the sun. The Sūtra therefore rightly says, 'On account of the absence and presence of specification.'—The Vāgasaneyins in their text record that he proceeds 'from the months to the world of the gods, from the world of the gods to the sun' (Bṛi. Up. VI, 2, 15). Here, in order to maintain the immediate succession of Vāyu and Āditya, we must suppose the souls to go from the world of the gods to Vāyu. What the Sūtra says about the soul going to Vāyu from the year has reference to the text of the Khândogya. As between the Vāgasaneyaka and the Khândogya, the world of the gods is absent from one, the year from the other. As both texts are authoritative, both stages have to be inserted in each, and the distinction has to be made that, owing to its connexion with the months, the year has the first place (i.e. after the months and before the world of the gods), and the world of the gods the second place.

¹ Read in the text—tvarāvaṭanam tv arkirādyapekshāyām api gantavyāntarāpekshayā kshaipryārtha°.—Ānandagiri comments—tvareti, arkirādimārgasyaikye=pi kutasid anyato gantavyād anenopāyena satyalokam gaḥ iti gaḥḥantīti gantavyabhedāpekshayā vaṭanam yuktam ity arthaḥ.

3. Beyond lightning (there is) Varuṇa, on account of the connexion (of the two).

The Khândogya continues, 'From Āditya to the moon, from the moon to lightning.' Here Varuṇa (mentioned in the Kaushîtaki-upan.) has to be brought in so that above that lightning he goes to the world of Varuṇa. For there is a connexion between lightning and Varuṇa; the broad lightnings dance forth from the womb of the clouds with the sound of deep thunder, and then water falls down. And a Brāhmaṇa also says, 'It lightens, it thunders, it will rain' (Kh. Up. VII, 11, 1). But the lord of all water is Varuṇa, as known from Sṛuti and Smṛiti.—And above Varuṇa there come Indra and Pragâpati, as there is no other place for them, and according to the force of the text, as it stands. Varuṇa and so on should be inserted at the end, for that reason also that they are merely additional, no particular place being assigned to them. And lightning is the end of the road beginning with light¹.

¹ So that Varuṇa and so on are to be placed after lightning.

4. (They are) conductors, this being indicated.

With regard to those beginning with light a doubt arises whether they are marks of the road, or places of enjoyment, or leaders of the travelling souls.—The first possible view of the question is that light and so on are marks of the road, because the instruction has that character. For as in ordinary life a man wishing to go to a village or a town is told, 'Go from here to that hill, from there to a fig-tree, from that to a river, from that to a village; after that you will reach the town;' so here the text also says, 'from light to day, from day to the waxing half of the month,' &c.—Or else light and so on may be viewed as places of enjoyment. For the text connects Agni and so on with the word 'world'; 'He comes to the world of Agni,' &c. Now the term 'world' is used to denote places of enjoyment of living beings, as when we say, 'The world of men; the world of the Fathers; the world of the gods.' A Brâhmaṇa passage also says, 'They remain attached to the worlds which consist of day and night' (Sat. Brâ. X, 2, 6, 8). Therefore light and the rest are not conductors. Moreover, they cannot be conductors because they are without intelligence. For in ordinary life intelligent men only are appointed by the king to conduct travellers over difficult roads.

To all this we reply as follows. They must be conductors, because the text indicates this. For we read, 'From the moon to the lightning; there a person that is not a man leads them to Brahman;' which shows their conductorship to be something settled. Should it be objected that this last sentence exhausts itself in conveying its own purport¹; we say No; for the attribute ('that is not a man') has only the meaning of excluding his previously established humanity. Only if in the case of the light and the rest personal conductors are settled, and those of human nature, it is appropriate to use the attribute ¹ And has not the additional power of indicating, i.e. enabling us to infer that also the beings previously mentioned are 'leaders' of the soul.

‘amānava,’ to the end of excluding this (previously established) humanity¹.

But mere indication has no force, as there is nothing to prove (that there must be such personal conductors).—To this objection the next Sūtra replies.

5. (There are personal conductors) because that is established on the ground of both (i. e. road and travellers) being bewildered (i. e. unconscious).

As, owing to their separation from a body, the organs of those who go on the road beginning with light are wrapped up, they are incapable of ruling themselves ; and the light &c., as they are without intelligence, are equally incapable. Hence it follows that the particular intelligent deities who represent light and the rest are appointed to the conductorship. For in ordinary life also drunken or senseless people whose sense-organs are wrapped up follow a road as commanded by others.—Again light and the rest cannot be taken for marks of the road because they are not always present. A man who dies in the night cannot come to day in its true (physical) nature ; and he cannot wait (for the break of day), as we have already explained above (IV, 2, 19). But this objection does not apply to gods who are permanent. And gods may be called light and so on, because they represent light and so on. Nor is the expression, ‘From light to day,’ &c. objectionable, even if we adopt the sense of conductorship ; for it means, through the light as cause they come to the day ; through the day as cause, to the waxing half of the moon. And such instruction is seen also in the case of conductors known in ordinary life, for they say, Go hence to Balavarman, thence (i. e. Balavarman conducting you) to Gayasimha, thence to

¹ Why should it be specially stated that this last ‘conducting person’ is amānava? Only, because it is a settled matter that the previously mentioned beings are also ‘conducting persons,’ and at the same time ‘mānava.’ The last clause therefore does not only directly teach that a person conducts the souls to Brahman, but at the same time ‘indicates’ that the beings mentioned before in connexion with the road are also ‘personal conductors.’

Kṛishṇagupta. Moreover, in the beginning where the text says that they go to the light, a relation in general only is expressed, not a special relation ; at the end, however, where it is said he leads them to Brahman, a special relation is expressed, viz. that between conductor and conductor. Therefore this is accepted for the beginning also.—And as the organs of the wandering souls are wrapped up together there is no possibility of their enjoying anything. Although, however, the wanderers do not enjoy anything, the word ‘world’ may be explained on the ground that those worlds are places of enjoyment for other beings dwelling there.—The conclusion therefore is that he who has reached the world of Agni is led on by Agni, and he who has reached the world ruled by Vāyu, by Vāyu.

But how, if we adopt the view of conductorship, can this apply to Varuṇa and the rest? Varuṇa and the rest were inserted above the lightning ; but scripture states that after the lightning until Brahman is reached a person leads who is not a man.—To this doubt the next Sūtra replies.

6. From thence (the souls are led) by him only who belongs to the lightning ; the sacred text stating that.

From thence, i. e. after they have come to the lightning they go to the world of Brahman, being led through the worlds of Varuṇa and the rest by the person, not a man, who follows immediately after the lightning. For that that person leads them is stated in the following passage, ‘When they have reached the place of lightning a person, not a man, leads them to the world of Brahman’ (Bṛi. Up. VI, 2, 15). Varuṇa and the rest, we must understand, favour them either by not hindering or somehow assisting them.—Therefore it is well said that light and so on are the gods who act as conductors.

7. To the effected (Brahman) (the souls are led) ; (thus opines) Bādari ; because going to him is possible.

With regard to the passage, ‘He leads them to Brahman,’ the doubt arises whether that person leads the souls to the effected, lower, Brahman, or to the highest, non-modified, chief Brahman.—Whence the doubt?—Because the (ambiguous) word Brahman is used, and because scripture speaks of going.—The opinion of the teacher Bādari is that the person, who is not a man, leads them to the lower, qualified, effected Brahman; because it is possible to go to that. For the effected Brahman which occupies a definite place can be the goal of a journey. With the highest Brahman, on the other hand, we cannot connect the ideas of one who goes, or object of going, or act of going; for that Brahman is present everywhere and is the inner Self of all.

8. And on account of (the Brahman to which the souls are led) being qualified (in another passage).

That the soul's going has for its object the effected Brahman, we conclude from another scriptural passage also which qualifies Brahman in a certain way, 'He leads them to the worlds of Brahman; in these worlds of Brahman they live for ever and ever' (Bṛi. Up. VI, 2, 15). For it would be impossible to qualify the highest Brahman by means of the plural number ('worlds'); while the plural number may be applied to the lower Brahman which may abide in different conditions.—The term 'world' also can directly denote only some place of enjoyment falling within the sphere of effects and possessing the quality of being entered into, while it must be understood in a metaphorical sense in passages¹ such as 'Brahman is that world' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 23).—And also what the text says concerning an abode and some one abiding within it ('in these worlds of Brahman,' &c.), cannot be directly understood of the highest Brahman.—For all these reasons the leading of the souls has the lower Brahman for its goal.

But even on this interpretation the word 'Brahman' is inappropriate, as it has been proved that Brahman is the cause of the origination and so on of the entire world.—To this objection the next Sûtra replies.

¹ Where the term 'world' is applied to the highest Brahman.

9. But on account of its proximity (to the higher Brahman) there is designation (of the lower Brahman) as that.

The word 'but' indicates the setting aside of the doubt.—As the lower Brahman is in proximity to the higher one, there is nothing unreasonable in the word 'Brahman' being applied to the former also. For when the higher Brahman is, for the purposes of pious meditation, described as possessing certain effected qualities—such as consisting of mind and the rest—which qualities depend on its connexion with certain pure limiting adjuncts; then it is what we call the lower Brahman.—But with the assumption of the lower Brahman there does not agree what scripture says about the souls not returning; for there is no permanence anywhere apart from the highest Brahman. And scripture declares that those who have set out on the road of the gods do not return, 'They who proceed on that path do not return to the life of man' (Kh. Up. IV, 15, 6); 'For them there is no return here' (Bri. Up. VI, 2, 15); 'Moving upwards by that a man reaches immortality' (Kh. Up. VIII, 6, 5).

To this objection we make the following reply.

10. On the passing away of the effected (world of Brahman) (the souls go) together with the ruler of that (world) to what is higher than that; on account of scriptural declaration.

When the reabsorption of the effected Brahman world draws near, the souls in which meanwhile perfect knowledge has sprung up proceed, together with Hiranyagarbha the ruler of that world, to 'what is higher than that,' i.e. to the pure highest place of Vishnu. This is the release by successive steps which we have to accept on the basis of the scriptural declarations about the non-return of the souls. For we have shown that the Highest cannot be directly reached by the act of going.

11. And on account of Smṛiti.

Smṛiti also agrees with this view; cp. the following passage, 'When the pralaya has come and the end of the highest (i.e. Hiraṇyagarbha), then they all, together with Brahman, with purified minds enter the highest place.'—The final conclusion (siddhānta) therefore is that the going of the souls, of which scripture speaks, has for its goal the effected Brahman.—But what is the primā facie view, with regard to which this final conclusion has been established in Sūtras 7-11?—This required primā facie view is now set forth in the following Sūtras.

12. To the highest (Brahman) (the souls are led); Gaimini (opines); owing to this being the principal sense (of the word 'Brahman').

The teacher Gaimini is of opinion that the passage, 'He leads them to Brahman,' refers to the highest Brahman. For the highest Brahman constitutes the principal, primary sense, of the word 'Brahman,' which denotes the lower Brahman only in a secondary, metaphorical way. And where both senses are possible, the primary sense has to be preferred.

13. And because scripture declares that.

The text, 'Going upwards by that he reaches immortality,' declares that immortality is reached by going. But immortality is possible only in the highest Brahman, not in the effected one, because the latter is transitory. So scripture says, 'Where one sees something else, that is little, that is mortal' (Kh. Up. VII, 24, 1). According to the text of the Kaṭha-upanishad also the going of the soul is towards the highest Brahman; for after the highest Brahman has been introduced there as general subject-matter—in the passage, 'That which thou seest,' &c., I, 2, 14, no other kind of knowledge is taken up later on.

14. And the intention of entering (can) not (be referred) to the effected (Brahman).

Moreover the intention of entering into which is expressed in the passage, 'I enter the hall of Pragâpati, the house' (Kh. Up. VIII, 14, 1), cannot have the lower Brahman for its object. For the immediately preceding passage, 'That within which these forms and names are contained is the Brahman,' shows that the highest Brahman, different in nature from the effected one, is the general subject-matter; and the subsequent passage, 'I am the glory of the Brâhmans,' represents the soul as the Self of all; it being known from another scriptural passage that 'Glory' is a name of the highest Brahman, 'There is no likeness of him whose name is great glory' (Vâg. Samh. XXXII, 3). And in the vidyâ of Brahman within the heart it is said of this same entering the house that it is preceded by going¹, 'There is the city of Brahman Aparâgitâ, and the golden hall built by Prabhu' (Kh. Up. VIII, 5, 3). And that the performing of a journey is intended follows also from the use of the verb 'pad,' which denotes going (prapadye, I enter).—The other (primâ facie) view therefore is that all the passages about the soul's going refer to the highest Brahman.

These two views have been embodied by the teacher in the Sûtras; one in the Sûtras 7-11, the other in the Sûtras 12-14. Now the arguments contained in the former set are capable of proving the fallaciousness of the arguments in the latter set, but not vice versâ; from which it follows that the former set states the final view and the latter set the primâ facie view only.—For nobody can compel us to accept the primary sense of a word (such as Brahman) even where it is impossible to do so.—And although met with in a chapter that treats of the highest knowledge, the reference to the going to Brahman—which belongs to another kind of knowledge—may be explained as aiming merely at the glorification of the highest knowledge (not at teaching that the going to Brahman is the result of higher knowledge).—And with reference to the passage, ‘I enter the hall of Pragâpati, the house,’ there is no reason why we should not separate that passage from what precedes and refer the intention of entering to the effected Brahman. And the qualified Brahman also may be spoken of as being the Self of all, as shown by other passages such as ‘He to whom all works, all desires belong,’ &c. (Kh. Up. III, 14, 2). The texts about the going therefore all belong to the lower knowledge.—Others again, in accordance with the general principle that the earlier Sûtras set forth the primâ facie view, while the later ones contain the siddhânta view, maintain that the passages about the soul’s going fall within the sphere of the higher knowledge. But this is impossible, because nothing may go to the highest Brahman. ‘Omnipresent and eternal like the ether;’ ‘The Brahman which is visible, not invisible, the Self that is within all’ (Bri. Up. III, 4, 1); ‘Self only is all this’ (Kh. Up. VII, 25, 2); ‘Brahman only is all this, it is the best’ (Mu. Up. II, 2, 11): from all these passages we ascertain that the highest Brahman is present everywhere, within everything, the Self of everything, and of such a Brahman it is altogether impossible that it ever should be the goal of going. For we do not go to what is already reached; ordinary experience rather tells us that a person goes to something different from him.—But we observe in ordinary experience also that something already reached may become an object of going, in so far as qualified by a different place; a man living on the earth, e.g. goes to the earth, in so far as he goes to another place on the earth. In the same way we see that a child reaches the adult state which in reality belongs to the child’s identical Self, but is qualified by a difference of time. Analogously Brahman also may be an object of going in so far as it is possessed of all kinds of powers.—This may not be, we reply, because scripture expressly negatives Brahman’s possessing any distinctive qualities.—‘Without parts, without actions, tranquil, without fault, without taint’ (Svet. Up. VI, 19); ‘Neither coarse nor fine, neither short nor long’ (Bri. Up. III, 8, 8); ‘He who is without and within, unproduced’ (Mu. Up. II, 1, 2);

¹ I am not quite sure which passage in the daharavidyâ is supposed to prove that the entering of Brahman's house is preceded by going. Probably VIII, 6, 5, 'He departs upwards; he is going to the sun.'

'This great, unborn Self, undecaying, undying, immortal, fearless, is indeed Brahman' (Bri. Up. IV, 4, 25); 'He is to be described by No, no!' (Bri. Up. III, 9, 26); from all these scriptural texts, as well as from Smṛiti and reasoning, it follows that the highest Self cannot be assumed to possess any differences depending on time or space or anything else, and cannot therefore become the object of going. The cases of places on the earth and of the different ages of man are by no means analogous; for they are affected by differences of locality and so on, and therefore can be gone to or reached.—Nor will it avail our opponent to say that Brahman possesses manifold powers, because scripture declares it to be the cause of the world's origination, sustentation, and final retraction; for those passages which deny difference have no other sense (but just the absolute denial of all difference).—But in the same way also those passages which state the origination and so on of the world have no other sense! (i.e. cannot be understood to teach anything but just the origination and so on of the world).—This is not so, we reply; for what they aim at teaching is the absolute oneness of Brahman. For texts which by means of the simile of the lump of clay, &c., teach that only that which is, viz. Brahman, is true, while everything effected is untrue, cannot aim at teaching the origination, &c. of the world.—But why should the passages about the origination, &c. of the world be subordinate to those which deny all difference, and not vice versa?—Because, we reply, the texts which negative all difference effect the cessation of all desire. For when the absolute oneness, permanence, and purity of the Self have once been apprehended, we cognize that the highest aim of man has been attained, and therefore conceive no further desires. Compare the following texts: 'What trouble, what sorrow can there be to him who beholds that unity?' (Īśa-up. 7); 'Thou hast reached fearlessness, O Ganaka' (Bri. Up. IV, 2, 4); 'He who knows does not fear anything; he does not distress himself with the thought, Why did I not do what is good? Why did I do what is bad?' (Taitt. Up. II, 9.) This also follows from our observing that those who know realise contentment of mind ; and from the fact that scripture blames the false notion of (the reality of) effects, 'From death to death goes he who sees here any difference' (Ka. Up. II, 4, 10). The texts negating all difference cannot therefore be understood as subordinate to other texts. Those texts, on the other hand, which speak of the origination of the world and so on have no similar power of conveying a sense which effects cessation of all desire. At the same time it is manifest that they have another (than their literal) meaning. For the text, after having said at first, 'Of this shoot sprung up know that it cannot be without a root' (Kh. Up. VI, 8, 3), declares in the end that Being which is the root of the world is the only object of cognition. Similarly Taitt. Up. III, 1, 'That from which these beings are born, that by which when born they live, that into which they enter at their death, seek to know that ; that is Brahman.' As thus the passages about origination and so on aim at teaching the unity of the Self, Brahman cannot be viewed as possessing manifold powers, and cannot therefore be the object of the action of going.—And, as already explained under IV, 2, 13, also the text Bri. Up. IV, 4, 6 ('Of him the prāṇas do not depart ; being Brahman he goes to Brahman'), denies any going to the highest Brahman.

Moreover, on the hypothesis of going, that which goes, i.e. the individual soul, must be either a part of Brahman to which it goes, or an effect of Brahman, or different from Brahman ; for if the two were absolutely identical no going could take place.—Well, what then ?—We reply as follows. If, in the first place, the soul is a part of Brahman, it cannot go to it, since the whole is permanently reached by the part. Besides, the hypothesis of whole and parts cannot be applied to Brahman, which is acknowledged to be without parts.—The same objection lies against the hypothesis of the soul being an effect of Brahman ; for also that which passes over into an effect is permanently reached by the effect. A jar made of clay does not exist apart from the clay which constitutes its Self ; were it so apart it would cease to be. And on both hypotheses, as that to which the parts or the effects would belong, i. e. Brahman is altogether unchanging, its entering into the Samsâra state could not be accounted for.—Let then, in the third place, the soul be different from Brahman. In that case it must be either of atomic size, or infinite, or of some intervening extent. If it is omnipresent, it cannot go anywhere. If it is of some middling extent, it cannot be permanent. If it is of atomic size, the fact of sensation extending over the whole body cannot be accounted for. The two hypotheses of atomic and middling extent have moreover been refuted at length in a former part of this work (II, 3, 19 ff.). And from the soul's being different from the highest Brahman it also would follow that such texts as 'Thou art that' are futile. This latter objection also lies against the theories of the soul being a part or an effect of Brahman. Nor can the difficulty be got over by it being pleaded that a part and an effect are not different from the whole and the causal substance; for that kind of oneness is not oneness in the true literal sense.—From all those three theories it moreover equally follows that the soul cannot obtain final release, because its Samsâra condition could never come to an end. Or else, if that condition should come to an end, it would follow that the very essence of the soul perishes; for those theories do not admit that the (imperishable) Brahman constitutes the Self of the soul.

Here now some come forward with the following contention. Works of permanent obligation and works to be performed on special occasions are undertaken to the end that harm may not spring up; such works as are due to special desires, and such as are forbidden, are eschewed, in order that neither the heavenly world nor hell may be obtained, and those works whose fruits are to be enjoyed in the current bodily existence are exhausted by just that fruition. Hence, as after the death of the present body, there is no cause for the origination of a new body, that blessed isolation which consists in the soul's abiding within its own nature will accomplish itself for a man acting in the way described above, even without the cognition of his

Self being identical with Brahman's Self.—All this is inadmissible, we reply, because there is no proof of it. For scripture nowhere teaches that he who desires release should conduct himself in the way described. To say that because the Samsāra state depends on works, it will cease when works are absent, is an altogether arbitrary style of reasoning. And (whether arbitrary or not) this reasoning falls to the ground, because the absence of the cause is something that cannot be ascertained. It may be supposed that each living being has, in its former states of existence, accumulated many works which have part of them pleasant, part of them unpleasant results. As these works are such as to lead to contrary results, which cannot be enjoyed all of them at the same time, some works whose opportunity has come, build up the present state of existence; others sit inactive waiting for a place, a time, and operative causes (favourable to them). As these latter works cannot thus be exhausted in the present state of existence, we cannot definitely assert, even in the case of a man who conducts himself as described above, that at the end of his present bodily existence all cause for a new bodily existence will be absent. The existence of a remainder of works is, moreover, established by scriptural and Smṛiti passages, such as, 'Those whose conduct has been good' (Kh. Up. V, 10, 7); 'Then with the remainder.'—But may not, an objection is raised, those remaining works be wiped out (even in the present existence) by the performance of works of permanent obligation and such works as are due to special occasions?—This may not be, we reply, because the two sets of works are not of contrary nature. Where there is contrariety of nature, one thing may be wiped out by another; but good deeds performed in previous states of existence, and works of permanent obligation and so on (performed in the present life), are both of them equally pure and therefore not of opposite nature. Bad works indeed, as being of impure nature, are opposed to works of permanent obligation, &c., and therefore may be extinguished by the latter. But even from this admission it does not follow that the causes for a new embodied existence are altogether absent; for those causes may be supplied by good deeds, and we do not know that the evil works have been extinguished without a remainder. Nor is there anything to prove that the performance of works of permanent obligation, &c., leads only to the non-origination of harm, and not at the same time to the origination of new results (to be extinguished in future states of existence); for it may happen that such new results spring up collaterally. Thus Âpastamba says, 'When a mango tree is planted for the sake of its fruits, it in addition gives shade and fragrance; thus additional advantages spring from the performance of religious duty.'—Nor can anybody who has not reached perfect knowledge promise to refrain altogether, from birth to death, from all actions either forbidden or aiming at the fulfilment of special wishes; for we observe that even the most perfect men commit faults, however minute. This may be a matter of doubt; all the same it remains true that the absence of causes for a new existence cannot be known with certainty.—If, further, the soul's unity with Brahman's Self—which is to be realised through knowledge—is not acknowledged, the soul whose essential nature it is to be an agent and enjoyer cannot even desire the state of blissful isolation; for a being cannot divorce itself from its true essence, not any more than fire can cease to be hot.—But, an objection is raised, what is of disadvantage to the soul is the state of agentship and fruition in so far as actually produced, not its mere potentiality. Release of the soul may, therefore, take place if only that actual condition is avoided while its potentiality remains.—This also, we reply, is not true; for as long as the potentiality exists it will inevitably produce the actuality.—But, our opponent resumes, potentiality alone, without other co-operative causes, does not produce its effect; as long therefore as it is alone it cannot, though continuing to exist, do any harm!—This also, we reply, is not valid; for the co-operative causes also are, potentially, permanently connected (with the acting and enjoying soul). If, therefore, the soul whose essence is acting and enjoying is not considered to possess fundamental identity with Brahman —an identity to be realised by knowledge—there is not any chance of its obtaining final release. Scripture, moreover (in the passage, ‘There is no other way to go,’ Svet. Up. III, 8), denies that there is any other way to release but knowledge.—But if the soul is non-different from the highest Brahman, all practical existence comes to an end, because then perception and the other means of right knowledge no longer act!—Not so, we reply. Practical life will hold its place even then, just as dreamlife holds its place up to the moment of waking. Scripture, after having said that perception and the rest are operative in the sphere of those who have not reached true knowledge (‘For where there is duality, as it were, there one sees the other,’ &c.; Bṛi. Up. IV, 5, 15), goes on to show that those means of knowledge do not exist for those who possess that knowledge (‘But when the whole of him has become the Self, whereby should he see another,’ &c.). As thus for him who knows the highest Brahman all cognition of something to be gone to, &c. is sublated, his going cannot in any way be shown to be possible.

To what sphere then belong the scriptural texts about the soul’s going?—To the sphere of qualified knowledge, we reply. Accordingly the soul’s going is mentioned in the chapter treating of the knowledge of the five fires, in the chapter treating of the knowledge of Brahman’s couch, in the chapter treating of the knowledge of Agni Vaisvānara (Kh. Up. V, 3–10; Kau. Up. I; Kh. Up. V, 11–24). And where the soul’s going is spoken of in a chapter treating of Brahman—(as e.g. in the passages, ‘He leads them to Brahman,’ &c., Kh. Up. IV, 15, 6, in a chapter treating of Brahman, as shown by ‘Breath is Brahman,’ &c., IV, 10, 5; and ‘He departs upward,’ &c., Kh. Up. VIII, 6, 5, in the chapter beginning ‘There is this city of Brahman,’ VIII, 1, 1)—such attributes as ‘vāmanî,’ i.e. Leader of blessings (Kh. Up. IV, 15, 3), and ‘satyakāma,’ i.e. having true wishes, show that there the qualified Brahman has to be meditated upon, and to that Brahman the soul can go. No passage, on the other hand, speaks of the soul’s going to the highest Brahman; while such going is specially denied in the passage, 'Of him the prâṇas do not depart.' In passages, again, such as 'He who knows Brahman obtains the Highest' (Taitt. Up. II, 1), we indeed meet with the verb 'to reach,' which has the sense of going; but because, as explained before, the reaching of another place is out of question, 'reaching' there denotes only the obtainment (realisation) of one's own nature, in so far as (through true knowledge) the expanse of names and forms which Nescience superimposes (on Brahman) is dissolved. Such passages are to be understood analogously to the text, 'Being Brahman he enters into Brahman' (Bṛi. Up. IV, 4, 6).—Besides, if the going were understood as connected with the highest Brahman, it could only subserve the purpose either of satisfying (the mind of him who knows) or of reflection. Now, a statement of the soul's going cannot produce any satisfaction in him who knows Brahman, since satisfaction is already fully accomplished through his perfect condition, bestowed on him by knowledge, of which he is immediately conscious. Nor, on the other hand, can it be shown that reflection on the soul's going in any way subserves knowledge, which is conscious of eternally perfect blessedness, and has not for its fruit something to be accomplished.—For all these reasons the soul's going falls within the sphere of the lower knowledge. And only in consequence of the distinction of the higher and lower Brahman not being ascertained, statements about the soul's going which apply to the lower Brahman are wrongly put in connexion with the higher Brahman.

But are there really two Brahman, a higher one and a lower one?—Certainly there are two! For scripture declares this, as e.g. in the passage, 'O Satyakâma, the syllable Om is the higher and also the lower Brahman' (Pr. Up. V, 2).—What then is the higher Brahman, and what the lower?—Listen! Where the texts, negating all distinctions founded on name, form, and the like, designate Brahman by such terms as that which is not coarse and so on, the higher Brahman is spoken of. Where, again, for the purpose of pious meditation, the texts teach Brahman as qualified by some distinction depending on name, form, and so on, using terms such as ‘He who consists of mind, whose body is prāṇa, whose shape is light’ (Kh. Up. III, 14, 2), that is the lower Brahman.—But is there not room here for the objection that this distinction of a higher and a lower Brahman stultifies the scriptural texts asserting aduality?—Not so, we reply. That objection is removed by the consideration that name and form, the adjuncts (of the one real Brahman), are due to Nescience. Passages such as ‘If he desires the world of the fathers’ (Kh. Up. VIII, 2, 1), which the text exhibits in proximity to a meditation on the lower Brahman, show that the fruit of such meditation is lordship over the worlds; a fruit falling within the sphere of the Samsāra, Nescience having not as yet been discarded. And as that fruit is bound to a special locality, there is nothing contradictory in the soul’s going there in order to reach it. That the soul, although all-pervading, is viewed as going because it enters into connexion with the buddhi and the rest of its adjuncts, just as general space enters into connexion with jars and the like, we have explained under II, 3, 29.

For all these reasons the view of Bādari as set forth in Sūtra 7 is the final one; while Sūtra 12, which states Gaimini’s opinion, merely sets forth another view, to the end of the illumination of the learner’s understanding.

15. Those who do not take their stand on symbols he leads, thus Bādarāyaṇa (opines); there being no fault in the twofold relation (resulting from this opinion); and the meditation on that (i.e. Brahman) (is the reason of this twofold relation).

It is a settled conclusion that all going has reference to the effected Brahman, not to the highest Brahman. Another doubt now arises here. Does that person who is not a man lead to the world of Brahman all those who take their stand on the effected Brahman, without any difference; or only some of them?

The pūrvapakshin maintains that all those who possess knowledge—provided that knowledge be not of the highest Brahman—go to the world of Brahman. For in Sūtra III, 3, 31 that going was put in connexion with all the different vidyās (of the qualified Brahmins), without any distinction.

To this the Sūtrakāra replies, 'Those who do not take their stand on symbols.' That means: Excepting those who take their stand on symbols (i. e. who meditate on certain things as symbolically representing Brahman), that person who is not a man leads all others who take their stand (i. e. who meditate) on the effected Brahman, to the world of Brahman; this is the opinion of the teacher Bādarāyaṇa. For in acknowledging in this way a twofold relation there is no fault; since the argumentation as to the non-restriction of going (Sūtra III, 3, 31) may be understood as referring to all meditations with the exception of those on symbols. The words, 'and the meditation on that,' state the reason for this twofold relation. For he whose meditation is fixed on Brahman reaches lordship like that of Brahman, according to the scriptural relation, 'In whatever form they meditate on him, that they become themselves.' In the case of symbols, on the other hand, the meditation is not fixed on Brahman, the symbol being the chief element in the meditation.—But scripture says also that persons whose mind is not fixed on Brahman go to it; so in the knowledge of the five fires, 'He leads them to Brahman' (Kh. Up. V, 10, 2).—This may be so where we observe a direct scriptural declaration. We only mean to say that where there is no such declaration the general rule is that those only whose purpose is Brahman go to it, not any others.

16. And scripture declares a difference (in the case of meditations on symbols).

With reference to the meditations on symbols, such as name and so on, scripture declares that each following meditation has a different result from the preceding one, 'As far as name reaches he is lord and master;—speech is greater than name;—as far as speech reaches he is lord and master;—mind is greater than speech' (Kh. Up. VII, 1, f.).

Now this distinction of rewards is possible because the meditations depend on symbols, while there could be no such distinction if they depended on the one non-different Brahman.—Hence those who take their stand on symbols cannot have the same reward as others.

FOURTH PÂDA.

REVERENCE TO THE HIGHEST SELF!

1. (On the soul's) having entered (into the highest light), there is manifestation (of its own nature); (as we infer) from the word 'own.'

'Thus does that serene being, having risen out of this body and entered into the highest light, manifest itself by its own nature' (Kh. Up. VII, 12, 3). Regarding this text a doubt arises whether the Self¹ manifests itself through some adventitious distinction—as the Self (of him who possesses the lower knowledge only) does in the world of the gods and other abodes of enjoyment—or only through its own Self.—The pûrvapakshin maintains that, as in other places, here also the manifestation takes place through some adventitious characteristic; because release also is a fruit (like other fruits, e.g. svarga), and because 'manifestation' means as much as origination. If the manifestation took place only through the Self's own nature, it would already appear in the Self's former states; for a thing's own nature is never absent from it. The Self therefore manifests itself by means of some adventitious distinction.

To this we make the following reply. It manifests itself through its Self only, not through any other attribute.—Why so?—On account of the word 'own' in the clause 'by its own nature.' For on the other view the qualification conveyed by 'own' would be unmeaning.—But may not the term 'own' merely indicate that that form belongs to that which manifests itself?—Not so, we reply. This is a point which would not require to be stated. For as in whatever form a thing manifests itself that form necessarily belongs to it, the qualification 'own' would be devoid of purport. It has a meaning, on the other hand, if it denotes the Self, the sense conveyed then being that the manifestation takes place only through the nature of the Self, not through any other, adventitious, nature.—But, as a thing cannot be without its own nature, what difference is there between the Self's former states and its present state (after the manifestation)?—To this question the next Sūtra replies.

¹ Samprati katurthe pâde paravidyâphalaikadeso brahmabhâvâvirbhâvaḥ, sagunavidyâphalam ka sarvesvaratulyabhogatvam avadhârayishyate, tatrâparavidyâprâpyam uktvâ paravidyâprâpyam âha sampadyeti. Ân. Gi.

2. (The Self whose true nature has manifested itself is) released ; according to the promise (made by scripture).

That soul, of which the text says that it manifests itself, is released from its former bondage and abides in its own pure Self ; while previously its Self was stained by the three states (i. e. the state of waking, dreaming, and dreamless sleep), according to Kṛ. Up. VIII, 9-11, 'It is blind ;' —'it weeps as it were ;'—'it goes to utter annihilation.' This is the difference.—But how is it known that in its present condition the soul is released?—'On account of the promise,' the Sūtra says. For after the teacher has promised to give further instruction about the Self as free from the imperfections of the three states ('I shall explain him further to you,' Kṛ. Up. VIII, 11, 3), he introduces the topic (of the released Self) in the words, 'Him being free from the body neither pleasure nor pain touches,' and concludes, 'By his own nature he manifests himself ; that is the highest Person.' The words at the beginning of the tale also, 'The Self which is free from sin' (VIII, 7, 1), make a promise regarding the released Self. And release is a fruit in so far only as it is a cessation of all bondage, not as implying the accession of something new. And with reference to the assertion that manifestation is the origination of something new we remark that it is so only with regard to a former condition (which ceases to be), as when we say of a convalescent person that he now manifests himself free from sickness. Hence there is no room for objections.

3. (The light into which the soul enters is) the Self; owing to the subject-matter of the chapter.

But how can the soul be called 'released,' considering that the clause 'having entered into the highest light' speaks of it as within the sphere of what is a mere effect? For the word 'light,' according to general usage, denotes physical light. And none who has not passed beyond the sphere of what is effected can be released, it being known that whatever is an effect is tainted with evil.—This objection is without force, we reply; because in the passage referred to the word 'light' denotes the Self, in accordance with the subject-matter of the chapter. For as such the highest Self is introduced in the words, 'The Self which is free from sin, old age, death,' &c., and we therefore may not all at once pass over to physical light; incurring thereby the fault of abandoning the topic under discussion and introducing a new one. Besides, the word 'light' sometimes denotes the Self, as e.g. in the passage, 'That the gods meditate on as the light of lights' (Bri. Up. IV, 4, 16). We have discussed this at length under I, 3, 40.

4. (The released soul abides) in non-division (from the highest Self); because that is seen from scripture.

A doubt here arises whether that soul of which the text says, 'Having entered the highest light it manifests itself by its true nature,' remains separate from the highest Self, or abides in the state of non-division from it.—Somebody might be inclined to think that—because in the passage, 'He moves about there,' a distinction is made between the abode and him who abides; and because the clause, 'Having entered the highest light,' mentions an agent and an object (of the agent's activity)—the soul remains distinct from the highest Self.—This view the Sûtra sets aside. The released soul is non-separate from the highest Self.—Why so?—Because that is seen from scripture.] For passages such as 'Thou art that' (Kh. Up. VI, 8, 7); 'I am Brahman' (Bri. Up. I, 4, 10); 'Where he sees nothing else' (Kh. Up. VII, 24, 1); 'But there is then nothing second, nothing else different that he could see' (Bri. Up. IV, 3, 23), show that the highest Self abides in the state of non-division. And the fruit must be assumed to correspond to the cognition, according to what was explained under IV, 3, 15. And also such passages as 'Just as pure water poured into pure water remains the same, thus, O Gautama, is the Self of a thinker who knows' (Ka. Up. II, 4, 15), whose object it is to describe the nature of the released soul, declare that there is non-separation only. The same follows from the comparisons (of the soul entering Brahman) to rivers falling into the sea. Passages where separation (of abode and abiding thing, &c.) is expressed, may be explained as, in a secondary sense, expressing non-separation; so e.g. Kh. Up. VII, 24, 1, 'In what does the Infinite rest?—In its own greatness;' and Kh. Up. VII, 25, 2, 'Loving the Self, playing with the Self.'

5. By (a nature) like that of Brahman (the soul manifests itself); (thus) Gaimini (opines); on account of reference and the rest.

It has been concluded that the clause, 'by its own nature,' means that the soul manifests itself by its own Self only, not by some other adventitious character. What has now to be inquired into is the specific qualities of that nature. Here the Sūtra at first states the opinion of the teacher Gaimini. According to him the soul's own nature is 'like that of Brahman,' i.e. it comprises all the qualities beginning with freeness from sin and concluding with truthfulness of conception (i.e. the qualities enumerated in Kh. Up. VIII, 7, 1), and also omniscience and omnipotence; and in this nature the soul manifests itself.—Why so?—Because this is known from reference¹ and the rest. For the reference to certain qualities made in VIII, 7, 1, teaches that the Selfhood of the Self is such (i.e. such as made up of those qualities).—Again, the passage, ‘He there moves about eating, playing, rejoicing,’ shows that the Self possesses lordly power; so also the passage, ‘For him there is free movement in all worlds’ (Kh. Up. VIII, 1, 6).—And thus also there is justification for such designations as ‘All-knowing; all-powerful.’

¹ The commentators say that the 'and the rest' of the Sūtra comprises vidhi and vyapadera, and give the following definitions.

6. By the sole nature of intelligence (the soul manifests itself), as that is its Self; thus Auḍulomi (opines).

Although the text enumerates different qualities, such as freeness from sin, &c., these qualities rest only on fanciful conceptions due to difference of words; for what the text intimates is only absence in general of all qualities such as sin and the rest. Intelligence alone constitutes the nature of the Self, and hence it is proper to conclude that it manifests itself in a nature consisting of that only. This conclusion will also agree with other scriptural texts, such as Bri. Up. IV, 5, 13, ‘Thus this Self has neither inside nor outside, but is altogether a mass of knowledge.’—Qualities, on the other hand, such as having true wishes, are indeed mentioned by the text as real (positive) attributes, the meaning being that his wishes are true, i.e. truly existent; but all the same they, as depending on the connexion with limiting adjuncts, cannot constitute the true nature of the Upanyāsa is the reference to something known (established elsewhere), which reference is made with a view to a vidhi, i.e. the establishing of something not yet known (upanyāso nāmoddēśaḥ sa kâṇyatra gñâtasyâṇyavidhânâyânuvâdaḥ). Thus here the qualities—freeness from sin—are referred to as known, for the purpose of establishing the vidhi, ‘That it is which we must search out.’—The passage, ‘He there wanders about,’ &c., is a vidhi; for it teaches what is not already known from elsewhere.—The mentioning of such qualities as omniscience and omnipotence is vyapadeśa, i.e. simple expression of something known without reference to a vidhi.

Self, as intelligence does. For all manifoldness of character has to be denied of Brahman, as we have shown under III, 2, 11. For the same reason the mention made of eating and so on, means only the absence of all pain in general, and aims at glorification, just as the passage about 'loving the Self' (Kh. Up. VII, 25, 2). For love, play, and the like cannot in their literal sense be ascribed to the action of the Self, because they presuppose something second (beyond the Self). Hence the soul manifests itself in the nature of pure intelligence, free from all manifoldness, calm, not capable of being expressed by any terms. This is the view of the teacher Auḍulomi.

7. Thus also, on account of the existence of the former (qualities), (admitted) owing to reference and so on, there is absence of contradiction, (as) Bādarāyana (thinks).

Thus also, i. e. although it be admitted that intelligence only constitutes the true nature of the Self, also the former nature, i. e. lordly power like that of Brahman, which is intimated by reference and the rest, is—with a view to the world of appearances—not rejected; and hence there is no contradiction. This is the opinion of the teacher Bādarāyana.

8. But by mere will (the released effect their purposes); because scripture states that.

In the meditation on Brāhman within the heart we read as follows: 'If he desires the world of the fathers, by his mere will the fathers rise,' &c. (Kh. Up. VIII, 2, 1).—A doubt here presents itself whether the will alone is the cause of the rising of the fathers, or the will joined with some other operative cause.—The pūrvapakshin maintains that although scripture says 'by his mere will,' some other cause must be supposed to co-operate, as in ordinary life. For as in our ordinary experience the meeting with one's father is caused by one's will, and, in addition, by the act of going and so on, so it will be in the case of the released soul also; and thus we do not assume something contrary to observation. When the text says 'by his mere will,' it implies, as in the case of a king, the whole apparatus of other easily procurable instrumental causes by which the desired object is obtained. Besides, if the fathers and so on rose owing to a mere wish, they would be of unstable nature, like the imaginary representation of some desired object, and thus not be able to procure any solid enjoyment.—To this we reply that the rising of the fathers and so on is due to the will only.—Why so?—Because scripture declares this. If any other cause were required, the direct scriptural statement 'by his will only' would thereby be contradicted. And even if we admit some other cause accompanying the act of will, it cannot be a cause to be realised by an effort; for therefrom it would follow that before the realisation of that cause the will would be barren. Nor can the analogies of ordinary experience be applied to something to be learned from scripture. For as the will of the released differs in nature from the will of ordinary men, it may have the power of effecting something that possesses as much stability as the special purpose requires.

9. And for this very same reason (the released soul is) without another lord.

For this very same reason, i.e. owing to the fact of the will of the released person not being barren, he who knows has no other lord over himself. For not even an ordinary person when forming wishes will, if he can help it, wish himself to be subject to another master. And scripture also declares this when saying, 'Those who depart from hence, after having discovered the Self and those true desires, for them there is freedom in all worlds' (Kh. Up. VIII, 1, 6).

10. The absence (of a body and sense-organs, on the part of the released) Bâdari (asserts); for thus scripture says.

The passage, 'By his mere wish the fathers rise,' shows that the released possesses a mind (internal organ, manas) whereby he wills. A question however arises whether he who knows, after having reached lordly power, possesses a body and senses, or not. Here the teacher Bādari is of opinion that the glorified possessor of knowledge is without body and sense-organs.—Why so?—Because scripture declares this, ‘With the mind seeing those wishes he rejoices’ (Kh. Up. VIII, 12, 5). If he rejoiced with the mind, the body, and the senses, scripture would not specially say ‘with the mind.’ Hence there are neither body nor sense-organs in the state of release.

11. The presence (of a body and senses) Gaimini (asserts); because the text records option (of the released person multiplying himself).

The teacher Gaimini is of opinion that the released person possesses a body and sense-organs as well as a mind. For passages like ‘He is onefold, he is threefold’ (Kh. Up. VII, 26, 2) declare that the Self has the option of manifold existence which cannot be brought about without manifoldness of body.—The capability of optionally multiplying one’s self is, indeed, mentioned in the knowledge of plenitude (bhūman) which refers to Brahman as devoid of qualities, but this lordly power which is valid only for the qualified state is there mentioned only in order to glorify the knowledge of the (unqualified) plenitude; and it therefore presents itself as constituting the fruit of qualified knowledge¹.

12. For this reason Bādarāyana (opines that the released person is) of both kinds; as in the case of the twelve days’ sacrifice.

The teacher Bādarāyana, again, thinks that for this reason, i.e. because scripture contains indications of both kinds, the proper conclusion is that the released person exists in both conditions. When he wishes to have a body, he appears with one; when he wishes to be disembodied, he is without one. For he has various wishes, and all his wishes are realised.—‘As in the case of the twelve days’ sacrifice.’ As the soma sacrifice extending over twelve days may be viewed either as a sattra or as an ahîna sacrifice, because both alternatives are indicated by scriptural passages¹; so it is here also.

¹ Manifoldness of the Self is mentioned in a vidyā referring to the highest Brahman; but its introduction there is not due to the wish of teaching something about that state, but merely of, rhetorically, glorifying it. We, therefore, are entitled to view that passage as teaching something about him who possesses the lower knowledge.

13. When there is no body, (the process) may take place as in the dreaming state.

When there is no body and no sense-organs, the process in the state of release may be viewed as analogous to that in the state of dream, when objects wished, such as a father and so on, have a perceptual existence only while body, senses, and objects do not really exist.

14. When there is (a body), (it may be) as in the waking state.

When, on the other hand, the released person has a body, then the objects of his wishes—fathers and so on—may have real existence, as in the waking state.

15. The entering (of one soul into several bodies) is like (the multiplication of) the flame of a lamp; for thus scripture declares.

Under Sûtra 11 it has been shown that the released person is embodied. The question now arises whether the bodies which the released create for themselves when rendering themselves threefold and so on are soulless like wooden figures, or animated by souls like the bodies of us men.—The pûrvapakshin maintains that as neither the soul nor the manas can be divided they are joined with one body only, while the other bodies are soulless.—To this the Sûtrakâra replies, ‘Like the flame of a lamp is their entering,’ i. e. just as the one flame of a lamp can pass over into several flames (lighted at the original flame), because it possesses the power of modifying itself, thus the soul of him who knows, although one only, multiplying itself through its lordly power, enters into all those bodies. For scripture declares that in this way one may become many, 'He is onefold, he is threefold, fivefold, sevenfold' (Kh. Up. VII, 26, 2). And this is not possible, if we should accept the simile of the wooden puppets, or the entering of other souls into those additional bodies¹. Nor again can there be any motion on the part of bodies destitute of souls.—Nor is there any force in the objection that, because the Self and the Manas cannot be divided, they cannot be in connexion with more than one body. For the Self, because possessing the quality of having true wishes (i. e. wishes which become real), may be supposed to create other bodies with internal organs, conformable to the original one organ; and, the Self dividing itself through the division of its limiting adjuncts, it may be possible to give a soul to each created body. This is the topic which the books on Yoga treat, in the chapters explaining the connexion of one soul with several bodies.—But how can lordly power, enabling the released soul to enter into several bodies, be admitted, if we consider that different scriptural texts declare that the soul in that state has not any specific cognition? so e.g. 'Whereby should he know another?' 'For there is then no second, nothing else different from him that he could know;' 'An ocean is that one seer, without any duality' (Bri. Up. II, 4, 14; IV, 3, 30; 32).

¹ See Pûrva Mîmâṃsâ-sûtras II, 3, 5th adhikarana.

To this objection the next Sūtra replies.

16. (What scripture says about absence of all specific cognition) refers either to deep sleep or union (release); for this is manifested (by the texts).

By 'entering into one's own Self' is meant dreamless sleep ; according to the text, 'He is gone to his own Self, he sleeps they say' (Kh. Up. VI, 8, 1). 'Union' means blissful isolation (final release), according to the text, 'Being Brahman he goes to Brahman' (Bri. Up. IV, 4, 6). What the texts say about absence of specific cognition is said with reference to either of those two states, dreamless sleep or final release.—How do we know this?—Because this is 'manifest,' owing to the fact that those two states form the topic there (where absence of all cognition is mentioned). Compare the passages, 'Having risen from out of these elements it perishes again after them. Having departed there is no more knowledge;' 'But where the Self only is all this;' 'Where when asleep he desires no more desires, and dreams no more dreams' (Bri. Up. II, 4, 12 ; IV, 5, 15 ; IV, 3, 19).—Those passages, on the other hand, which describe lordly power refer to an altogether different condition, which—like the heavenly world and so on—is an abode where qualified knowledge produces its results.—Thus there is no contradiction.

¹ I. e. the scriptural statement about one Self rendering itself manifold can neither be reconciled with the hypothesis of the other bodies being moved by the one soul as puppets are moved by one person through strings, nor with the hypothesis of a new separate soul entering each new body.

17. With the exception of world-business (the released possess all lordly power), (the Lord) being the topic (where world-business is referred to), and (the souls) not being near (to such business).

The following doubt here presents itself. Do those who through meditations on the qualified Brahman enter, together with their manas, into a condition of equality with the Lord, possess unlimited lordly power, or power limited to some extent?—The pûrvapakshin maintains that their power must be unlimited, because we meet with texts such as 'He obtains Self-lordship' (Taitt. Samh. I, 6, 2); 'All the gods bring an offering for him' (Taitt. Samh. I, 5, 3); 'For them there is freedom in all worlds' (Kh. Up. VIII, 1, 6).—To this the Sûtra replies, 'Excepting the world-business.' With the exception of the origination and so on of the world all other lordly powers, as e. g. rendering one's self of atomic size, must belong to the released. The world-business, on the other hand, can belong to the everlastingly perfect Lord only.—Why so?—Because there (where the origination and so on of the world are referred to) the Lord forms the general topic, and because the other (souls) do not stand near (to the world-business). The highest Lord only is appointed to do all work referring to the entire world; for the world's origination and so on are taught only where he constitutes the general subject-matter, and moreover he (only) is eternal, and described in scripture (as the creator, &c. of the world)¹. The lordly power of the other souls, on the contrary, scripture shows to have a beginning, because it depends on their searching for and striving to know the Lord. They are therefore remote from all world-business. And just because they have minds, they might be of different minds, and one might have the intention of preserving the world while another might wish to destroy it. Such conflicts can only be avoided by assuming that the wishes of one should conform to those of another, and from this it follows that all other souls (but the Lord) depend on the highest Lord.

18. (Should it be said that the souls must possess unlimited power) on account of manifest teaching; we reply No, because scripture states him who, entrusted with office, abides in the spheres (of the sun and so on), (to be that one on whom the soul's obtaining lordly power depends).

It remains to refute the remark, made by the pûrvapakshin, that absolute power on the part of those who know must be inferred from texts directly asserting such power, as e.g. 'He obtains self-lordship.'—This refutation the above Sûtra undertakes. Scripture declares that the obtaining of rulership on the soul's part, depends on the highest Lord who, as entrusted with definite offices, abides in certain definite abodes, such as the sphere of the sun, &c. This is shown by the text going on to say (after the clause quoted above), 'He obtains the lord of Mind.' For that means that he obtains the lord known to be the lord of all minds. In accordance herewith the text later on says that he becomes lord of speech, lord of the eye, lord of the ear, lord of understanding.—Similarly in other passages also the lordly power of the other souls has to be viewed, according to circumstances, as depending on the eternally perfect Lord.

¹ Kim ka paraisyaiva nityatvena svahetvanapekshanasya klipta-saktitvâg gagatsarganam prati kalpyasâmarthyâk ka vidushâm îsvara-vishayaiva gagatsrîshîr eshtavyâ, kim ka paurvâparyâlokanâyâm îsvarasyaiva gagatsargañ sabdâd gamyate ganmâdisûtram ârabhya kaitad upapâditam. Ân. Gi.

19. And (there is also a form of the highest Lord) not abiding in effected things ; for thus scripture declares his abiding.

Moreover, according to scripture, there is also an eternal form of the highest Lord which does not abide in effects ; he is not only the ruling soul of the spheres of the sun and so on which lie within the sphere of what is effected. For the text declares his abiding in a twofold form, as follows : ' Such is the greatness of it ; greater than it is the Person. One foot of him are all beings ; three feet of him is what is immortal in heaven ' (Kh. Up. III, 12, 6). And it cannot be maintained that that form of him which is divorced from all effects is reached by those who put their trust on his other form ; for their minds are not set on the former. Hence as he who does not reach that form of the double-natured highest Lord which is divorced from all qualities stops at that form which is distinguished by qualities, so also, unable to reach unlimited power within the latter form, he stops at limited lordly power.

20. And thus perception and inference show.

Scripture and Smṛiti both declare that the highest light does not abide within effected things, 'The sun does not shine there, nor the moon and the stars, nor these lightnings, and much less this fire' (Mu. Up. II, 2, 10). 'The sun does not illumine it, nor the moon, nor fire' (Bha. Gîtâ XV, 6).—The Sûtra is meant to show that the non-abiding of the highest light within effected things is a well-known circumstance.

21. And on account of the indications of equality of enjoyment only.

The lordly power of those who take their stand on the effected Brahman is not absolute, for that reason also that scripture teaches that their enjoyment only is equal to that of the eternally perfect Lord. For scripture contains statements and indications of the difference (of the Lord and the released soul); compare 'To him he says, Water indeed is enjoyed¹ (by me); that world (is to be enjoyed by thee also)' (Kau. Up. I, 7); 'As all beings honour that deity, so do all beings honour him who knows that' (Bṛi. Up. I, 5, 20); 'He obtains through it equality (in body) and sameness of abode with that deity' (Bṛi. Up. I, 5, 23). But from the circumstance of the lordly power of the released souls not being absolute it follows that it comes to an end, and then they will have to return from the world of Brahman!—To this objection the reverend Bādarāyaṇa replies in the following Sūtra.

22. (Of them) there is non-return, according to scripture; non-return, according to scripture.

Those who, in following the road of the gods, to which the vein and the ray are leading, and on which light is the first stage, reach the world of Brahman as described by scripture—where 'there are the two lakes Ara and Nya in the world of Brahman, in the third heaven from hence,' and where 'there is the lake Airammadiya and the Asvattha tree showering down Soma, and the city of Brahman Aparāgitā and the golden hall built by Prabhu' (Kā. Up. VIII, 5, 3)—and set forth at length in mantras, arthavâdas, and so on; those, we say, who reach that world do not return from there after having finished the enjoyment of their deeds; as those do who have gone to the world of the moon and other places.—Why so?—Because scriptural passages teach that they do not so return. Compare 'Moving upwards by it he reaches the immortal' (Kh. Up. VIII, 6, 6); 'For them there is no return' (Bri. Up. VI, 2, 15); 'Those who proceed on that path do not return to the life of man' (Kh. Up. IV, 15, 6); 'He reaches the world of Brahman and does not return' (Kh. Up. VIII, 15, 1). That the finality of their lordly power does not imply their return to the life of man, we have shown under IV, 3, 10. It is a settled matter that those who through perfect knowledge have dispelled all mental darkness and are devoted to the eternally perfect Nirvâṇa do not return. And as those also who rely on the knowledge of the qualified Brahman in the end have recourse to that (Nirvâṇa), it follows that they also do not return¹—The repetition of the words, 'Non-return, according to scripture,' indicates the conclusion of this body of doctrine.

¹ All the commentators explain the reading 'mīyante.'—Ān. Gi. says—taṁ brahmalokagatam upāsakam hiraṇyagarbhaḥ svasamīpam upāgatam sânunayam âha mayâ khalv âpa evâmṛitamayyo mīyante drīsyante bhugyante tavâpy asāv amṛitarūpodakalakshano loko bhogyo yathāsukham bhugyatām.

INDEX OF QUOTATIONS

TO

VOLUMES XXXIV (i) AND XXXVIII (ii).

Aitareya- âranyaka

- II, 1, 2, 1 . . . ii, 272, 303
 1, 2, 6 . . . i, 56; ii, 304
 1, 3, 1 . . . ii, 206
 2, 4, 6 . . . i, p. lxxii; ii, 244
 3, 2, 1 . . . i, 63
 4, 1 . . . ii, 205-208
 4, 1, 1 . . . i, p. lxix, 22, 332
 4, 1, 1; 2 . . . i, 265
 4, 1, 2 . . . i, 48
 4, 1, 2; 3 . . . i, 263
 4, 2, 2 . . . ii, 206
 4, 2, 4 . . . i, 304; ii, 91, 257
 4, 3, 4; 6;
 7; 10 . . . ii, 208
 6, 1, 5; 6 . . . ii, 208
 III, 2, 3, 12 . . . i, 94; ii, 190

Aitareya- brâhmana

- III, 8, 1 . . . i, 35, 222

Âpastamba- dharma-sûtra

- I, 7, 20, 3 . . . ii, 399
 8, 23, 2 . . . i, 293
 9, 26, 8 . . . ii, 318 n.

Ârsheya- brâhmana

- I i, 214

Bhagavad-gîtâ

- II, 24 ii, 180
 39; 49 . . . ii, 361
 54 i, 43, 282
 III, 12 ii, 337
 13 i, 111
 35 ii, 318

- IV, 11 i, 359
 V, 14; 15 . . . i, 330
 17 ii, 302
 VI, 11 ii, 350
 45 ii, 316
 VII, 6 i, 293
 19 i, 282
 21 ii, 183
 VIII, 6 i, 63; ii, 281, 352
 10 ii, 352
 23 ii, 380
 24 i, 128
 24; 25 . . . ii, 381
 26 ii, 234
 X, 2 i, 307
 4 ii, 22
 41 i, 63, 80
 42 i, 96
 XIII, 2 i, 113, 122, 282
 12 ii, 157
 27 i, 282
 31 i, 187
 XIV, 17 i, 46
 XV, 3 i, 361
 6 ii, 417
 6; 12 i, 195
 7 ii, 63
 20 i, 36
 XVIII, 61 i, 113, 330

Bṛihad-âranyaka- upanishad

- I, 1, 4 i, p. cv
 2, 2 ii, 24
 2, 4 i, 203
 3, 1 ii, 192
 3, 2 i, 303; ii, 95
 3, 12 ii, 92
 3, 19 ii, 89
 3, 22 ii, 91, 154

INDEX OF QUOTATIONS

TO

VOLUMES XXXIV (i) AND XXXVIII (ii).

Aitareya- âranyaka

- II, 1, 2, 1 . . . ii, 272, 303
 1, 2, 6 . . . i, 56; ii, 304
 1, 3, 1 . . . ii, 206
 2, 4, 6 . . . i, p. lxxii; ii, 244
 3, 2, 1 . . . i, 63
 4, 1 . . . ii, 205-208
 4, 1, 1 . . . i, p. lxix, 22, 332
 4, 1, 1; 2 . . . i, 265
 4, 1, 2 . . . i, 48
 4, 1, 2; 3 . . . i, 263
 4, 2, 2 . . . ii, 206
 4, 2, 4 . . . i, 304; ii, 91, 257
 4, 3, 4; 6;
 7; 10 . . . ii, 208
 6, 1, 5; 6 . . . ii, 208
 III, 2, 3, 12 . . . i, 94; ii, 190

Aitareya- brâhmana

- III, 8, 1 . . . i, 35, 222

Âpastamba- dharma-sûtra

- I, 7, 20, 3 . . . ii, 399
 8, 23, 2 . . . i, 293
 9, 26, 8 . . . ii, 318 n.

Ârsheya- brâhmana

- I . . . i, 214

Bhagavad-gîtâ

- II, 24 . . . ii, 180
 39; 49 . . . ii, 361
 54 . . . i, 43, 282
 III, 12 . . . ii, 337
 13 . . . i, 111
 35 . . . ii, 318

- IV, 11 . . . i, 359
 V, 14; 15 . . . i, 330
 17 . . . ii, 302
 VI, 11 . . . ii, 350
 45 . . . ii, 316
 VII, 6 . . . i, 293
 19 . . . i, 282
 21 . . . ii, 183
 VIII, 6 . . . i, 63; ii, 281, 352
 10 . . . ii, 352
 23 . . . ii, 380
 24 . . . i, 128
 24; 25 . . . ii, 381
 26 . . . ii, 234
 X, 2 . . . i, 307
 4 . . . ii, 22
 41 . . . i, 63, 80
 42 . . . i, 96
 XIII, 2 . . . i, 113, 122, 282
 12 . . . ii, 157
 27 . . . i, 282
 31 . . . i, 187
 XIV, 17 . . . i, 46
 XV, 3 . . . i, 361
 6 . . . ii, 417
 6; 12 . . . i, 195
 7 . . . ii, 63
 20 . . . i, 36
 XVIII, 61 . . . i, 113, 330

Bṛihad-âranyaka- upanishad

- I, 1, 4 . . . i, p. cv
 2, 2 . . . ii, 24
 2, 4 . . . i, 203
 3, 1 . . . ii, 192
 3, 2 . . . i, 303; ii, 95
 3, 12 . . . ii, 92
 3, 19 . . . ii, 89
 3, 22 . . . ii, 91, 154

I, 3, 23	ii, 193	III, 2, 11	i, pp. lxxxi, lxxxix
3, 24	ii, 195	2, 13	i, 359; ii, 105
4, 1	ii, 206		seq., 369
4, 6	i, 117	4	i, p. lxxii, 231
4, 7	i, 25, 242, 264, 267; ii, 32, 42	4, 1	ii, 173, 238, 242, 291, 339, 394
4, 10	i, 29, 31, 219, 282; ii, 32, 46, 66, 101, 111, 173, 238, 339, 408	4, 2	i, 32, 133, 169; ii, 18
4, 15	i, 25	5	i, p. lxxii; ii, 291, 322
5, 2	ii, 361	5, 1	i, p. lxxvi; ii, 242, 291
5, 3	ii, 49, 56, 90, 95	6, 8	ii, 315
5, 13	ii, 257	7	i, p. xxviii
5, 20	ii, 93, 418	7, 1 seqq.	i, 130
5, 21	ii, 87 n., 94, 256	7, 2	i, 154
5, 22	ii, 18, 258	7, 3	i, p. xxxv, 125; ii, 339
5, 23	ii, 257, 258, 418	7, 4	i, 370
II, 1, 1	ii, 168	7, 9	i, 81
1, 16	i, 273; ii, 146	7, 15	ii, 173
1, 17	ii, 42, 50, 144	7, 22	i, 134
1, 18	ii, 50, 56, 135	7, 23	i, 51, 70, 113, 115, 133, 282; ii, 46, 54, 62, 66, 174
1, 19	ii, 141
1, 20	ii, 30, 74, 75, 147	8, 7; 8	i, 169
2, 3	i, 254	8, 8	i, 62, 99, 171, 327, 349, 355; ii, 17, 152, 155, 239, 329, 335, 394
2, 4	i, 217	8, 9	i, 170, 181, 355, 370; ii, 290
3	ii, 167	8, 11	i, 171, 243, 282; ii, 46, 335
3, 3	ii, 6	9, 1; 2	i, 200
3, 6	i, 62; ii, 157, 175	9, 4	ii, 79, 83
4, 5	i, p. xl, 17, 25, 26, 297, 344, 356; ii, 52, 77, 288, 291, 331	9, 9	i, 269
4, 6	i, 36, 282, 309, 311, 321; ii, 10, 179, 329, 339	9, 16	i, 131
4, 10	i, 20; ii, 291	9, 26	i, 37, 299, 327, 349; ii, 171, 329, 395
4, 11	ii, 79	9, 28	i, 65, 75, 83; ii, 34, 335
4, 12	i, 154, 349; ii, 160, 415	IV, 1, 3	ii, 281
4, 13	i, 22, 31, 323, 329	2, 4	i, 29, 194, 327, 352; ii, 395
4, 14	ii, 414	3, 5	i, 91
5, 1	ii, 154	3, 6	i, 194
5, 18	i, 178; ii, 159	3, 7	i, p. xxxviii, 234; ii, 39, 46, 53, 208
5, 19	i, 22, 31, 36, 100; ii, 32, 155, 161, 175, 180	3, 8	ii, 29
III, 1, 1	ii, 288	3, 9	ii, 133, 138
1, 9	i, 30
2	i, 239
2, 1	ii, 79
2, 8	ii, 80, 83

- IV, 3, 9; 10 . . . ii, 133
 3, 10 . . . i, 353; ii, 133
 3, 11 . . . ii, 34, 36
 3, 12 . . . ii, 49 seq., 89, 135
 3, 13 . . . ii, 56
 3, 14 . . . ii, 34, 134
 3, 14; 15 . . . ii, 248
 3, 14-16 . . . i, 235
 3, 15 . . . i, 28
 3, 16 . . . i, 298; ii, 148
 3, 19 . . . ii, 415
 3, 21 . . . i, 60; ii, 141, 176
 3, 21-32 . . . ii, 54
 3, 22 . . . i, 235; ii, 151, 337, 340
 3, 23 . . . ii, 34, 408
 3, 30 . . . i, 188; ii, 34, 414
 3, 32 . . . i, 74, 168; ii, 414
 3, 33 . . . ii, 112
 3, 35 . . . i, 345
 3, 38 . . . ii, 367
 4, 1 . . . ii, 36, 377
 4, 1-4 . . . ii, 102
 4, 2 . . . ii, 36, 82, 83, 93, 105, 289, 352, 367, 377
 4, 3 . . . ii, 103, 352
 4, 5 . . . i, pp. lxxx, lxxxi, lxxxix; ii, 32, 46, 119, 369
 4, 6 . . . i, p. cxii; ii, 35, 113, 173, 363, 373, 396, 401, 415
 4, 6; 7 . . . i, p. cix
 4, 7 . . . i, 43, 157; ii, 144, 375
 4, 8; 9 . . . i, pp. cvii, cviii
 4, 9 . . . ii, 317
 4, 12 . . . i, 36
 4, 16 . . . i, 91, 193; ii, 407
 4, 17 . . . i, p. xl, 257
 4, 18 . . . i, 84, 87, 230
 4, 19 . . . i, 66, 262, 282, 323; ii, 154, 180, 339
 4, 20 . . . ii, 37
 4, 21 . . . i, 157; ii, 331
 4, 22 . . . i, p. lxxiii, 79, 182, 234, 330; ii, 37, 42, 62, 141, 247, 294, 295, 307, 337, 356, 359, 361
 4, 23 . . . ii, 308, 390

- IV, 4, 24 . . . i, 92, 282; ii, 181
 4, 25 . . . i, 321, 327; ii, 31, 209, 330, 335, 395
 5, 1 . . . ii, 305
 5, 6 . . . i, 274, 285; ii, 9
 5, 6-15 . . . ii, 285
 5, 8 . . . i, 285
 5, 13 . . . i, 156; ii, 32, 34, 156 seq., 409
 5, 15 . . . i, 36, 62, 123, 168; ii, 54, 145, 248, 292, 295, 330, 400, 415
 V, 1 . . . i, 84
 4 & V, 5 . . . ii, 245-247
 4, 1 . . . ii, 245
 4, 5 . . . i, p. lxxii
 5 . . . i, p. lxx; ii, 216
 5, 2 . . . i, 124; ii, 245
 5, 3 . . . i, 89; ii, 245
 6 . . . i, p. lxvii
 8 . . . i, 257
 9 . . . i, 144
 10 . . . i, p. cvii
 10, 1 . . . ii, 382, 383 seq., 385
 10, 6 . . . ii, 214
 VI, 1, 1 . . . ii, 186
 1, 6 . . . ii, 188
 1, 7 . . . i, 303
 1, 13 . . . i, 304; ii, 85
 1, 14 . . . ii, 211, 309
 2, 9 . . . i, 257
 2, 14 . . . ii, 187
 2, 15 . . . i, p. cix; ii, 383, 386, 389, 390, 391, 419
 2, 15 seqq. . . i, pp. cvii, cviii
 2, 16 . . . ii, 110, 113, 234

Gābāla-upanishad

- ? . . . ii, 244, 249, 251, 295, 297, 302 seq., 338

I . . . i, 153

IV . . . i, 298

Gaimini-(pūrva-mīmāṃsā)-sūtra

- I, 1, 1 . . . i, 24, 26, 44
 1, 2 . . . i, 24, 291 n.
 1, 5 . . . i, 24
 1, 25 . . . i, 24

Digitized by Google

IV, 3, 1; 3 . . .	i, 30
3, 3 . . .	ii, 87 n., 256, 277
3, 5 . . .	i, 226
3, 6 . . .	ii, 257
3, 8 . . .	i, 95; ii, 258
4, 5 . . .	i, 228
10 seqq. . .	i, 126 n.
10, 5 . . .	i, 84; ii, 277, 400
14, 3 . . .	ii, 354
15 . . .	i, pp. cvii, cviii
15, 1 . . .	i, p. xxxv, 124; ii, 219
15, 2 . . .	i, 125; ii, 203
15, 3 . . .	ii, 400
15, 4 . . .	ii, 219
15, 5 . . .	i, 128
15, 6 . . .	ii, 391, 400, 419
17, 1 . . .	ii, 361
17, 10 . . .	ii, 284
18, 3 . . .	ii, 92
V, 1, 1 . . .	ii, 85, 186, 277
1, 2 . . .	ii, 309
1, 7 . . .	i, 304
2, 2 . . .	ii, 211
3-10 . . .	ii, 101-132, 400
3, 3 . . .	ii, 103, 368
3, 10 . . .	ii, 108
4, 1 . . .	ii, 267
7, 1; 8, 1 . . .	i, 35
9, 1 . . .	ii, 122
9, 2 . . .	ii, 188
10 . . .	i, pp. cvii, cviii
10, 1 . . .	i, 27; ii, 233, 295, 297, 382, 385
10, 2 . . .	ii, 403
10, 4 . . .	ii, 110
10, 5-7 . . .	ii, 112 seq.
10, 6 . . .	ii, 130
10, 7 . . .	ii, 398
10, 8 . . .	ii, 384
10, 10 . . .	ii, 187
11 seqq. . .	i, pp. lxxiii, lxxv, 143
11-24 . . .	ii, 400
11, 2 . . .	ii, 154
11, 5 . . .	ii, 288
11, 6 . . .	i, p. xxxv
11, 7 . . .	i, 227
12-17 . . .	ii, 275
18 . . .	i, 143; ii, 275
18, 1 . . .	ii, 191
18, 2 . . .	i, 146
19, 1 . . .	i, 146; ii, 249
24, 2; 4 . . .	ii, 249

V, 24, 3 . . .	i, 145; ii, 354
VI, 1 . . .	ii, 7
1, 3 . . .	i, 285, 341 seq., 343; ii, 9, 79
1, 4 . . .	i, 266, 285, 320; ii, 12
2 . . .	i, 47 seq., 53 n.
2 seqq. . .	i, 53, 55
2, 1 . . .	i, 22, 267, 282, 332, 341; ii, 163
2, 1; 2 . . .	i, 264
2, 1; 3 . . .	i, 265
2, 2 . . .	ii, 20
2, 3 . . .	i, 263; ii, 22, 25, 74, 290
2, 3; 4 . . .	i, 52, 303; ii, 24
2, 4 . . .	ii, 23, 366
3, 1 . . .	ii, 126
3, 2 . . .	i, 233, 268, 329, 343, 361; ii, 32, 140, 159
3, 2; 3 . . .	ii, 96
3, 3 . . .	i, 88 n.
4 . . .	i, 332
4, 1 . . .	i, 321
5, 4 . . .	ii, 79
6, 1 . . .	ii, 364
6, 5 . . .	ii, 27, 366
8 . . .	ii, 370
8, 1 . . .	i, 59, 180, 345; ii, 47, 141, 151, 176, 179, 415
8, 2 . . .	i, 59 n., 84, 87, 272; ii, 142
8, 3 . . .	ii, 396
8, 3; 5 . . .	i, 59
8, 4 . . .	i, 155, 266
8, 7 . . .	i, 23, 31, 54, 321, 343; ii, 9, 32, 46, 66, 79, 163, 173, 339, 408
8, 7 &c.-16, 3 . . .	ii, 243
9, 2; 3 . . .	i, 313; ii, 48
10, 2 . . .	ii, 147, 148
11, 3 . . .	ii, 28, 31
14, 2 . . .	i, 17; ii, 236, 237, 285, 357, 363
16 . . .	i, 56, 323
VII, 1 . . .	i, 189
1 seqq. . .	ii, 403
1, 1 . . .	i, 227
1, 3 . . .	i, 29, 167, 266

- VII, 1, 5 . . . ii, 281, 341
 11, 1 . . . ii, 386
 12, 3 . . . ii, 405
 15, 1 . . . i, 162, 164, 261;
 ii, 277
 16 i, 166
 18, 2 i, 326
 23 i, p. xxxv, 163
 23; 24 i, 162
 24 i, 74
 24, 1 i, 62, 78, 163,
 168, 329; ii,
 329, 392, 408
 25, 1; 2 . . . ii, 179
 25, 2 i, 282, 311, 321;
 ii, 180, 394,
 408, 410
 26, 1 i, 60, 167
 26, 2 i, 29, 167, 440;
 ii, 237, 311,
 414
 VIII, 1 i, pp. xxxvi, lxxiii
 1, 1 i, 174, 274; ii,
 219, 247, 378,
 400
 1, 3 ii, 180, 219
 1, 6 i, 12, 178; ii,
 248, 409, 411,
 415
 2 i, pp. lxxiii, lxxv
 2, 1 ii, 402, 410
 3, 2 i, 180; ii, 148
 3, 3 i, 59; ii, 39
 3, 4 i, p. xxxvi, 182,
 191
 4, 1 ii, 144, 151, 175,
 356
 4, 2 ii, 175
 4, 3 ii, 384
 5, 1 ii, 307
 5, 3 ii, 315, 393, 418
 6, 2 ii, 379
 6, 3 ii, 141
 6, 5 i, pp. cvii, cviii,
 232; ii, 378,
 380, 382, 391,
 393 n., 400
 6, 6 ii, 419
 7 ii, 61 seq.
 7 seqq. ii, 291
 7, 1 i, p. lxxxiv, 25,
 79, 110, 184,
 232, 344, 355;
 ii, 52, 203,
 285, 330, 406,
 408, 409

- VIII, 7, 2 . . . i, 219
 7, 3 i, 184; ii, 277
 9-11 ii, 406
 9, 1 i, 129
 9, 3 i, 184
 9, 3 seqq. . . i, 232
 10, 1 i, 184
 10, 4 i, 184
 11, 1 i, 184
 11, 2 i, 184
 11, 3 i, 199; ii, 406
 12, 1 i, 27, 41, 232
 12, 3 i, pp. xxxvi,
 xxxviii, lxxv,
 231, 232, 277;
 ii, 291
 12, 4 ii, 34
 12, 5 ii, 412
 13 ii, 225
 14 i, p. xxxviii, 82,
 182; ii, 98
 14, 1 i, 233, 329; ii,
 155, 393
 15 ii, 63, 289
 15, 1 ii, 419

Mahâbhârata

- III, 16763 . . . i, 195

Maitrâyanîya-
sâmhita

- I, 1, 6 ii, 273 n.

Maitrâyanîya-
upanishad

- VI, 30 i, pp. cvii, cviii, seq.

Manu

- I, 5 i, 133
 21 i, 204
 27 ii, 369
 II, 87 ii, 316
 X, 4 i, 227
 126 i, 227

- XII, 91 i, 294 seq.
 105, 106 . . . i, 315

Mundaka-
upanishad

- I, 1, 1 i, 138
 1, 3 i, p. xxxv, 138,
 159, 285; ii, 9,
 76
 1, 4 i, p. cxvi
 1, 5; 6 i, 135; ii, 239

I, 1, 6 . . .	i, p. xliii, 288 ; ii, 171	Nyāya-sūtra	I, 1, 2 . . .	i, 30
I, 7 . . .	i, 285	I, 18 . . .	i, 435
I, 9 . . .	i, 48, 136, 137, 158, 355 ; ii, 290	Pūrva-mīmāṃsā-sūtra, see Gaimini-sūtra
2, 7 . . .	i, 138 seq.	Pañkadarī	I, 7 . . .	i, p. xcii
2, 9 seqq. . .	i, pp. cvii, cviii	Pāṇini	I, 4, 30 . . .	i, 285
2, 11 . . .	ii, 295, 382	II, 1, 50 . . .	i, 260
2, 12 . . .	i, 139	VI, 4, 158 . . .	i, 162
2, 13 . . .	i, 137
II, 1, 1 . . .	ii, 30	Praśna- upanishad	I, 1 . . .	i, 227
I, 2 . . .	i, p. cxix, 28, 107 seq., 139, 243, 349 ; ii, 77, 85, 155, 335, 394	I, 9 seqq. . .	i, p. cvii
I, 3 . . .	ii, 21, 27, 74-76, 85, 86, 94	10 . . .	i, p. cviii, 128
I, 4 . . .	i, 140	II, 3 . . .	i, 102 ; ii, 89
I, 4-9 . . .	i, 142, 142 n.	13 . . .	ii, 87 n.
I, 8 . . .	ii, 74, 79	III, 3 . . .	i, 60
I, 10 . . .	i, 142, 143 n., 155 ; ii, 76	6 . . .	ii, 39
2, 5 . . .	i, p. xxxv, 154, 194	9 . . .	ii, 365
2, 6 . . .	ii, 52	10 . . .	ii, 352
2, 8 . . .	i, 29, 31, 98, 157 ; ii, 237, 354, 356	IV, 2 . . .	i, 168
2, 10 . . .	i, p. xliii, 192 ; ii, 417	2 ; 3 . . .	i, 163
2, 11 . . .	i, 22, 155, 282, 311, 321 ; ii, 10, 180, 329, 394	6 . . .	i, 163
III, 1 . . .	i, p. lxxii	8 . . .	ii, 79, 83
I, 1 . . .	i, 34, 117, 119, 121, 159 ; ii, 65, 240	9 . . .	ii, 49, 55
I, 3 . . .	i, 288 ; ii, 225, 232	V, 2 . . .	i, 171 ; ii, 401
I, 8 . . .	ii, 171-173	4 . . .	ii, 112
I, 9 . . .	ii, 38, 44	5 . . .	i, p. xxxv, 178
2, 6 . . .	i, 282 ; ii, 302	7 . . .	i, 173
2, 7 . . .	ii, 376	VI, 1 . . .	ii, 154
2, 8 . . .	i, 157, 278 ; ii, 173	3 . . .	i, 48
2, 9 . . .	i, 25, 29, 31, 186 ; ii, 173, 285	3 ; 4 . . .	i, 284 ; ii, 45, 89
2, 10 . . .	ii, 186	4 . . .	i, 263 ; ii, 74, 78, 85
Nirukta		5 . . .	ii, 376
I, 2 . . .	i, 16	8 . . .	i, 29
		Rig-veda-samhitā
		I, 98, 1 . . .	i, 144
		104, 1 . . .	i, 288
		164, 39 . . .	i, 83 seq.
		II, 12 . . .	ii, 274
		IV, 26, 1 seqq. . .	ii, 37 n.
		VIII, 53, 7 . . .	i, 262
		IX, 46, 4 . . .	i, 242
		X, 14, 1 . . .	ii, 123
		71, 3 . . .	i, 211
		88, 3 . . .	i, 147
		88, 12 . . .	i, 144

- X, 90 i, 95 seq.
 121, 1 i, 142
 129, 2 ii, 85
 129, 6 i, 307
 190, 3 i, 215, 361
- Sāṅkhya-kārikā
 3 i, 257, 364 n.
 12, 13 i, 364 n.
 15 i, 364 n., 367 n.
- Sāṅkhya-sūtras
 I, 129 seqq. . . i, 364 n.
 II, 31 ii, 86 n.
- Shadvimsa-brāhmaṇa
 I, 1 i, 219
- Satapatha-brāhmaṇa
 I, 3, 1, 26 . . . ii, 321
 VI, 1, 1, 1 . . . ii, 74
 1, 3, 2; 4 . . . i, 303
 X, 1, 2, 2 . . . ii, 303
 2, 6, 8 . . . ii, 387
 3, 3, 6 . . . i, 85
 5, 2, 3 . . . ii, 267
 5, 2, 23 . . . ii, 267
 5, 4, 1 . . . ii, 272
 5, 4, 16 . . . ii, 234
 6, 1, 11 . . . i, 146, 148
 6, 3 i, p. lxvii
 6, 3, 1 . . . ii, 352
 6, 3, 2 . . . i, 112, 177; ii, 180
- XI, 5, 3, 13 . . . i, 227
 6, 2, 6 . . . ii, 109
 XII, 4, 1, 1 . . . ii, 290
 XIV, 6, 7, 30 . . ii, 59
- Svetāśvatara-upanishad
 I, 1 i, 255
 11 ii, 139
 12 ii, 154
 II, 8 i, 297
 10 ii, 351
 12 i, 223
 III, 1 i, 98
 8 i, 98, 252, 266, 298; ii, 47, 400
 9 ii, 180
 19 i, 51, 355
- IV, 3 i, 111; ii, 62
 5 i, p. xxxix, 253
 6 ii, 240
 10 i, 243
 10; 11 . . . i, 255
 19 ii, 18
 V, 2 i, 292
 8 i, 175; ii, 44
 9 ii, 38, 44
 VI, 8 i, 51, 347
 9 i, 61; ii, 20
 11 i, 34, 74; ii, 32, 242
 12 i, 329
 13 i, 298
 15 i, 167, 231
 18 i, 213, 240
 19 i, 62, 284, 349; ii, 394
- Taittirīya-āraṇyaka
 III, 12, 7 . . . i, 62, 278, 329; ii, 62
 X, 64 ii, 220
- Taittirīya-brāhmaṇa
 II, 2, 4, 2 . . . i, 204
 III, 1, 4, 1 . . . i, 215
 12, 9, 7 . . . i, 91, 299
- Taittirīya-saṃhitā
 I, 5, 3 ii, 415
 6, 2 ii, 415
 6, 2, 2 . . . i, 258
 6, 3, 3 . . . i, 91
 6, 8, 1 . . . ii, 107
 II, 2, 10, 2 . . . i, 294
 3, 6 ii, 259
 5, 5, 2 . . . ii, 195 n.
 V, 1, 10, 3 . . . ii, 267
 3, 2, 3 . . . ii, 79
 3, 2, 5 . . . ii, 79
 3, 12, 1 . . . ii, 354
 VII, 1, 1, 6 . . . i, 224
 1, 9 ii, 240 n.
 3, 1 ii, 261 n.
 5, 5, 2 . . . ii, 274
- Taittirīya-upanishad
 I, 6 i, p. cvii
 11, 1 ii, 297
 11, 2 ii, 120

INDEX OF SANSKRIT WORDS

TO

VOLUMES XXXIV (i) AND XXXVIII (ii).

- amśa*, part, Part i, pages lvii, lviii, lxxv, xcvi seq.
- akshara*, the Imperishable, i, 169-171, 243; ii, 239 seq.
- syllable, i, 169.
- akhyâtivâdin*, i, 5 n.
- Agni* = agrazî, i, 150.
- fire, i, 255.
- fire-altar, ii, 260-268.
- agnikayana*, the building of the fire-altar, ii, 261 n., 264.
- agnihotra*, ii, 313.
- āṅga*, subordinate member (of a sacrificial act), i, 199.
- āṅgushṭhamâtra*, of the size of a thumb, i, pp. xxxvii, xxxviii, xlii.
- āṅgushṭhamâtratâ*, the being of the size of a thumb, i, 196 n.
- akid vastu*, non-sentient matter, i, p. lxxv.
- agâ*, its meaning discussed, i, 252-257.
- unborn, i, 253.
- she-goat, i, 253, 256 n.
- = mâyâ, i, 256 n.
- agîva*, non-soul, i, 428.
- anu*, of very minute size, i, pp. liv, lvi, lvii, lix, 384 n.; ii, 44.
- anutva*, minuteness, i, 382.
- smallness, subtlety, ii, 44.
- atigraha*, objects of the senses, i, p. cxi seq., 239; ii, 369.
- atirâtra*, i, 351.
- ativâdin*, i, 163, 165 seqq.
- atiraya*, reaching beyond itself, i, 334, 341.
- adrishṭa*, the unseen principle, i, p. li, 382, 406; ii, 70 seqq., 75, 115, 137 n., 166.
- adrishṭârtha*, ii, 378 n.
- adresya*, that which is not seen, i, p. xlii.
- advaita*, non-duality, monism, i, pp. xxx, cxxv.
- adharma*, demerit, i, 26, 429.
- adhika*, additional to, i, p. xcvi.
- adhikâra*, statement of claim, ii, 110.
- adhidâivata*, relating to the gods, ii, 91.
- adhipatipratyaya*, the defining cause (Bauddha), i, 409 n.
- adhishṭhâna*, superintendence, guidance, i, 7 n.
- adhyâtma*, relating to the Self, ii, 91.
- adhyâropita*, fictitiously ascribed, i, 130.
- adhyâsa*, superimposition, i, 3 n., 4 n.; ii, 197, 198.
- anârtha*, object of aversion, i, 378.
- anarthin*, the non-desiring person, i, 378.
- anârabdhakârya*, works which have not yet begun to produce their effects, i, p. lxxviii.
- anâsrama*, not belonging to any one of the four stages of life, i, p. lxxvi.
- anîṣâ*, impotence, i, 122.
- anubhava*, perception, i, 300 n.
- anuyâga*, ii, 287 n.
- anuvâkyâ*, ii, 259, 259 n.
- anuvâda*, a statement referring to something already known, i, 221; ii, 55, 66, 138, 216, 221, 308, 309, 322, 322 n.
- anuraya*, remainder of works, i, p. lix; ii, 113, 116, 119.
- anushṭhâna*, performance, ii, 121.
- antariksha*, ether, ii, 6.
- antaryamana*, ruling within, i, 131.

- antaryāmin, the ruler within, i, pp. xxviii, xxxv, xlii, lxii seqq., xcvi, c, cxiii, 131.
- antyeshti, funeral ceremony, ii, 109 n.
- anna, food, earth, ii, 23 seq.
- anyathākhyātivādin, i, 4 n., 5 n.
- aparam brahma, lower Brahman, i, pp. xxx, xxxiii n.
- aparā vidyā, lower knowledge, i, pp. lxxx, lxxxi, lxxxiv, cix, cxvi; ii, 19.
- aparokshatva, immediate presentation, i, 6 n.
- apavāda, sublation, ii, 197.
- apahatapāpmatva, i, p. lxxxiv.
- apahatapāpman, free from all evil, i, p. lxii.
- apāna, the descending vital air, i, 342; ii, 86, 89.
- apūrva, supersensuous principle, i, p. lxxv; ii, 109, 110 n., 181, 182, 183, 347 n.
- apratismākyāvirodha, cessation not dependent on a sublative act of the mind, i, 412.
- abhāvamātra, of a merely negative character, i, 410.
- abhiḡamana, approach to the temple, i, 440.
- abhiḡvalana, kindling, i, 403.
- abhidhāyaka, i, 204 n.
- abhimimāna, i, 143, 153.
- abhyudaya, exaltation, i, p. lxxvi; ii, 233.
- amānava, not a man, ii, 388, 388 n.
- ayana, ii, 250, 250 n., 251, 314.
- ayutasiddha, incapable of separate existence, i, 396, 397.
- ayutasiddhatva, i, 396.
- ayutasiddhi, i, 395.
- artha, an object of desire, i, 377 n.
- arthadhibetu, i, 204 n.
- arthavattva, i, p. lxxi.
- arthavāda, glorifying passage, i, p. lxxv, 218, 220 seqq.; ii, 212 n., 213 n., 227, 235, 246, 246 n., 251, 254, 255, 261, 264, 286, 290, 299 n., 310, 311, 312.
- alpaśruti, i, p. xlii.
- avakābedavāda, the doctrine that the soul is the highest Self in so far as limited by its adjuncts, i, pp. lviii, xcvi.
- avabhāsa, consciousness, i, 418 n.
- avasthiti, permanent abiding, i, p. c.
- avāntaraprakṛiti, i, 256 n.
- avidyā, Nescience, i, pp. lxxix, xcvi, xcvi, 6, 357 n., 393 n.; ii, 48, 83 n., 102.
- ignorance as to Brahman, i, p. cxv.
- avidvān, destitute of knowledge of Brahman, i, pp. lxxix, lxxxii.
- avibhāga, non-separation, i, p. lxxxiv.
- avimukta, the non-released soul, i, 153.
- avimoksha, i, 316.
- avivākya, ii, 261.
- aveshi, an offering mentioned under the heading of the rāgasūya-sacrifice, ii, 266.
- avyakta, unevolved (matter), i, p. xxviii.
- the Undeveloped, i, p. xxxix, 237-242, 238 n., 245, 252.
- avyākṛita, the Undeveloped, i, p. cxix.
- aranāyā, hunger, i, 59.
- arvakarma, horse-ear, a certain plant, i, 261 n.
- arvamedha, horse sacrifice, ii, 305 n.
- asamyagdarśin, a person who has not risen to perfect knowledge, i, p. cxiii.
- asat, that which is not, non-existent, i, 333 n. See also General Index.
- asatkāryavādin, i, 334, 339.
- astikāya, category, i, 429.
- ahaṅkartri, principle of egoity, i, 34.
- ahaṅkāra, the principle of egoity, i, p. xxiii, 364 n., 376 n., 440, 441; ii, 81.
- aham, secret name of Brahman, ii, 216 seq., 246.
- ahampratyaya, self-consciousness, ii, 52.
- ahar, secret name of Brahman, ii, 216 seq., 246.
- ākāṅkshā, a desire of complementation, ii, 279 n.
- ākāśa, ether, or space, i, 81-84, 175, 232, 243, 412, 429; ii, 3 n., 6.
- ākṛiti, i, 202 n.
- ākāra, conduct, ii, 119.
- religious duty, ii, 121.
- ātmakhyātivādin, i, 4 n.
- ātman ānandamaya, the Self consisting of bliss, i, p. lxix seq.
- purushavidha, the Self in the shape of a person, i, p. cv seq.

- âtman prânamaya, i, p. lxix seq.
 — vaivânara, i, p. xxxv.
 âtmânusmarana, consciousness of personal identity, ii, 148.
 âditya, sun, ii, 244.
 âdravana, the rushing on, i, 225.
 ânanda, bliss, i, 74.
 ânandamaya, consisting of bliss, i, pp. xxxiii, xlii, lxix seq., 66-71.
 — its true meaning, i, 71-76.
 — kosa, involucre of delight, ii, 203.
 âbhâsa, reflection, i, pp. lviii, xcvi.
 — = hetvâbhâsa, a fallacious argument, i, pp. lviii seq., xcvi.
 âyurveda, medicine, ii, 152.
 ârabdhakârya, works which have begun to produce their effects, i, p. lxxviii.
 ârtâb, Rîgvedins, ii, 228.
 âlambanapratyaya, the substantial cause, i, 409 n.
 âlayavigñâna, internal cognition, i, 426 seq., 426 n.
 âlayavigñâna-pravâha, the train of self-cognitions, i, 403.
 âvaranâbhâva, absence of any covering, i, 412 n.
 âvirbhâva, i, p. xxxvi.
 âvirbhûtasvarûpa, i, 185 n.
 âsrama, stage of life, ii, 300-303, 306 seq., 309, 315 seq., 317, 324 seq.
 âsramakarmâni, duties of the four stages of life, i, p. lxxv.
 âsra, the issuing outward, i, 428, 428 n.
 igyâ, oblation, i, 440.
 itara, the other one, i.e. the individual soul, i, p. xcvi.
 iti, so, ii, 167, 169, 344.
 indriya, sense-organ, ii, 94.
 iva, i, p. cxx seq.
 ishri, sacrificial oblation, ii, 108-110, 259, 353 n.
 îva, Lord, i, 122.
 îvara, the Lords, i, 213.
 — divine being, i, 307.
 utkrânti, departure (of the soul from the body), i, p. lxxxi.
 udanyâ, thirst, i, 59.
 udâna, the ascending function of the chief vital air, ii, 86, 89 seq.
 udgîtha. See General Index.
 udgîtha-vidyâ. See General Index.
 udbhid, name of a sacrifice, i, 261, 261 n.
 upakurvâna, a Brahmatârin for a certain time only, not for life, ii, 318 seq.
 upanishad, secret name, ii, 216.
 upanyâsa, reference to something known, ii, 409 n.
 uparati, discontinuance of religious ceremonies, i, 12 n.
 upalabdhi, perception, ii, 57.
 upalabdhi, the perceiving person, i, 413.
 — perceiving principle, ii, 57.
 upasad, ii, 239 seq.
 upasthâna, ii, 252.
 upâdâna, the material cause of the world, i, pp. xxv, xciii, xciv.
 — activity, i, 405 n.
 — procuring of things to be offered, i, 440.
 upâdhi, limiting adjunct, i, pp. xxvi, lvii, lxii, lxiv, xcv, cxxi; ii, 153.
 upâsanâ and upâsana, devout meditation, i, pp. lxxviii, xciv, 22; ii, 203 n., 253 n.
 ubhayalingatva, i, pp. lxiii, lxiv.
 ūrdhvaretas, ascetic, i, p. lxxv seq.
 ekatva, unity, ii, 197.
 evam, so, ii, 167.
 omkâra, the syllable Om, i, p. lxxviii; ii, 194, 196-199, 283.
 âisvarya, lordly power, i, p. lxxxiv, 130.
 audâśînya, non-activity, ii, 69 n.
 ka, pleasure, i, 126 seq.
 kapila, i, 292 n.
 karmakânda. See General Index.
 karman, work, action, i, p. lxxi, 270, 357 n., 390 n.; ii, 83 n., 102, 103, 105, 121.
 — motion, i, 387.
 karmabheda, ii, 166 n.
 karmânga, ii, 120 n.
 karmâsaya, aggregate of works, ii, 113.
 kâma, desire, ii, 83 n.
 — desire, lovely thing, ii, 134.
 — wish, for satyakâma, ii, 247.

kāranāvasthâ, causal condition, i, p. xxix.
 kârîfreshî, a sacrifice offered to bring about rain, ii, 118, 118 n.
 kâryam brahma, effected Brahman, i, p. lxxxii.
 kâryavasthâ, condition of an effect, i, p. xxix.
 kârshâpana, ii, 178.
 kuâ, small wooden rod, ii, 225, 227 seq., 227 n.
 kûrastha, absolutely changeless, i, 327.
 kûrasthanitya, eternal without undergoing any changes, i, 28.
 kaivalya = sampatti, i, p. lxxxv.
 kratu, determination, i, 107.
 kratvartha, subordinate to action, i, p. lxxv, 291 n.
 kshanikatva, momentariness, i, 403 n.
 kshetragña, individual soul, i, 122 ; ii, 83.
 kha, ether, i, 126 seq.
 khadira, ii, 313.
 gana, troop, i, p. lxxxiii.
 guna, the three constituent elements of the pradhâna, i, 46, 48 seq., 364 n.
 — the three qualities (Sâṅkhya), i, 254, 353.
 — quality, i, 336 n., 390.
 — secondary matter, ii, 187.
 gunavâda, a statement of a quality, i, 221 ; ii, 112, 261, 299, 299 n.
 gunavidhi, enjoining some secondary matter, i, 108 n. ; ii, 279.
 godohana, a certain sacrificial vessel, ii, 253, 253 n., 255 seq., 284, 321, 347, 347 n.
 gaunyasambhavât, ii, 77.
 graha, seizers, i. e. senses and organs, i, p. cxi seq., 239 ; ii, 79, 83, 369.
 ghana = saṅghâta, i, 173.
 — = mûrtta, shape, i, 173 n.
 kâmasa, a sacrificial vessel, ii, 253 n., 347 n.
 kâraṇa, conduct, ii, 114, 119 seq.
 — 'remainder of works,' ii, 120 seq.
 — 'good and evil works,' ii, 121.
 kâritra, conduct, ii, 119.
 âit, intelligence, i, 3 n.

âitta, mind, thought, i, 402 ; ii, 48, 81.
 âitanya, pure intelligence, i, pp. xxiv, liv, lxxxiv.
 — consciousness, ii, 269.
 âaitta, mental, i, 402.
 gagadvâyâpâra, world-business, i, p. xxxix.
 gana, i, 261 n.
 garâ, decay, i, 405 n.
 gâti, species, i, 405 n.
 gîva, individual soul, i, p. xxxii and often.
 — intelligent principle, i, 53.
 gîvaghana, of the shape of the individual soul, i, 173.
 gîvapura, city of the individual soul, i, 178.
 gîvâtman, the living Self, i, p. cxxii, 62 n., 233 ; ii, 96, 140.
 — the object of self-consciousness, i, 37.
 guhî, sacrificial ladle, ii, 253, 253 n., 254, 256, 287 n.
 gña, intelligent, intelligence, i, pp. liv, xcvi.
 — individual soul, i, 122.
 gñâtri, knowing agent, i, pp. lv, lvii.
 gñâna, pure intelligence or thought, i, pp. xxv, lxxv.
 — knowledge, i, pp. lv, cxiv.
 gyotishroma. See gyotis.
 gyotis, light, also = gyotishroma, a certain sacrificial performance, i, pp. xxxviii, xliv, 54 seq., 57, 87, 88-93 ; ii, 185, 185 n.
 taggalân, i, 108 ; ii, 21.
 tat tvam asi, that art thou, i, p. lxxxiv.
 tattva, category, i, 428.
 tâdâtmya, identity, i, 436.
 titikshâ, patience in suffering, i, 12 n.
 trishnâ, desire, i, 405 n.
 tegas, elementary fire, heat, i, 255 ; ii, 368.
 tegomâtrâb, parts of light, ii, 102.
 tyat, that, ii, 25, 167.
 trasarenu, a combination of three atoms, lit. a speck of dust, ii, 41 n., 392 n.
 tritva, the being three, i, 384 n.
 dakshinâyana, southern progress of the sun, i, p. lxxxii.

- Datta for Devadatta, ii, 248.
dama, self-restraint, i, 12 n.
darsapūrnāmāsa, the full and new moon sacrifice, ii, 255, 275, 287 n., 309, 309 n., 313, 324.
daharavidyā. See General Index.
dir, place, ii, 14.
dubkha, pain, i, 405 n.
durmanas, mental affliction, i, 405 n.
devayāna, path of the gods, i, p. cvii.
dehin, the embodied Self, the individual soul, i, 33.
dravya, substance, ii, 15 n.
dvitva, the being two, i, 384 n.
dharma, religious duty, i, 26, 299, 300.
— merit, i, 429.
— qualifying particulars, ii, 186.
dhū, to shake, ii, 228 seq.
dhvani, tone, i, 208.
nāśī, vein. See General Index.
nāmarūpavyākaraṇa, evolution of names and forms, i, p. lix.
Nāśī, i, 153.
nitya, permanent, i, p. lxxviii.
nityatā, permanency, ii, 312 n.
nityānuvāda, ii, 216.
nididhyāsā, mental concentration, i, 297 n.
nimitta, operative cause, i, p. xl, 331 n.
niyogabhedā, ii, 166 n.
nirguṇa, non-qualified, i, pp. xxxiii, cxvi, cxxiv.
nirguṇam brahma, i, pp. xxx, lxxi, lxxii.
nirgara, destruction, i, 428, 428 n.
nirviśeṣatva, absence of distinctive attributes, i, p. lxi.
neti neti, 'not so, not so,' i, pp. lxiii, lxiv.
naimittika, i, 331 n.
naishṭhika, a Brahma-tārin for life, ii, 318 seq.
pañcāgaṇāb, five-people, i, p. xl, 257-262, 258 n.
pañcapūli, one bundle made of five bundles, i, 259.
pañcāgnividya, knowledge of the five fires, i, pp. lxxxiii, cviii; ii, 187.
pad, to go, ii, 393.
para, higher, highest, i, 173.
paramārthadr̥śhi, intuition, ii, 37 n.
param brahma, higher Brahman, i, pp. xxx, xxxiii n.
parāgrūpatva, externality, i, 130.
parā vidyā, highest knowledge, i, pp. lxxxiii, cix, cx, cxvi.
parināma, change, modification, i, pp. xxix, xl, xcv, cxviii, 393 n.
parināmavāda, i, p. xcv.
parināmīnitya, eternal, although changing, i, 28.
parimandala, spherical, i, 382 n.
parivedana, lament, i, 405 n.
parṇamayitva, the quality of being made of parṇa-wood, ii, 253 n.
pāṇḍitya, learning, i, p. lxxvi; ii, 322, 323.
pāramārthika, real, i, p. lxxiii; ii, 133.
pāriplava, recitation of certain stories at stated intervals during the year occupied by the aśvamedha sacrifice, ii, 305 seq., 305 n.
pārivrāgya, the state of the wandering mendicant, ii, 302.
pudgala, body, i, 429.
— atom (Gaiṇa), i, 431.
purījaya, dwelling in the city, i, 172, 178.
purītat, pericardium, ii, 144.
puruṣa, the Person, i, pp. cxix, cxxiii seq., 298; ii, 205.
— purījaya, the person dwelling in the castle (of the body), i, 172, 178.
— soul, i, 36; ii, 167, 169.
— individual soul (in the Sāṅkhyasense), i, pp. xl, xlvi, 45, 238 n., 370.
purushayagña, man-sacrifice, ii, 220.
purushārtha, beneficial to man (soul), i, 291 n.; ii, 120 n.
puroḍāsa, cake, ii, 240, 259.
pūrva-pakṣa, the prima facie view, i, 22, 316 and often.
prīthagbhūta, separate, i, p. lxxxiv.
prakaraṇa, subject-matter, i, 68 n., 166, 256 n.; ii, 253 n., 254, 260-264.
prakāra, mode, i, pp. xxviii, liii, lxiv.
prakāśa, luminousness, i, p. lxv.
prakāśarūpatā, i, p. lxiii.
prakṛiti, i, p. lxxxiii, 329.
— = pradhāna of the Sāṅkhyas, i, p. xciii, 16 n., 238 n., 253.
prakṛitaitāvattva, i, pp. lxiv, xcvi.

- prakāya, accumulation, i, 384 n.
 pragñā, intelligence, i, 100, 103, 105.
 pragātman, the intelligent Self, i, 97.
 pranava, the syllable Om, ii, 282, 282 n.
 pratibimbavāda, the doctrine that the soul is a reflection of the Self in the buddhi, i, pp. lviii, xcvi seq.
 pratisamkhyāvirodha, cessation dependent on a sublative act of the mind, i, 412.
 pratika, symbol, i, pp. lxxvii, lxxxii, lxxxiii, 147 n.
 pratikopāsana, meditation in which Brahman is viewed under a symbol, i, p. lxxvii.
 pratyaksha, intuition, i, 266.
 pratyagātman, the interior Self, i, 5 n., 32; ii, 335.
 pratyakṣa, internal, i, 133.
 prathamagatva, i, p. lxxxiii.
 pradesa, part, i, 388.
 pradhāna, principal element, i, pp. lxiii, xcvi; ii, 278.
 — as a Sāṅkhya term. See General Index.
 prapañcaviśiṣṭatā, the quality of being differentiated by the world, i, p. lxv.
 prabalakarmāntara, another very strong work, i, p. lxxvi.
 pramāṇa, means of proof, i, p. xli.
 pramātri, knowing subject, i, 418 n.
 prayāga, five offerings made to the fuel, &c., ii, 255, 274, 274 n., 275, 287, 313, 331.
 prayogana, final end, i, 38.
 pralaya. See General Index.
 pravṛttivigñāna, quasi-external cognition, i, 426 n., 427.
 pravṛgīn, mendicant, i, p. lxxv.
 prastāva, i, 84, 86, 87; ii, 254.
 prākūrya, abundance, i, 77.
 prāṇa, intelligent, i, 60, 234.
 — (ātman), the highest Self, i, 192 seqq., 195; ii, 45, 134, 138, 141, 144.
 prāṇa, vital air, a generic name denoting the sense-organs, and the manas, i, p. lix, 261, 269 seqq.; ii, 65 n., 94, 96. See also Prāṇas in the General Index.
 prāṇa, (chief) vital air, breath, i, p. lxxix, 84-87, 97-106, 162 seqq., 172, 229-231. See also General Index.
 — the forward-function of the chief vital air, i, 342; ii, 86, 89.
 — air, i, 229.
 prāṇabhṛt, individual soul, i, 158.
 prāṇamaya (ātman), ii, p. lxix seq.
 prāṇa-vidyā, i, p. lxxviii; ii, 200 seq., 212.
 prāṇasarīratva, i, p. lxxvii.
 prāṇasamvāda, the colloquy of the vital airs, i, p. lxx.
 prādesamātra, measured by a span, i, 151.
 priyasirastva, i, p. lxix.
 bandha, bondage, i, 428.
 bahutva, plurality, i, 384 n.
 bālya, childlike state, i, p. lxxvi; ii, 322, 323, 325 seq.
 bāhyārthavādin, i, p. li.
 buddhi, intelligence, i, p. lv seqq., 239 seq.; ii, 27, 42-48, 50, 51, 56, 57, 65, 65 n., 81, 178, 336, 402.
 — mind, i, 104, 118 seqq., 418.
 — the apprehending agent, i, 206, 209, 210.
 — ‘the great one’ (technical Sāṅkhya term), i, 238 n.
 — internal organ, i, 331.
 — the generic name for buddhi, ahankāra, and manas, i, 376 n.
 bodha, thought, intelligence, ii, 160.
 brahma bhrāntam, i, p. cxxii.
 brahma māyopādāhikam, i, p. cxxii.
 brahmaṭārya, ii, 307.
 brahmapura, city of Brahman, i, 178.
 brahmaloka, world of Brahman, i, 180.
 brahmavidyā, knowledge of Brahman, i, pp. xxxvii, lxx, 216 seq.
 brahmasamsthā, grounded on Brahman, ii, 296, 300, 301.
 brahmasamsthātā, ii, 299 n.
 bhakti, figurative identification, ii, 7.
 bhagavat, holy, i, 440.
 Bhāmanī, name of the Lord, i, 125.
 Bhāmā for Satyabhāmā, ii, 248.
 bhārūpatva, i, p. lxxvii.
 bhāva, being, individual soul, ii, 30 n.
 bhāvanā, ii, 69 n.
 bhāvavikārah, six forms of existence, i, 16 n.

bhûta, element, i, 402.
 — beings, moving and non-moving things, ii, 63.
 bhûtasûkshma, subtle material elements, i, p. lix.
 bhûman. See General Index.
 bheda, individual existences, i, p. xxv.
 bhedâbhedavâda, i, 277 n.
 bhoga, fruition, i, p. lxxviii.
 bhautika, elementary, i, 402.

madhu-vidyâ, 'knowledge of the (sun as) honey,' i, 216 seq.; ii, 233.

manana, thinking, ii, 323.

manas, internal organ, mind, i, pp. xxiii, xxvi, li, lxxix, cxxi, 175, 239, 376 n., 398 n., 440; ii, 14, 16, 27, 33, 48, 65 n., 69, 81, 82, 84, 89, 90, 260, 336, 411, 413 seq., 415.

mano-buddhi, mind, i, 113, 277.

manomaya, consisting of mind, i, 111.

manomayatva, i, p. lxvii.

-maya, the affix, 'abounding in,' i, 67.

maranam, death, i, 405 n.

mahat, great, i, 252.

— the great principle (of the Sâṅkhyas), i, 252, 364 n., 370.

— big, i, 384 n.

mahattva, bigness, i, 383, 384 n.

mahâpitriyagña, ii, 299.

mahâpralaya, general annihilation of the world, i, 212 seq.; ii, 238.

mâtrâ, the elements and the sense organs, i, 281.

mâna, knowledge, i, 418 n.

mânava, human being, ii, 388 n.

mânasa, mental, ii, 260, 266 seq.

mâyâ, illusion, i, pp. lx, xcvi seq., 243, 256 n., 329, 371; ii, 133, 134.

— wonderful nature (Râmânuga), i, p. lxi.

— creative power, i, p. cxvii n.

mâyâvâda, theory of illusion, i, p. xcvi.

mâyâvâdin, i, p. cxx.

mukti, final release, i, pp. lxxv, lxxvii, lxxxix.

mukhya prâṇa, the chief vital air, i, p. lix; ii, 79, 84, 93 seq., 95.

muni, derived from manana, 'thinking,' ii, 323.

muni. See General Index.

muhūrta, moment, ii, 136.

mūrta rūpa, i, p. cxx.

mūrti, solid size, i, 394.

moksha, final release, i, 27, 28, 283, 428; ii, 58.

mauna, muni-ship, i, p. lxxvi; ii, 322 n., 323.

yagamâna, sacrificer, i, p. lxxvi.

yâgyâ, ii, 259, 259 n.

yâvatsampâtam, ii, 112, 113.

yûpa, a wooden post, i, 261, 261 n.

yoga, devout meditation, i, 440.

yoni, source, i, 136, 288.

— place, i, 288.

— womb, ii, 132.

yaugika, etymological (meaning), i, 261 n.

ragas = avidyâ, i, 123 n.

râkshasa = rakshas, i, 150.

rûdhi, conventional meaning, i, 256 n., 261 n.

rûpa, form, ii, 185.

rûpaskandha, the group of sensation, i, 402, 402 n.

rûpopyanyâsat, i, 142 n.

lakshana, indication, i, 258 n., 261 n.; ii, 127.

— implication, ii, 348.

laya, merging, i, p. lxxix.

lînga, indicatory or inferential mark, i, p. lxxv, 68 n., 196 n., 225 n.; ii, 224, 260, 261, 263, 264.

lîngâtman, the subtle Self, ii, 169.

lokâyatika, materialist, ii, 269.

Varanâ, 'that which wards off,' i, 153.

vasitva, i, p. lxxiii.

vâkya, syntactical unity, i, 196 n.; ii, 221, 224, 263, 287, 287 n.

vâkyabhedâ, split of the sentence, i, 108 n., 177 n.; ii, 279 n.

vâṭaka, i, 204 n.

vâmani, leader of blessings, i, 125; ii, 400.

vâyasa = vayas, i, 150.

vâsanâ, mental impression, i, 420 n.; ii, 56, 141.

vikalpa, optional procedure, ii, 228.

vikâra, modification, i, p. cxviii.

vikâra, expansion, i, pp. xxix, liii.

vikriti, ii, 309, 309 n.

- vigara, free from old age, i, p. lxii.
 vigñāna, individual soul, i, p. lvi.
 — knowledge (Baudha), i, 404 n.
 — cognition, idea, i, 418.
 — knowledge, internal organ, ii, 48, 82.
 vigñānakosa, i, 66.
 vigñānamaya, he who consists of knowledge, i, p. xxxviii, 273; ii, 33.
 vigñānavādin, an idealist, i, p. li, 401, 418 n.
 vigñānaskandha, the group of knowledge, i, 402, 402 n., 426 n.
 vigñānātman, cognitional Self, soul, i, 70, 120, 124, 174, 329.
 vidyā, knowledge, cognition, meditation, i, pp. lxvii-lxxvi, 6, 152; ii, 101, 187-284, 355, 378.
 vidyāmāhātmya, i, p. lxxi.
 vidyāvaidhi, ii, 279.
 vidvān, he who knows, i, pp. lxxvii-lxxxiv.
 vidhi, the establishing of something not yet known, ii, 408 seq. n.
 vidhriti, a liminary support, i, 181.
 vimṛityu, free from death, i, p. lxii.
 vivakṣhita, desired to be expressed, i, 110 n.
 vivarta, illusory manifestation of Brahman, i, pp. xcv, xcvi.
 vivartavāda, i, p. xcv.
 viśiṣṭa advaita, qualified non-duality, i, p. xxx.
 viśeṣana, specification, ii, 197.
 virvānara, i, 150.
 vṛitti, function, ii, 84.
 vedanā, feeling, i, 405 n. vedanāskandha, the group of feeling, i, 402, 402 n.
 vedi, a levelled spot, i, 261; ii, 252.
 vairāgya, absence of all desire, ii, 102.
 vailakṣhanya, difference of character, i, 308 n.
 vyakta, developed, manifested, i, 242, 245.
 vyapadeśa, expression of something known without reference to a vidhi, ii, 408 seq. n.
 vyavahāra, the phenomenal world, i, p. xxvi, 326 n.
 vyavahārāpekṣayā, with a view to the world of appearances, i, pp. lxxxiv, xc.
 vyākriyāta, it became developed, i, 268.
 vyāna, the cause of works of strength, ii, 86, 89 seq.
 vyāpin, all-pervading, i, p. liv, 111 n.
 vyūha, the four forms of Vāsudeva, i, p. xxiii, 440.
 vyoman, ether, i, 84.
 yakti, potentiality, i, 214.
 — power, i, 329.
 jābda, word, i, p. xxxvii, 196 n., 201.
 jābdāntaram, difference of terms, ii, 166 n.
 jama, tranquillity, i, 12 n.
 jarvari, 'night' = earth, ii, 24.
 jārīra, embodied, i, p. xcvi, 111.
 jishṭa, honourable man, ii, 320.
 jīla, conduct, ii, 119, 119 n.
 juk, grief, i, 225.
 sūnyavāda, hypothesis of a general void, ii, 14.
 sūnyavādin, a nihilist, i, 401.
 roka, grief, i, 405 n.
 śaddhā, faith, also explained as water, ii, 12 n., 103, 106-108, 109 n., 110 n.
 śruti, direct enunciation, i, 196 n.; ii, 262.
 śhadāyatana, the abode of the six (senses), i, 405 n.
 śhodasīn, i, 351.
 samyagdarśana, complete intuition, perfect knowledge, i, p. lxxvii, 172 n.; ii, 101.
 samyag-vigñāna, perfect knowledge, ii, 12.
 Samyadvāma, a name of the Lord, i, 125, 128, 130.
 samyoga, conjunction, i, pp. lxxix, lxxx, 335 seq., 336 n., 385, 390, 396 seq., 436; ii, 128 n.
 samrādhana, worship, i, p. lxxv.
 samvara, restraint, i, 428, 428 n.
 samvargavidyā, i, 224-226.
 samvid svayamprabhā, the self-luminous principle of thought, i, p. xcii.
 samśleṣa, intimate connexion, i, 399.
 saṁsāra. See General Index.

- samsârin, the transmigrating soul, i, 51, 66.
 samskâra, ceremonial purification, i, 33; ii, 120 n., 286, 286 n., 287 n., 347 n.
 — impression, affection (Buddha), i, 404 n. samskâraskandha, the group of impressions, i, 402, 402 n. samskrîta, produced, i, 410.
 samsthânavishesha, special arrangement, i, p. lxxv.
 saguna, qualified, i, pp. xxxiii, lxxxii, ci, cxvi, 330.
 sagunam brahma, the qualified (lower) Brahman, i, pp. xxx, lxxvii, lxxi, lxxii.
 saguna-vidyâ, qualified knowledge, i, pp. lxxii, lxxvi.
 sañkalpa, determination, wish, i, p. lxxxv; ii, 139.
 sañkoṭa, contraction or non-manifestation (of intelligence), i, pp. xxix, liii seq.
 sañghâta = ghana, i, 173.
 sak-kid-ânanda, i, p. xcii.
 samgñâskandha, the group of verbal knowledge, i, 402, 402 n.
 sat. See General Index.
 sattâ, the quality of being, i, 63 n., 306.
 — essentiality, ii, 16 n.
 sattva, goodness, i, 49 n.
 — internal organ, i, 122 seq., 161.
 — being, that which is, i, 333.
 sattva-guna, the quality of goodness, i, 379.
 satyakâma, having true wishes, i, pp. lxiii, lxxiii; ii, 247, 400.
 satyakâmatva, i, p. lxxiii.
 satyabhedavâda, i, 278 n.
 satyaloka, the world of the True, i, 181.
 satyasamkalpa, of truthful conception, i, pp. lxiii, lxxxv.
 satyasamkalpatva, truthfulness of conception, i, pp. lxxvii, lxxxiv.
 samnyâsa, ii, 222.
 samnyâsin, an ascetic, a man in the fourth stage of life, ii, 322-324, 325, 326.
 sanmâtira, 'only that which is,' i, p. lxiv.
 saptabhaṅginaya, i, 429.
 samanantarapratyaya, the immediate cause (Buddha), i, 409 n.
 samavâya, inherence, i, 335 seq., 335 n., 336 n., 341, 389 seq., 396 seq.
 samâdhâna, concentration of the mind, i, 12 n.
 samâdhi, meditation, ii, 52.
 samâna, the function of the chief vital air which conveys food equally through all the limbs of the body, ii, 86, 89 seq.
 sampatti, combination, i, p. lxxix; ii, 209.
 — = maraṇam, dying, i, p. lxxxv.
 — = kaivalya, i, p. lxxxv.
 sampâta, aggregate of works, ii, 113.
 samprasâda, serene being, i, p. xxxvi.
 — bliss, i, 164.
 sarvagata, omnipresent, i, p. liv.
 sarvavaritva, i, p. lxxvii.
 sarvâstivavâdin, realist, i, p. li, 401.
 saviresha, distinguished by qualities, i, 74, 76, 78 n.
 savireshatva, presence of distinctive attributes, i, p. lxi.
 sahakâripratyaya, the auxiliary cause (Buddha), i, 409 n.
 sâkshât-kâra, intuition, i, p. lxxv, 18 n., 300.
 sâkshin, a witnessing principle, i, 49, 150.
 sâmanâdhikaranyâ, co-ordination, ii, 196 n.
 siddhânta, the final conclusion, i, pp. liv, lvi, 316; ii, 392.
 sushupti, deep sleep, i, p. lxxxv.
 sushumnâ, the vein passing through the crown of the head, i, pp. lxxxii, cvii, cix, cx.
 sūkshmarâra, the subtle body, i, p. xxxix.
 sūtrâtman, the lower Brahman, i, p. lxix, 172 n.
 sriṣṭikrama, the order of creation, ii, 23.
 setu, bridge, i, 156.
 — bank, ii, 175.
 skandha, group, i, 402 seq.
 stuti, glorification, i, p. lxxv.
 sparśa, touch, i, 405 n.
 sphoṭa, manifestor, i, p. xxxvii, 204 seq., 204 n., 209, 210.
 syâdvâda, sceptical doctrine, i, 431.
 svapiti, to sleep, i, 59.
 svabhâva, nature, i, 357 n.

-
- svayamprakāśa, self-luminous, i, 5 n.
 svara, accent, i, p. lxxiv.
 svarūpa, true nature, i, 186.
 svarūpānyathābhāva, change of essential nature, i, p. liv.
 svarga, heaven, ii, 405.
 svargaloka, heavenly world, i, pp. cviii, cx.
 svādhyāya, recitation, i, 440.
 svāpyaya = sushupti, deep sleep, i, p. lxxxv. hiraṇyagarbha. See General Index.
 hṛdaya, heart, i, 59.
 hetvābhāsa, fallacious argument, i, p. xcviil.

GENERAL INDEX

TO

VOLUMES XXXIV (i) AND XXXVIII (ii).

- Abhipratârin. See Kaitraratha.
- Accents, udâtta, anudâtta, svarita, depend on the tone, Part i, page 208.
- Action, five classes of, and five organs of, ii, 81.
- Actions (karman): birth, a. and death, i, p. xxvii.
- there is no confusion of a., or fruits of a., because there is no extension of the acting and enjoying Self, ii, 68.
 - the soul takes with itself the results of good and evil a., when leaving the body, ii, 102.
 - some single a. are the causes of more than one new existence, ii, 118.
 - not the fruits of all a. are brought about by death, the fruits of some a. being enjoyed in this life already, ii, 118, 119.
 - the fruits of, according to Gaimini, are brought about by the a. themselves, ii, 182.
 - see also Works.
- Adhikarâṇas, 'heads of discussion,' i, p. xxxi.
- Adhvaryu priest, ii, 240.
- Āditya, the sun, i, 216, 217.
- the ideas of Ā. &c. are to be superimposed on the members of the sacrificial action, i, p. lxxvii; ii, 345-349.
 - is Ā. to be meditated upon as Brahman, or Brahman as Ā.? ii, 342-345.
 - the reaching of Ā. constitutes the fruit of certain works, ii, 347.
 - Vāyu comes before Ā. (on the path of the gods), ii, 385.
- Ādityas, class of gods, i, 202, 216.
- Adṛishṭa. See Unseen principle.
- Advaita, non-duality or monism taught both by Śaṅkara and Rāmānuga, i, p. xxx.
- Agā does not mean pradhāna, i, p. xxxix, 252-257.
- the elements beginning with light are meant by, i, 254 seq.
 - denotes the causal matter metaphorically, i, 256 seq.
- Agātasatru, i, p. cv.
- dialogue of Bālāki and A., i, 268-274.
- Agent, every action requires an, i, 337 seqq.
- Aggregate, the seventeenfold, ii, 65, 65 note.
- Aggregates, the dyad of, assumed by the Bauddhas with its two causes, cannot be established, i, 400-409.
- the Gaina doctrine that a. are formed from the atoms, i, 430 seq.
- Agni, the eater of food, i, 116, 117.
- the highest Self, from the etymology agni = agraṇī, i, 150.
 - offers to Agni, i, 215.
 - fire, i, 217.
 - having become speech entered the mouth, ii, 91 seq.
 - speech enters into, at the time of death, ii, 105 seq.
 - and the man in the sun are not equal, though the term 'death' is applied to both, ii, 267.
 - means light, when mentioned on the path of the gods, ii, 385.
 - Vairvānara. See Vairvānara.
 - see also Fire.

Agnihotra, ii, 191.

— the permanent obligation of the, ii, 296, 296 n., 297.

— a text relating to the, which forms part of the mahāpitri-yagña, ii, 299 seq.

— offered to the prāṇas, ii, 249–252.

— offered during a whole month at the ayana of the Kunda-pâyins, ii, 250 n., 251, 314.

— transference of the fire from the Gârhapatya-fire to the two other fires, at the, ii, 251.

— the details of the fundamental A. are not valid for the Prânâgni-hotra, ii, 251 seq.

— the imaginary A. consisting of speech and breath, ii, 263.

— the A. and other works of permanent obligation enjoined by the Veda, tend towards the same effect as knowledge, i, p. lxxviii; ii, 358–360.

— and similar works are either connected with a special knowledge based on the constituent members of the sacrifice, or not, ii, 360 seq.

Agnirahasya, i, p. lxxiv.

— the Sāṅdilya-vidyâ part of the, ii, 214, 216.

— of the Vâgasaneyins, ii, 260.

Agnishomau, a he-goat sacrificed to, ii, 274, 274 n.

Air, springs from ether, i, p. lii; ii, 18 seq.

— is it 'the abode of heaven, earth, and so on'? i, 154, 158.

— in the a., when it manifests itself in the form of Parganya, lightning, thunder, rain, and thunderbolts manifest themselves, i, 229.

— with its five forms, i, 229.

— is founded on space (ether), i, 413.

— origination of, ii, 3, 18 seq.

— is a product, ii, 18 seq.

— fire is produced from, ii, 20–22.

— fire is dissolved into, ii, 26.

— is dissolved into Ether, ii, 26.

— passing into the adhyâtma-state, dividing itself fivefold and thus abiding in a specialised condition is called prāṇa, ii, 87.

Âkâra. See Ether.

Akshara. See Imperishable.

Alms, less meritorious than sacrifices, i, 27.

— lead to the road of the fathers, ii, 124.

Ânandagiri mentions Dravidâkârya, i, p. xxii.

Ânandamaya. See Self consisting of bliss.

Animal sacrifice is an act of duty, as we know from Scripture, ii, 131.

— and the prohibition of doing harm to any living creature, ii, 310.

Animals and men compared, i, 7 seq.

— gods, and rishis excluded from the study of the Veda, i, 197 n.

Aniruddha, a manifestation of the highest being, i, p. xxiii.

— a form of Vāsudeva, denotes the principle of egoity, i, 440.

— cannot spring from Pradyumna, i, 441, 442.

— taken as a Lord, i, 441 seq.

Antaryâmin brâhmana (i.e. Brîh. Up. III, 7), i, p. xxviii.

Anudâta. See Accents.

Apântaratamas was born on this earth as Krishna Dvaipâyana, ii, 235.

— the bodily existence of A. and others who are entrusted with offices conducive to the subsistence of the worlds lasts as long as the office lasts, ii, 235–238.

Arhat = Gina, i, 430, 434.

Ârtabhâga, instructed by Yâgñavalkya, i, pp. lxxx, cxii; ii, 373 seq.

Arthavâdas, i, 219 seq., 304, 348, 355.

— the corporeality of the gods appears from, i, 198, 217, 223.

— as means of knowledge, i, 218, 220 seq.

— are either anuvâda or gunavâda, i, 221.

— possess authoritative power, i, 222.

— have no authority if not connected with a corresponding injunctive passage, i, 225 n.

— have occasionally to be taken in a secondary sense, i, 318, 318 n.

- Arthavâdas, the non-return of the released soul is set forth in Mantras and A., ii, 418 seq.
- Asat (non-being, non-existent, non-entity, that which is not), the origin &c. of the world cannot proceed from it, i, 17 seq.
- the passages speaking of the A. do not intimate absolute non-existence, i, 266-268.
 - denotes 'Being' previous to the differentiation of names and forms, i, 267.
 - the term a. denotes another quality only, i, 332-334.
 - compared with 'the son of a barren woman,' i, 338 seq.
 - the cause of the world, i, 341.
 - entity does not spring from a. or non-entity, i, 415-418.
 - Brahman cannot spring from it, for the a. is without a self, ii, 20.
- Ascetic who has broken his vow of chastity, i, p. lxxvi; ii, 317-320.
- the passage enjoining a childlike state means that the a. is to live not manifesting himself, ii, 325-327.
 - see Muni.
 - see Samnyâsin.
- Ashvakâs, i, 297 n.
- Âsmarathya, i, pp. xix, xcix, 150 seq., 276 seq., 279, 280.
- Âsramas. See Stages of life.
- Asuras among the pañcagāṇab, i, 262.
- metres of the A., i.e. metres of less than ten syllables, ii, 228, 228 n.
- Âsuri, a Smṛiti writer, i, 291.
- Âsvapati Kaikeya, i, 227 n.; ii, 276.
- Âtharvanikas, their rite of carrying fire on the head before the study of the Veda, ii, 186, 189 seq.
- the seven libations (from the saurya libation up to the sataudana libation) are limited to the Â., ii, 189, 190.
- Atirâtra-sacrifice, Shodâsin-cup at the, i, 262 seq.; ii, 188.
- Âtman means the internal organ, ii, 81.
- see Self.
- Atomistic doctrine refuted, i, p. xlviii, 289, 317 seq., 354, 381, 394-400.
- Atoms, refutation of the Vaisesika 'tenet that the world originates from a. set in motion by the adrishya, i, p. 1 seq., 16, 381-400.
- conjunction of a. the material cause of the world, i, 46, 382, 382 n., 387 n.
 - conjunction cannot take place between the a., the soul, and the internal organ, because they have no parts, i, 398.
 - conjunction of the soul with the a. cannot be the cause of the motion of the a., i, 398 n.
 - during the period of each pralaya they are isolated and motionless, i, 382 n.
 - subsist during a certain period without producing any effect, i, 382.
 - possess the qualities of colour, &c., according as they are a. of earth, water, fire, or air, i, 382, 382 n., 386, 402.
 - are of spherical form, i, 382, 382 n.
 - the form of extension of an effect depends on the number of, not on their form of extension, i, 382 seq., 383 n.
 - cannot be divided themselves, i, 386 seq.
 - action of the a. is impossible, whether the adrishya is assumed to adhere in the a. or in the soul, i, 386-389.
 - Kanâda's reasons for the permanence of, i, 392 seq.
 - difficulties in the relation of the a. and the four elements, i, 393 seq.
 - may be decomposed by their passing back into the indifferenced condition of the highest cause, i, 400.
 - the cause of the aggregate of the elements and elementary things (Baudha), i, 403.
 - external things can neither be a. nor aggregates of, i, 419.
 - the Gaina doctrine that aggregates are formed from the a., refuted, i, 430 seq.

Ātreya, i, p. xix; ii, 320.

Audulomi, i, pp. xix, lxxxiv, xcix, 277 seq., 278 n., 279, 280.

— thinks that the meditations on subordinate members of the sacrifice are the work of the priest, ii, 321.

— thinks that the released soul manifests itself by the sole nature of intelligence, ii, 409 seq.

Aupanishadas or Vedāntins, i, p. xx seq.

Austerity, the path of the gods cannot be attained by faith and a., unaided by knowledge, ii, 234.

— the stage of life, in which a. is the chief thing, ii, 298.

— the term a. denotes the hermit in the woods, and not the mendicant, ii, 300 seq.

Avabhṛtha-ceremony, identification of the A. with death, ii, 221.

Avidyā. See Mâyā.

— see Nescience.

Avyakta. See Undeveloped.

Bādarāyaṇa, i, p. xi, 198, 218; ii, 182 seq., 285, 290, 297 seq., 318, 360, 402 seq., 410, 412 seq.

— and the chief distinguishing doctrines of Saṅkara and Rāmānuga, i, pp. lxxxvii-c.

— the system of B. had greater affinities with that of the Bhāgavatas and Rāmānuga than with that of Saṅkara, i, p. c.

— quotes the Bhagavadgītā as an authority, i, p. cxxvi.

Bādari, i, pp. xix, lxxxii seq., xc seq.

— on the highest Lord as 'measured by a span,' i, 151.

— on the meaning of karana, ii, 121.

— thinks that the souls are led to the lower Brahman, ii, 389-392, 393-402.

— asserts the absence of a body and sense-organs on the part of the released, ii, 411 seq.

Bāhva, questioned about Brahman by Vāshkalī, explained it to him by silence, ii, 157.

Bālāki and Agātaratru, dialogue of, i, 268-274.

Bauddha doctrines refuted, i, p. li, 340, 400-428.

— — three principal, i, 401.

Bauddha philosophers, i, 15 n.

— schools, their idealistic doctrine rejected, i, p. xxvi.

— sects, teach the eternal flux of everything that exists, i, 403 n.

Bauddhas deny the authoritativeness of Scripture, i, 412.

— the opinion of the B. that the Self alone begins to function in a new body, and that new sense-organs are produced in a new body, ii, 103 seq.

Beatitude, highest, not to be attained by the knowledge of the Sāṅkhya-smṛiti irrespective of the Veda, nor by the road of Yoga-practice, i, 298.

— — there is no other means of obtaining it but the knowledge of the unity of the Self which is conveyed by the Veda, i, 298.

Being. See Sat.

Bhagavadgītā, as an authority for Bādarāyaṇa, i, p. cxxvi.

— the doctrine of the Bh. a fusion of the Brahman theory of the Upanishads with the belief in a personal highest being, i, p. cxxvi.

Bhāgavatas, or Pāṇḍarātras, the fore-runners of the Rāmānugas, i, p. xxii seq.

— their views refuted according to Saṅkara, approved of according to Rāmānuga, i, p. li seq., 439-443.

— their system nearer to Bādarāyaṇa than that of Saṅkara, i, p. c.

— — and the Bhagavadgītā, i, p. cxxvi.

— — and the Mahābhārata, i, p. cxxvii.

— — contradictions in, i, 442 seq.

— the theory of the Bh. that Brahman carries within its own nature an element from which the material universe originates, i, p. cxvii.

— the doctrine of the Bh. stated, i, 440.

Bhāllavins, a mantra of the, ii, 227 seq.

Bharuḍi quoted by Rāmānuga, i, p. xxi.

Bhāshika-sūtra for the accentuation of the Satapatha-brāhmaṇa, i, 258 note.

- Bhâshyakâra, i. e. Dramida, i, p. xxii.
 Bhedâbheda relation of the soul to Brahman, i, p. xix.
 Bhîshma chooses the time of his death, ii, 380.
 Bhrigu Vâruni, disciple of Varuna, i, 199.
 — and other sons of Brahman's mind were again born at the sacrifice of Varuna, ii, 235.
 Bhugyu Sâhyâyani, i, p. cv.
 Bhûman (that which is much) is Brahman, i, p. xxxv, 162-169.
 — is it the vital air? i, 162-168.
 — is bliss, i, 163.
 — is immortality, i, 163, 168.
 — in it the ordinary activities of seeing, &c., are absent, i, 168 seq.
 — knowledge of, ii, 412.
 Birth, action, death, i, p. xxvii.
 — when applied to the sprout, i, 340.
 — the terms 'b.' and 'death,' if applied to the soul, have a metaphorical meaning, ii, 28 seq.
 — may take place without the 'five oblations,' i. e. not in the ordinary way, ii, 125 seq.
 Blind man who had caught hold of the ox's tail, i, 55.
 Bliss is Brahman, i, 65, 75.
 — of Brahman is absolutely supreme, i, 67.
 — Brahman is the cause of b., i, 67.
 — absolute b. the result of higher knowledge, i, 138.
 — (Brahman as) the bhûman is b., i, 163, 168.
 — attaches to the state of deep sleep, i, 163, 164, 168.
 — constitutes the nature of the Self, i, 168.
 — and other qualities ascribed to Brahman in different scriptural texts, have to be attributed to Brahman everywhere, ii, 201-204.
 — see also Self consisting of b.
 Bodhâyana, author of a Vṛitti on the Vedânta-sûtras, i, p. xxi.
 Bodhâyana quoted by Râmânuga, i, p. xxi.
 Body, the product of Nescience, i, 244.
 — the Undeveloped, i, 246.
 — is the b. the sufferer, or the soul? i, 379.
 — the Sâṅkhya cannot admit a real connexion of the soul and the b., i, 379.
 — consists of three elements, fire, water, and earth, ii, 104.
 — water (liquid matter) preponderates in the b., ii, 104 seq.
 — Brahman's secret names with reference to the Devas and to the b., ii, 216 seq.
 — embodied soul and b. viewed as non-different, ii, 374.
 — subtle, due to the soul's higher knowledge, not due to Karman or works, i, p. lxxi.
 — — is beyond the soul, i, 244.
 — — is meant by the term avyakta, i, 241 seq., 244.
 — — and the gross b., i, 244, 245.
 — — consisting of the ten sense-organs, the five prâṇas, manas, and buddhi, ii, 65 note.
 — — is not destroyed by what destroys the gross b., ii, 372.
 — — the warmth which we perceive in the living b. belongs to the s. b., ii, 372.
 Brahmâtârin, ii, 298, 300.
 — who breaks the vow of chastity, ii, 318 seq., 320.
 Brahmâtârya, ii, 315.
 Brahman¹, according to Sâṅkara and Râmânuga, i, p. xxviii.
 — a certain vague knowledge of B. common to all the Upanishads, i, p. civ seq.
 — of Sâṅkara is impersonal, i, p. xxx.
 — becomes a personal God through Mâyâ, i, p. xxx.
 — with Râmânuga is a personal God, i, pp. xxx, cxxiii, cxxiv n.
 — only exists, i, p. xxvii.
 — is 'that which is,' and cannot have originated from anything else, i, p. lii, 266 seq., 332; ii, 19 seq.

¹ Arranged in the following order:—(1) names, definitions, and symbols of B.; (2) nature, qualities, powers, forms, parts, abodes of B.; (3) higher and lower B.; (4) unity of, and oneness with B.; (5) B. is everything; (6) B. and the world; (7) B. and the soul; (8) B. and Scripture; (9) knowledge of B.; (10) meditation on B.; (11) B. and final release; (12) world of B.

- Brahman is 'thought' and 'that which is,' ii, 160.
- cannot spring from that which is not, ii, 20.
 - is called Non-being, previously to the origination of the world, i, 267.
 - unborn, i, 349.
 - the highest Self is B., i, 79.
 - derivation of the word from brāh, i, 14.
 - identified with Vishṇu or Nārāyaṇa, i, p. xxxi note.
 - defined as that from which the origin, subsistence, and dissolution of this world proceed, i, pp. xxxii, xcii seq., 15-19, 107, 109, 117, 283.
 - in its causal condition, i, p. xxix.
 - in the condition of an effect, i, p. xxix.
 - later definitions of B., e.g. as sak-tid-ānanda, i, p. xcii.
 - is ānandamaya, or, the Self consisting of bliss, i, 65, 66-68, 75.
 - only is bliss as bhūman, i.e. in its plenitude, i, 169.
 - is called the tail, i.e. a member of the Self consisting of bliss, i, 72 seq., 75, 76 seq.
 - not a member, but the support or abode, the one nest of all worldly bliss, i, 73.
 - the bliss of B. is absolutely supreme, i, 67.
 - is declared to be the cause of bliss, i, 67.
 - neuter, can it be designated by a masculine noun? i, 76.
 - that which consists of mind, is B., i, 107-112.
 - whose Self is pleasure intimated by Ka and Kha, i, 126 seq.
 - that which is much (bhūman) is B., i, 162-169.
 - is the source of all beings, i, 135-139, 288.
 - the Imperishable is B., i, 169-171.
 - Bāhva explained B. by silence, ii, 157.
 - why it is called a bank, ii, 176 seq.
 - the two secret names of B. with reference to the gods and to the body, ii, 216-218.
 - is the True, i, 167, 267; ii, 216 seq., 234.
- Brahman, breath (prāṇa) is, i, 84-87, 97-106, 229-231, 272.
- ether is, i, 81-84, 144, 174-192, 232 seq.; ii, 8, 12, 248.
 - is like the ether, i, 110, 114; ii, 6 seq., 17 seq.
 - is the Self of the ether, i, 110.
 - before ether was produced, B. existed without ether, ii, 17.
 - ether is an effect of, ii, 18.
 - ether is dissolved into, ii, 26.
 - light is, i, 87-93, 96, 97, 185, 191, 194, 231 seq.
 - the gastric fire a symbol of, i, 92.
 - B.'s name a symbol of, i, 92.
 - denoted by the metre Gāyatrī, i, 93-95, 95 seq.
 - why it is compared to the images of the sun and the like, ii, 157-159.
 - nature of, i, pp. lxiv seq., xcv seq.; ii, 101, 133-183.
 - — uniformity of it, i, 156.
 - — does not resemble the world, i, 284.
 - the break in it is a mere figment of Nescience, i, 352.
 - — matter and souls are real constituents of it, i, p. xxviii.
 - the only universal being, of an absolutely homogeneous nature, i, pp. xxiv, xxx.
 - is of the nature of intelligence, i, p. xxiv seq., 68, 264; ii, 156 seq., 168.
 - is an intelligent principle and cannot be identified with the non-intelligent pradhāna of the Sāṅkhyas, i, p. xxxii, 47-64, 300.
 - superior to the gods, i, p. xiv.
 - is incapable of receiving any accretion and eternally pure, i, 34.
 - is all-knowing, i, 19, 25, 47, 49, 362.
 - is the internal ruler over the Devas and so on, i, 130-132.
 - that which possesses the attributes of invisibility and so on is B., i, 135-139.
 - is the bridge of the Immortal, i, 154, 156.
 - a cause of fear, i, 230 seq.
 - eternal and changeless, i, 25, 327.
 - is all-knowing, all-powerful, and possessing the great power of Mâyā, i, 362.

- Brahman is not apprehended, because it is unevolved, ii, 171.
- is omnipresent, i, 91, 120, 125, 172; ii, 180.
 - is altogether unchanging, ii, 397.
 - there is nothing either beneficial to be done by it or non-beneficial to be avoided by it, i, 344.
 - qualities of, i, 107, 328; ii, 101, 201-204.
 - without any distinctive qualities, i, p. xxv; ii, 239, 394 seq.
 - endowed with auspicious qualities, i, p. xxviii.
 - the limiting adjuncts of B. are presented by Nescience merely, ii, 153.
 - is endowed with various powers, i, 354 seq.
 - is not devoid of powers though it is devoid of organs of action, i, 355 seq.
 - powers of B. which are connected with the Devas, ii, 219.
 - is devoid of form, i, pp. lxiii, lxiv, 306 seq.; ii, 154-166, 166-175.
 - is different from name and form, i, 232 seq.
 - is devoid of parts, i, 349-352; ii, 396.
 - represented as comprising sixteen parts, ii, 219.
 - has four feet (quarters), i, 90, 95.
 - the idea of place does not apply to B., i, 89.
 - a special locality may be ascribed to the omnipresent B., i, 91, 120, 125.
 - a multiplicity of abodes ascribed to B., i, 92.
 - spoken of as in heaven and beyond heaven, i, 96 seq.
 - its abode in the heart, i, 113 seq., 350.
 - the smallness of, i, 113 seq.
 - as abiding within the sun, and within the eye, i, p. lxx, 123-128; ii, 216-218.
 - 'city of B.' may mean the body, or the city of the highest B., i, 174, 175, 178.
 - described as residing within the body, ii, 219.
 - statements as to B. being connected or separated are only made with a view to difference of place, ii, 178 seq.
- Brahman, highest and lower B. distinguished, i, pp. xix, xx, xxxii seq., xxxvi (masc. and neut.), 61-64, 171-174; ii, 7, 166, 202 seq., 401 seq.
- — — Sāṅkara's distinction between, not valid, i, pp. xci-xciv.
 - — — not distinguished by Rāmānuga, i, p. xxxi.
 - — — not distinguished by Bādarāyaṇa, i, p. c.
 - — — not distinguished in the Upanishads, i, pp. cxiii, cxv seq.
 - to which B. does the soul of the worshipper repair on death? i, p. xc seq.
 - the highest, all beings spring from it, i, 83, 85.
 - — is a place of rest, i, 83.
 - — — endlessness a characteristic mark of it, i, 83.
 - — the highest Person is nothing but the h. B., i, 174.
 - — the vital airs are the effects of it, ii, 76.
 - — is the agent in the evolution of names and forms, ii, 97.
 - — is inside of the limiting adjuncts, ii, 158 seq.
 - — the Yogins, in the state of perfect conciliation, apprehend it, ii, 171 seq.
 - — the sense-organs and the elements of him who knows the h. B. are merged in that same h. B., ii, 376 seq.
 - — with it we cannot connect the idea of going, or of one who goes; for that B. is present everywhere and is the inner self of all, ii, 390, 391, 394, 396.
 - — immortality is possible only in the h. B., not in the effected one, ii, 392.
 - — to it the souls are led, Gaiṇi opines, ii, 392 seq.; refutation of this view, ii, 393-402.
 - — glory is a name of it, ii, 393.
 - — the lower, associated with Māyā, i, p. xxv.
 - — called Īvara, the Lord, i, pp. xxv, xxvii.

- Brahman, the lower, to it the departed soul is led by the guardians of the path of the gods, i, p. lxxxii; ii, 389-402.
- is the vital principle in all creatures, i, 172 n.
 - the world of the l. B. is called Satyaloka, i, 181.
 - is fundamentally one with the unqualified B., ii, 248.
 - for the purpose of worship or meditation, i, 330; ii, 155, 156, 161 seq., 391.
 - is the object of the discussion on the difference or non-difference of the cognitions of B., ii, 185.
 - worlds of B. can only refer to the l. B., ii, 390.
 - on account of its proximity to the higher B., can be designated by the word 'B.,' ii, 391.
 - also may be spoken of as being the Self of all, ii, 394.
 - sons of B.'s mind, ii, 235.
 - is one and undivided, i, p. l, 349-354, 395 seq.
 - one only without a second, i, p. xxviii, 286; ii, 12, 13.
 - has in itself elements of manifoldness, so that unity and manifoldness are both true of him, i, 321 seqq., 345 seq.
 - although one only, is, owing to the plurality of its powers, meditated upon in more than one way, ii, 220.
 - there cannot be any plurality in B., ii, 158, 160, 202, 327 seq., 329, 410.
 - comprises elements of plurality, i, p. xxviii.
 - is free from all difference, and two-fold characteristics cannot belong to him, ii, 152-154, 156 seq.
 - oneness with B., i, 319 seq.; ii, 355, 362 seq.
 - I am B., i, 31, 44, 104, 115, 185, 326; ii, 32, 46, 66, 173, 339, 408.
 - is the real giver of the gifts bestowed by princes on poets and singers, i, 80 n.
 - Indra declares that he is one with B., i, 101 seq.
 - the fishermen, the slaves, the gamblers are B., ii, 61, 62.
- Brahman, union with B. is the reason for the absence of all contact with evil, ii, 144.
- there is absolute non-division from B., of the parts merged in it, ii, 376 seq.
 - whatever is, is B., i, p. xxx, 94.
 - all things are effects of B., or are B. itself, i, p. cxix seq.
 - all this indeed is B., beginning, ending, and breathing in it, i, 107, 109, 156.
 - is the Self of everything, i, 23, 110 seq., 267, 357; ii, 138, 165, 208, 341.
 - is the abode of heaven, earth, &c., i, 154-162, 230.
 - the ten objects and the ten subjects cannot rest on anything but B., i, 104.
 - some metaphorical expressions, seemingly implying that there is something different from B., explained, i, p. lxxv; ii, 175-180.
 - the existence of anything apart from B. distinctly denied by Scripture, i, 321; ii, 168-171, 179 seq.
 - there is nothing further beyond B., ii, 175-179.
 - subsists apart from its effects, i, 350.
 - not only the operative but also the material cause of the world, i, pp. xl, xciv seq., 49, 60 seq., 264 seq., 283-288, 317, 320-330, 346 seq., 361 seq.
 - creates the world without instruments, i, p. xlix seq., 346-349, 354-356.
 - — from a mere sportive impulse, i, p. l, 356 seq.
 - — by means of a modification of itself, i, p. xciv.
 - creative power of, i, p. l, 233, 344, 361 seq.
 - as a creator and dispenser, acts with a view to the merit and demerit of the individual souls, and has so acted from all eternity, i, p. l, 357-361.
 - the origin of the world from B. proved on the ground of the system of the Vaisheshikas, i, 381-386.

- Brahman, the world originates from, i, p. xl, 202, 267, 268-274; ii, 13, 16, 21, 22.
- — objections against this view refuted, i, p. xlvii seq., 299-317, 352 seq., 381-386.
- and the world, i, pp. xxx, lii, 50; ii, 3-73, 391 seq.
- — see also Cause and effect.
- compared to a magician, i, p. xxv.
- relation of the non-sentient matter to, i, p. lxxv.
- the source of Fire, ii, 20-22.
- the order in which the elements are retracted into B. is the reverse of that in which they are created, ii, 25 seq.
- relation of the individual soul to, i, pp. xix, lvii seqq.; ii, 61-73.
- — — according to Ṣaṅkara and Bādarāyana, i, pp. xcvi-c.
- broken up, as it were, into individual souls, i, p. xxv.
- only is real in each giva, i, p. xxv.
- discussions as to whether certain passages refer to B. or to the individual soul, i, p. xxxii seq., 64-289.
- the souls are parts of B., according to Rāmānuga, i, p. lviii.
- the identity of the individual soul with it, i, pp. xx, xxvii, 104, 114-116, 322, 343 seq.; ii, 30, 31, 33, 34, 42 seqq., 138, 146, 149.
- Ṣaṅkara's individual soul is B. through Mâyā, i, p. xxx.
- Rāmānuga's individual soul has sprung from B. and is never outside B., i, p. xxxi.
- the Self is B., i, 14, 30 seq., 36, 45, 105, 241, 264 seq.; ii, 209, 288.
- is 'that,' the inward Self is 'thou,' ii, 335.
- the soul cannot be a part of B., nor an effect of B., nor different from B., ii, 396 seq.
- and the individual soul, difference of nature between, i, 114-116.
- — — both different and non-different, i, 277 n., 345.
- the individual souls go to, i, 178, 180 seq., 191.
- Brahman, separate from the individual souls, is the creator, i, 344 seq.
- is superior to the individual soul, i, 345.
- and the released soul, i, p. xxx; ii, 408 seq.
- in which the individual soul is merged in the state of deep sleep, i, p. lxi seq., 180, 273; ii, 144-149, 152-166, 176.
- the only real topic of Scripture, i, p. xxxii, 22-47, 265 seq.
- is the source of the Veda, i, p. xxxii, 19-22.
- Scripture does not contradict itself on the all-important point of B., i, p. xl, 263-268.
- is not the object of any other means of proof but Scripture, i, p. lxiv seq., 22-47, 307, 350-352, 355.
- the Veda intimates B. only as the object of certain injunctions, i, 23 seqq.
- not the subject of injunctions, ii, 162-166, 185.
- the attainment of the Self of B. lies outside the sphere of sacred precept, ii, 359.
- knowledge of, i, pp. x, lxxviii seq., 9-15, 19, 31, 73, 138, 157, 159, 324; ii, 8, 162 seqq., 378, 393.
- — its fruit or result, i, 11, 14, 18, 24 seqq., 26 seqq., 29, 231, 266, 300, 327; ii, 117 n., 229 seq., 236, 353-363, 372-375, 419.
- — is not subordinate to action, but independent, i, p. lxxv, 10-12, 29; ii, 285-295.
- — the purpose of man is effected through it, ii, 285, 290-306.
- — reading of the Veda an antecedent for those desirous of it, i, 10.
- he who knows B. becomes B., i, 25, 29, 31, 186; ii, 375.
- — — to be the Self is free from his body, i, 41-43.
- the body is an abode for the perception of, i, 178.
- texts exhorting us to strive to see B., i, 349.
- some persons although knowing B. yet obtained new bodies, ii, 235.

- Brahman, the state of being grounded in B. belongs to the wandering mendicant, ii, 300-303.
- meditation on, i, pp. lxxvi-lxxv, 31, 94, 105 seq., 107-111; ii, 19 n. (as Vāyu), 177 seq., 184-284, 333-337, 342-345.
 - its result, i, p. lxxv, 25, 174; ii, 402.
 - see also Meditation.
 - only those who have not worshipped B. under a symbol, are led to B., i, p. lxxxii; ii, 402-404.
 - the state of final release is nothing but B., i, 28 seq., 34; ii, 329.
 - the released have to resort to, i, 157.
 - has to be inquired into because it is the cause of absolute beatitude, i, 283.
 - on the attainment of B. there take place the non-clinging and the destruction of sins, ii, 353-356.
 - world of, i, p. xxix, 173, 174; ii, 383. See also Brahma-world.
 - see also Self, highest.
 - see also Lord.
- Brāhmaṇa-accent, i, 258.
- Brahmanical studentship, ii, 303 n.
- Brahmans, he to whom the B. and the Kshattriyas are but food is the highest Self, i, p. xxxv, 116-118.
- are not qualified for the rāgasūya-sacrifice, i, 218.
 - the world with its, i, 275 seq.
- Brahma-sūkta of a Jākhā of the Atharva-veda quoted, ii, 62.
- Brahma-sūtras, another name for Vedānta-sūtras, i, p. xiv n.
- Brahma-upanishad = Veda-upanishad, i, 94.
- Brahma-vidyā, Gaimini maintains the non-qualification of the gods for it, i, 216 seq.
- gods are qualified for, i, 218-223.
- Brahmavidyābharana on the three Bauddha sects, i, 401 n.
- on the Bauddha series beginning with Nescience, i, 404 seq. n.
- Brahma-world applied to the small ether, i, 180.
- Brahma-world, not 'the world of Brahman,' but 'the world which is Brahman,' i, 180 seq.
- see Brahman, world of.
- Breath (Prāṇa) is the highest Brahman, i, p. xxxiv, 84-87, 97-106.
- in which everything trembles, is Brahman, i, p. xxxvii, 229-231.
 - is the deity of the Prastāva, i, 84, 86.
 - of b., i, 87.
 - beings enter into and proceed from it, i, 85, 86.
 - is most beneficial for man, i, 98.
 - strength is, i, 99.
 - denotes either the individual soul or the chief vital air or both, i, 102 seq.
 - is the abode of the power of action, i, 105.
 - is prāṇā, i, 105.
 - is the one god, the gods are all forms of, i, 200.
 - one of the pañcagāṇāḥ, i, 260-262.
 - spoken of as a 'person,' i, 261.
 - speech, b., and mind presuppose fire, water, and earth, ii, 78 seq.
 - acts under the guidance of Vāyu, ii, 91 seq.
 - meditation on all food as food of, ii, 211, 213.
 - water is the dress of, ii, 211-214.
 - is water, ii, 366.
 - may be viewed as the causal substance of mind, ii, 366.
 - mind is merged in, ii, 366 seq.
 - is merged in the individual soul, on the departure of the soul, ii, 367 seq.
 - is merged in heat, ii, 367, 368.
 - the soul, with the b., goes to the elements, ii, 368.
 - see Prāṇa, and Vital air, chief.
- Bṛihadāraṇyaka-upanishad, germs of Māyā doctrine in the, i, pp. cxvii, cxx seq.
- on the embodied soul, i, 134 seq.
 - the Udgītha-vidyā of the, ii, 192-199.
- Bṛhaspatisava, an offering enjoined for one who is desirous of Brahmavarkas, ii, 223, 223 n., 224.
- Buddha, variety of Bauddha doctrines due either to the dif- ference of the views maintained by B., or else to the difference of capacity on the part of the disciples of B., i, 401.

- Buddha, though he propounded the doctrine of the reality of the external world, was himself an idealist, i, 418.
- teaches three mutually contradictory systems, i, 428.
- Buddhi. See Intelligence.
- Castes, men only of the three higher c. entitled to the study of the Veda, i, 197.
- all the four c. are fit for the knowledge of the itihâsas and purâṇas, i, 229.
- pañcagāṇab = the four c. and the Nishâdas, i, 262.
- Categories, twenty-five, of the Sâṅkhya system, i, 257-260.
- difficulties with regard to the six c. of the Vaiśeshikas, i, 394 seqq.
- seven, two, or five c. of the Gainas, i, 428 seq., 430.
- five, of the Saivas, i, 435.
- Caterpillar, soul compared to a, ii, 103, 352.
- Causal matter is metaphorically represented as a she-goat, i, 256 seq.
- Cause, only the one highest c. is true, i, 322.
- and effect are non-different, i, pp. xxix, xlix, 300-305, 309, 311, 320-343, 399, 436; ii, 9.
- their absolute equality impossible, i, 305 seq.
- real effects may sometimes arise from unreal (imaginary) causes, i, 324 seq.
- the internal organ is affected by them jointly, i, 331.
- connected by samavâya, i, 335 seq., 396 n.
- difference of, i, 350.
- the relation of, is no reason for assuming that all effects whatever have a non-intelligent principle for their antecedent, i, 367.
- — — according to the Vaiśeshikas, i, 396 seq.
- — — impossible on the assumption of the Bauddha that everything has a momentary existence only, i, 407 seq., 409.
- Cause and effect, the relation of, requires some superiority on the part of the cause, i, 442; ii, 20.
- between them conjunction and disjunction do no longer take place, i, 397.
- chain of causes and effects, beginning with Nescience (Baudha), i, 404 seq., 410, 410 n.
- Causes, whatever is originated, the Sâṅkhyas say, is originated from inherent c., non-inherent c., and operative c., i, 5 seq.
- four kinds of, admitted by the Bauddha, i, 409, 409 n.
- Cave, the two entered into the c. are Brahman and the individual soul, i, pp. xxxv, xlii, 118-123.
- Ceremonial purifications, the Sûdras excluded from them, i, 227.
- referred to in the Vidyâs, i, 227.
- Cessation, the two kinds of c. which the Bauddhas assume cannot be proved, i, 410 seq., 413.
- Chariot, the simile of the, i, 121, 239 seq., 244, 246.
- Chastity, knowledge belongs to those who are bound to, ii, 295 seq.
- the stages of life for which ch. is obligatory, established by Scripture, ii, 297-303.
- he who has entered them cannot fall from them, ii, 317 seq.
- expiatory sacrifice for a Brahman who breaks his vow of, ii, 318 seq.
- persons bound to ch. who have broken their vow condemned, ii, 320.
- Chief vital air. See Vital air, chief.
- Childlike state, which is enjoined for the ascetic, means absence of strong sensual passions, absence of guile, pride, and the like, ii, 325-327.
- Cognition, the Self whose nature is unchangeable, eternal c., i, 185 seq.
- Cognitions (vidyâs), discussion on the separateness or non-separateness of the c. of Brahman,

- which form the subject of the different Vedānta-texts, ii, 101, 184-279.
- Cognitions, in the same Sākhā also there is unity of, ii, 214-216.
- connected with members of sacrificial acts, are not permanently connected with those acts, ii, 252-256.
 - — — are valid for all Sākhās and Vedas, ii, 274.
 - compared with sacrifices, ii, 280.
 - should there be cumulation of the different c. or option between them? ii, 280-284.
 - the fruit of all c. is the intuition of the object meditated upon, ii, 281.
 - which have the qualified Brahman for their object, ii, 330.
- Colebrooke, i, p. cxvi.
- Conjunction (samyoga), the distinction of the Vaiśeṣikas between c. and inherence, i, 390, 396 seq.
- the connexion between the Lord and the souls and pradhāna cannot be c., i, 436.
- Consciousness of external things, i, 418-424.
- Crane, female, conceives without a male, i, 348; ii, 126.
- conceives from hearing the sound of thunder, i, 348.
- Creation owing to an act of volition on the Lord's part, i, p. xxix.
- according to Rāmānuja, i, pp. l, liii seq.
 - accounts given in the Upanishads of the c., their divergence, i, p. cv seq.
 - — — have no mention of Mâyā, i, p. cxviii.
 - — — discussion of, i, 263-266; ii, 3, 22.
 - has thought for its antecedent, i, 47 seq.; ii, 206.
 - Brahman, before the c., i, 50, 286; ii, 8.
 - cannot possibly belong to any Self different from the highest Self, i, 69.
 - Brahman the cause of it, i, 117; ii, 183.
 - description of it in the Mundaka-upanishad alluded to, i, 140-142.
- Creation is preceded by the word, i, 203 seq.
- each new c. is the result of the religious merit and demerit of the animated beings of the preceding c., i, 214.
 - the relation of senses and sense-objects is the same in different creations, i, 214 seq.
 - the world was evolved at the beginning of the c. in the same way as it is at present seen to develop itself by names and forms, viz. under the rulership of an intelligent creator, i, 268.
 - Scripture when relating the c. of the elements, does not mention a separate c. of the individual soul, i, 279; ii, 31.
 - a multiform c. exists in the individual Self, and in gods, &c., i, 352 seq.
 - the scriptural doctrine of c. refers to the apparent world only, i, 357.
 - the c. of this world is mere play to the Lord, i, 357.
 - in consequence of the Lord's conjunction with Mâyā, the c. is unavoidable, i, 357 n.
 - neither c. nor pralaya could take place, if the atomic theory were adopted, i, 386-389, 391.
 - according to the Vaiśeṣika system, i, 387.
 - order of, ii, 3-24.
 - the origination of the organs does not cause a break in it, ii, 26-28.
 - passage on the c. in the Kbāṇ-dogya-upanishad, ii, 4.
 - Brahman and ether before and after, ii, 8.
 - is the c. taking place in dreams a real one, or does it consist of illusion? ii, 133-141.
 - the so-called real c. is not absolutely real, ii, 138.
 - accomplished by Pragāpati, ii, 206.
 - of the worlds is accomplished by some inferior Lord different from, and superintended by, the highest Self, ii, 206.
 - of the elements, different from the c. of the worlds, ii, 206, 207 seq.

- Creator, the Vedânta-texts differ with regard to the order of creation, but not with regard to the C., i, 264.
- described as all-knowing, the Lord of all, the Self of all, without a second, i, 264 seq.
 - is non-different from the created effects, i, 265.
 - see also Brahman.
- Daharavidyâ, the knowledge of Brahman within the heart, i, p. lxxv; ii, 219, 233, 393 n., 410.
- Daksha, assumed a new body, ii, 235.
- Darkness is called black on account of its covering and obscuring property, i, 253.
- Goodness, Passion, and Darkness, the three gunas, i, 353.
 - — the three constituent elements of the pradhâna, i, 364 n., 36 seq.
 - the guṇa D. is eternal, i, 380.
 - see also Guṇas.
- Death, the round of birth, action, and, i, p. xxvii.
- the fate after d. of those whom their good works do not entitle to pass up to the moon, i, p. lx; ii, 121-126.
 - — of him who possesses knowledge, i, p. lxxviii seq.; ii, 364-419.
 - not necessary for the condition of being free from the body, i, 41, 43.
 - is a condiment, i, 116, 117.
 - release from the jaws of d. by knowledge of the highest Self, i, 247.
 - — not by perceiving the pradhâna, i, 247.
 - when applied to the sprout, i, 340.
 - the terms 'birth' and 'death,' if applied to the soul, have a metaphorical meaning, ii, 28 seq.
 - has the power of manifesting those works whose fruit has not yet begun, ii, 113, 117-119.
 - the state of swoon is the door of, ii, 152.
 - identification of the Avabhṛitha-ceremony with, ii, 221.
 - the term 'd.' applied to Agni, and to the man in the sun, ii, 267.
- Death, the d. of the body is the term of the attainment of final release, ii, 357 seq., 363.
- see Departure.
 - see also Yama.
- Debts, the three, ii, 295.
- Deceased, the, on his way to Brahman, shakes off his good and evil deeds, ii, 229-231.
- Deeds. See Works.
- Deities, if the elements and the sense-organs are spoken of in Scripture as of an intellectual nature, the superintending d. are denoted, i, 303-305.
- the particular intelligent d. who represent light, &c., on the soul's journey to Brahman, are appointed as personal conductors of the soul, ii, 388 seq.
 - see also Devas, Divinities, Gods.
- Departure (from the body), the highest Self different from the individual soul in the state of, i, 233-236.
- Deussen, 'System des Vedânta,' i, pp. xxiv, xxiv n., xxxiii n., xxxiv n., xxxv n., xli, xlv, xlvii, lxxvii.
- Devala, author of a Dharma-sûtra, i, 289.
- Devas, the eternal ruler over the, &c., is Brahman, i, 130-132.
- Brahman's secret names with reference to the D. and to the body, ii, 216 seq.
 - powers of Brahman which are connected with the, ii, 219.
 - metres of the D., i. e. metres of ten and more syllables, their priority to those of the Asuras, ii, 228, 228 n.
 - the powers of the D. constitute the Self of the organs of the body, ii, 257.
 - see also Deities, Divinities, Gods.
- Dhr̥ishadyumna, not born in the ordinary way, ii, 125, 126.
- Digambara Gainas, their opinion that the individual soul only flying away from the old body alights in the new one as a parrot flies from one tree to another, ii, 104.
- Divinity, highest. See Brahman.

- Divinities, in meditations connected with constitutives of sacrificial works the idea of the d. is to be transferred to the sacrificial items, not vice versâ, i, p. lxxvii; ii, 345-349.
- intelligent presiding d. are connected with everything, i, 304.
 - the vital airs act under the guidance of, ii, 91 seq.
 - who act as the guides of the vital airs and co-operate with them, stop their co-operation at the time of death, ii, 106.
 - even priests who do not know the d. of sacrifices, perform them, ii, 254.
 - the organs of the body and the d. are non-different, ii, 257.
- Dramida* quoted by Rāmānuga, i, pp. xxi, xxii.
- preceded Saṅkara, i, p. xxii.
- Dramida*-bhāṣhya, i, p. xxii.
- Dramidabhāṣhyakāra* quoted by Rāmānuga, i, p. xlix.
- Draupadī*, not born in the ordinary way, ii, 125.
- Dravida* or Dramida, i, p. xxii n.
- Dravidātārya*. See Dramida.
- Dreams, Rāmānuga on d. as the work, not of the individual soul, but of the highest Lord, i, p. lx seq.
- the unreal phantom of a d. may have a real result, i, 325.
 - some d. are auspicious omens, others the reverse, i, 325; ii, 136 seq.
 - variety of d. while the dreaming person remains one, i, 346.
 - the idealist's example of the ideas in, i, 420.
 - the ideas of the waking state are not like those of, i, 424 seq.
 - in the state of d. the instruments of the Self are not altogether at rest, ii, 56.
 - place of d.=intermediate place, ii, 133.
 - the soul in the state of, i, p. lx; ii, 133-141.
 - the Self is the shaper of lovely things in, ii, 133 seq., 137 seq.
 - the world of d. is mere illusion, ii, 134-136, 140 seq.
 - moving about in, ii, 135.
- Dreams are outside the body, ii, 135.
- experts in the science of, ii, 136.
 - their purpose and cause, ii, 137 n.
 - in d. we have perceptions while the body lies motionless, ii, 272.
- Droṇa*, not born in the ordinary way, ii, 125, 126.
- Duties. See Works.
- Dvaipāyana*, ii, 43.
- Dying, certain times for, ii, 379-381.
- Earth, springs from water, i, p. lii; ii, 23 seq.
- called 'night' (sarvarī) by the Paurāṇikas, ii, 23 seq.
 - is meant by the word 'anna' ('food'), ii, 23 seq.
 - (predominant) colour of e. is black, ii, 23 seq.
 - is dissolved into water, ii, 26.
 - is the Rik, ii, 345-349.
- Eater, the e. who is the highest Self, i, pp. xxxv, xlii, 116-118.
- Effect. See Cause and effect.
- Ego and Non-Ego, the spheres of the object and subject, i, 3.
- Egoity, the principle of, Aniruddha identical with it, i, p. xxiii, 440.
- accomplishes all actions and enjoys their results, i, 34.
- Elements, the origination of the e. is due to Brahman acting in them, i, p. lii; ii, 24 seq.
- the reabsorption of the e. into Brahman takes place in the inverse order of their emission, i, p. lii; ii, 25 seq.
 - the subtle e. are completely merged in Brahman only when final emancipation is reached, i, p. lxxix seq.; ii, 371 seq.
 - the three e., fire, water, earth, denoted by the three colours red, white, black, i, 254 seq.
 - and the sense-organs, the product of Nescience, i, 281.
 - the atoms and their respective, i, 393 seq., 402.
 - origin of the three, fire, water, earth, according to the K'bāṇ-dogya Upanishad, ii, 4.
 - usual order of the five e.: ether, air, fire, water, earth, ii, 4, 4 n.

- Elements spoken of as endowed with intelligence, ii, 24 seq.
- the origin, the subsistence, and the retraction of the e. all depend on Brahman, ii, 25 seq.
 - the order of the creation of the e. is not broken by the origination of the organs, ii, 26-28.
 - in obtaining a different body the soul goes enveloped by subtle parts of the, ii, 101-104, 371 seq.
 - the aggregate of the five e. in the body, ii, 242.
 - the soul, with the breath, goes to the, ii, 368 seq.
 - the aggregate of the e. continues to exist up to the final union with Brahman, ii, 371, 376 seq.
- Emancipation, final, i, p. xxix.
- depends on the true nature of the cause of the world, i, 316.
 - a being desirous of it becomes a deva, i, 223 n.
 - by degrees, i, 174, 223.
 - the Sāṅkhya doctrine about the e. of the Selfs, ii, 69 seq.
 - see also Release.
- Entity does not spring from non-entity, i, 415-418.
- Ether is the highest Brahman, i, pp. xxxiv, xxxviii, 81-84, 182, 232 seq., 273, 287; ii, 6 seq., 8, 12, 248.
- the small e. within the heart is Brahman, i, p. xxxvi, 174-192; ii, 144.
 - cannot mean the individual soul, i, 177.
 - spoken of as the place of sleep, ii, 144.
 - is not co-eternal with Brahman, but springs from it as its first effect, i, p. lii; ii, 3-18.
 - is the Udgītha, i, 83.
 - although all-pervading, is spoken of as limited and minute, if considered in its connexion with the eye of a needle; so Brahman also, i, 114.
 - the highest Lord is greater than, i, 177.
 - distinction between the outer and the inner, i, 175, 176 seq.
 - origination of, discussion of Vedānta-texts concerning it, ii, 3-18.
- Ether, origination of, the Sāṅkhyas deny it, ii, 5 seq.
- is divided, therefore must be an effect, ii, 14, 15.
 - is non-eternal, because it is the substratum of a non-eternal quality, viz. sound, ii, 17.
 - is the abode of air, ii, 18.
 - is dissolved into Brahman, ii, 26.
 - air is dissolved into, ii, 26.
 - the body consisting of water which the soul assumes in the moon, becomes subtle like e., but not identical with e., ii, 127.
 - the one e. is made manifold, as it were, by its connexion with different places, ii, 179.
 - see also Space.
 - see also Brahman, above, p. 446.
- Expiation cannot take place, if a Brahmañārin for life breaks his vow of chastity, ii, 318; can take place, according to some teachers, ii, 318 seq.
- Expiatory ceremonies and the results of works, ii, 117 n., 353, 354.
- Eye. See Person in the eye.
- Faith, the path of the gods cannot be attained by f. and austerities, unaided by knowledge, ii, 234.
- Fathers, among the pañḍaganāb, i, 262.
- create many things by their mere intention, i, 347 seq.
 - rise owing to their mere will, ii, 410 seq.
 - see Path of the fathers.
- Fire springs from air, i, p. lii, 20-22.
- has for its source that which is, i. e. Brahman, ii, 20-22.
 - water is produced from, ii, 22 seq.
 - water is dissolved into, ii, 26.
 - is dissolved into air, ii, 26.
 - gastric, within man, i, 89.
 - characterised by the noise it makes and by heat, i, 90.
 - as a symbol of Brahman, i, 92.
 - Vairvānara is the, i, 143 seq., 146 seq.
 - the perception of the highest Lord in the, i, 147.

- Fire, gastric, either the outward manifestation, or the limiting condition of the Lord, i, 149.
- the simile of the sparks and the f. (individual souls and Brahman), i, 277 n., 279; ii, 29, 30, 61, 62, 139.
 - the rite of carrying f. on the head is an attribute of the study of the Veda of the Ātharvanikas, ii, 186, 189 seq.
 - sacrificial, the lighting of it not to be observed, since man's purpose is effected by knowledge, ii, 306.
 - is Sāman, ii, 345-349.
 - see also Agni.
- Fire-altars made of mind, &c., do not constitute part of the sacrificial action, i, p. lxxiv; ii, 259-268.
- Fires, the fiction concerning the three sacred, i, 146.
- five, viz. the heavenly world, Parganya, the earth, man and woman, ii, 103.
 - — — raddhā the oblation in the first of them, ii, 106.
 - — — knowledge (vidyā) of the (=Kh. Up. V, 3-10), i, pp. lxxxiii, cviii; ii, 101-132, 186, 187 seqq., 233, 234 seq., 298, 383, 400, 403.
 - — — a sixth fire mentioned by the Vāgasaneyins in their, ii, 187-189.
- Fire-sacrifice, individual soul, and the highest Self, the three points of discussion in the colloquy between Yama and Nakiketas, i, 247-252.
- Five-people, five, of the Brh. Up. are not the twenty-five principles of the Sāṅkhyas, i, p. xl, 257-263.
- are the breath and so on, i, 260-262.
 - explained as Gods, Fathers, Gandharvas, Asuras, and Rakshas, i, 261 seq.
 - as the four castes together with the Nishādas, i, 262.
 - created beings in general, i, 262.
- Flamingo, able to distinguish and separate milk and water when mixed, ii, 149.
- Food, certain relaxations of the laws regarding f. are allowed only for cases of extreme need, i, p. lxxv; ii, 309-312.
- Sruti and Smṛiti on lawful and unlawful, ii, 311 seq.
 - the word 'f.' denotes 'earth,' ii, 23 seq.
 - meditation on all f. as f. of the breath, ii, 211, 213.
- Fruition, Brahman is not, like the embodied Self, subject to, i, 114-116, 117, 119.
- not even the embodied soul is really subject to, i, 116.
 - is the figment of false knowledge, i, 116.
 - characteristic of the individual soul, i, 159 seq., 269.
 - see also Works.
- Gābāla was initiated by Gautama, i, 228.
- Gābālas, the, speak of the highest Lord in the interstice between the top of the head and the chin which is measured by a span, i, 152 seq.
- their text on the fourth stage of life, ii, 295, 297, 302 seq.
 - on the highest Lord as the Self, ii, 338.
- Gaimini, i, pp. xi, xc seq.
- quoted in the Vedānta-sūtras, i, pp. xix, lxxxii seq., lxxxiv, 149 seq., 151 seq., 216 seq., 272-274; ii, 295-297, 317 seq., 360, 392-402.
 - thinks that religious merit brings about the fruits of action, i, p. lxxv; ii, 180-182.
 - that the statements as to the fruits of the knowledge of the Self are arthavādas, ii, 285-288.
 - that the released soul manifests itself by a nature like that of Brahman, ii, 408 seq.
 - asserts the presence of a body and sense-organs, on the part of the released, ii, 412.
 - Sūtra, its subject is dharma, i, 26.
- Gainas, refutation of their doctrine, i, p. li, 428-434.
- acknowledge seven, two, or five categories, i, 428 seq., 430.

- Gainas. See Digambara Gainas.
- Gâmadagnya - ahîna - sacrifice, the upasad offerings for it are to consist of purodâśas, ii, 240, 240 n.
- Ganaka, Sulabhâ entered into his body to carry on discussion with him, ii, 237.
- Gânasrutî, Raikva called him Sûdra, i, 223-226.
- must have been a Kshattriya, not a Sûdra, i, 226 seq.
 - legend of, ii, 305, 306.
- Gandharva, possessing a maiden, teaches Bhugyu Sâhyâyani, i, p. cv.
- colloquy of the G. and Yâgñavalkya, i, 219.
- Gandharvas, among the pañkaganâb, i, 262.
- Gângya, i, p. cv.
- Gârhapatya-fire, as the G. the highest Self may be represented, because it is the Self of all, i, 150.
- Gâtakakarman, or gâta ceremony, the birth ceremony, ii, 28, 29.
- Gaudapâda, i, pp. xcix, cxxvii.
- Gautama, having ascertained Gâbâla not to be a Sûdra, proceeded to initiate and instruct him, i, 228.
- Gâyatrî is everything whatsoever exists, i, 90, 93-95.
- Brahman denoted by the metre G., i, 93-95, 95 seq.
 - has four feet, Brahman has four feet, i, 95.
 - the beings, the earth, the body, and the heart are the feet of, i, 95.
- Gina or Tîrthakâra, i, 429.
- Gîva. See Soul.
- Glory is a name of the highest Brahman, ii, 393.
- Gñânakânda, systematised by the Uttara Mimâmsâ, i, pp. x, xii.
- necessity of systematising it, i, p. xi.
 - two different parts of it, i, p. xxvii.
 - final escape from the samsâra to be obtained by the, i, p. xxix.
- Goat. See Agâ.
- God, Śaṅkara's personal, is something unreal, i, p. xxx.
- Râmânuga's Brahman is a personal, i, pp. xxx, cxxiii, cxxiv n.
- Gods capable of the knowledge of Brahman, i, p. xxxvii, 198 seq., 218-223; not capable according to Gaimini, i, 216 seqq.
- the soul is led by g. on the way up to Brahman, i, p. lxxxii; ii, 387-389.
 - create many things by their mere intention, i, p. xciv, 347 seq.
 - possess unobstructed knowledge, i, 99.
 - their deathlessness only means their comparatively long existence, and their lordly power depends on the highest Lord, i, 130; ii, 17.
 - cannot perform sacrifices, hence not entitled to the study of the Veda, i, 197 n.
 - are qualified for the study and practice of the Veda, i, 198 seq.
 - may have the desire of final release, i, 198.
 - their corporeality appears from mantras, arthavâdas, itihâsas, purâṇas, and ordinary experience, i, 198, 217.
 - involves no contradiction to sacrificial works, i, 199-201.
 - to them the Veda is manifest of itself (without study), i, 199.
 - undergo discipleship, i, 199.
 - their number, i, 200.
 - are all forms of Breath, i, 200, 269.
 - naturally possess all supernatural powers, i, 200, 219.
 - their power to render themselves invisible, i, 201.
 - all comprised in the Vasus, Rudras, Âdityas, Viśvedevas, and Maruts, i, 202 n.
 - the Vedic injunctions presuppose certain characteristic shapes of the individual g., without which the sacrificer could not represent the g. to his mind, i, 221 seq.
 - Vyâsa and others conversed with the g. face to face, i, 222 seq.
 - among the pañkaganâb, i, 262.
 - multifiform creations exist in them, i, 353.
 - possess bodily organs of action, i, 355.

- Gods exist in the state of highest power and glory, and cannot enter, in this wretched body, into the condition of enjoyers, ii, 93.
- the vital airs, at the time of death, enter into them, ii, 105 seq.
 - the souls are the food of the, ii, 110-112.
 - do not eat, ii, 111.
 - the performers of sacrifices are objects of enjoyment for the, ii, 111.
 - the souls of sacrificers enjoy themselves with the, ii, 112.
 - the soul goes from the world of the g. to Vāyu, ii, 386.
 - may be called light and so on, because they represent light and so on, ii, 388.
 - are permanent, ii, 388.
 - see Path of the gods.
 - see also Devas, Deities, Divinities.
- Goodness, knowledge an attribute of the guna of, i, 46, 48 seq.
- by means of g. men are known to be Yogins, i, 46, 49.
 - is called white, because it is of the nature of Light, i, 253.
- Passion and Darkness, the three gunas, i, 353.
- — the three constituent elements (guna) of the pradhāna, i, 364 n., 366 seq.
 - see Gunas.
- Gough (A.) on Sāṅkara, i, p. xvii seq.
- his sketch of Sāṅkara Vedānta, i, p. xxiv.
 - on Māyā in the Upanishads, i, pp. cxvii, cxv.
 - on Virāg, i, p. cxiii.
- Great one, the, 'beyond the G. there is the Undeveloped, beyond the Undeveloped there is the Person,' i, 237 seq.
- is the technical Sāṅkhya term for buddhi, i, 238 n.
 - originates from the Undeveloped, if the G. one be the intellect of Hiraṇyagarbha, i, 244.
 - the individual soul, i, 244.
 - has a different meaning as a Sāṅkhya term, and in Vedic use, i, 252.
- Great principle, the, the Undeveloped (pradhāna), and the soul, are the three entities of the Sāṅkhyas, i, 238, 296.
- — of the Yoga-smṛiti, i, 296.
 - — the subtle elements of material things proceed from it, i, 376.
- Groups. See Skandhas.
- Guhadeva quoted by Rāmānuga, i, p. xxi.
- Gunas*, the three (Goodness, Passion, and Darkness) of the Sāṅkhyas, i, 28.
- the pradhāna is the state of equilibrium of the, i, 353, 370.
 - passing out of the state of equipoise and entering into the condition of mutual subordination and superordination, originate activities tending towards the production of particular effects, i, 367.
 - the relation of principal and subordinate matter is impossible between them, i, 374 seq.
 - absolute independence their essential characteristic, i, 375.
- Gymnosophists. See Gainas.
- Hall, Fitz-Edward, i, p. xvi.
- Hari is contemplated in the sacred stone called Sālagrām, i, 114.
- Heaven, that within which the h., the earth, &c., are woven, is Brahman, i, p. xxxv, 154-162.
- Heavenly world, if the Gaina maintains that it exists or does not exist, and is eternal or non-eternal, nobody will act for the purpose of gaining it, i, 430.
- Hell, degree of pleasure and pain enjoyed by the inmates of, i, 27.
- Hells, there are seven, ii, 123.
- Hermit in the woods is referred to by the term 'austerity,' ii, 300 seq.
- when he has broken his vows, undergoes the Krikkbra penance for twelve nights, ii, 319.
- Highest being manifests itself in a fourfold form, i, p. xxiii.
- see Brahman, Lord, Self highest.
- Hiraṇyagarbha, i.e. the effected Brah-

- man, i, pp. lxxxiii, cix, cxxiii, 172 n.
- Hiranyagarbha = Pragâpati, i, 142, 142 n.
- is the Self of all organs, and dwells in the Brahma-world, i, 173.
 - Lords such as, i, 213.
 - the intellect of the first-born H., which is the basis of all intellects, may be called 'the great Self,' i, 240, 244.
 - a subordinate causal substance, ii, 77 n.
 - the Self of the prâṇa appears as H. in his double—universal and individual—form, ii, 91.
 - himself comes to an end, ii, 238.
 - the ruler of the Brahman world, ii, 391, 392.
- Honey means the sun by a metaphor, i, 256 seq.
- Hotri, by the meditation on the unity of prâṇa and udgîtha, the H. sets right any mistake he may commit in his work, ii, 282.
- Householder is everything, for the performance of many works belonging to his own âśrama is enjoined on him, and at the same time the duties of the other âśramas, ii, 324 seq.
- Householdership, the duties of, ii, 296 seqq.
- Idealists maintain that thought only is real, i, 401.
- are the Yogâcâras, i, 401 n.
 - controverted, i, 418-427.
- Ideas and mental impressions succeed each other as causes and effects, i, 420, 423.
- the variety of, explained by the idealist, i, 420.
 - cannot be explained from the variety of mental impressions, i, 425-427.
 - two, cannot apprehend, or be apprehended by, each other, i, 422.
 - require an ulterior intelligent principle, i, 424.
 - the i. of the waking state are not like those of a dream, as the idealist asserts, i, 424 seq.
- Ignorance, cessation of, the fruit of the cognition of Brahman, i, 31.
- Illusion, this apparent world an, i, 345.
- see Mâyâ.
- Immortality, of him who knows the lower Brahman only, is merely a relative, i, pp. lxxix, lxxx; ii, 369 seq.
- of him who knows Brahman, according to Râmânuga, i, pp. lxxix, lxxx.
 - bhûman is, i, 163, 168.
 - of all effected things is merely a relative one, i, 169.
 - is not to be reached but through the knowledge of the highest Self, i, 275.
 - the result of the knowledge of the soul, i, 279.
 - of ether is to be understood, like that of the gods, as a relative i. only, ii, 17.
 - is possible only in the highest Brahman, ii, 392.
- Imperishable, the, (akshara), is Brahman, i, p. xxxv, 169-171.
- that element in Brahman, from which the material universe springs, i, p. cxix.
 - the Indestructible is higher than the high I., i, 136, 137, 140.
 - the knowledge of the I. is the knowledge of Brahman, i, 138.
 - the term explained, i, 140.
 - cannot be the embodied soul, i, 171.
 - the denials of conceptions concerning the I. are to be comprehended in all meditations on the, ii, 238-240.
- Indestructible, the higher knowledge is this by which the I. is apprehended, i, 135-138.
- Indra, the legend of I. and Pratar-dana, i, 97-99, 101.
- may be called prâṇa, i, 99.
 - is the god of strength, i, 99.
 - is one with Brahman, i, 101 seq.
 - disciple of Pragâpati, i, 199.
 - with a thunderbolt, i, 217 n.
 - three cakes offered to, ii, 259.
 - above Varuṇa there come I. and Pragâpati, on the path of the gods, ii, 386.
- Inference denotes Smṛiti, i, 203.

- Inherence (samavāya), the distinction of the Vaiśeṣikas between conjunction (samyoga) and i., i, 389 seq., 396 seq.
- the connexion between the Lord and the soul and the pradhāna cannot be i., i, 436.
- Injunction is the sense of all potential, imperative, &c., verbal forms, ii, 304.
- Injunctions and prohibitions, what room is there for them, if there is only one internal Self of all beings? ii, 65-68.
- do not refer to him who has obtained perfect knowledge, ii, 67.
- are possible on account of the connexion of the Self with bodies, ii, 66-68.
- Intellect (buddhi) is higher than the mind, i, 239 seq.
- higher than the i. is the great Self, i, 240.
- the pervadingness of, ii, 40.
- abides in the heart, ii, 45.
- the connexion of the soul with the i. exists as long as the soul, ii, 45-48.
- is the first produced, ii, 57.
- there are five distinctions of i., and on their account five intellectual organs, ii, 81.
- Intelligence the substance of Brahman, i, p. xxv.
- Intermediate place, i.e. state of dreams, ii, 133.
- Internal cognition cannot be the abode of mental impressions, i, 426 seq.
- organ, Pradyumna identical with it, i, p. xxiii.
- (sattva), and the individual soul, i, 122 seq.
- conjunction cannot take place between the atoms, the soul, and the, i, 398.
- conjunction of soul and i. o. cannot be the cause of cognition, i, 398 n.
- called by different names, manas, buddhi, vigñāna, kitta, ii, 48.
- if no i. o. existed there would result either constant perception or constant non-perception, or else a limitation either of the soul or of the senses, ii, 48 seq.
- Internal organ, called Ātman, ii, 81.
- organs, the Sāṅkhyas sometimes speak of three, sometimes of one only, i, 376.
- co-operate with the Selfs, according to Kaṇāda, ii, 69.
- Intuition a means of knowledge, i, 18.
- is the final result of the enquiry into Brahman, i, 18; ii, 332.
- vouched for by Scripture, i, 101 seq.
- the highest Self corresponds to the mental act of complete, i, 172.
- true knowledge cannot be de-stitute of its result, since that result is the object of immediate, ii, 238, 295.
- the fruit of all meditations is to be effected through, ii, 281.
- repetition not necessary to bring about, ii, 333.
- Invisibility, that which possesses the attributes of i. is Brahman, i, p. xxxv, 135-142.
- may be an attribute of the pradhāna, i, 136.
- Involucrum of delight, ii, 202 seq.
- Īvara*, the Lord, i, p. xxv.
- as a retributor and dispenser, i, p. xxvi.
- retracts the material world and sends forth a new one, i, pp. xxvi, xxvii.
- or the lower Brahman, i, pp. xxvii, xci, xcii.
- is something unreal according to Sāṅkara, i, p. xxx.
- no distinction between Ī. and Brahman, i, p. xxx.
- of Rāmāṇuga, i, p. cxxiv.
- see also Lord.
- Īvaragītās* = Bhagavadgītā, ii, 63.
- Itihāsas*, ii, 315.
- and Purāṇas, i, 198, 217, 222, 223, 304, 348; ii, 235.
- are of human origin, hence do not constitute an independent means of authoritative knowledge, i, 218.

- Itihâsas and Purâṇas based on mantra and arthavâda, i, 222.
 — based on perception, i, 222.
 — all the four castes are qualified for acquiring the knowledge of the, i, 229.
- Kahola, the questions of K. and Ushasta constitute one vidyâ, ii,
 242 seq.
- Kaitraratha Abhipratârin, Gâna-ruti being mentioned together with the Kshattriya K. must have been a Kshattriya himself, i, 226
 seq.
- Kâkrâyana, the Rîshi, when in danger of life, ate unlawful food, but refused to drink, ii, 311.
- Kalpas, the great world periods, i,
 p. xxvi, 212.
 — there is no measure of the past and the future, i, 361.
- Kalpa-sûtras, i, p. xii.
- Kanabhug. See Kanâda.
- Kanâda, i, 315.
 — his Vaireshika-sûtras, i, 384.
 — his doctrine, i, 386 seq.
 — his reasons for the permanence of the atoms, i, 392 seq.
 — his followers deny the origination of ether, ii, 5.
 — declare the soul to be non-intelligent, ii, 33.
 — their doctrine about the unintelligent Selfs and the internal organs, ii, 69.
- Kânâdas. See Vaireshikas.
- Kânvas and Mâdhyandinas, the two râkhâs of the Brihad-âraṇyaka,
 i, p. lxxxix, 134, 260 n., 262
 seq.; ii, 214, 308.
- Kapardin quoted by Râmânuga, i,
 p. xxi.
- Kâpeya, Kaitraratha Abhipratârin connected with, i, 226.
- Kapila and other supreme rîshis maintain the doctrine of the pradhâna being the general cause only because it is based on the Veda, i, 237.
 — his Sânkhya-âstra, i, 291.
 — his knowledge rîshi-like and unobstructed, i, 292, 293, 294, 315.
 — the dvaitavâdin, not mentioned in Sruti, i, 294.
- Kapila Vâsudeva who burned the sons of Sagara, another, i, 294.
 — by acknowledging a plurality of Selfs, does not admit the doctrine of there being one universal Self, i, 295.
 — blamed by Manu, i, 295.
 — his great principle, i, 296.
- Kâpila Smṛiti, i, 291.
- Karmakânda, systematised by the Pûrva Mîmâṃsâ, i, p. ix.
 — concerned the higher castes only,
 i, p. xi.
 — cannot lead to final release, i, pp.
 xxvii, xxix.
 — its subject-matter, i, 21, 24.
 — activity depends on the, i, 322.
 — works enjoined in the, ii, 184,
 314 n.
- Kârshnâgini, i, p. xix.
 — his view of the remainder of works with which the soul re-descends, ii, 119 seq.
- Kâsakritsna, i, pp. xix, xcix.
 — on the highest Self existing in the condition of the individual soul, i, 278-283.
- Kârbaka, ii, 196.
- Kârba-upanishad quoted in the Vedânta-sûtras, i, p. xlii.
 — its topic the boons granted by Yama to Nakîketas, i, 249.
- Kaushîtaki-upanishad quoted in the Vedânta-sûtras, i, p. xlii.
- Kbândogya-upanishad, most of the passages discussed in the Ved-ânta-sûtras are taken from the, i, pp. xli seqq., xlv seq.
 — creation according to the, ii,
 4 seq.
 — the Udgîtha-vidyâ of the, ii, 192-199.
- Kitragupta and others are employed by Yama as superintendents of hells, ii, 123.
- Kitraratha connected with the Kâpeyas, i, 226.
- Knowing, repetition of the mental functions of k., meditating, &c.
 is required (even where the text gives instruction once only), ii, 331-337.
 — and 'meditating' are used one in the place of the other, ii, 332.
- Knowledge, he who consists of k. is

- not the individual soul, but Brahman, i, p. xxxviii, 233-236.
- Knowledge, when does it arise, in this life or in the next? i, p. lxxvi; ii, 327-330.
- defined, i, 6.
 - is not an activity, i, 35 seq.
 - an attribute of goodness, i, 46, 48 seq.
 - the individual soul consists of, i, 134.
 - 'when he has departed, there is no more,' i, 280 seq.
 - the act of k., the object of k., and the result of k., an internal process, i, 418.
 - the act of k. and the object of k. are simultaneous, hence in reality identical, i, 419.
 - the means of k., the object of k., the knowing subject, and the act of k. are all alike indefinite, i, 429.
 - nescience, work, and former k., limiting adjuncts of the soul, ii, 367.
 - and works are the two roads for entering on the road of the gods and the road of the fathers, ii, 123-125.
 - the path of the gods cannot be attained by faith and austerities, unaided by, ii, 234.
 - works inferior to, ii, 267, 307.
 - mere k. cannot effect the purpose of man, ii, 288 seq.
 - good works also are apt to obstruct the result of, ii, 356 seq.
 - works connected with k. are superior to those destitute of, ii, 361.
 - means of, sacrifices and other works are, i, p. lxxviii; ii, 292 seq., 306-309, 313-315, 358-362.
 - procured in a former existence, i, 228; ii, 316, 328.
 - discussion of the various, ii, 306-327.
 - calmness &c. are direct means of k., sacrifice &c. are indirect means, ii, 307-309.
 - Muniship is enjoined as, ii, 322-324.
- Knowledge belongs to those who are bound to chastity, ii, 295.
- works are co-operative for the origination of k., but not for the fruits of, ii, 313.
 - also persons 'standing between,' i.e. not belonging to one or other of the stages of life, are qualified for, ii, 315 seq.
 - works if joined with k. may effect final release, ii, 359.
 - higher and lower, distinguished by Sāṅkara, i, pp. xxxi, lxxviii, 137 seqq.; this distinction not valid, i, pp. lxxxviii-xci.
 - — not distinguished by Rāmānuga, i, pp. xxxi, lxxviii seq.
 - — not distinguished by Bādarāyana, i, pp. c, ci.
 - — not distinguished in the Upanishads, i, pp. cviii-cxi, cxv seq.
 - the lower, departure of the soul of him who possesses, i, p. lxxix; ii, 364-404.
 - the greater part of the Vedānta-sūtras is taken up with, i, p. ci.
 - comprises the Rig-veda and so on, i, 137, 138.
 - leads to mere worldly exaltation, the higher to absolute bliss, i, 138.
 - he who possesses it obtains lordly power and cessation of all sin, ii, 355.
 - the highest, the fate of the soul of him who has reached it, i, p. lxxx seq.; ii, 372-377.
 - is this by which the Indestructible is apprehended, i, 135, 137 seq.
 - true (or perfect, or k. of the highest Self), the practical world, perception, &c., vanishes in the sphere of, i, 135, 281; ii, 340, 400.
 - is irrefutable, i, 282.
 - cannot be founded on reasoning, i, 316 seq.
 - rests on the Veda, i, 317.
 - as long as it is not reached, the ordinary course of secular and religious activity holds on undisturbed, i, 324.
 - — injunctions and prohibitions

- do not refer to him who has obtained, ii, 67.
- Knowledge, true, will spring up of itself, it cannot be enjoined, ii, 163, 164 seq.
- has pious meditation for its antecedent, ii, 205.
 - there is no difference in it as there is between works, ii, 330.
 - there can be no successive stages in it, ii, 336.
 - when t. k. springs up, Scripture ceases to be valid, ii, 340.
 - it is impossible for any one who has not reached t. k. to refrain altogether, from birth to death, from all actions, ii, 399.
 - a man dying in the possession of t. k. shakes off his good and evil deeds, i, p. lxx; ii, 119, 225-229, 230, 294 seq., 357 seq.
 - even beings who have reached t. k. may retain a body for the discharge of certain offices, i, p. lxxii; ii, 235-238.
 - in all cases brings about its fruit, viz. final release, i, 229; ii, 235-238.
 - by means of it, there is effected the Self's dissociation from the mātrās, i, 281.
 - is the door to perfect beatitude, i, 283.
 - Smṛitis composed with reference to t. k. as the means of final release, i, 291.
 - is not purposeless, ii, 64.
 - the accomplishment of man's highest end by means of t. k., the different injunctions as to the means of t. k., and the absence of certain rules as to release which is the fruit of, ii, 101, 285-330.
 - for those who have risen to t. k. it would be purposeless to proceed on the path of the gods, ii, 232.
 - completely destroys the potentiality of action, ii, 237.
 - alone effects the purpose of man, ii, 285, 290-306.
 - its fruit, being present to intuition, does not manifest itself at a later time only, as the fruits of actions do, ii, 294.
- Knowledge, true, he who possesses t. k. cannot be born again, ii, 369 seq., 419.
- is the door of release, ii, 370, 371, 400.
 - owing to the power of t. k. the soul departs through the hundred and first vein, ii, 377 seq.
 - through t. k. the expanse of names and forms which Nescience superimposes on Brahman is dissolved, ii, 401.
 - see also Brahman, knowledge of, p. 449.
 - see also Self, knowledge of the.
 - (vidyā) of the prāṇa, ii, 186 seq.
 - of Brahman's couch, ii, 400.
 - of Brahman within the heart, ii, 410. See also Daharavidyā.
 - of Agni Vairvānara. See Vairvānara-vidyā.
 - of the five fires. See Fires.
 - of the udgītha. See Udgītha-vidyā.
- Kṛikkhṛa* penance, prescribed for hermits and mendicants who have broken their vows, ii, 319.
- Krishna* or Vishnu, and the Bhagavadgītā, i, p. cxxvi.
- Krishna* Dvaipāyana, Apāntaratamas was born again as, ii, 235.
- Kundapāyins*, the ayana of the, a great sacrifice lasting a whole year, ii, 250, 250 n., 251, 314.
- Legends recorded in the Vedānta-texts have the purpose of glorifying (as arthavādas) the injunctions with which they are connected, i, p. lxxv; ii, 305 seq.
- Libations, five l. in the form of Sraddhā, Soma, rain, food, seed are offered in the five fires, viz. the heavenly world, Parganya, the earth, man, and woman, ii, 103.
- the seven l. (from the saurya libation up to the jataudana l.) are limited to the Ātharvavikās, ii, 189, 190.
- Light is the highest Brahman, i,

- pp. xxxiv, xxxviii, 87-97, 185, 191, 231 seq.
- Light, Brahman is the l. of lights, i, 193, 194.
- of Brahman, by it everything is lighted, i, p. xxxvi, 192-195.
- is the cause of the manifestation of this entire world, i, 194.
- the first-born (original) l. which has not yet become tripartite, i, 88 seq.
- the highest l. identified with the gastric fire within man, i, 89.
- the prāṇa Self is the universal, i, 195.
- on the road beginning with l. the departed soul proceeds, ii, 382-384, 386.
- and the other stations on the soul's journey to Brahman are conductors of the souls, not marks of the road, nor places of enjoyment, ii, 387-389.
- the l. into which the soul enters is the highest Self, ii, 407.
- highest. See also Lord, highest.
- Lightning is the end of the road beginning with light, ii, 386.
- beyond l. there is Varuṇa (on the path of the gods), ii, 386.
- after the l. has been reached, the souls are led through the worlds of Varuṇa, &c., by the person, not a man, who follows immediately after the, ii, 389.
- Lokāyatikas*, i, 14.
- Lord, the, or the highest Self, or Brahman, i, p. xxvii.
- matter and souls constitute his body, i, p. xxviii.
- pervades all things as their antaryāmin, i, p. xxviii.
- modes of him (prakāra), i, p. xxviii.
- creation owing to an act of volition on his part, i, p. xxix.
- is Brahman in the condition of an effect, i, p. xxix.
- highest, all-knowing, all-powerful, i, 15, 79, 136 seq., 329, 357.
- his knowledge does not require a body, i, 50 seq., 438.
- the one within the sun and the eye is the, i, 77-81, 124 seqq.; ii, 416 seq.
- Lord, highest, has no special abode, but abides in his own glory, i, 78.
- the sole topic of all worldly songs, i, 80.
- — — of Scripture, i, 160.
- may assume a bodily shape formed of Mâyā, i, 80, 370 seq.
- also resides in the body, but not in the body only, for he is all-pervading, i, 111.
- although present everywhere, he is pleased when meditated upon as dwelling in the heart, i, 114, 196.
- immortality and fearlessness ascribed to him, i, 125.
- free from all evil, i, 125.
- the lordly power of the gods is based on the, i, 130; so also that of other souls, ii, 416-418.
- is the source of all beings, i, 135-142.
- 'measured by a span,' i, 144, 150-153, 192, 195 seq.
- has a shape consisting of the threefold world, i, 145 seq.
- the perception of the h. L. is the gastric fire, i, 147, 149.
- has the heaven for his head &c., and is based on the earth, i, 148.
- forms the head &c., and is based on the chin of the devout worshipper, i, 148.
- is everlastingly free from Nescience, ii, 149.
- worship of the h. L. as Vaiṣvānara, i, 149 seq.
- the supporting of all things up to ether can be the work of the h. L. only, i, 170.
- is greater than ether, i, 177.
- is a liminary support, i, 181 seq.
- there is only one h. L. ever unchanging, whose substance is cognition, and who, by means of Nescience, manifests himself in various ways, i, 190.
- besides the h. L. there is no other substance of cognition, i, 190.
- is the absolute ruler of the past and the future, i, 196.

- Lord, highest, his nature is Mâyâ joined with time and karman, i, 357 n.
- cannot be reproached with cruelty, on account of his regarding merit and demerit, i, 357-360; ii, 180-183.
 - his essential goodness affirmed by Sruti and Smṛiti, i, 358.
 - his position analogous to that of Parganya, i, 358.
 - Scripture the production of the omniscient L., and the omniscience of the L. based on Scripture, i, 437.
 - we are to meditate on him, i, 441.
 - from him there result samsâra and moksha, ii, 58 seq.
 - is the evolver of names and forms, i, 328 seq.; ii, 96-98.
 - meant by the term 'he who renders tripartite,' ii, 97.
 - is free from all qualities, ii, 340.
 - there is also a form of the h. L. not abiding in effected things, ii, 417 seq.
 - the Bauddhas do not admit a ruling, i, 403.
 - on the Sāṅkhya and Yoga systems the L. acts as the ruler of the pradhâna and of the souls, i, 434 seq.
 - Parupati, Siva, i, 435.
 - the pradhâna cannot be ruled by the L. in the same way as the organs are ruled by the soul, i, 437 seq.
 - such terms as L. and the like cannot be applied to the individual soul, i, p. xxxix.
 - highest, is not, like the individual soul, the cause of evil, i, p. xlix, 343-346.
 - who abides within the soul, is not affected by the imperfections clinging to the soul, i, pp. lxii-lxiv.
 - the intelligent Self is the, i, 15, 234, 290; ii, 337-340.
 - different from the individual soul, i, p. xcvi, 70, 81, 159 seq., 187, 234; ii, 290 seq.
 - the released soul, ii, 418.
 - is himself the individual soul, not anything else, i, 279; ii, 65 seq., 138 seq., 140, 244 seq., 291, 338, 339 seq.
- Lord, highest, stands in the realm of the phenomenal in the relation of a ruler to the individual souls, i, 329.
- with a view to the efforts made by the soul the L. makes it act, ii, 59-61.
 - as the soul is affected by pleasure and pain not so the, ii, 63-65.
 - refutation of the view that a h. L. is not the material but only the operative cause of the world, i, p. li, 284, 434-439, 440.
 - the world, according to the Upanishads, is nothing but a manifestation of the h. L.'s wonderful power, i, p. cxix.
 - the cause of the world, i, 16, 17, 46, 48, 49, 61, 243, 254, 263-266, 270, 271, 328; ii, 183.
 - dependency of the world on him, i, 242-245, 290, 370; ii, 415 seq.
 - arranged at the beginning of the present kalpa the entire world just as it had been arranged in the preceding kalpa, i, 215.
 - the creation of this world is mere play to him, i, 357.
 - may, although himself unmoving, move the universe, i, 369.
 - is the creative principle abiding within the elements, ii, 24 seq.
 - is a causal agent in all activity, ii, 59.
 - only is eternal and the creator of the world, ii, 416.
 - see also Īvara.
 - see also Brahman, and Self.
- Lords, such as Hiranyagarbha, &c., are able to continue their previous forms of existence in each new creation, i, 213, 215.
- Lotus, as the L. wanders from one pond to another without any means of conveyance, so Brahman creates the world, i, 348.

- Madhu-vidyā, i, 216 seq.; ii, 233.
- Mādhymikas, or nihilists, believe that everything is void and nothing whatever is real, i, p. li, 5 n., 401 n.
- Mādhyaṇḍinas. See Kāṇvas.
- Magician, Saṅkara's illustrative instance of the m. producing illusive sights is not known to Bādarāyaṇa, i, pp. xxv, xciv n.
- Magicians, multiform creations exist in them, i, 353.
- Mahābhārata, Vedāntic portions in it referred to by the Sūtras of Bādarāyaṇa, i, p. cxxvii.
- there is one universal Self according to the, i, 295.
- quoted to show that those who know Brahman do not go or depart, ii, 375.
- Māheśvaras. See Saivas.
- Maitrāyaṇīya-upanishad, Mâyā in the, i, pp. cxvii n., cxxi n.
- Maitreyī, dialogue of M. and Yâgñavalkya, i, 274 seqq.
- Maitreyī-brāhmaṇa, ii, 305, 306.
- Man, fancifully identified with the sacrifice, ii, 220, 221, 265.
- Man-sacrifice, the particulars of it given in the Khândogya are not to be inserted in the Taittirīyaka, ii, 220-222.
- Manas. See Mind.
- see Internal organ.
- Mantras, certain m. and brāhmaṇa passages, met with in the beginning of some Upanishads, do not belong to the brahmavidyā, i, p. lxx; ii, 222-225.
- do not constitute an independent means of authoritative knowledge for anything, i, 218.
- though subserving other purposes, are also independent means of knowledge, i, 220-222.
- have occasionally to be explained in a secondary sense, i, 318.
- which are enjoined in one Sākhā are taken over by other Sākhās also, ii, 273 seq.
- enjoined in one Veda are valid for other Vedas also, ii, 274.
- and arthavādas as authorities on the gods, i, 198, 203, 217, 219 seq., 223, 304, 348, 355.
- — stories about men who obtained new bodies, in the, ii, 235.
- Mantras and arthavādas on the non-return of the released Soul, ii, 418 seq.
- Manu mentioned in Sruti, i, 294, 294 n.
- 'Whatever M. said is medicine,' i, 294.
- blames the doctrine of Kapila, i, 294 seq.
- recommends reasoning, i, 315.
- the doctrine of pradhāna accepted by, i, 394.
- Manu-smṛiti opposed to the Sāṅkhya-smṛiti, i, p. xlvii, 291.
- Maruts, i, 202, 216.
- Materialists, i, p. lxxiv.
- consider intelligence to be a mere attribute of the body, i, 368.
- assert that a Self separate from the body does not exist, ii, 269.
- do not admit the existence of anything but the four elements, ii, 270.
- Matter, unevolved (avyakta), i, p. xxviii.
- — becomes gross, i, p. xxix.
- and souls constitute the body of the Lord, i, p. xxviii.
- Mâyā or Avidyā, the appearance of the world due to it, i, p. xxv.
- is neither sat nor asat, i, p. xxv, 243.
- a principle of illusion, i, p. xxv.
- constitutes the upādāna, i, p. xxv.
- belongs to Brahman as a śakti, i, p. xxv, 362.
- modifies itself into all the individual existences, i, p. xxv.
- bodily organs and mental functions the offspring of, i, p. xxvi.
- the non-enlightened soul is unable to look through it, i, p. xxvi.
- the material world merged into it, i, p. xxvi.
- he whose soul has been enlightened withdraws from the influence of, i, p. xxvii.
- the world is not unreal M., i, p. xxx.
- Brahman becomes a personal God through, i, p. xxx.
- the soul is Brahman in so far as

- limited by the unreal upâdhis due to, i, p. xxx.
- Mâyâ, the doctrine of, unknown to Bâdarâyana, i, pp. xci-xcvii, c.
- not in the Upanishads, i, pp. cii, cxvi-cxxi.
 - though not part of the teaching of the Upanishads, does not contradict it openly, i, p. cxxv.
 - is of a non-intelligent nature, and the world does not spring from Brahman as being intelligence, but from Brahman as being associated with, i, p. xciii.
 - occurrence of the word M. in the Upanishads, i, p. cxvii n.
 - the highest Lord may assume a shape formed of, i, 81.
 - the nature of the Lord is M. joined with time and karman, i, 357 n.
 - in consequence of the Lord's conjunction with M. the creation is unavoidable, i, 357 n., 369.
 - emitted by the omniform Nârâyana, ii, 157.
 - see also Nescience.
- Meditating, repetitions of the mental functions of knowing, m., &c., is required even where the text gives instruction once only, ii, 331-337.
- and 'knowing' are used one in the place of the other, ii, 332.
- Meditation on Brahman as possessing certain attributes, i, p. lxvii, 107-109.
- the devotee engaged in it is to view it as constituting his own Self, i, p. lxxvi; ii, 337-340.
 - on the lower Brahman may have different results, ii, 161 seq., 185.
 - — its fruit lordship over the worlds, ii, 402.
 - is an action, knowledge is not, i, 35.
 - the threefoldness of, i, 102-106, 272.
 - as taught in the Vedânta-texts, is possible only if the soul is an agent, ii, 52.
 - presentation before the mind of
- the highest Self is effected through, ii, 171 seq.
- Meditation as a means of the knowledge of the highest person, ii, 204 seq.
- the double enunciation 'I am thou' and 'Thou art I,' points to a twofold m. on the oneness of the Self, ii, 244 seq.
 - owing to the might of the m. on the unity of prajñā and udgītha, the Hotṛi sets right any mistake he may commit in his work, ii, 282.
 - on the udgītha viewed as the sun, ii, 333.
 - is in itself of the nature of work, and thus capable of producing a result, ii, 348.
 - by the application of m. the soul departs by the vein passing through the skull, ii, 377 seq.
- Meditations (vidyās), discussions as to whether certain m. have to be combined or to be kept apart, i, pp. lxvii seq., lxx, lxxii seq.; ii, 184-192, 216-222, 240-249.
- certain m., such as that on the udgītha, are really separate, although apparently identical, i, p. lxviii; ii, 192-196.
 - on Brahman, in all of them are all its qualities included, or only those mentioned in the special m.? i, p. lxviii seq.; ii, 201-204.
 - the form under which the Self of the meditating devotee has to be viewed in them, i, p. lxxiv.
 - for which the texts assign one and the same fruit are optional, i, p. lxxv; ii, 280 seq.
 - not m. on symbols, are the cause of being led to the world of Brahman, ii, 403 seq.
 - on constituent parts of sacrifices, are not to be considered as permanently requisite parts of the latter, i, p. lxxiv; ii, 252-256.
 - — — are valid for all jâkhâs, i, p. lxxiv; ii, 272-274.
 - — — and m. which refer to special wishes may be cumulated or optionally employed, i, p. lxxv; ii, 281-284.

- Meditations on constituent parts of sacrifices, are to be carried on by the sacrificer, ii, 320 seq.
- — — by the priest, ii, 321.
 - certain clauses forming part of the m., are not mere glorifications, but enjoin the m., i, p. lxxv; ii, 303-305.
 - which refer to one subject, but as distinguished by different qualities, have to be held apart as different m., i, p. lxxv; ii, 277-279.
 - on the Self are to be repeated again and again, i, p. lxxvi; ii, 331-337.
 - are to be carried on in a sitting posture, i, p. lxxvii; ii, 349 seq.
 - may be carried on at any time, and in any place, favourable to concentration of mind, i, p. lxxvii; ii, 350 seq.
 - are to be continued until death, i, p. lxxvii; ii, 351 seq.
 - are themselves acts, but not subordinate members of the sacrifices, ii, 256.
 - subserve the end of man, not of sacrifice, ii, 283.
 - the fruit belongs to him who carries out the, ii, 320.
 - — — to the sacrificer, ii, 321.
- Mendicant, religious, meditation only is prescribed for him, not action, i, p. lxxv; ii, 295-303, 306.
- — — and Brāhmanas, ii, 27.
 - — — not afflicted by pain, ii, 64.
 - — — the term 'austerity' cannot refer to him, ii, 300 seq.
 - — — the state of being grounded in Brahman belongs to him, ii, 300-303.
 - — — enjoys immortality, ii, 301.
 - — — penance prescribed for the m. who has broken his vow, ii, 319.
- 'Mental' cup, offered on the tenth day of Soma sacrifices, ii, 260 seq., 263, 266 seq.
- Mental impressions, the variety of ideas is due to m. i. of former ideas, i, 420, 420 n.
- — — their existence is not possible on the Bauddha view, i, 425-427.
- Mental impressions, internal cognition cannot be their abode, i, 426 seq.
- Metres, by means of the m. the direction of the mind on Brahman is declared, i, 93-95.
- their names used to denote other things resembling those m. in certain numerical relations, i, 95.
 - statements about the order of succession of m. supplementing each other, ii, 225, 228.
 - of the Asuras and of the Devas, ii, 228, 228 n.
- Milk, as milk transforms itself into curds, so Brahman is the cause of the world, i, 346 seq.
- Mīmāṃsā, i, p. ix.
- its two branches, pūrva and Uttara, i, p. ix.
 - the word employed already in the Brāhmanas, i, p. x.
 - its various means of proof, as determining the proper meaning and position of Scriptural passages in the Vedānta-sūtras, i, p. xli.
 - the Vedānta-sūtras as well as the Pūrva-mīmāṃsā-sūtras are throughout M., i, p. xlv.
- Mīmāṃsā-śāstra, a short name for the Pūrva-mīmāṃsā-śāstra, i, p. xi.
- Mīmāṃsā-sūtras not intelligible without a commentary, i, p. xiii seq.
- Mind (manas), the being which consists of m. & c. is Brahman, not the individual soul, i, p. xxxiv seq., 107-116.
- Brahman as it differentiates itself through the m. is called individual soul, i, 104.
 - is the abode of the power of cognition, i, 105.
 - the embodied Self is connected with the, i, 107.
 - the 'two entered into the cave,' are they the m. and the individual soul, or the individual soul and the highest Self? i, 118 seqq.
 - constitutes the limiting adjunct of the individual soul, and chiefly abides in the heart, i, 175.

- Mind is superior to the sense-objects, i, 239.
- intellect is higher than the, i, 239 seq.
 - presupposes the existence of an aggregate of atoms, viz. the body (Baudha), i, 403 n.
 - Pradyumna denotes the, i, 440.
 - speech, breath, and m. presuppose fire, water, and earth, ii, 78 seq.
 - has all things for its objects and extends to the past, the present, and the future, ii, 81.
 - on account of the plurality of its functions we find it designated as manas or buddhi or aham-kâra or âtta, ii, 81.
 - has five functions, ii, 89 seq.
 - accompanies the soul when leaving its body, ii, 102.
 - six and thirty thousand different energies of the m. identified with the fire-altars, the cups, &c., ii, 265.
 - speech is merged in, ii, 364 seq.
 - all sense-organs are merged in, ii, 365 seq.
 - breath may be viewed as the causal substance of, ii, 366.
 - is earth, ii, 366.
 - i. e. the function of m., is merged in breath, on the departure of the soul, ii, 366 seq.
- Mitra and Varuna, Vasishtha again procreated by them, ii, 235.
- Moksha. See Release.
- Moksha Sâstras, ii, 158.
- Momentariness, the Baudha doctrine of universal m., i, 403 n., 407, 408, 427.
- — — is impossible on account of remembrance of the perceiving person, i, 413-415.
- Monism. See Advaita.
- Moon, men who perform sacrifices &c. ascend after death to the, i, p. cvii, 108, 110, 112, 114, 121-125.
- the soul's ascent to, and descent from the, ii, 101-132.
 - the body of the soul in the m. consists of water, which had originated in the m. for the purpose of enjoying the fruits of works, ii, 114, 115, 127.
- Moon, the soul's descending from the, ii, 126-128.
- Mother-of-pearl mistaken for silver, simile, i, 4 n., 5, 43.
- Mundaka-upanishad and the rite of carrying fire on the head, ii, 186, 189 seq.
- Muni, the state of the, enjoined by the side of learning and childlike state, i, p. lxxvi; ii, 322-327.
- Nâdis, veins or arteries of the body, by means of them the soul departs from the body, i, pp. lxxix, lxxxii.
- deep sleep takes place in them, i, 191; ii, 141-146.
 - glorified, ii, 143.
 - light contained in them, ii, 144.
 - and pericardium are, in deep sleep, merely the limiting adjuncts of the soul, ii, 145.
 - see also Veins.
- Nâdiketa, legend of, ii, 123.
- Nâdiketas, colloquy between Yama and, i, 247-252.
- Names, the two secret, applied to the deva-abode of Brahman and to its bodily abode, are to be held apart, ii, 216-218.
- and forms, i, p. xxv.
 - their evolution is the work, not of the individual soul, but of the Lord, i, pp. lix, lxiii; ii, 96-100.
 - — — was preceded by the tripartition, ii, 98.
 - — the object of Brahman's knowledge before the creation, i, 50.
 - — attributed to Brahman, i, 125.
 - — presented by Nescience, i, 140, 282, 328 seq., 345, 369; ii, 64, 140, 401, 402.
 - — on account of their equality, there is no contradiction to the eternity of the Veda in the renovation of the world, i, 211-216.
 - — the world periodically divests itself of them, i, 212.
 - — Brahman only is different from, i, 232 seq.
 - — the entire world of effects is evolved exclusively by, i, 233, 242, 268, 357.

- Names and forms, 'Being' is that which is differentiated by, i, 267.
- abide in the individual soul, i, 277 seq.
 - cannot abide in the soul, i, 279.
 - non-existence of the effect previous to its production only means the state of n. and f. being unevolved, i, 333.
 - the element of plurality characterised by, i, 352.
 - in Bauddha terminology, i, 404, 404 n.
 - the apparent world of n. and f. to be dissolved by knowledge, ii, 162 seq.
- Nārada, dialogue between N. and Sanatkumāra, i, 166 seq.
- instructed by the omniform Nârâyana, ii, 157.
 - assumed a new body, ii, 235.
- Nârâyana, another name of Brahman, i, p. xxxi n.
- the omniform N. instructed Nârada about Mâyâ being the cause of Nârada's seeing him, ii, 157.
 - who is higher than the Undeveloped, who is the highest Self, and the Self of all, reveals himself by dividing himself in multiple ways, i, 440.
- Nâsadiya-sûkta quoted, ii, 85.
- Nescience (avidyâ), superimposition is, i, 6.
- perception &c. have for their object that which is dependent on, i, 7.
 - the seed of the Samsâra, destroyed by knowledge of Brahman, i, 14, 300; ii, 68 seq.; but not by the lower knowledge, ii, 370.
 - distinctions fictitiously created by, i, 32.
 - Brahman as the object of, i, 62.
 - the limiting adjunct, consisting of the organs of action, presented by, i, 134.
 - the whole practical world exists only in the sphere of, i, 135, 155; ii, 294.
 - names and forms presented by, i, 139 seq., 282, 328 seq., 345, 357, 369; ii, 64, 67, 140, 163, 401, 402.
- Nescience, the conception that the body and other things contained in the sphere of the Not-self are our Self, constitutes N., i, 157.
- from it there spring desires, aversions, fear, and confusion, i, 157, 167.
 - compared to the mistake of him who in the twilight mistakes a post for a man, i, 185.
 - the unreal aspect of the individual soul, as different from the highest Self, is a mere presentation of, i, 189, 241, 244, 251, 252; ii, 68, 139, 173, 179, 340.
 - by means of N., the highest Lord manifests himself in various ways, i, 190, 352.
 - the causal potentiality is of the nature of, i, 243.
 - the body the product of, i, 244.
 - all the kinds of specific cognition belonging to the sphere of N., are absent in the sphere of true knowledge, i, 281.
 - the elements and the sense-organs the product of, i, 281.
 - the effects both at the time of creation and reabsorption are the mere fallacious superimpositions of, i, 312.
 - element of plurality the figment of, i, 355.
 - naturally tends towards effects without any purpose, i, 357 n.
 - cannot be the cause of inequality, as it is of a uniform nature, i, 360.
 - the relation of causes of suffering and of sufferers is the effect of, i, 380.
 - in the Vâisheshika-sûtra, i, 392 seq.
 - the mutual causality of N. and so on (Bauddha) cannot explain the formation of aggregates, i, 404-409, 404 n.
 - Bauddha doctrine of the distinction, owing to the influence of N., of the attributes of existence and non-existence, i, 423.
 - the rising from deep sleep is due to the existence of potential N., ii, 48.

- Nescience, the conditions of being agent and enjoyer presented by N. only, ii, 54, 55.
- the soul being engrossed by N., identifies itself as it were with the body &c., and imagines itself to be affected by the experience of pain which is due to N., ii, 63 seq., 65.
 - the soul when leaving its body takes N., with itself, ii, 102.
 - the Lord is everlastingly free from, ii, 149.
 - a soul which has freed itself from N. cannot possibly enter into phenomenal life, ii, 149.
 - limiting adjuncts presented by, ii, 67, 153, 156.
 - the primeval natural N. leaves room for all practical life and activity, ii, 156.
 - the bondage of the soul due to N. only, ii, 174.
 - a limiting adjunct of the soul, ii, 367.
- Nihilist = Bauddha, i, 415.
- Nihilists are the Mādhyamikas, i, 401 n.
- maintain that everything is void, i, 401.
 - are contradicted by all means of right knowledge, and therefore require no special refutation, i, 427.
- Nimi, Vasishṭha cursed by, ii, 235.
- Nirvāṇa, the eternally perfect, ii, 419.
- Nishādas and the four castes, the pañcagāṇāḥ, i, 262.
- Non-being. See Asat.
- Non-duality, taught both by Saṅkara and Rāmānuga, i, p. xxx.
- with a difference, taught by Rāmānuga, i, p. xxx.
- Non-ego, the object has for its sphere the notion of the, i, 3.
- Non-entity, non-existent. See Asat.
- Nyāya philosophy, i, 15 n.
- Object and subject cannot be identified, i, 3.
- are not distinguished in consequence of wrong knowledge, i, 4.
 - the relation of, cannot exist in the Self, i, 378 seq.
- Objects, the ten, and the ten subjects cannot rest on anything but Brahman, i, 104.
- have reference to pragñā, i, 105 seq.
 - are beyond the senses, i, 239, 244.
 - mind is superior to the, i, 239.
- Oblations, the five, not always necessary for birth, ii, 125 seq.
- Om, the syllable, and the udgītha, i, p. lxviii; ii, 193 seq., 196-199.
- is all this, i, 169 seq.
 - a means to obtain Brahman, i, 170.
 - meditation on the highest person by means of it, i, 171-174; is the lower Brahman the object of this meditation? i, 171 seq.; the highest Brahman is the object of it, i, 172 seqq.
 - which is a quality, i.e. the abode of a meditation, is common to the three Vedas, ii, 282 seq.
- Omnipotence depends on the omnipotent ruler being the cause of all created things, i, 132.
- Omniscience, ascribed to the Pradhāna, i, 46 seq.
- Ordeal of the heated hatchet, and the thief, i, 323 n.
- Organic beings, four classes of, ii, 126.
- Organs, the creation and reabsorption of the o. of the soul do not interfere with the creation &c. of the elements, i, p. liii; ii, 26-28.
- five intellectual, and five o. of action, ii, 81.
 - drawn inward in sleep, ii, 136.
 - of the body and the divinities declared to be non-different, ii, 257.
 - see also Internal organ, and Sense-organs.
- Pañḍi-rahasya Brāhmaṇa, i, 122.
- Pañḍi-upanishad, i, p. xxxv n., 161.
- Pañḍāgni-vidyā. See Fires, knowledge of the five.
- Pāñḍarātra, the followers of the P. = the Bhāgavatas, i, 442.
- Pāñḍarātras = Bhāgavatas, quod vide.
- Pañḍarikha, a Smṛiti writer, i, 291 n.

- Parganya, air manifesting itself in the form of, i, 229.
- the position of the Lord with regard to merit and demerit of the living creatures is analogous to that of, i, 358.
- Parivṛgakas. See Mendicant.
- Paryāṅka-vidyā, ii, 230, 232, 233.
- Passion is called red on account of its colouring, i.e. influencing property, i, 253.
- Goodness, P., and Darkness, the three guṇas, i, 353.
 - Goodness, P., and Darkness, the three constituent elements of the pradhāna, i, 364 n., 366 seq.
 - the guṇa, cannot be that which causes suffering, i, 379.
 - see Guṇas.
- Paśupati or Siva, according to the Śaivas, the operative cause, i, 435.
- Path, the Bauddha instruction as to the, i, 411.
- of the gods, i, p. xxix, 128; ii, 297, 381.
 - — only those who know the qualified Brahman proceed on the, while those who know the unqualified Brahman become one with it without moving to any other place, i, p. lxxi; ii, 231 seq.
 - — all who meditate on Brahman proceed on the, i, p. lxxii.
 - followed by all who are acquainted with the saguṇa-vidyās of Brahman, i, p. lxxii; ii, 232-235.
 - stations on it, i, p. lxxxii; ii, 382-389.
 - — men who possess knowledge proceed on it up to the world of Brahman, from which there is no return, i, pp. cvii, cix; ii, 124, 391, 418 seq.
 - the details about it are given both in the Upakośala-vidyā and in the Pañkāgni-vidyā, ii, 233, 234 seq.
 - cannot be attained by faith and austerities, unaided by knowledge, ii, 234.
 - description of it, ii, 364-404.
 - of the fathers, ii, 234, 381, 384.
 - leading through smoke, ii, 108.
- Path of the fathers to be obtained by means of sacrifices, works of public utility, and alms, ii, 124.
- Perception denotes Scripture, i, 203.
- possible without the body, as in dreams, ii, 272.
- Pericardium, also a place of deep sleep, ii, 142, 144.
- merely the abode of the limiting adjuncts of the soul in deep sleep, ii, 145.
- Person (puruṣa), the highest, to be meditated upon with the syllable Om is not the lower, but the higher Brahman, i, p. xxxv seq., 171-174.
- — meditation as a means of the knowledge of, ii, 205.
 - of the size of a thumb is Brahman, i, p. xxxvii, 195-198.
 - which is not the original Brahman, but an effect may be called the internal Self of all beings, i, 142.
 - 'Beyond the Great there is the Undeveloped, beyond the Undeveloped there is the P.,' i, 237 seq.
 - is essentially pure, i, 298.
 - is higher than the senses and everything else, ii, 204 seq.
 - called the Self, ii, 205.
 - is hard to know, and to be reached by sharp minds only, ii, 205.
 - in the sun, the golden, is the highest Self, i, 63, 112.
 - — whom the sun does not know, i, 81.
 - — and Agni are not equal, though the term 'death' is applied to both, ii, 267.
 - — and the p. seen within the eye are not some individual soul, but Brahman, i, p. xxxiv, 77-81.
 - — and the p. within the eye are one, ii, 217, 218, 244-247.
 - within the eye, is Brahman, i, p. xxxv, 123-130.
 - — is not a deity of the sun, i, 124, 130.
- Pradhāna, the non-intelligent first cause, the Sāṅkhya doctrine of the, refuted, i, pp. xxxii, xlvi, l, xciii, cxvii, 16, 16 n., 46 seq.,

- 47-64, 70 seq., 135 seq., 139-142, 237-241, 238 n., 252, 257-260, 263, 290, 296, 313 seq., 353 seq., 363-381, 437 seq.
- Pradhâna, the Upanishads teach nothing like it, i, p. cxix.
- figuratively spoken of as thinking, i, 52 seq.
 - is not figuratively spoken of as thinking, i, 53 seq.
 - cannot be designated by the term 'Self,' because release is taught of him who takes his stand on that (the Sat), i, 55-57.
 - — because there is no statement of its having to be set aside, i, 57 seq.
 - — on account of the individual soul going to the Self, i, 59 seq.
 - the internal ruler is not the, i, 132 seq.
 - absolute bliss cannot result from, i, 138.
 - the abode of heaven, earth &c. cannot be the, i, 154, 157, 158.
 - the supporting of all things up to ether cannot be the work of the, i, 170, 171.
 - denoted by 'the Undeveloped,' i, 238, 245 seqq.
 - by the term p. the Sâṅkhya understands the antecedent condition of the world, i, 242.
 - is something to be cognised, i, 246.
 - is not spoken of as an object of knowledge, i, 246 seq.
 - not mentioned among the subjects of discussion in the colloquy between Yama and Nāṭiketas, i, 247-252.
 - a mere thing of inference and not vouched for by Scripture, i, 252.
 - is not denoted by agā, i, 252-257.
 - why it is treated in the Vedānta-sūtras, i, 288 seq., 317.
 - the Smṛitis teach that it is the independent cause of the world, i, 291.
 - assumed by the Yoga-Smṛiti, i, 296.
 - the non-intelligent p. cannot pass into what is intelligent, i, 308.
 - is the state of equilibrium of the three guṇas, Goodness, Passion, and Darkness, i, 353.
- Pradhâna, arguments of the Sâṅkhyas for the threefold, i, 364.
- its three constituent elements, Goodness, Passion, and Darkness, i, 364 n., 366 seq.
 - activities cannot be ascribed to a non-intelligent, i, 367-369.
 - cannot be active, because it stands in no relation, there being nothing beyond it, i, 370 seq.
 - does not modify itself spontaneously, i, 371 seq.
 - absence of a purpose on the part of the, i, 372 seq., 374.
 - the soul may move the p. as the lame man moves the blind one, or as the magnet moves the iron, i, 373 seq.
 - the theory of p. adopted by Manu and other adherents of the Veda, i, 394.
 - the Lord acts as the ruler of the p. and of the souls, and the p., the soul, and the Lord are of mutually different nature (Sâṅkhya and Yoga), i, 434 seq.
 - the Lord cannot be connected with the souls and the, i, 436 seq.
 - of infinite duration, i, 438.
 - the same as saṃsâra, i, 439.
 - through it the souls obtain enjoyment and release, ii, 69.
- Pradyumna, a manifestation of the highest being, i, p. xxiii, 441 seq.
- cannot spring from Saṅkarshana, i, p. li, 441, 442.
 - a form of Vāsudeva, denotes the mind (manas), i, 440.
 - Aniruddha cannot spring from, i, 441, 442.
- Pragâpati, birth of P., whose body is this threefold world, i, 142.
- is himself an 'effect' and called the inner Self, i, 142 seq. n.
 - his instruction on the Self, i, 183-191.
 - Indra his disciple, i, 199.
 - the creator, i, 203 seq.; ii, 206.
 - above Varuṇa there come Indra and P., on the path of the gods, ii, 386.
- Pragâpativākya, in the Kṛāṇḍogya-upanishad, i, p. lxiii.
- Prâṇasarâla, ii, 274, 276.

Prakṛiti of the Sāṅkhyas, i, p. xxx.
— the individual soul as free from, i, p. lxxxiii.

Pralaya (re-absorption of the world into Brahman) at the end of each kalpa, i, pp. xxix, liv, xciv, 382 n., 386-389; ii, 47, 371, 392.

— in it endeavour cannot take place, because no body exists then, nor any other seen cause, required to bring about the conjunction of the atoms, i, 387.

— would be impossible, if the atoms were essentially active, i, 391.

— see also World, reabsorption of the.

Prāṇa, Vāyu and, not to be identified, i, p. lxxiv; ii, 256-259.

— is Brahman, i, 229-231, 272; ii, 143.

— through knowledge of the p. immortality arises, i, 229-231.

— is a raised thunderbolt, i, 229-231.

— is the highest Self, i, 231.

— knowledge of the, ii, 186 seq.

— is the best among the organs of the body, ii, 256.

— everything is food of the, ii, 309 seq.

— see also Breath, and Vital air.

Prāṇāgnihoṭra is not omitted even when the eating of food is omitted, ii, 249 seq.

— is omitted when the eating of food is omitted, ii, 250-252.

— the details of the fundamental Agnihoṭra not valid for it, ii, 251 seq.

Prāṇas, the word 'person' applied to them, i, 261.

— colloquy of the, i, 304; ii, 88, 89, 186, 187 seqq., 200, 211, 215, 309.

— the individual soul is the sustaining principle of the, i, 361.

— see also Vital airs.

Prāṇavidyās, their unity, i, p. lxviii; ii, 200 seq., 212.

Prajna-upanishad, on the akshara Om, i, p. xliii.

Prastoti, even those priests, P. and so on, who are devoid of the knowledge of the divinities of the prastāva and the like, perform the sacrifices, ii, 254.

Pratardana, the legend of Indra and, i, 97-99, 101; ii, 305, 306.

Pravargya-ceremony, passages about the, ii, 222-224.

Prayer, where the works of the āśramas are not possible, p. qualifies for knowledge, ii, 316.

Priest, the meditations on subordinate members of the sacrifice are his work, ii, 321.

— the fruit of meditations in which the p. is the agent goes to the sacrificer, ii, 321.

Priests: as a rule sacrificers of one and the same family employ officiating p. of one and the same family, i, 226.

— even those p. who do not know the divinities of the prastāva and the like, perform sacrifices, ii, 254.

Purāṇas, on past and future kalpas, i, 361.

— see Itihāsas and P.

Purifications, required for Vedic works, mentioned with a view to the origination of knowledge in him who has undergone those, ii, 314.

Purushas of the Sāṅkhyas, i, p. xxx.

Purusha-vidyā, of the Taittirīyaka and of the Kāṇḍogya-upanishad are not to be combined, ii, 220-222.

Pūrvākāryās, 'ancient teachers,' quoted by Rāmānuga, i, p. xxi.

Pūrvamīmāṃsā, i, p. ix.

— — arose at an early date, i, p. x.

— — enquiry into active religious duty its subject, i, 10.

— — means of proof made use of in the, i, 17 seq. and n.; ii, 262 seq.

Pūrvamīmāṃsā-sūtras, i, p. xii.

Pūshan, the grains for P. are to be crushed at all vikṛitis of the darṣapūrnamāsa, ii, 309.

Rāgasūya-sacrifice, Brāhmaṇas are not qualified for the, i, 218; ii, 266.

— is to be offered by a prince who wishes to become the ruler of the whole earth, i, 222, 222 n.

- Rahasya-brâhmana, of the Tândins and the Paingins (the Kbân-dogya), ii, 220.
- Raikva, called Gânasruti a Sûdra, i, 223-226.
- possessed the knowledge of Brahman, ii, 315.
- Rakshas, among the pañkaganâb, i, 262.
- Râma Misra Sâstrin, Pandit, i, p. xxii n.
- Râmânuga, his Vedânta-sâra, i, p. xvi.
- Sri-bhâshya, i, p. xvi seq.
- rests on old and weighty tradition, i, pp. xvii, xxii.
- its sectarian feature, i, p. xxxi n.
- follows the authority of Bodhâyana, i, p. xxi seq.
- quotes a series of ancient teachers in his Vedârthasaṅgraha, i, p. xxi seq.
- sketch of his philosophical system, i, pp. xxiv, xxvii seqq.
- and Saṅkara, i, pp. xxii seqq., lxxxv-ci, cxxvi.
- chief points in which they agree and differ, i, pp. xxx seq., xxxiii-xi, xlviii-li, lxii-lxvi, lxviii-lxxiv, lxxvi-lxxix, lxxx-lxxxvi, cxii, cxiv, cxviii n., cxxi.
- on the subdivision of the Vedânta-sûtras into Adhikaraṇas, and the determination of the Vedic passages discussed in the Sûtras, i, pp. xli-xlvi.
- relation of Bâdarâyana's Sûtras to their chief distinguishing doctrines, i, pp. lxxxvii-ci.
- as interpreters of the Upanishads, i, p. cxxiii seq.
- approves of the system of the Bhâgavatas, i, p. li seq.
- on the relation of the individual soul to Brahman, i, pp. liii seq., lviii.
- according to him the soul is of minute size, and a knowing agent, i, pp. liv-lvii.
- on the activity of the soul, i, p. lvii.
- on dreams, i, p. lx seq.
- on the term 'mâyâ', i, p. lxi.
- on the combination of the senses with the manas, &c., at the death of the vidvân, i, p. lxxix.
- Râmânuga, on the immortality of him who knows Brahman, i, pp. lxxix, lxxx.
- his explanation preferred to that of Saṅkara, i, p. lxxxvi seq.
- denies the distinction of the two Brahman and the doctrine of Mâyâ, i, p. xci.
- denies the distinction between a higher and a lower knowledge, i, p. xci.
- denied that the Upanishads teach Mâyâ, i, p. cii.
- Râmânugas, an important Vaishṇava sect, i, p. xvii.
- closely connected with the Bhâgavatas, i, p. xxii seq.
- their fundamental text concerning the soul's fate after death, i, p. cxxi seq.
- see also Bhâgavatas.
- Râmâyan of Tulsidâs, i, p. cxxvii seq.
- Rânâyaniya-khila, the holding together and the pervading the sky attributed to Brahman in the R. are not to be inserted in other vidyâs, i, p. lxx; ii, 218-220.
- Rânâyaniyas, the Upanishad of the, ii, 219.
- Raurava, one of the seven hells, ii, 123.
- Reabsorption of the world into Brahman. See World and Pralaya.
- Real, the, and the Unreal, i.e. the intelligent Self and the non-real objects, coupled by wrong knowledge, i, 4.
- Realists, i.e. the Sautrântikas and the Vaibhâshikas, i, 401 n.
- maintain the reality of everything, i, 401.
- controverted, i, 402-418.
- Reasoning stands nearer to perception than Sruti, i, 299.
- is there room for objections founded on r. after the sense of the sacred texts has once been settled? i, 299 seq.
- only a subordinate auxiliary of intuitional knowledge, i, 307.
- which disregards the holy texts and rests on individual opinion

- only has no proper foundation, i, 314-317.
- Reasoning, the assertion that r. has no foundation rests on r. only, i, 315.
- recommended by Manu, i, 315.
 - the want of foundation constitutes the beauty of, i, 315 seq.
- Régnaud, M. Paul, i, pp. cv, cxvii.
- Release, final, or emancipation, attained by highest knowledge, i, p. xxvii, 29, 63, 71, 92, 291, 300, 316, 327, 328; ii, 55, 101, 101 n., 165 seq., 235-238, 357, 370, 371, 397-400.
- persons desirous of, have to include such qualities as satyā-kāmatva in their meditations on Brahman, i, p. lxxiii.
 - — — the dissolution of the apparent world prescribed for them, ii, 162.
 - — — could not be in the possession of irrefutable knowledge, if the doctrine of general identity were not true, i, 282.
 - is nothing but Brahman, i, 28 seq., 34, 283 n.; ii, 329.
 - not the effect of religious merit, i, 27 seqq.
 - is an eternally and essentially disembodied state, i, 28, 29, 283, 328.
 - is of the nature of the eternally free Self, i, 32.
 - is something to be ceremonially purified, i, 33.
 - is of the nature of Brahman, which is eternally pure, i, 33.
 - is it a quality of the Self? i, 33.
 - taught of him who takes his stand on the Sat, i, 55-57.
 - desire of, caused by the reflection that all effects, objects, and powers are non-permanent, i, 198.
 - a man going to f. r. reaches the sun, i, 232.
 - connected with the element of unity in Brahman, i, 322.
 - cannot be the purpose of the pradhāna, i, 372 seq.
 - would be impossible on the pradhāna hypothesis, i, 373, 374, 380 seq.
- Release, final, is impossible, if the causes of suffering and the sufferer (i. e. the world and the souls) constitute one Self, i, 378.
- depends on knowledge, according to the Sāṅkhya also, i, 380 n.
 - no being desirous of, could be assumed, on the Bauddha doctrine, i, 406 seq.; nor on the Gaiṇa doctrine, i, 430.
 - Bauddha doctrine of bondage and, depending on absence and presence of right knowledge, i, 423.
 - the Gaiṇa doctrine of bondage and, untenable, i, 432.
 - the Self which enjoys f. r. must be the agent in the meditation which helps to bring it about, ii, 52 n.
 - impossibility of f. r. would follow, if the Self's agency were natural, ii, 53.
 - Samsāra and f. r. result from the highest Lord, ii, 58 seq., 139.
 - consists, according to the Vaiśeṣikas, in the absolute non-origination of the nine qualities of the Self, ii, 69.
 - the Self freed of the aggregate of eight, in f. r., ii, 83, 83 n.
 - the existence of a remainder of works does not stand in its way, ii, 119.
 - obtained by sleep only, ii, 148 seq.
 - by successive steps, one of the results of meditations on the qualified Brahman, ii, 162, 185, 391.
 - is possible, because the bondage of the soul is due to Nescience only, ii, 174.
 - no definite rule about its springing up in this life or in the next, exists as to the fruit which is, ii, 329 seq.
 - could never take place, if the chain of works which have been running on from eternity could not be cut short, ii, 355 seq.
 - cannot be dependent on locality, time, and special causes, as the fruit of works is, ii, 356.

- Release, final, the death of the body is the term of the attainment of, ii, 357 seq.
- works if joined with knowledge may effect it, ii, 359.
 - is something not to be effected at all, ii, 359.
 - is a fruit like other fruits, ii, 405.
 - — in so far only as it is a cessation of all bondage, not as implying the accession of something new, ii, 406.
 - when the released has a body and senses, the state of f. r. is analogous to the waking state, ii, 413; when he has no body and no senses, it is analogous to that of a dream, ii, 413.
 - what Scripture says about absence of all specific cognition refers either to deep sleep or to f. r., not to that abode which is the result of qualified knowledge, ii, 414 seq.
 - see also Emancipation.
- Released, the. See Soul, released.
- Religious acts, their performance has for its fruit transitory felicity, i, 11.
- see also Works, and Sacrifice.
 - duty, the enquiry into it carried on in the Gaimini-sûtra, i, 26.
 - the possession of supernatural powers depends on the performance of it, i, 293.
 - is characterised by injunction, i, 293, 293 n.
 - in the case of r. d. we entirely depend on Scripture, i, 299.
 - hunter, i, 228.
 - merit, different degrees of pleasure the mere effects of it, i, 27.
 - final release not the effect of it, i, 27 seq.
 - is what brings about the fruits of actions, as Gaimini thinks, ii, 182.
- Retraction (of the world into Brahman). See Pralaya, and World.
- Rig-veda, the lower knowledge comprises the, i, 137, 138.
- the prazava belonging to the R. is connected with the udgitha belonging to the Sâma-veda, ii, 282 n.
- Rik, the highest Self is, i, 79.
- meditation on the earth as R., and fire as Sâman, ii, 345-349.
- Rinsing of the mouth with water before and after eating is enjoined with reference to the act of meditation on the water viewed as the dress of prâna, ii, 211-214.
- Rîshi, knowledge of the R. necessary for the performance of a sacrificial action, i, 213 seq.
- the Tantra (Sâhkhya-sâstra) composed by a, i, 291, 292.
- Rîshis cannot perform sacrifices, hence are not entitled to the study of the Veda, i, 197 n.
- are entitled to acquire knowledge, i, 199.
 - the Vedas were seen by R., men of exalted vision, i, 213, 223.
 - cannot be qualified for meditations connected with, i, 217.
 - we have no right to measure by our capabilities their capability, i, 223.
 - create many things by their mere intention, i, 347 seq.
- Rivers, simile of the, i, 277 seq., 279.
- Road of the gods. See Path of the g.
- of the fathers. See Path of the f.
- Rudra, in consequence of a boon being granted to R., Sanatku-mâra was born again as Skanda, ii, 235.
- Rudras, class of gods, i, 202, 216.
- Ruler within, or the internal r., is Brahman, i, pp. xxxv, xlii seq., cxiii, 130-135.
- is not the pradhâna, i, 132 seq.
 - cannot mean the embodied soul, i, 133-135.
- Sabara Svâmin, ii, 268.
- Sacrifice must be preceded by the knowledge of the Rîshi of the mantra used, i, 213 seq.
- Sûdra unfit for it, i, 224.
 - is accomplished by means of speech and mind, ii, 57.
 - water is intimately connected with, ii, 105, 108, 109.
 - though involving harm done to animals, &c., is not unholy, ii, 130 seq.

- Sacrifice, man fancifully identified with the, ii, 220, 221, 265.
- subordinate members of the, meditations on them are the business of the priest, not of the sacrificer, i, p. lxxvi; ii, 320 seq.
 - — — though connected with s., yet are not necessary members of the s., because they have results of their own, ii, 252-256.
 - — — contribute towards the supersensuous result of the entire s., ii, 346 seq.
 - — — prescribed for some typical s. are so prescribed for the modified forms of the s. also, ii, 192, 192 n.
 - — — on which the meditations rest are taught in the three Vedas, so also the meditations, ii, 281 seq.
 - — — the ideas of Āditya &c. are to be superimposed on them, ii, 345-349.
- Sacrifices required as conducive to the rise of knowledge in the mind, i, p. lxxv; ii, 306-309, 313-315, 327 n.
- which are enjoined permanently, such as the Agnihotra, do not lose their efficiency, i, p. lxxviii; ii, 358-360.
 - the Upanishads distinguish men who perform s. and meritorious works only, and men who in addition possess a certain kind of knowledge, i, p. cvii.
 - the performers of s. only proceed on the northern path of the sun, i, 27.
 - — are objects of enjoyment for the gods, ii, 111.
 - — dwelling together with the gods obtain enjoyment, ii, 111, 112.
 - — only rise to the moon, ii, 122; the opposite view refuted, ii, 121-123, 124.
 - animals, gods, and Rishis do not perform, i, 197 n.
 - men whose only desire is emancipation, do not perform s., as they do not care for the perishable fruits of them, i, 197 n.
- Sacrifices, a god may divide himself into many forms and enter into relation with many, i, 200.
- those who do not perform s., descend to Samyamana, the abode of Yama, suffer their torments, and then again reascend to this world, ii, 122 seq.
 - lead to the road of the fathers, ii, 124.
 - prescribed for him who is desirous of the heavenly world, ii, 162, 182.
 - certain mantras and s., referred to in certain passages, the matter of which is different from the approximate vidyās, have not to be combined with the latter, ii, 222-225.
 - performed even by priests who do not know the divinities of the, ii, 254.
 - Vedic texts referring to s. aim at enjoining the performance of the entire s. only, ii, 274, 275.
 - cognitions compared with, ii, 280.
 - and other duties connected with householdship, ii, 298.
- Sacrificial thread round the neck or on the right shoulder, ii, 298.
- Sādhyas, i, 216.
- Saivas maintain that the five categories were taught by the Lord Paśupati to the end of breaking the bonds of the soul; Paśupati is, according to them, the operative cause, i, 435.
- Sākhā, in the same S. also there is unity of vidyā, ii, 214-216.
- although they differ as to accents and the like, the vidyās connected with certain members of sacrificial acts, refer to the udgītha and so on belonging to all, ii, 272-274.
 - mantras and the like enjoined in one S. are taken over by other Sākhās also, ii, 273 seq.
- Sakti, Mâyā belongs to Brahman as a, i, p. xxv.
- Sālagrām, Hari is contemplated in the sacred stone called, i, 114, 126, 178.

- Samâtâra, a book of the Âtharvânikas treating of Vedic observances, ii, 189.
- Sâman, the highest Self is, i, 79.
- meditation on the fire as S., and the earth as Rik, ii, 345-349.
- Sâma-veda, the pranava belonging to the Rig-veda is connected with the S. meditation on the udgitha, ii, 282 n.
- Samnyâsin, in the case of perfect knowledge not yet having arisen in the S., Muniship is enjoined as a means of knowledge, ii, 322-324.
- Samsâra (the endless cycle of birth, action, and death), the Veda furnishes the means of escaping from it, i, pp. xxvii, xxix.
- release from it according to Sânkara and Râmânuga, i, p. xxxi.
- Nescience, the seed of it, i, 14; ii, 68 seq.
- non-eternal, of a fleeting, changing nature, i, 27.
- beginningless, i, 212, 214, 420; ii, 60.
- gradually all souls are released from it, i, 439.
- the pradhâna which is ruled by the Lord and which modifies itself for the purposes of the soul is what is meant by, i, 439.
- is only due to the qualities of the buddhi and the other limiting adjuncts being wrongly superimposed upon the Self, ii, 43 seq., 46-48.
- and moksha result from the highest Lord, ii, 58 seq.
- the Lord afflicted by the pain caused to the soul by its experience of the, ii, 63.
- the nine qualities of the Selfs constitute the s. according to the Vaishikas, ii, 69.
- the manner in which the soul together with its subordinate adjuncts passes through the, ii, 101-132.
- threefold fruits of action in the s., viz. pain, pleasure, and a mixture of the two, come from the Lord, ii, 180 seq.
- Samsâra, the Self which stands outside the, ii, 288.
- scriptural declarations of the, ii, 371.
- would be impossible on the assumption of the soul being either a part, or an effect of, or different from Brahman, ii, 397.
- because the s. depends on works, it does not follow that the s. will cease, when works are absent, ii, 398.
- Samvarga-knowledge, or S.-vidyâ, i, 224-226; ii, 19, 196.
- Samvarta became a great Yogin, ii, 315.
- Samyamana, those who do not perform sacrifices go to S., the abode of Yama, ii, 122 seq.
- in the city of S. evil works are requited under Yama's rule, ii, 123.
- Sanatkumâra, dialogue between Nârada and, i, 166 seq.
- a son of Brahman's mind, was, in consequence of a boon being granted to Rudra, born again as Skanda, ii, 235.
- Sândilya, i, p. cxv.
- did not find highest bliss in the Vedas, i, 443.
- Sândilyavidyâ, i, pp. lxxvii, lxxv, cxiv, 91; ii, 187, 214, 216, 217, 219, 233, 266.
- Sânkara or Sâhkarâcârya, i, p. xiv.
- his commentary represents the orthodox side of Brahmanical theology, i, p. xiv.
- — the oldest of the extant commentaries, i, p. xiv.
- — the authority most generally deferred to in India, i, p. xv.
- his authority above doubt and dispute, i, p. xv.
- how far he represents the true Vedânta doctrine, i, p. xvii seq.
- his doctrine of the absolute identity of the individual soul with Brahman, i, p. xx.
- refers to other commentators, i, p. xx.
- his school acknowledges Vedântic teaching of an essentially different type, i, p. xxi.

Saṅkara or Saṅkarātārya, preceded by Dramida, i, p. xxii.

— and Rāmānuga, i, pp. xxii seqq., xxx seq., xli-xlvi, lxxxv-ci.

— — disagree as to the system of the Bhāgavatas, i, p. li seq.

— sketch of his philosophical system, i, p. xxiv seqq.

— his doctrine about the soul being merged in Brahman, faithfully represents the teaching of the Upanishads, i, p. cxxi seq.

— his mode of interpretation with regard to the Upanishads, i, pp. cxxii-cxxv.

— the philosophy of S. nearer to the teaching of the Upanishads than the Sūtras of Bādarāyana, i, p. cxxvi.

— a translation of his commentary cannot be combined with an independent translation of the Vedānta-sūtras, i, p. cxxviii.

Saṅkara system, no tendency among its followers to keep their doctrines secret, i, p. xcix.

Saṅkarsha-kāṇḍa, ii, 259.

Saṅkarshaṇa, a manifestation of the highest being, i, pp. xxiii, lii.

— originated from Vāsudeva, i, p. li.

— a form of Vāsudeva, denotes the individual soul, i, 440.

— cannot spring from Vāsudeva, i, 441, 442.

— Pradyumna cannot spring from, i, 441, 442.

— taken as a Lord, i, 441 seq.

Saṅkhyā and Yoga are mere Smṛiti, not of scriptural character, ii, 381.

Saṅkhyas, their prakṛiti and puruṣas, i, p. xxx.

— refutation of their doctrines, i, pp. xxxix-xlvi, xciii, 15 n., 237-289.

— — is applicable also to other theories, i, p. xl, 288 seq.

— were anxious to prove that their views are warranted by scriptural passages, i, p. xlvi.

— Vedāntins, and Upanishads, i, p. cxvii.

— their three guṇas, i, 28. See also Guṇas.

— number of their categories, i, 257-260.

Saṅkhyas maintain duality, do not discern the unity of the Self, i, 298.

— are in harmony with the Veda, in their description of the soul as free from all qualities, i, 298.

— hold that the intelligent beings (i. e. the souls) are incapable of either taking in or giving out anything, and are non-active, i, 301.

— the objections raised by them against the Vedānta doctrine apply to their view also, i, 313 seq.

— reasons why their system should be refuted by the Vedāntin, i, 363 seq.

— charge the Vedāntins with contradictions, i, 376-378.

— think that eternal intelligence constitutes the very nature of the soul, ii, 33.

— their doctrine of many Selfs refuted, ii, 69 seq.

— teach that the chief vital air is to be considered as the combined function of all organs, ii, 86.

— hold that the Self and the organs are both all-pervading, and when obtaining a new body only begin to function in it in consequence of the Karman, ii, 103.

— see also Pradhāna.

Saṅkhyasāstra taught by Kapila, i, 291 n.

Saṅkhyā-smṛiti, i, 247, 258, 284 n., 296.

— and other Smṛitis, their conflicting claims, i, p. xlvii, 290-296.

— refuted, i, 132 seq.

— the pradhāna assumed by the, i, 158.

— the three entities (the great principle, the Undeveloped, the soul) in the, i, 238.

— and Yoga-smṛiti, why singled out for refutation, i, 297 seq.

— knowledge of the S. does not lead to highest beatitude, i, 298.

Sāriraka Mīmāṃsā-sūtras, another name for Vedānta-sūtras, i, p. xiv n., 9.

- Sârîraka-jâstra, its aim is to show that there is only one highest Lord, i, 190.
- Sarvadarśanasamgraha, Râmânuga chapter in the, i, p. xxiv.
- Sat, 'being,' 'that which is,' Mâyâ cannot be called so, i, p. xxv.
- in the beginning there existed nothing but the, i, p. cv seq.; this passage refers to the Self, i, p. cxviii; ii, 209 seq.
 - the thought of it not to be understood in a figurative sense, i, 54.
 - release is taught of him who takes his stand on it, i, 55-57.
 - pradhâna is not denoted by the term, i, 57-60.
 - denotes that which is differentiated by names and forms, i, 267.
 - Brahman is S., and the world is S., i, 332.
 - there is no origin of S. (i. e. of Brahman), ii, 19 seq.
 - fire has for its source S. (Brahman), ii, 20-22.
 - 'he became S. and tyat,' ii, 25, 167.
 - chapter treating of the, ii, 96.
 - a name of Brahman, ii, 142, 144, 160.
 - comprises the Self as well as the Non-Self, ii, 210, 210 n.
 - which is the root of the world, is the only object of cognition, ii, 396.
- Satapatha-brâhmana, its accentuation, and the Bhâshika-sûtra, i, 258 n.
- Sataudana libation of the Âtharvazikas, ii, 190.
- Sattva. See Internal organ.
- Satyakâma, i, p. cv.
- Satyaloka, the world of the lower Brahman is called S., i, 181.
- Saunaka on the Rishis, i, 213.
- Saurya libation of the followers of the Atharva-veda, ii, 190.
- Sautrântikas are realists, i, 401 n.
- Savitar (the Sun) after having for thousands of yugas performed the office of watching over these worlds, enjoys at the end of this period the condition of release in which he neither rises nor sets, ii, 236.
- Scripture allows argumentation, i, 17.
- and intuition as means of knowledge, i, 18.
 - Brahman the source of, i, 19-22.
 - the means of knowing Brahman, i, 20 seq., 22-47, 288, 350-352, 355; ii, 339.
 - aims at action, i, 20 seq.
 - not the source of Brahman, i, 22.
 - because it is directly stated in S. therefore the all-knowing Brahman is the cause of the world, i, 61-64, 306, 317.
 - intuition vouched for by, i, 101 seq.
 - Brahman is the special topic of, i, 160, 265 seq.
 - nowhere makes statements regarding the individual soul, i, 160.
 - in order to be authoritative, is independent of anything else, i, 203.
 - Smṛiti depends on, i, 203, 440.
 - may sometimes have to be taken in a secondary sense, i, 318.
 - its authoritativeness denied by the Bauddhas, i, 412.
 - is the production of the omniscient Lord, and omniscience of the Lord is based on it, i, 437.
 - our only authority in the origination of the knowledge of supersensuous things, ii, 4.
 - our knowledge of what is duty and the contrary of duty depends entirely on, ii, 131.
 - ceases to be valid, when true knowledge springs up, ii, 340.
 - see also Śruti, and Veda.
- Self, the soul looks for its true S. in the body, &c., i, p. xxvi.
- consisting of bliss (ânandamaya), is the highest Self, not an individual soul, i, p. xxxiii seq., 64-77.
 - — — desire mentioned as belonging to it, i, 70 seq.
 - — — scripture teaches the joining of the individual soul with it, i, 71-77.
 - — — Brahman is called the tail, i. e. a member of it, i, 72 seq.
 - the S. (of whose existence all - are conscious) is Brahman, i, 14, 377; ii, 208 seq.

- Self, different opinions about it, i, 14 seq.
- everything has its S. in Brahman, i, 23.
 - passages about the non-transmigrating, i, 25 seq.
 - not joined to the gross body, not to the subtle body, independent of either, i, 28 n.
 - the word S. is applied to the cause of the world, i, 53-55.
 - used figuratively in the sense of 'that which effects all purposes of another,' i, 54, 56.
 - pradhāna cannot be designated by the term 'Self,' i, 55-60.
 - in its primary meaning refers to what is intelligent only, i, 56.
 - the individual soul goes to the, i, 59 seq.
 - the personal S. of a deity may be called an intelligent, i, 99.
 - the Person called the internal S. of all beings, i, 142.
 - divine, one and the same d. S. may assume several forms at the same time, i, 200.
 - the intelligent, is the highest Lord, i, 234, 235.
 - the great, may denote the intellect of the first-born Hiraṇyagarbha, i, 240.
 - is higher than the intellect, i, 240.
 - i. e. the individual soul, or the fundamental intellect, i, 241.
 - is the intelligent soul of the Sāṅkhyas, i, 259.
 - husband, wife, riches, and other objects of enjoyment in this world are dear on account of the, i, 274.
 - is not destroyed, i, 281.
 - but by means of true knowledge there is effected its dissociation from the mātṛās, i, 281.
 - makes itself; which is possible owing to modification, i, 287.
 - the witnessing S. is self-proved, i, 424.
 - is one and permanent, i, 424.
 - there results from the Gaina doctrine non-universality of the, i, 431 seq.
- Self, the doctrine of the Upanishads refers to that S. which stands outside the saṃsāra and cannot therefore be subordinate to activity, ii, 288.
- love, play, and the like cannot be ascribed to the action of the, ii, 410.
 - has the option of manifold existence, ii, 412, 413 seq., 414 n.
 - the highest, there is no Self apart from, i, p. xxvii, 113, 115, 155, 190, 240 seq., 249 seqq., 277, 283, 295, 320-330, 381; ii, 66-68, 73, 174-180, 244; nor within it, ii, 180.
 - — Vāsudeva identical with it, i, p. xxiii, 440.
 - — or Brahman, i, p. xxvii, 36.
 - — the world is the body investing it, i, p. xxx.
 - — different from the soul in the states of deep sleep and departing, i, p. xxxix, 233-236; ii, 54.
 - — the S. to be seen, to be heard, &c., is the h. S., not the individual soul, i, p. xl, 274-283.
 - — higher than everything, i, p. lxix; ii, 204 seq.
 - — the S. spoken of in the account of the creation given in Ait. Ār. II, 4 is not a lower form of the S., but the h. S., i, p. lxix; ii, 205-211.
 - — relation of the individual soul to the h. S., i, p. cxxi seq., 37, 118-123, 161, 185 seq., 190, 233, 251, 277 seq., 278 n., 278-283, 441; ii, 65 seq., 68 seq., 138, 149, 173-175, 240 seq., 407 seq.
 - — its true nature is nothing either to be endeavoured after or to be avoided, i, 36.
 - — the golden person in the disc of the sun is the, i, 63.
 - — although eternally unchanging and uniform, it reveals itself in a graduated series of beings, i, 63.
 - — is ānandamaya, i, 66-68.
 - — only is entirely free from sin, i, 79.
 - — is Rīk, Sāman, Uktha, Yagus, Brahman, i, 79 seq.

- Self, the highest, the knowledge of the, is most beneficial for man, i, 98, 167, 250.
- — — subsequently to it all works and their effects entirely cease, i, 98.
 - — — through it everything becomes known, i, 275.
 - — — is self-established, ii, 14.
 - — — souls devoid of it are objects of enjoyment for the gods, ii, 111.
 - — — is it connected with works, or is it an independent means to accomplish the purpose of man? ii, 285-306.
 - — — does not only not promote action but rather cuts all action short, i, 290.
 - — — the qualities of having true desires and true purposes attributed to the, i, 110.
 - — — the eater is the h. S. since what is movable and what is immovable is mentioned as his food, i, 116-118.
 - — — fruition on the part of the h. S. denied, i, 117, 119, 120.
 - — — the person within the eye is the, i, 129 seq.
 - — — universal rulership an appropriate attribute of it, i, 131 seq.
 - — — immortal, unseen, unheard, i, 132.
 - — — organs of action may be ascribed to it, i, 132.
 - — — may be represented as the Gârhapatya-fire, i, 150.
 - — — as the mere witness, i. e., the pure Self, non-related to the limiting conditions, i, 150.
 - — — is the abode of heaven, earth, &c., i, 161.
 - — — absence of seeing, &c., characteristic of it, i, 168 seq.
 - — — the qualities of being the True, of resting in its own greatness, of being omnipresent, and of being the Self of everything, can belong to the h. S. only, i, 169.
 - — — meditation on the, i, 171-174.
 - — — its reward, i, 174.
 - — — 'the highest person' means 'the h. S.', i, 171-174, 205.
 - — — corresponds to the mental act of complete intuition, i, 172.
- Self, the highest, its nature is pure intelligence, i, 185 seq.
- — — that after which sun, moon, &c., are said to shine is the, i, 192-194.
 - — — the word 'light' denotes the, i, 195; ii, 407.
 - — — with reference to the heart the h. S. is said to be of the size of a span, i, 196-198.
 - — — prâna is the, i, 230 seq.
 - — — is the end of the journey, the highest place of Vishnu, i, 239.
 - — — the calm, i. e. the h. S., i, 241.
 - — — Nâṭiketas' question and Yama's answer as to the, i, 248.
 - — — is above all attributes, i, 249.
 - — — the one general cause, i, 274.
 - — — is the centre of the whole world with the objects, the senses, and the mind, it has neither inside nor outside, it is altogether a mass of knowledge, i, 276.
 - — — is the operative as well as material cause of the world, i, 286.
 - — — is not affected by the world-illusion, i, 312.
 - — — the one unchanging witness of the three states, the creation, subsistence, and reabsorption of the world, i, 312.
 - — — though devoid of motion, may yet move other things, i, 369.
 - — — the relation of object and subject cannot exist in it, i, 378 seq.
 - — — appears in manifold forms, i, 440; ii, 66-68.
 - — — its nature is eternal presence, ii, 15.
 - — — is not an effect, i, 15.
 - — — is not the shaper of dreams, ii, 137 seq.
 - — — the creation of the worlds was accomplished by some inferior Lord, different from, and superintended by the, ii, 206.
 - — — the passage 'Being only this was in the beginning' refers to it, ii, 209 seq.
 - — — is within all, ii, 242 seq.
 - — — men wrongly superimpose upon it the attribute of being made up of many parts, such as the body, the senses, &c., ii, 336.

Self, the highest, affected with duality by Nescience, ii, 340.
 — not to be contemplated in the symbol, ii, 340-342.
 — see also Brahman, and Lord.
 — individual (embodied), can an existence independent of the body be assigned to it? i, p. lxxiv; ii, 268-272.
 — a reflection of the highest S., i, p. xcvi.
 — is the only reality, i, 4 n.
 — is the object of the notion of the Ego, i, 5.
 — is the witness of all the modifications of the internal organ, i, 9.
 — the identity of the i. S. and Brahman, i, 30 seq., 41-43, 45, 105; ii, 288, 291, 337-340.
 — — — arguments against it, ii, 338.
 — is purified by certain ritual actions, i, 33.
 — cannot be the abode of any action, i, 33.
 — cannot become an agent, i, 42.
 — considered as the agent in sacrifices, i, 42.
 — as the ruler of the organs of action is connected with the mind, i, 107.
 — the golden person is in the, i, 112.
 — difference and non-difference of the i. S. and the highest S., i, 112 seq., 115, 130, 187, 249 seqq., 251 seq., 283.
 — is the charioteer, the body the chariot, i, 121.
 — cannot be the person in the eye, i, 124, 129 seq.
 — is not immortal, i, 130.
 — the effects of Nescience, desire and works, ascribed to it, i, 130.
 — is one only, i, 135.
 — is, by means of merit, and demerit, the cause of the origin of the complex of things, i, 136.
 — has the qualities of Selfhood and intelligence, but not those of omniscience and similar qualities, i, 158, 268.

Self, individual, of a dreaming person, there exists a multiform creation in it, i, 352 seq.; ii, 133 seq., 137 seq.
 — how is it known at all if it is not the object of perception? i, 368.
 — is not produced, but it is eternal, according to Scripture, ii, 29-33.
 — deep sleep takes place in it, ii, 141-146; therefore the awakening takes place from it, ii, 146 seq.
 — the passages about its having true wishes and other qualities, have to be combined, ii, 247-249.
 — the existence of a S. different from the body proved, ii, 268-272.
 — not different from the body, according to the materialists, ii, 269.
 — taught by the Upanishads as the object of cognition, ii, 288.
 — is 'thou,' it is the agent in seeing and hearing, is successively apprehended as the inward S. of all the outward involucra beginning with the gross body, and finally ascertained as of the nature of intelligence, ii, 335.
 — the conceit of it being subject to pain is a wrong conceit, ii, 336 seq.
 — when released, manifests itself in its own nature, ii, 405 seqq.
 — see also Soul.
 Self-consciousness, the subtle elements of material things proceed from it, i, 376.
 Selves, the real, innermost Self and secondary, i, 64-66, 68, 72.
 — words like āditya, &c., convey the idea of certain divine, i, 219.
 — it is senseless to insist on a plurality of, i, 282 seq.
 — plurality of S. acknowledged by Kapila, i, 295.
 — nine qualities of the S., according to the Vaiśeṣikas, ii, 69.
 — refutation of the Sāṅkhya and Vaiśeṣika doctrine of many, ii, 69-73.

- Selves, there is no distinction of different S., such a distinction being due to limiting adjuncts only, ii, 172.
- Senselessness. See Swoon.
- Sense-organs, the elements and the s. the product of Nescience, i, 281.
- ten, ii, 65 n.
 - are the cause of the perception of the sense-objects, ii, 95.
 - the word prāṇa is secondarily applied to the, ii, 96.
 - accompany the soul when leaving its body, ii, 102.
 - all s., i.e. their functions, are merged in mind on the departure of the soul, ii, 365 seq.
 - and elements of him who knows Brahman are merged in Brahman, ii, 376 seq.
 - see also Organs.
- Senses, the objects are beyond the, i, 239, 244.
- the relation of the s. and their objects is based on the mind, i, 239.
 - the Sāṅkhyas enumerate sometimes seven, sometimes eleven, i, 376.
 - 'the abode of the six,' in Bauddha terminology, i, 404, 405 n.
 - though the soul is intelligent, the s. are not useless, ii, 34.
 - seven, ii, 82 seq.
 - called grahas, i.e. seizers, because they are bonds by which the soul is tied, ii, 83.
 - the vital airs are the eleven, ii, 93 seq.
- Servara-sāṅkhyas admit the existence of a highest Lord, but postulate a pradhāna besides, i, p. xl.
- Shodasakala-vidyā, ii, 233.
- Shodas-in-cup at the atirātra-sacrifice, either to be offered or not to be offered, i, 262 seq.; ii, 188.
- Shodas-in-rite, the time of the stotra accompanying the performance of the, ii, 228.
- Sin, on the attainment of Brahman all s. is extinguished, ii, 353-356.
- he who possesses knowledge obtains lordly power and cessation of all, ii, 355.
- Sîtâ not born in the ordinary way, ii, 125.
- Siva. See Parupati.
- Skanda, Sanatkumâra was born again as, ii, 235.
- Skandhas (groups), the five, of the realists, i, 402 seq.
- the atoms and s. cannot be assumed to enter on activity on their own account, i, 403.
- Sleep, the activity of the sense-organs interrupted during, i, 85, 86.
- a kind of dissolution and origination takes place in the sleeping and the waking states, i, 212.
 - the undeveloped principle or the causal potentiality is a universal s., in which are lying the transmigrating souls destitute for the time of the consciousness of their individual character, i, 243.
 - the soul wanders about in the state of, ii, 49 seq.
 - in it the organs are drawn inward, ii, 136.
 - deep, in the state of it the soul abides within Brahman in the heart, i, p. lxi, 180, 273, 350; ii, 54 seq., 141-147, 176, 210.
 - the soul awakening from it is the same that went to, i, p. lxi; ii, 147-149.
 - what Scripture says about absence of all specific cognition, refers either to d. s. or final release, i, p. lxxxv; ii, 145, 414 seq.
 - when a man sleeps he is gone to his own Self, i, 59.
 - the soul in the condition of d. s. is resolved into an intelligent entity, i, 60.
 - the vital air remains awake in the state of, i, 162-168.
 - is characterised by the cessation of the activity of all bodily organs, i, 163, 168.
 - bliss attaches to it, i, 163, 164, 168.
 - denoted by the word 'serenity,' i, 182.
 - the highest Self different from the individual soul in the state of, i, 233-236.

- Sleep, deep, the case of the re-absorption of the world compared with that of, i, 312.
- the absence of intelligence in it is only due to the absence of objects, but the soul remains intelligent even in, ii, 33, 34 seq., 47 seq., 336 seq.
 - the rising from it is due to the existence of potential avidyā, ii, 48.
 - takes place in the nāḍīs and in the Self, ii, 141-146.
 - — in the pericardium, ii, 142, 144.
 - the state of swoon is half coincident with, ii, 151 seq.
 - in it the elements are merged in Brahman in such a way as to continue to exist in a seminal condition, ii, 371.
- Sleeping man, the doctrine about the soul, conveyed by the waking of the, i, 269, 273, 274.
- Smṛiti, 'that which the S. assumes,' viz. the pradhāna of the Sāṅkhyas, i, 132 seq.
- inference from it of the meaning of Śruti, i, 145 seq.
 - in order to be authoritative, depends on Scripture, i, 203, 291 n., 293, 294, 297 n., 440.
 - and Śruti on the rinsing of the mouth with water, ii, 211-214.
 - Sāṅkhya and Yoga are S. only, without scriptural authority, ii, 381.
- Smṛitis such as the Manu-smṛiti opposed to the Sāṅkhya-smṛiti, i, p. xlvii, 290-296.
- if the doctrine of Brahman being the cause of the world be accepted, is there any room for S.? i, 290-299.
 - like the Kāpila S. were composed with reference to perfect knowledge as the means of final release, i, 291.
 - men who are unable to ascertain the true sense of Śruti, rely on them, i, 292.
- Smṛitis which follow Śruti are to be considered as authoritative, while all others are to be disregarded, i, 293, 294.
- Soma sacrifice, on the tenth day of a S. a soma cup is offered mentally, ii, 260 seq.
- extending over twelve days, may be viewed either as a sattra or as an ahina sacrifice, ii, 413.
- Soul¹, individual or personal, or gīva, i, p. xxv.
- Sāṅkarshaṇa identical with it, i, p. xxiii, 440.
 - according to Rāmānuga, i, pp. xxx seq., liii.
 - meant by the serene being, i, p. xxxvi, 188, 191.
 - the subject of the Upanishads, i, 36 seq.
 - cannot be denied, i, 37.
 - is the Self, i, 37, 54, 103, 361.
 - sattva and kshetragṇa, or the internal organ and the, i, 122 seq.
 - it is nowhere the purpose of Scripture to make statements regarding it, i, 160.
 - is known from experience to be the agent and enjoyer, i, 160.
 - Sāṅkhya views about it, i, 238, 259, 298, 370, 372-374, 379 n., 436-438; ii, 33.
 - Nāṭiketas' question and Yama's answer as to it, i, 248.
 - as it is the support of prāṇa, it may itself be called prāṇa, i, 270.
 - Āmarathya's opinion about it, i, 276 seq.
 - according to the Vaiśeṣikas intelligence is not essential to it, i, 388 n.
 - conjunction cannot take place between the atoms, the s., and the internal organ, i, 398.
 - its conjunction with the atoms cannot be the cause of the motion of the latter, i, 398 n.
 - its conjunction with manas cannot be the cause of cognition, i, 398 n.

¹ Arranged in the following order:—(1) different designations and notions of different schools about it; (2) its nature and characteristics; (3) its size; (4) s. and body; (5) s. and Brahman, the Lord, the highest Self; (6) its states of dream, sleep, swoon; (7) its fate after death; (8) the released s.

- Soul, denied by the Bauddhas, i, 403, 406.
- and non-soul of the Gainas, i, 428, 428 n.
 - Paṇḍita taught the five categories to the end of breaking the bonds of the animal, i.e. the s., i, 435.
 - individual, difference of scriptural statements regarding it, ii, 3.
 - — is non-intelligent, according to the followers of Kaṇāda, ii, 33.
 - the non-enlightened s. unable to look through Mâyâ, i, p. xxvi.
 - identifies itself with its adjuncts, i, p. xxvi.
 - in reality pure intelligence, non-active, infinite, it becomes limited, i, p. xxvi, 139 seq., 171; ii, 140.
 - individual, discussion on the nature of it, i, p. liii; ii, 28-73.
 - — is permanent, eternal, not produced from Brahman at the time of creation, i, p. liii; ii, 29-33.
 - — is gṛā, i, p. liv; ii, 33-35.
 - is all-pervading, not anu, i, p. liv seqq.; ii, 35-49.
 - intelligent, i, pp. lv, lvi, xcvi, 53, 103, 133, 134; ii, 33-35, 39-42, 43, 45-48, 367 seq.
 - is it an agent? i, pp. lvii, xcvi; ii, 49-58.
 - is imperishable, i, 37, 133, 438; ii, 28 seq.
 - is eternally unchanging, pure, and free, i, 37.
 - its characteristic marks, i, 102.
 - rules and employs the different organs of action, i, 102, 133.
 - is the charioteer driving on through transmigratory existence and final release, i, 121, 241.
 - is the enjoyer, i, 133.
 - is non-pervading, not omnipresent, i, 158.
 - is the knower, Brahman the object of knowledge, i, 159.
 - eating, i.e. fruition of the results of works, is characteristic of it, i, 159 seq., 269.
 - cannot be denoted by akshara, i, 171.
 - the mind constitutes its limiting adjunct, i, 175.
- Soul, individual, carries on the course of its practical existence by means of the activities of seeing, hearing, cognising; otherwise no practical existence at all would be possible, i, 186, 322.
- its nature before the rise of discriminative knowledge, i, 186 seq., 189.
 - as such is real, i, 189 seq.
 - depending on the Undeveloped, i.e. Nescience, i, 241, 244.
 - name and form abide in it, i, 277 seq.; cannot abide in it, i, 279.
 - the 'sufferer,' i, 376 n., 378.
 - is its suffering real or not? i, 379 seq.
 - cannot be the guiding principle of the adrishya, because at the time of pralaya its intelligence has not yet arisen, i, 388.
 - is not divided, but only appears divided, ii, 30, 32.
 - dwells within the heart, ii, 38 seq., 45, 175.
 - and intelligence represented as separate, viz. as the agent and the instrument of action, ii, 42.
 - tied by the senses (grahas), ii, 83.
 - the chief vital air is subordinate to it, ii, 88.
 - the vital airs are connected with it, which is the Lord of the aggregate of instruments of action, ii, 92 seq.
 - compared to a caterpillar, ii, 103.
 - is self-luminous, ii, 141.
 - is it to be meditated upon as the sun, and the sun as the s., or is it only to be meditated upon as the sun? ii, 244.
 - possesses Nescience, work, and former knowledge as limiting adjuncts, ii, 367.
 - its size minute (anu), says Rāmānuja, i, pp. liv, xcvi.
 - — atomic, ii, 35-45, 397.
 - — that of an awl's point, i, 113.
 - — compared to the point of a goad, i, 175.

- Soul, individual, its size, the Gainas believe that it is the same as that of the body, i, 431-434.
- requires a body in order that knowledge may arise, i, 51.
 - is in the body only, i, 111 seq.; ii, 93.
 - is the body the sufferer of pain, or the s.? i, 379; ii, 64, 65.
 - the Sāṅkhya cannot admit a real connexion of it and the body, i, 379.
 - endeavour (which is required for action) originates when it is connected with the internal organ which abides in the body, i, 387.
 - although abiding in one point of the body only, may be the cause of perception extending over the entire body, ii, 38-42.
 - that its knowledge and lordship are hidden, is due to its connexion with the body, ii, 139 seq.
 - the ruler of the body and senses, ii, 367.
 - and body viewed as non-different, ii, 374.
 - its relation to Brahman, i, pp. xix, lvii seqq., xcvi-c, 59 seq.; ii, 61-73, 138.
 - according to the Upanishads, i, p. cxxi seq.
 - has to be viewed like that of the snake to its coils, ii, 173 seq.
 - like that of light to its substratum, both being fire, ii, 174.
 - a part of Brahman, i, pp. xxv, xcvi seq.; ii, 61-63, 396 seq.
 - its fundamental identity with the highest Brahman, i, pp. xxvii, xxx, xxxiv seq., 51, 104, 116, 161, 185, 190 n., 198, 233, 251, 277 seq., 278-283, 322; ii, 30, 31, 33, 34, 42 seqq., 65 seq., 138, 140, 146, 244 seq., 396 seq., 399 seq.
 - becomes manifest by strenuous meditations only; for from the Lord are the s.'s bondage and release, ii, 138 seq.
 - only the universal Brahman is real in each, i, p. xxvi.
- Soul, individual, discussions as to whether certain passages refer to Brahman or to the, i, p. xxxii seq., 64-289. See also Brahman.
- difference and non-difference of the Lord and the, i, pp. xxxix, xlix, 114-116, 183-191, 277 n., 278 n., 281 seq., 343-346; ii, 68 seq., 149, 339 seq.
 - in its activity is dependent on the Lord who impels it with a view to its former actions, i, p. lvii; ii, 58-61.
 - do the imperfections clinging to it affect also the highest Lord who abides within it? i, pp. lxii-lxiv.
 - and the Self consisting of bliss different, i, 69-71; to be joined, i, 71-77.
 - the 'two entered into the cave' are the i. s. and the highest Self, i, 118-123.
 - called 'the lord of the city of Brahman,' i, 175.
 - Brahman in the city of the, i, 178.
 - the highest Self different from it in the states of deep sleep and departing, i, 233-236.
 - Scripture does not mention a separate creation of it, i, 279, 441; ii, 396 seq.
 - Brahman is superior to it, i, 345.
 - a reflection of the highest Self, ii, 68 seq.
 - its different states, and the nature of Brahman, ii, 101, 133-183.
 - and the highest Self referred to by the 'two birds, inseparable friends,' &c., and by 'the two drinking their reward,' &c., ii, 240 seq.
 - the light into which it is said to enter is the highest Self, ii, 407.
 - its different states, i, 191; ii, 133-152.
 - its intermediate state, i. e. the state of dreams, i, p. lx; ii, 133-141.
 - in deep sleep becomes one with Brahman, i, pp. xxvi, lxi, 273; ii, 54, 141-149, 176, 210.

- Soul, individual, in deep sleep is resolved into an intelligent entity, i, 60.
- the same s. which entered into union with Brahman in deep sleep, returns from Brahman, when awaking, i, p. lxi; ii, 147-149.
 - wanders about in the state of sleep, ii, 49 seq., 56.
 - essentially non-connected with the worlds that appear in the waking and in the dreaming state, ii, 146.
 - its state of swoon, i, p. lxi; ii, 149-152.
 - actions determine its future embodied existences, i, p. xxvi.
 - when passing out of the body at the time of death, remains invested with the subtle material elements which serve as an abode to the prāṇas, i, p. lix; ii, 101-112.
 - descends from the moon with a remainder of former deeds which determines the nature of the new embodiment, i, p. lix seq.; ii, 112-121.
 - its descent from the moon described, i, p. lx; ii, 126-132.
 - of him who possesses the lower knowledge, and of him who possesses no knowledge of Brahman at all, their fate the same up to the entrance of the s. into the veins, i, pp. lxxix, cvii; ii, 369 seq.
 - — — passes into the heart, and out of the body by the veins, then up to the sun by means of a ray of light, i, p. lxxx seq.; ii, 372, 377-381.
 - — — stations on its way to Brahman, i, p. lxxxii; ii, 382-389; these stations are conductors of the s., not marks of the road, nor places of enjoyment, ii, 387-389.
 - — — its departure from the body, ii, 364-404; the scriptural texts about it belong to the sphere of qualified knowledge, ii, 400 seq.
 - of him also who knows the highest Brahman, departs from the body, i, p. lxxx.
- Soul is enveloped in the subtle body until it reaches the river Vigraha, i, p. lxxxii n.
- of the pious effects its desires by mere determination, i, p. lxxxiv seq.; ii, 410 seq.
 - when it departs from the body all specific cognition vanishes, but the Self is not destroyed, i, 281.
 - although all-pervading, is viewed as going because it enters into connexion with buddhi and the rest of its adjuncts, ii, 42-45, 402.
 - on account of its non-extension, there is no confusion of the results of actions, ii, 68.
 - its ascent to, and descent from the moon, ii, 101-132.
 - accompanied by the chief vital air, the sense-organs, and the mind, and taking with itself Nescience, moral good or ill-desert, and the impressions left by its previous existences, leaves its former body and obtains a new body, ii, 102.
 - goes enveloped by water, ii, 103-110, 112.
 - when it descends from the moon, it enters into similarity (not identity) with ether, air, smoke, mist, cloud, and rain, ii, 126-128.
 - assumes a body of water in the moon, ii, 127.
 - passes through the stages of its descent in a not very long time, ii, 128.
 - after having entered into plants, enters into conjunction with one who performs the act of generation, ii, 131 seq.
 - breath is merged in it, ii, 367 seq.
 - with the breath, goes to the elements, ii, 368 seq.
 - when it attains a new body, after speech and the other organs have been withdrawn within it, work constitutes its abode, ii, 369.
 - of him who knows Brahman does not depart, ii, 372-375.
 - the abode of the s. when about to depart is the heart, and the point of it is lighted up, ii, 377 seq.

- Soul, the entering of one s. into several bodies is like the multiplication of the flame of a lamp, ii, 413 seq.
- — — treated in books on Yoga, ii, 414.
 - the released, opinions about its characteristics, i, pp. xix, xxx, lxxxiv; ii, 408-410.
 - — manifests itself through its own Self, in its own nature, i, p. lxxxiii; ii, 405-407.
 - — is non-separate from Brahman, i, p. lxxxiv; ii, 173-175, 407 seq.
 - — is either embodied or disembodied according to its wish and will, i, p. lxxxv; ii, 411-413.
 - — how it can animate several bodies at the same time, i, p. lxxxv; ii, 412-415.
 - — absence of all specific cognition on the part of it, i, p. lxxxv; ii, 414 seq.
 - — participates in all the perfections and powers of the Lord, with the exception of the power of creating and sustaining the world, i, p. lxxxv; ii, 415-418.
 - — does not return to new forms of embodied existence, i, p. lxxxv; ii, 418 seq.
 - — does not enter on new courses of existence, i, 243.
 - — effects its purposes by mere will, ii, 410 seq.
 - — possesses a mind (manas), ii, 411.
 - — is without another lord, ii, 411.
 - — is without a body and sense-organs, says Bādari, ii, 411 seq.
 - — has a body and senses, says Gaimini, ii, 412.
 - — the enjoyment only of the r. s. and the highest Lord is equal, ii, 418.
 - see also Self, individual.
- Souls, individual, Brahman appears to be broken up into, i, p. xxv.
- — matter and i. s. constitute the body of the Lord, i, p. xxviii.
 - — not joined to material bodies, i, p. xxix.
 - — enter into material bodies corresponding to merit or demerit previously acquired, i, p. xxix.
- Souls, individual, although the enjoying i. s. and the objects of fruition are in reality nothing but Brahman, yet the two sets may practically be held apart, i, p. xlviii, 318-320.
- — are parts of Brahman, according to Rāmānuga, i, p. lviii.
 - — Lord different from all i. s., i, 81; stands in the relation of a ruler to them, i, 329.
 - the released, have to resort to Brahman, i, 157 seq., 180 seq.
 - the Sāṅkhyas say that the s. are non-active, ii, 301.
 - the Lord acts as the ruler of the pradhāna and of the s., and the pradhāna, the s., and the Lord are of mutually different nature (Sāṅkhya and Yoga), i, 434 seq.
 - gradually all s. obtain release from saṃsāra, i, 439.
 - their being the food of the gods is metaphorical, on account of their not knowing the Self, ii, 110-112.
 - ascend to the moon for the purpose of finding there a complete requital of their works, ii, 115.
 - — when descending enter into plants animated by other s., they do not undergo pleasure and pain in that condition, ii, 129-131.
 - are led by the 'person not a man' to the lower Brahman, ii, 389-402.
 - on the passing away of the effected world of Brahman the s. go together with the ruler of that world to what is higher than that, ii, 391 seq.
 - the lordly power of the other s. depends on the highest Lord, ii, 416-418.
- Space (ākāśa), one of the three non-existences of the Bauddhas, i, 410.
- the doctrine that it is a non-entity cannot be proved, i, 412 seq.
 - the air is founded on, i, 413.
 - see also Ether.

- Species, the individuals only have an origin, not the s., they are eternal, i, 202 seq.
- words connected with the s., not with the individuals, i, 202 seq.
- Speech, the origin of all effects, i, 346, 381.
- the distinction of names and forms originates entirely from s. only, i, 352.
 - and prāṇa, and mind presuppose fire, water, and earth, ii, 78 seq.
 - acts under the guidance of Agni, ii, 91 seq.
 - is merged in mind (on the departure of the soul), ii, 364 seq.
- Sphoṭa is the word, i, 204-206.
- is eternal, i, 206.
 - its assumption gratuitous, i, 209 seq.
- Spider, as it emits out of itself the threads of its web, so Brahman creates the world, i, 348.
- Śrī-bhāṣya. See Rāmānuga.
- Sruti, the meaning of it inferred from Smṛiti, i, 145 seq.
- those Smṛitis only which follow S. are to be considered as authoritative, i, 291 n., 293, 294, 297 n.
 - men who are unable to ascertain the true sense of S., rely upon Smṛitis, i, 292.
 - supersensuous matters cannot be perceived without, i, 293.
 - if in conflict with other means of right knowledge, has to be bent, so as to accord with the latter, i, 299.
 - and Smṛiti on the rinsing of the mouth with water, ii, 211-214.
 - indicatory mark, and syntactical connexion, are of greater force than leading subject-matter, ii, 262 seq.
- Stages of life (āśrama), the duties connected with them are obligatory on him also who does not strive after mukti, i, p. lxxv; ii, 312-315.
- persons who do not belong to any one of them have also claims to knowledge, i, p. lxxvi; ii, 315-317; but it is better to belong to one of them, ii, 316 seq.
- Stages of life requiring chastity are open to men whether they have reached householdership or not, ii, 295.
- — — for which chastity is prescribed, knowledge valid for them, ii, 295.
 - — — Gaimini's opinion on them, ii, 295-297.
 - — — established by Scripture, ii, 297-303.
 - — — four, not three, ii, 300 seq.
 - — — those belonging to the three former obtain the world of the blessed, while the mendicant enjoys immortality, ii, 301.
 - — — the state of being grounded in Brahman is impossible for the three former, ii, 301.
 - — — all works enjoined on them must be had regard to with a view to the springing up of knowledge, ii, 309.
 - — — of him who has entered on a higher one there is no descending to a lower one, ii, 317 seq.
 - — — the duties of the other, are incumbent on the householder, as well as those of his own stage, ii, 324 seq.
 - — — as all the four are equally taught by Scripture, they are to be gone through equally, either in the way of option between them or in the way of comprehension of all of them, ii, 325.
- Stories told in the Upanishads are not for the purpose of the pāṇiplava, ii, 305 seq.
- Stotra and other members of the sacrifice are taught in the three Vedas, and so also the meditations resting on them, ii, 282 seq.
- Subject and object, i, 3.
- the relation of, cannot exist in the Self, i, 378 seq.
- Subjects, the ten objects and the ten s. cannot rest on anything but Brahman, i, 104.
- the ten s. have reference to objects, i, 106.
- Substance, contradictions in the Vāireśhika doctrine about s. and quality, i, 394 seqq.

- Subtle body. See Body.
- Sūdras are altogether disqualified for Brahmayidya, i, p. xxxvii, 223-229.
- excluded from the study of the Veda, i, 197 n., 224, 228 seq.
 - unfit for sacrifices, i, 224, 228 seq.
 - etymologised as śūḍam abhidu-drāva, &c., i, 225 seq.
 - excluded from ceremonial purifications, i, 227.
- Suffering and sufferer, objections against the Vedāntin, based on the relation of, i, 376-381.
- Suka, the son of Vyāsa, travelled to the sphere of the sun, ii, 375.
- Sulabhā entered into the body of Ganaka, to carry on a discussion with him, ii, 237.
- Sun to be meditated upon under the form of honey, i, 216, 256 seq.
- a man going to final release reaches the, i, 232.
 - and the other divinities are mere differentiations of prāṇa, i, 269.
 - is the soul to be meditated upon as the s., and the s. as the soul, or is the soul only to be meditated upon as the? ii, 244.
 - dying during the northern progress of the s. is more excellent, ii, 380.
 - the departed soul follows the rays also during the southern progress of the, ii, 380.
 - see Person in the sun.
 - see also Savitar.
- Superimposition, i, 3 n.
- defined, i, 4-9.
 - is Nescience, i, 6.
 - mutual s. of Self and Non-Self, i, 7-9.
 - endless s. the cause of individual souls appearing as agents and enjoyers (of the results of their actions), i, 9.
 - explained, ii, 197.
 - of something higher upon something lower is the rule, ii, 343 seq.
- Supreme Being, the whole world a manifestation of it, i, 442.
- Subtegas, the head of Valvānara, ii, 275, 276.
- Sūtras, what they are, and what they aim at, i, pp. xi, xiii.
- the meaning of, i, p. xi.
 - preceded by a literature now lost, i, p. xii.
 - see Vedānta-sūtras.
- Sūtrātman = Pragāpati, i, 142 n.
- Svarita. See Accents.
- Svetaketu, i, pp. cv, cxviii; ii, 210.
- Svetāsvatara-upanishad, Mâyā in the, i, pp. cxvii n., cxxi n.
- Swoon, the nature of it explained, i, p. lxi; ii, 149-152.
- is half-union or half-coincidence with deep sleep, ii, 151 seq.
 - belongs with one half to sleep, with the other half to death, it being the door of death, ii, 152.
- Symbol, in meditations on Brahman viewed under a s., the devotee is not to consider the s. as constituting his own Self, i, p. lxxvii; ii, 340-342.
- — — the s. is to be meditatively viewed as being one with Brahman, not Brahman as being one with the, i, p. lxxvii; ii, 342-345.
- Symbols, only those who do not take their stand on s. are led to the world of Brahman, ii, 402-404.
- Taittirīya-upanishad, the ānanda-maya in the, i, p. xlii.
- Taṅka quoted by Rāmānuga, i, p. xxi.
- the Vākyakāra, i, p. xxii.
- Tantra or Sāṅkhyāśāstra, i, 291, 291 n.
- That art thou, i, pp. xxvii, xlix, 23, 31, 54-56, 104, 113, 115, 116, 122, 125, 185, 197, 250, 251, 266, 279, 321-323, 326, 343, 345; ii, 32, 46, 65, 66, 138, 140, 173, 197, 209, 210, 238, 243, 291, 333-337, 339, 370, 397, 408.
- which is. See Sat.
 - which is not. See Asat.
- Thief, the ordeal of the heated hatchet undergone by the, i, 323 n.
- Third place (or path) for those who are neither entitled to the road

- of the gods, nor to the road of the fathers, ii, 123 seq.
- Third place, the five oblations not necessary in the case of those who go to it, ii, 125.
- Thunderbolt, the prâṇa is a raised, i, 229-231.
- used to denote 'cause of fear in general,' i, 230 seq.
- Tirthakâra or Gina, i, 429.
- Transmigration of souls, i, pp. xxvi seq., xxix seq.
- — see Soul, p. 489 seq.
- the origin &c. of the world cannot proceed from a being subject to, i, 17.
- Transmigratory world, a man who has once understood Brahman to be the Self, no longer belongs to the, i, 41-43.
- Tripartition of the three elements, and t. in man, ii, 98-100.
- on account of it, water consists of three elements, ii, 104.
- True, there is only one vidyâ of the, i, p. lxxii; ii, 245-247.
- explained as Hiranyagarbha, i, p. cix.
- ativâdin is one who declares something beyond by means of the, i, 163, 165 seqq.
- is the highest Brahman, i, 167, 267; ii, 216 seq., 234.
- in dreamless sleep the individual soul is united with the, i, 350; ii, 210.
- the T. of the, ii, 171.
- its secret names, ahar and aham, ii, 246.
- Tulsidâs, Râmâyan of, i, p. cxxvii seq.
- Twelve days' sacrifice. See Soma sacrifice.
- Udâta. See Accents.
- Uddâlaka, i, pp. cv, cxv, cxviii.
- a Rishi, ii, 276.
- was a householder and yet taught his son, ii, 288.
- Udgâtri-priest and the udgîtha-vidyâ, ii, 194 seq., 321.
- the term udgîtha calls up the idea of the sphere of action of the, ii, 197.
- Udgîtha, relation between the u. and the syllable Om, i, p. lxxviii; ii, 193 seq., 196-199.
- Udgîtha, meditations on the, i, p. lxxiv; ii, 247, 252-256, 272-274, 282 seq., 282 n., 292, 303-305, 321, 333, 345-349.
- and Aditya (the sun), i, p. lxxvii; ii, 333, 346 seq. and n.
- ether is the, i, 83.
- and the Udgâtri, ii, 197.
- never used to denote the syllable Om in its connexion with the Rig-veda and Yagur-veda, ii, 199.
- Udgîtha-vidyâ, i, p. lxxviii.
- in the Bṛihad-âraṇyaka and in the Kbândogya-upanishad, ii, 192-199.
- Uktha, the highest Self is, i, 79.
- Undeveloped, the, (avyakta), means the body, and not the pradhâna, i, p. xxxix, 237-252.
- that element in Brahman, from which the material universe springs, i, p. cxix, 243.
- is beyond the Great one, i, 237 seq., 243 seq.
- is the pradhâna, i, 238, 238 n.
- is the body in the simile of the chariot, i, 239.
- means the subtle body, i, 241 seq., 244.
- i. e. Nescience, i, 244.
- is not mentioned as an object of knowledge, i, 246.
- Unseen principle and the activity of the Lord are the operative causes of the world, i, 382.
- — the motion in the atoms due to it, i, 387, 388.
- — is it to be considered as inhering in the soul or in the atoms? i, 388.
- — in both cases it cannot be the cause of motion in the atoms, because it is non-intelligent, i, 388.
- — abides in the pradhâna, ii, 70.
- — is of the nature of religious merit or demerit and acquired through mind, speech, and body, ii, 70.
- — refutation of the Sâṅkhya and Vaiśeshika doctrines of the, ii, 70-73.
- — is due to the non-particular conjunction of the Selfs with the internal organs, ii, 70 seq.

- Unseen principle, the limitation of actions and their results cannot be caused by the, ii, 70 seq.
- Upādhis, soul is Brahman in so far as limited by the unreal u. due to Mâyâ, i, p. xxx.
- see also Brahman, Mâyâ, Names and forms, Soul.
- Upakośala, i, pp. cv, cviii.
- the instruction given to him by the sacred fires, i, 126 seq.
- Upakośala-vidyâ, ii, 219, 233, 234 seq.
- Upanayana ceremony, only men of the three higher castes are subject to the precepts about the, i, 197, 224.
- — merely subserves the study of the Veda, i, 198 seq., 224.
- referred to in the vidyâs, i, 227.
- omitted in a certain case, i, 227 n.
- Upanishads, i, pp. x, xi, xxix.
- Saṅkara's commentaries on the, i, p. xv.
- differing theories claim to be founded on them, i, p. xviii.
- their teaching according to Saṅkara, i, p. xxiv seqq.
- according to Rāmānuga, i, pp. xxvii seqq., xxxi, cii.
- the principle on which the passages from them have been selected and arranged in the Vedānta-sūtras, i, pp. xli-xlvi.
- to guard them against misinterpretations on the part of the Sāṅkhya, was the task of the Vedāntin, i, p. xlvi.
- what is the relation in which those parts of the U. stand to each other which enjoin identical or partly identical meditations? j, p. lxvi seq.
- the different accounts of the U. as to the stations of the way which leads the vidvân up to Brahman, i, pp. lxxxii, cvii-cxi; ii, 382-386.
- the philosophy of the, its relation to Bâdarâyana, Saṅkara, and Rāmānuga, i, pp. ci-cxxvii.
- for the Hindu commentator a body of revealed truth, i, p. ciii.
- Upanishads, the teachers of the U. belong to different sections of Brahminical society, some of them are even Kshattriyas, i, p. ciii.
- do not constitute a systematic whole, i, pp. ciii seqq., cxiv seq.
- together with a certain uniformity of general leading conceptions in the U. there runs throughout divergence in details, i, p. civ seq.
- texts from the U. as handled by Saṅkara, i, pp. cv-cxiv.
- the doctrine of Mâyâ not in the, i, pp. cxvi-cxxi.
- on the relation of the individual soul to the highest Self, i, p. cxxi seq.
- the soul comprehended by the U. only, i, 36 seq.
- who has heard the U. or the secret knowledge, i. e. who knows Brahman, i, 128, 317.
- mantras and passages referring to sacrifices which occur in the U., cannot be viewed as supplementary to the vidyâs of the, ii, 222-225.
- the mantras as well as the vidyâs found in the U., have to be studied in the woods, ii, 225.
- the stories told in the U. are not for the purpose of the pâriplava, ii, 305 seq.
- Upavarsha, i, p. xxxvii; ii, 268.
- maintains that the letters only are the word, i, 206 seq.
- Ushasta, the questions of U. and Kahola constitute one vidyâ, ii, 242 seq.
- Ut, name of the person within the sun, i, 78, 79.
- Uttara-mîmāṃsâ, i, p. ix.
- later than the Pûrva-mîmāṃsâ, i, p. x.
- or Vedānta-sūtras, i, pp. xii, xiv n.
- Vâgapeya-sacrifice, the Bṛhaspati-sava a subordinate part of it, ii, 223, 223 n., 224.
- Vâgasaneyins, i, 146, 148.
- Vaiśhāṣikā are realists, i, 401 n.
- Vaināśika = Bauddha, i, 414, 415.

- Vaiśeshikas, the non-difference of cause and effect defended against them, i, p. xlix, 320-343.
- refutation of their tenet that the world originates from atoms set in motion by the adrishṭa, i, p. l seq., 381-400.
 - their belief in a non-intelligent soul, i, p. liv; ii, 33-35.
 - teach that the Lord is the operative cause of the world, i, 17 n., 435.
 - their argument against the Vedāntins, i, 381.
 - difficulties with regard to their six categories, i, 394 seqq.
 - their doctrine may be called semi-destructive or semi-nihilistic, i, 401, 401 n.
 - refutation of their doctrine of many Selves, ii, 70.
 - their opinion that the mind only proceeds to the new abode of fruition, ii, 104.
- Vaiṣṇava sects, the most important of Hindu sects, i, p. xvii.
- Vaiṣvānara is Brahman, i, p. xxxv, 143-153.
- is to be meditated upon as a whole, not in his single parts, i, p. lxxv; ii, 274-277, 279.
 - is the gastric fire, i, 143 seq., 146 seq.
 - is the elemental fire, i, 144, 147.
 - is the divinity whose body is fire, i, 144, 147.
 - is the embodied Self, i, 144.
 - is man, i, 146-148.
 - cannot be the divinity of fire, or the element of fire, i, 148 seq.
 - worship of the highest Lord as, i, 149 seq.
 - a span long, ii, 191.
 - legend of the six Rishis who wished to obtain a knowledge of, ii, 274-276.
 - Suteḡas, the head of, ii, 275, 276.
- Vaiṣvānara-vidyā, or knowledge of Agni Vaiṣvānara, ii, 187, 233, 249, 292, 400.
- Vaśaknu, the daughter of, possessed the knowledge of Brahman, ii, 315.
- Vākyakāra, i.e. Taṅka, i, p. xxii.
- Vāmadeva, i, p. lxxv.
- by intuition identifies himself with everything in the universe, ii, 37, 37 n., 101.
 - the Rishi V. saw and understood it, singing, 'I was Manu, I was the sun,' ii, 238.
 - became Brahman in his mother's womb, ii, 328.
- Vāmadevyā, knowledge of the, ii, 310.
- Varuṇa, Bhrigu, his pupil, i, 199.
- with a noose, i, 217 n.
 - Bhrigu and other sons of Brahman's mind were again born at the sacrifice of, ii, 235.
 - is the lord of all water, ii, 386.
 - above V. there come Indra and Pragāpati, on the path of the gods, ii, 386.
 - beyond lightning there is V., ii, 386.
 - the souls are led through the worlds of V., &c., by the person, not a man, ii, 389.
- Vāṣkalin, Bāhva questioned about Brahman by, ii, 157.
- Vasiṣṭha, the son of Brahman's mind, having parted from his former body in consequence of the curse of Nimi, was, on the order of Brahman, again procreated by Mitra and Varuṇa, ii, 235.
- Vāsudeva, a manifestation of the highest being, i, p. xxiii, 440.
- from it originated Saṅkarshana, i, p. li.
 - a surname of Kapila, who burned the sons of Sagara, i, 294.
 - to be worshipped, i, 440.
 - appears in four forms, as V., Saṅkarshana, Pradyumna, and Aniruddha, i, 440.
 - is the ultimate causal essence, of which his three other forms (Saṅkarshana, &c.) are the effects, i, 440.
 - objections to the doctrine of the Bhāgavatas as to the four forms of, i, 441 seq.
 - the only real essence, i, 442.
 - and Arguna, dialogue on knowledge originating in a future life, ii, 328 seq.
- Vasus, class of gods, i, 202, 216.

- Vāyu (air) and Prāṇa not to be identified, i, p. lxxiv; ii, 256-259.
- the deity that never sets, ii, 18 seq.
 - an object of worship, ii, 19.
 - Brahman to be meditated upon under the form of, ii, 19 n.
 - having become breath entered into the nostrils, ii, 91.
 - is the best among the Devas, ii, 256.
 - Prāṇa and V. identified, ii, 257.
 - from the year to V., the departed soul proceeds, ii, 384-386.
 - comes before Āditya (on the path of the gods), and must be inserted between the year and Āditya, ii, 385.
 - the soul goes from the world of the gods to, ii, 386.
- Veda furnishes the means of escaping from samsāra, i, p. xxvii.
- its Gñānakāṇḍa and Karmakāṇḍa, i, p. xxix.
 - Brahman is the source of the, i, p. xxxii, 19-22.
 - the reading of it the common antecedent for those who wish to enter on an enquiry into religious duty and for those desirous of knowing Brahman, i, 10.
 - extends up to the comprehension of its purport, ii, 289.
 - cannot aim at conveying information about accomplished substances, i, 21.
 - possesses authority as a means of right knowledge of Brahman, i, 23, 38, 317.
 - aims at action, i, 24, 38 seqq.
 - prohibitory passages of the, i, 39 seq. and n.
 - in the V. which is not the work of man no wish can be expressed, i, 110.
 - men are entitled to the study of the, i, 196-198.
 - also beings above men (gods, &c.) are qualified for the study and practice of the, i, 198 seq.
 - to the gods it is manifest of itself (without study), i, 199.
 - its authoritativeness proved from its independence, basing on the original (eternal) connexion of the word with its sense, i, 201, 295.

- Veda, from the word of the V. the world, with the gods and other beings, originates, i, 202-204.
- its eternity, i, 211-216, 317.
 - the Rishis see the mantras and brāhmaṇa passages, i.e. the, i, 223.
 - study of it demands as its antecedent the upanayana-ceremony, i, 224.
 - Sūdras prohibited from hearing and studying the, i, 228 seq.
 - Yoga practices enjoined in the, i, 297.
 - the real sense of it, that Brahman is the cause and matter of this world, i, 361.
 - the Bhāgavata contains passages contradictory to the, i, 443.
 - all its parts are equally authoritative, and hence must all be assumed to have a meaning, ii, 156.
 - the rite of carrying fire on the head is an attribute of the study of the V. of the Ātharvanikas, ii, 189 seq.
 - Scripture enjoins works for such only as understand the purport of the, ii, 289.
 - of him who has merely read the V. there is qualification for works, ii, 293.
 - see also Scripture, and Sruti.
- Vedānta, what the study of the V. presupposes, i, p. xxxii, 9-15.
- the doctrines concerning the origin of the world which are opposed to it, i, 289.
- Vedānta-mīmāṃsā, i, 9.
- Vedānta-jāstra, i, p. xi.
- Vedānta-sūtras, the Gñānakāṇḍa systematised only in the, i, p. xii.
- presuppose the Pūrva-mīmāṃsā-sūtras, i, p. xiii.
 - other names for, i, p. xiv n., 9, 190.
 - numerous commentaries on them, i, p. xvi.
 - differences of Vedānta doctrine, existed before their final composition, i, p. xviii seqq.

- Vedānta-sūtras quote opinions of various teachers, i, p. xix.
- conspectus of their contents, i, pp. xxxi-lxxxv.
 - are throughout Mīmāṃsā, i, p. xlv.
 - claim to be systematisations of the Upanishads, i, p. cii.
 - have merely the purpose of stringing together the flowers of the Vedānta-passages, i, 17.
- Vedānta-texts, Brahman the uniform topic of all, i, p. xxxii, 22-47.
- why they are to be studied, i, 9.
 - they all teach that the cause of the world is the intelligent Brahman, i, 60 seq.
 - have a twofold purport; some of them aim at setting forth the nature of the highest Self, some at teaching the unity of the individual soul with the highest Self, i, 198.
 - there is a conflict of V. with regard to the things created, but not with regard to the Lord as the cause of the world, i, 263-266.
 - do not contradict one another with regard to the mode of creation and similar topics, i, 290.
 - the cognitions of Brahman intimated by all the V. are identical, ii, 184-279; Scripture also declares this, ii, 190 seq.
 - they all represent the object of knowledge as one, ii, 190.
- Vedārthasaṅgraha of Rāmānuga, i, p. xxi.
- Vedas seen by men of exalted vision (rishis), i, 213.
- Sandilya did not find highest bliss in them, i, 443.
 - mantras enjoined in one V. only, are taken over into other V. also, ii, 274.
 - three, the syllable Om common to them, ii, 282 seq.
 - the members of the sacrifice on which the meditations rest, are taught in them, so also the meditations, ii, 282.
- Veda-upanishad, i, 94.
- Vedic texts have for their object that which is dependent on Nescience, i, 8.
- Veins, a hundred and one v. of the heart, the hundred and first passing through the skull, ii, 378.
- connexion between the v. and the rays, ii, 378, 379.
 - the junction of the v. and rays is the way of the departing soul, ii, 382.
 - see also Nāḍīs.
- Vidura, though born from a Sūdra mother, possessed eminent knowledge, i, 224, 228.
- Vidyā, unity of the, i, 152.
- see also Knowledge, and Meditation.
- Vidyās. See Cognitions, and Meditations.
- Vigārā, having reached the river V., the soul divests itself of the subtle body, i, p. lxxxi n.
- Virāḡ, the ātman purushavidha identified with the V. of the latter Vedānta, i, p. cvi.
- Mr. Gough on, i, p. cxxiii seq.
- Vishṇu, Brahman identified with V. or Nārāyaṇa, i, p. xxxi n.
- in the Bhagavadgītā, i, p. cxxvi.
 - contemplated in the sacred Śāla-grām, i, 126, 178.
 - the highest place of, i, 239, 245, 246; ii, 205, 391.
 - — the highest Self is the, i, 239.
 - — difficulty of knowing it, i, 241.
 - contemplated in an image, ii, 338, 339, 345.
- Viśvānara = Vaisvānara, i, 150.
- Viśvedevas, class of gods, are non-eternal beings, because produced, i, 202.
- Vital air (prāṇa) remains awake in the state of deep sleep, i, 162-168.
- — is the bhūman the? i, 162-168.
 - — represented as the Self of everything, i, 164.
 - — is immortality, i, 164.
 - — may be called 'higher' with reference to the body, i, 172.
 - — is the maker of all the persons, the person in the sun, the person in the moon, &c., i, 269.

Vital air, the chief, (mukhya prāṇa), is produced from Brahman, is distinct from air in general and from the other vital airs, and is minute, i, p. lix; ii, 84-91, 94-96.

— — — called 'the best,' ii, 84 seq.
— — — 'the oldest and the best,' ii, 85.

— — — is neither air nor function, ii, 85-87.

— — — according to the Sāṅkhya, the combined function of all organs, ii, 86.

— — — is nothing but air, according to a Sruti, ii, 86, 87.

— — — various powers ascribed to it in scriptural passages, ii, 87.

— — — is independent in the body, like the individual soul, ii, 87.

— — — is subordinate to the soul, ii, 88.

— — — is not an instrument, ii, 88 seq.

— — — the body and all the senses subsist by means of it, ii, 89, 95.

— — — is designated as having five functions like mind, ii, 89 seq.

— — — is not a sense-organ, ii, 93 seq.

— — — accompanies the soul when leaving its body, ii, 102.

— — — the two passages on the Udgītha-vidyā in the Bṛh. Up. and in the Kbānd. Up. both glorify it, and are injunctions of a meditation on it, ii, 192 seq.

— — — represented as Udgātri, as well as udgītha, ii, 195.

— — — see also Breath, and Prāṇa.

Vital airs (prāṇas) spring from Brahman, are eleven in number, and are of minute size, i, p. lix; ii, 74-84.

— — — are superintended and guided in their activity by special divinities, they are independent principles, not mere modifications of the chief vital air, i, p. lix; ii, 91-96.

— — — do not depart from the body, i, p. cxii.

— — — the instance of the v. a. illustrating the identity of cause and effect, i, 342 seq.

Vital airs, difference of scriptural statements regarding them, ii, 3.

— discussion of Vedic passages on the origination of the, ii, 74-79.

— — the statement that they existed before the creation refers to a subordinate causal substance, ii, 76 seq.

— — different Vedic statements as to their number, ii, 79-84.

— — called graha, seizers, ii, 79, 83.

— — although guided by divinities, are yet connected with the individual soul, ii, 92 seq.

— — are senses, with the exception of the chief vital air, ii, 93 seq.

— — are not functions of the chief vital air, ii, 94.

— — when a new body is obtained, they also go from the old body to the new one, ii, 105.

— — at the time of death, go to Agni and the other gods, ii, 105 seq.

— — Agnihotra offered to them, ii, 249-252.

— — all come to the individual soul, ii, 367 seq.

— — do not depart from the embodied soul of him who knows Brahman, ii, 372 seq.

— — see also Prāṇas.

Void, doctrine of a general, i, 439; ii, 14, 168.

Vṛttikāra referred to by Saṅkara, i, pp. xx, xxi.

Vyāsa and others conversed with the gods face to face, i, 222 seq.

Vyāsādhikarāṇamālā, i, p. xxxi.

Water springs from fire, i, p. lii; ii, 22 seq.

— from it sprang earth, ii, 23 seq.

— is dissolved into fire, ii, 26.

— earth is dissolved into, ii, 26.

— the soul goes from one body into another, enveloped by, ii, 103-105, 106-110, 112.

— is intimately connected with religious works, sacrifices, &c., ii, 105, 108, 109.

— designated by śraddhā, ii, 106-108.

— the soul assumes a body of w. in the moon, ii, 127.

- Water is the dress of breath, ii, 211-214.
- Woman, no w. to be avoided, with reference to the knowledge of the Vâmadevya, ii, 310.
- Word, the original (eternal) connexion of the w. with its sense, i, 201.
- connected with the species, not with the individual, i, 202 seq.
 - the world originates from the w., as is shown by perception and inference, i, 201-211; how is that origination to be understood? i, 203.
 - creation is preceded by the w., i, 203 seq.
 - the sphoṛa is the, i, 204-206.
 - the letters are not the, i, 205 seq.
 - Upavarsha says that the letters are the, i, 206-210.
 - the sphoṛa is not the, i, 209 seq.
 - and thing are different, i, 222.
- Words, Sāṅkara on the nature of, i, p. xxxvii, 204-211.
- Works (viz. sacrifices, &c.), knowledge is independent of, i, p. lxxv; ii, 285-295, 306.
- knowledge and w. are the two roads for entering on the road of the gods and the road of the fathers, ii, 123-125.
 - enjoined for such only as understand the purport of the Veda, ii, 289.
 - for him who has merely read the Veda, ii, 293.
 - destruction of the qualification for w., by knowledge, ii, 294 seq.
 - obligatory for the three former âśramas, but not for the mendicant, ii, 301 seq.
 - are needed for the origination of knowledge, ii, 306 seq., 313-315; but w. undertaken for the fulfilment of some special wish do not contribute towards this end, ii, 360.
 - are the washing away of uncleanness, but knowledge is the highest way, ii, 307.
 - are incumbent on him also who does not desire release, ii, 312 seq.
- Works, those performing w. are not overpowered by passion and the like, ii, 315.
- of permanent obligation enjoined by the Veda, such as the Agnihotra, have the same effect as knowledge, ii, 358-362.
 - joined with knowledge may effect final release, ii, 359.
 - — — are superior to w. destitute of knowledge, ii, 361.
 - of public utility, less meritorious than sacrifices, lead through smoke &c. to the southern path of the sun, i, 27.
 - — — lead to the road of the fathers, ii, 124.
 - (Karman), the reward of w. is not the independent result of the w. acting through the apûrva, but is allotted by the Lord, i, p. lxxv; ii, 180-183.
 - the shaking off of the good and evil, i, p. lxx; ii, 225-229; takes place at the moment of the soul's departure from the body, i, p. lxx seq.; ii, 229-231.
 - even he whose w. are entirely annihilated, is yet connected with some kind of body, i, p. lxxi.
 - he who has reached knowledge of Brahman is not affected by the consequences of either past or future evil or good w., i, p. lxxvii seq.; ii, 119, 237, 353-357.
 - the non-operation of w. holds good only in the case of w. which have not yet begun to produce their effects, i, p. lxxviii; ii, 357 seq.
 - which have begun to produce their effects have to be worked out fully, whereupon (after death) the possessor of knowledge becomes united with Brahman, i, p. lxxviii; ii, 113, 117, 119, 237, 362 seq.
 - the Lord regards merit and demerit acquired by the w. of living beings, i, 357-360.
 - constitute the efficient cause for the origination of a new body, ii, 105.

- Works, on the passing away of the w. the soul redescends with a remainder, ii, 112-119, 398.
- good fortune as well as misfortune is caused by good and evil, ii, 114.
 - the souls are to find in the moon complete requital of their, ii, 115.
 - whose operation is obstructed by other w. leading to fruits of a contrary nature last for a long time, ii, 117 seq.
 - definite fruits are attached to particular, ii, 117.
 - the fruits of different w. must be experienced in different existences, ii, 117, 117 n.
 - are extinguished either by expiatory ceremonies or by the knowledge of Brahman or by the full fruition of their consequences, ii, 117 n.
 - depend on conduct, ii, 120 seq.
 - and not conduct are the cause of new births, ii, 121.
 - inferior to knowledge, ii, 267.
 - knowledge is subordinate to, ii, 289.
 - their reaching maturity depends on place, time, and operative cause presenting themselves, ii, 328.
 - the fruits of which are opposed to each other, ii, 328.
 - do not perish, ii, 353, 354.
 - good, are mentioned together with evil w., and the term 'evil' is used without any distinction for both, ii, 356.
 - of them also there is non-clinging (to him who knows); but at death, ii, 356 seq.
 - depend on false knowledge, ii, 363.
 - a limiting adjunct of the soul, ii, 367.
 - at the time of the soul attaining a new body, after speech and the other organs have been withdrawn within the soul, w. constitute the soul's abode, ii, 369.
 - refraining from w. of any kind whatsoever cannot lead to final release, ii, 397-400.
- Works, refraining from, impossible for one who does not possess perfect knowledge, ii, 399.
- see also Actions.
- World, the appearance of it due to Mâyâ or illusion, i, p. xxv, 329 seq., 345; ii, 138.
- upâdâna the material cause of it, i, p. xxv.
 - springs from Brahman, i, p. xl, 15-19, 202, 305-308, 317, 320-330, 381-386, 442; ii, 16, 21. See also Cause and effect, and Creation.
 - is it co-eternal with Brahman, or does it issue from it and is it refunded into it at stated intervals? i, p. lii; ii, 3-73.
 - its origin, subsistence, and dissolution proceed from Brahman, i, 15-19, 286 seq., 328; ii, 395 seq., 416.
 - — — the highest Self is the one unchanging witness of, i, 312.
 - originates from the word, i, 201-211; how that origination is to be understood, i, 203.
 - trembles in the prâna, i, 229-231.
 - is evolved by names and forms, i, 233, 242, 357.
 - a previous seminal condition of it, i, 242-245, 255.
 - evolution of it under the superintendence of a ruler, i, 268.
 - doctrines concerning its origin which are opposed to the Vedânta, i, 288 seq.
 - is different in nature from Brahman, i, 299-305.
 - is non-intelligent and impure, i, 300 seq.
 - can we assume it to be intelligent? i, 302 seq.
 - being based on the individual soul, cannot have an independent existence, i, 322 seq.
 - is in all time only that which is, i, 332.
 - is without a beginning, i, 212, 359-361.
 - the pradhâna cannot be the cause of the w., on account of the orderly arrangement of the w. being impossible on that hypothesis, i, 363-367.

- World cannot be produced without activity, and therefore cannot have a non-intelligent cause, i, 367-369.
- the 'cause of suffering,' i, 376 n., 378.
 - non-difference of it from Brahman, ii, 9.
 - if the text says 'the w. is a fire indeed,' this does not mean that the w. really is a fire, ii, 267.
 - the term 'w.' denotes places of enjoyment, ii, 387, 389, 390.
 - the re-absorption (pralaya) of the, the material w. is merged into Mâyâ at the time of, i, pp. xxvi, xciv.
 - — objections against the Vedânta doctrine based on the consequences that would arise at the time of, i, 309 seq.; these objections refuted, i, 310-314.
 - — the power of distinction founded on wrong knowledge remains even after, i, 313.
 - — would be impossible, if we adopted the atomic theory, i, 386-389.
 - — there exists, potentially, a connexion between the Self and the buddhi even in the state of, ii, 47 seq.
 - — in the state of, the elements are merged in Brahman only in such a way as to continue to exist in a seminal condition, ii, 371.
 - the periodical renovation of the, i, p. xxvii, 211 seq., 214.
 - — — there is no contradiction to the eternity of the word of the Veda in it, i, 211-216.
 - — — compared to the sleeping and waking states, i, 212.
 - the phenomenal w. is the same in all kalpas, i, 215.
- Worship (of Brahman). See Meditation.
- Yâgñavalkya, i, p. cxv.
- colloquy of Ârtabhâga and, i, pp. lxxxi, cxii; ii, 373 seq.
 - colloquy of the Gandharva and, i, 219.
 - Yâgñavalkya, dialogue of Maitreyi and, i, 274 seqq.
 - and others who knew Brahman did not take their stand on works, ii, 292.
 - Yagus, the highest Self is, i, 79.
 - Yama with a staff in his hand, i, 217 n.
 - colloquy between Y. and Nakiketas, i, 247-252.
 - Samyamana, the abode of, ii, 122 seq.
 - men who have not offered sacrifices, fall into the power of, ii, 122 seq.
 - the evil-doers suffer punishments allotted by, ii, 123.
 - chief ruler in the seven hells, ii, 123.
 - from his realm none ever return, ii, 151.
 - Year, the departed soul proceeds from the y. to Vâyû, ii, 384-386.
 - Yoga (practice) leads to the acquirement of extraordinary powers, i, 223.
 - the means of attaining knowledge, i, 241, 297.
 - highest beatitude is not to be attained by the road of, i, 298.
 - is of the nature of lower knowledge, ii, 375.
 - books on Y. treat of the connexion of one soul with several bodies, ii, 414.
 - Yogâkâras are idealists, i, 401 n.
 - Yoga-vâstra, i, 50.
 - in giving rules for the condition of the wandering religious mendicant, agrees with the Veda, i, 298.
 - the five functions of the manas known from it, viz. right knowledge, error, imagination, slumber, and remembrance, ii, 90.
 - teaches different sitting postures, ii, 350.
 - Yoga-smṛiti refuted, i, p. xlvii, 296-299.
 - like the Sâṅkhya-smṛiti, assumes a pradhâna, as the independent cause of the world, and the 'great principle' &c. as its effects, i, 296.
 - and Sâṅkhya-smṛiti, why singled out for refutation, i, 297 seq.

Yoga-smṛiti and Sāṅkhya-smṛiti are mere Smṛiti, not of scriptural character, ii, 381.

Yoga-system, i, 15 n.

— and Sāṅkhya-system maintain duality, do not discern the unity of the Self, i, 298.

— on it the Lord acts as the ruler of the pradhāna, and of the souls, i, 434 seq.

Yogin, does the term 'the internal Ruler' refer to ? i, 131.

Yogin may animate several bodies at the same time, i, 200.

— in the state of perfect conciliation, apprehends the highest Brahman, ii, 171 seq.

— the rules as to dying by day and during the northern progress of the sun in order not to return, are given by Smṛiti for the Y. only, ii, 380, 381.

Yogins, their omniscience, i, 46, 49, 50.

CORRIGENDA.

VOLUME XXXIV.

- Page lxi, line 25, read (10) for (9)
„ lxiv, „ 32, read prakṛitaitāvattva
„ cxvi, „ 3, read I, 1, 4 for I, 4
„ 34, „ 20, read I, 3, 4 for III, 1, 4
„ 172, „ 6 from below, read or for on „ 191, „ 22, read nād'is for nad'is
„ 246, last line, read Ka. Up. I, 3, 15
„ 282, line 23, read IV, 4, 24 for IV, 24
„ 402, „ 13, and line 8 from below, read saṃgṛhā° for saṃgṛhā°
„ 440, „ 26, read igyā for igrā

VOLUME XXXVIII.

- Page 154, line 12, read Vairvānara for °svanara
„ 182, „ 4 from below, read Bādarāyana for Bādārayana
„ 190, last line, read Up. II, 6, 2
„ 221, line 7, read Avabhrītha- for Avabrītha-„ 236, „ 9 } read Aparāntaratamas for Aparāntamas
„ „ 23 }
„ 287, „ 2 from below, read guhū for guhū
„ 295, „ 11 „ „ read 2, 11 for 10, 11
„ 319, „ 6 „ „ read Krikkhṛa for Krikkhṛa
„ 330, „ 13 „ „ read their for its
„ 352, „ 18 „ „ read Pr. Up. III, 10 for Pr. Up. IV, 2, 10

TRANSLITERATION OF ORIENTAL ALPHABETS ADOPTED FOR THE TRANSLATIONS
OF THE SACRED BOOKS OF THE EAST.

CONSONANTS	MISSIONARY ALPHABET.			Sanskrit.	Zend.	Pahlavi.	Persian.	Arabic.	Hebrew.	Chinese.
	I Class.	II Class.
		III Class.
Gutturales.
1 Tenuis	k	.	.	क	𐬕	𐬕	𐬕	𐬕	𐤀	k
2 " aspirata	kh	.	.	ख	𐬖	𐬖	𐬖	𐬖	𐤁	kh
3 Media	g	.	.	ग	𐬗	𐬗	𐬗	𐬗	𐤂	.
4 " aspirata	gh	.	.	घ	𐬘	𐬘	𐬘	𐬘	𐤃	.
5 Gutturo-labialis	q	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	𐤄	.
6 Nasalis	h (ng)	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	𐤅	.
7 Spiritus asper	h	.	.	ह	𐬙	𐬙	𐬙	𐬙	𐤆	h, hs
8 " lenis	,	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	𐤇	.
9 " asper faucalis	'h	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	𐤈	.
10 " lenis faucalis	'h	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	𐤉	.
11 " asper fricatus	.	'h	.	.	.	.	.	.	𐤊	.
12 " lenis fricatus	.	'h	.	.	.	.	.	.	𐤋	.
Gutturales modificatae (palatales, &c.)
13 Tenuis	.	k	.	𐬚	𐬚	𐬚	𐬚	𐬚	𐤌	k
14 " aspirata	.	kh	.	𐬛	𐬛	𐬛	𐬛	𐬛	𐤍	kh
15 Media	.	g	.	𐬜	𐬜	𐬜	𐬜	𐬜	𐤎	.
16 " aspirata	.	gh	.	𐬝	𐬝	𐬝	𐬝	𐬝	𐤏	.
17 " Nasalis	.	q	.	𐬞	𐬞	𐬞	𐬞	𐬞	𐤐	.

CONSONANTS (continued).	MISSIONARY ALPHABET.			Sanskrit.	Zend.	Pehlvi.	Persian.	Arabic.	Hebrew.	Chinese.
	I Class.	II Class.	III Class.
18 Semivocalis	y	...	...	य	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	ي	י	y
19 Spiritus asper	...	(y')	...	...	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	...	...	...
20 " lenis	...	(y)	...	...	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	...	...	...
21 " asper assibilatus	...	s	...	श	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	...	...	...
22 " lenis assibilatus	...	s	...	...	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	...	...	...
Dentales.
23 Tenuis	t	...	...	त	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	ت	ת	t
24 " aspirata	th	...	...	थ	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	...	...	th
25 " assibilata	...	...	TH	...	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	...	...	...
26 Media	d	...	...	द	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	د	ד	...
27 " aspirata	dh	...	...	ध	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	...	...	...
28 " assibilata	...	...	DH	...	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	...	...	...
29 Nasalis	n	...	...	न	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	ن	נ	n
30 Semivocalis	l	...	...	ल	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	ل	ל	l
31 " mollis 1	...	l	...	...	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	...	...	...
32 " mollis 2	...	...	L	...	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	...	...	...
33 Spiritus asper 1	s	...	...	स	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	س	ס	s
34 " asper 2	...	...	s (S)	...	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	...	...	...
35 " lenis	z	...	...	...	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	ز	ז	z
36 " asperimus 1	...	...	z (z)	...	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	...	...	...
37 " asperimus 2	...	...	z (z)	...	𐬨	𐬨	𐬨	...	...	...

Dentales modificatae
(linguales, &c.)

38 Tenuis	t	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
39 " aspirata	th	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
40 Media	d	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
41 " aspirata	dh	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
42 Nasalis	n	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
43 Semivocalis	r	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
44 " fricata	r	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
45 " diacritica	r	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
46 Spiritus asper	sh	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
47 " lenis	zh	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...

Labiales.

48 Tenuis	p	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
49 " aspirata	ph	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
50 Media	b	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
51 " aspirata	bh	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
52 Tenuissima		...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
53 Nasalis	m	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
54 Semivocalis	w	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
55 " aspirata	hw	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
56 Spiritus asper	f	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
57 " lenis	v	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
58 Anusvāra	m	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...
59 Visarga	h	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	...

VOWELS.	MISSIONARY ALPHABET.			Sanskrit.	Zend.	Pehlvi.	Persian.	Arabic.	Hebrew.	Chinese.
	I Class.		III Class.
	II Class.
1 Neutralis	0	. . .	. . .	. . .	. . .	. . .	. . .	. . .	. . .	ə
2 Laryngo-palatalis	ě	. . .	. . .	. . .	. . .	. . .	. . .	. . .	. . .	. . .
3 " labialis	ö	. . .	. . .	. . .	. . .	. . .	. . .	. . .	. . .	. . .
4 Gutturalis brevis	a	. . .	. . .	अ	ا	ا	ا	ا	א	ā
5 " longa	ā	(a)	. . .	आ	ا	ا	ا	ا	א	ā
6 Palatalis brevis	i	. . .	. . .	इ	ی	ی	ی	ی	י	i
7 " longa	ī	(i)	. . .	ई	ی	ی	ی	ی	י	ī
8 Dentalis brevis	u	. . .	. . .	उ	و	و	و	و	ו	u
9 " longa	ū	. . .	. . .	ऊ	و	و	و	و	ו	ū
10 Lingualis brevis	ri	. . .	. . .	रि	ر	ر	ر	ر	ר	ri
11 " longa	ri	. . .	. . .	रि	ر	ر	ر	ر	ר	ri
12 Labialis brevis	u	. . .	. . .	उ	و	و	و	و	ו	u
13 " longa	ū	(u)	. . .	ऊ	و	و	و	و	ו	ū
14 Gutturo-palatalis brevis	e	. . .	. . .	ए	ه	ه	ه	ه	ה	e
15 " longa	é (ai)	(e)	. . .	ऐ	ه	ه	ه	ه	ה	é
16 Diphthongus gutturo-palatalis	āi	(ai)	. . .	आइ	ه	ه	ه	ه	ה	āi
17 " "	ei (ēi)	. . .	. . .	ऐ	ه	ه	ه	ه	ה	ei
18 " "	oi (ōu)	. . .	. . .	औ	و	و	و	و	ו	oi
19 Gutturo-labialis brevis	o	. . .	. . .	ओ	و	و	و	و	ו	o
20 " longa	ō (au)	(o)	. . .	औ	و	و	و	و	ו	ō
21 Diphthongus gutturo-labialis	āu	(au)	. . .	आउ	و	و	و	و	ו	āu
22 " "	eu (ēu)	. . .	. . .	ऐउ	و	و	و	و	ו	eu
23 " "	ou (ōu)	. . .	. . .	औउ	و	و	و	و	ו	ou
24 Gutturalis fracta	ä	. . .	. . .	अः	ه	ه	ه	ه	ה	ä
25 Palatalis fracta	ī	. . .	. . .	इः	ه	ه	ه	ه	ה	ī
26 Labialis fracta	ū	. . .	. . .	उः	و	و	و	و	ו	ū
27 Gutturo-labialis fracta	ō	. . .	. . .	औः	و	و	و	و	ו	ō

SACRED BOOKS OF THE EAST

TRANSLATED BY VARIOUS ORIENTAL SCHOLARS

AND EDITED BY

THE RIGHT HON. F. MAX MÜLLER.

This Series is published with the sanction and co-operation of the Secretary of State for India in Council.

REPORT presented to the ACADEMIE DES INSCRIPTIONS, May 11, 1883, by M. ERNEST RENAN.

‘M. Renan présente trois nouveaux volumes de la grande collection des “Livres sacrés de l’Orient” (Sacred Books of the East), que dirige à Oxford, avec une si vaste érudition et une critique si sûre, le savant associé de l’Académie des Inscriptions, M. Max Müller. . . . La première série de ce beau recueil, composée de 24 volumes, est presque achevée. M. Max Müller se propose d’en publier une seconde, dont l’intérêt historique et religieux ne sera pas moindre. M. Max Müller a su se procurer la collaboration des savans les plus éminens d’Europe et d’Asie. L’Université d’Oxford, que cette grande publication honore au plus haut degré, doit tenir à continuer dans les plus larges proportions une œuvre aussi philosophiquement conçue que savamment exécutée.’

EXTRACT from the QUARTERLY REVIEW.

‘We rejoice to notice that a second series of these translations has been announced and has actually begun to appear. The stones, at least, out of which a stately edifice may hereafter arise, are here being brought together. Prof. Max Müller has deserved well of scientific history. Not a few minds owe to his enticing words their first attraction to this branch of study. But no work of his, not even the great edition of the Rig-Veda, can compare in importance or in usefulness with this English translation of the Sacred Books of the East, which has been devised by his foresight, successfully brought so far by his persuasive and organising power, and will, we trust, by the assistance of the distinguished scholars he has gathered round him, be carried in due time to a happy completion.’

Professor E. HARDY, Inaugural Lecture in the University of Freiburg, 1887.

‘Die allgemeine vergleichende Religionswissenschaft datirt von jenem grossartigen, in seiner Art einzig dastehenden Unternehmen, zu welchem auf Anregung Max Müllers im Jahre 1874 auf dem internationalen Orientalistencongress in London der Grundstein gelegt worden war, die Übersetzung der heiligen Bücher des Ostens’ (the Sacred Books of the East).

The Hon. ALBERT S. G. CANNING, ‘Words on Existing Religions.’

‘The recent publication of the “Sacred Books of the East” in English is surely a great event in the annals of theological literature.’

OXFORD

AT THE CLARENDON PRESS
LONDON: HENRY FROWDE

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE, AMEN CORNER, E.C.

FIRST SERIES.

VOL. I. The Upanishads.

Translated by F. MAX MÜLLER. Part I. The Khândogya-upanishad, The Talavakâra-upanishad, The Aitareya-âranyaka, The Kaushîtaki-brâhmana-upanishad, and The Vâgasaneyi-samhitâ-upanishad. Second Edition. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

The Upanishads contain the philosophy of the Veda. They have become the foundation of the later Vedânta doctrines, and indirectly of Buddhism. Schopenhauer, speaking of the Upanishads, says: 'In the whole world there is no study so beneficial and so elevating as that of the Upanishads. It has been the solace of my life, it will be the solace of my death.'

[See also Vol. XV.]

VOL. II. The Sacred Laws of the Âryas,

As taught in the Schools of Âpastamba, Gautama, Vâsishtha, and Baudhâyana. Translated by GEORG BÜHLER. Part I. Âpastamba and Gautama. Second Edition. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

The Sacred Laws of the Âryas contain the original treatises on which the Laws of Manu and other lawgivers were founded.

[See also Vol. XIV.]

VOL. III. The Sacred Books of China.

The Texts of Confucianism. Translated by JAMES LEGGE. Part I. The Shû King, The Religious Portions of the Shih King, and The Hsiâo King. Second Edition. 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d.

Confucius was a collector of ancient traditions, not the founder of a new religion. As he lived in the sixth and fifth centuries B. C. his works are of unique interest for the study of Ethology.

[See also Vols. XVI, XXVII, XXVIII, XXXIX, and XL.]

VOL. IV. The Zend-Avesta.

Translated by JAMES DARMESTETER. Part I. The Vendîdâd. Second Edition. 8vo, cloth, 14s.

The Zend-Avesta contains the relics of what was the religion of Cyrus, Darius, and Xerxes. It forms to the present day the sacred book of the Parsis, the so-called fire-worshippers.

[See also Vols. XXIII and XXXI.]

VOL. V. Pahlavi Texts.

Translated by E. W. WEST. Part I. The Bundahis, Bahman Yast, and Shâyast lâ-shâyast. 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d.

The Pahlavi Texts comprise the theological literature of the revival of Zoroaster's religion, beginning with the Sassanian dynasty. They are important for a study of Gnosticism.

[See also Vols. XVIII, XXIV, XXXVII, and XLVII.]

VOLS. VI AND IX. The Qur'ân.

Parts I and II. Translated by E. H. PALMER. Second Edition. 8vo, cloth, 21s.

This translation, carried out according to his own peculiar views of the origin of the Qur'ân, was the last great work of E. H. Palmer, before he was murdered in Egypt.

VOL. VII. The Institutes of Vishnu.

Translated by JULIUS JOLLY. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

A collection of legal aphorisms, closely connected with one of the oldest Vedic schools, the Kathas, but considerably added to in later time. Of importance for a critical study of the Laws of Manu.

VOL. VIII. The Bhagavadgîtâ, with The Sanatsugâtîya, and The Anugîtâ.

Translated by KÂSHINÂTH TRIMBAK TELANG. Second Edition. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

The earliest philosophical and religious poem of India. It has been paraphrased in Arnold's 'Song Celestial.'

VOL. X. The Dhammapada,

Translated from Pâli by F. MAX MÜLLER; and

The Sutta-Nipâta,

Translated from Pâli by V. FAUSBÖLL; being Canonical Books of the Buddhists. Second Edition. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

The Dhammapada contains the quintessence of Buddhist morality. The Sutta-Nipâta gives the authentic teaching of Buddha on some of the fundamental principles of religion.

VOL. XI. Buddhist Suttas.

Translated from Pāli by T. W. RHYS DAVIDS. 1. The Mahā-parinibbāṇa Suttanta; 2. The Dhamma-kakka-ppavattana Sutta. 3. The Teviggā Suttanta; 4. The Ākaṅkheyya Sutta; 5. The Ketokhila Sutta; 6. The Mahā-sudassana Suttanta; 7. The Sabbāsava Sutta. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

A collection of the most important religious, moral, and philosophical discourses taken from the sacred canon of the Buddhists.

VOL. XII. The Satapatha-Brāhmaṇa, according to the Text of the Mādhyandina School.

Translated by JULIUS EGGELING. Part I. Books I and II. 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d.

A minute account of the sacrificial ceremonies of the Vedic age. It contains the earliest account of the Deluge in India.

[See also Vols. XXVI, XLI, XLIII, and XLIV.]

VOL. XIII. Vinaya Texts.

Translated from the Pāli by T. W. RHYS DAVIDS and HERMANN OLDENBERG. Part I. The Pātimokkha. The Mahāvagga, I-IV. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

The Vinaya Texts give for the first time a translation of the moral code of the Buddhist religion as settled in the third century B.C.

[See also Vols. XVII and XX.]

VOL. XIV. The Sacred Laws of the Āryas,

As taught in the Schools of Āpastamba, Gautama, Vāsishṭha, and Baudhāyana. Translated by GEORG BÜHLER. Part II. Vāsishṭha and Baudhāyana. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

VOL. XV. The Upanishads.

Translated by F. MAX MÜLLER. Part II. The Katha-upanishad, The Mundaka-upanishad, The Taittirīyaka-upanishad, The Brīhadāraṇyaka-upanishad, The Svetāsvatara-upanishad, The Prasṇa-upanishad, and The Maitrāyaṇa-brāhmaṇa-upanishad. Second Edition. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

VOL. XVI. The Sacred Books of China.

The Texts of Confucianism. Translated by JAMES LEGGE. Part II. The Yî King. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

[See also Vols. XXVII, XXVIII.]

VOL. XVII. Vinaya Texts.

Translated from the Pāli by T. W. RHYS DAVIDS and HERMANN OLDENBERG. Part II. The Mahāvagga, V-X. The Kullavagga, I-III. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

VOL. XVIII. Pahlavi Texts.

Translated by E. W. WEST. Part II. The Dādīstān-ī Dīnīk and The Epistles of Mānūsīhar. 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d.

VOL. XIX. The Fo-sho-hing-tsan-king.

A Life of Buddha by Asvaghosha Bodhisattva, translated from Sanskrit into Chinese by Dharmaraksha, A.D. 420, and from Chinese into English by SAMUEL BEAL. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

This life of Buddha was translated from Sanskrit into Chinese, A.D. 420. It contains many legends, some of which show a certain similarity to the Evangelium infantiae, &c.

VOL. XX. Vinaya Texts.

Translated from the Pāli by T. W. RHYS DAVIDS and HERMANN OLDENBERG. Part III. The Kullavagga, IV–XII. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

VOL. XXI. The Saddharma-puṇḍarīka ; or, The Lotus of the True Law.

Translated by H. KERN. 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d.

'The Lotus of the True Law,' a canonical book of the Northern Buddhists, translated from Sanskrit. There is a Chinese translation of this book which was finished as early as the year 286 A.D.

VOL. XXII. Gaina-Sūtras.

Translated from Prākṛit by HERMANN JACOBI. Part I. The Ākārāṅga-Sūtra and The Kalpa-Sūtra. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

The religion of the Gainas was founded by a contemporary of Buddha. It still counts numerous adherents in India, while there are no Buddhists left in India proper.

[See Vol. XLV.]

VOL. XXIII. The Zend-Avesta.

Translated by JAMES DARMESTETER. Part II. The Sīrōzahs, Yasts, and Nyāyis. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

VOL. XXIV. Pahlavi Texts.

Translated by E. W. WEST. Part III. Dīnā-ī Maīnōg-Khirad, Sikand-gūmānīk Vigār, and Sad Dar. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

SECOND SERIES.

VOL. XXV. Manu.

Translated by GEORG BÜHLER. 8vo, cloth, 21s.

This translation is founded on that of Sir William Jones, which has been carefully revised and corrected with the help of seven native Commentaries. An Appendix contains all the quotations from Manu which are found in the Hindu Law-books, translated for the use of the Law Courts in India. Another Appendix gives a synopsis of parallel passages from the six Dharma-sūtras, the other Smritis, the Upanishads, the Mahābhārata, &c.

VOL. XXVI. The Satapatha-Brāhmaṇa.

Translated by JULIUS EGGELING. Part II. Books III and IV. 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d.

VOLS. XXVII AND XXVIII. The Sacred Books of China.

The Texts of Confucianism. Translated by JAMES LEGGE. Parts III and IV. The Lî Kî, or Collection of Treatises on the Rules of Propriety, or Ceremonial Usages. 8vo, cloth, 25s.

VOL. XXIX. The Gṛihya-Sūtras, Rules of Vedic Domestic Ceremonies.

Part I. Sāṅkhāyana, Āsvalāyana, Pāraskara, Khādīra. Translated by HERMANN OLDENBERG. 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d.

VOL. XXX. The Gṛihya-Sūtras, Rules of Vedic Domestic Ceremonies.

Part II. Gobhila, Hiranyakesin, Āpastamba. Translated by HERMANN OLDENBERG. Āpastamba, Yagña-paribhāṣhā-sūtras. Translated by F. MAX MÜLLER. 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d.

These rules of Domestic Ceremonies describe the home life of the ancient Āryas with a completeness and accuracy unmatched in any other literature. Some of these rules have been incorporated in the ancient Law-books.

VOL. XXXI. The Zend-Avesta.

Part III. The Yasna, Visparad, Āfrīnagān, Gāhs, and Miscellaneous Fragments. Translated by L. H. MILLS. 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d.

VOL. XXXII. Vedic Hymns.

Translated by F. MAX MÜLLER. Part I. 8vo, cloth, 18s. 6d.

[See also Vol. XLVI.]

VOL. XXXIII. The Minor Law-books.

Translated by JULIUS JOLLY. Part I. Nārada, Brīhaspati. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

VOL. XXXIV. The Vedânta-Sûtras, with the Commentary by Sāṅkarācārya. Part I.

Translated by G. THIBAUT. 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d.

[See also Vols. XXXVIII and XLVIII.]

VOLS. XXXV AND XXXVI. The Questions of King Milinda.

Translated from the Pāli by T. W. RHYS DAVIDS. Part I. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. Part II. 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d.

VOL. XXXVII. Pahlavi Texts.

Translated by E. W. WEST. Part IV. The Contents of the Nasks, as stated in the Eighth and Ninth Books of the Dīnkard. 15s.

VOL. XXXVIII. The Vedânta-Sûtras. Part II. 8vo, cloth, with full Index to both Parts, 12s. 6d.

VOLS. XXXIX AND XL. The Sacred Books of China. The Texts of Tāoism. Translated by JAMES LEGGE. 8vo, cloth, 21s.

VOL. XLI. The Satapatha - Brāhmaṇa. Part III.

Translated by JULIUS EGGELING. 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d.

VOL. XLII. Hymns of the Atharva-veda.

Translated by M. BLOOMFIELD. 8vo, cloth, 21s.

VOL. XLIII. The Satapatha-Brāhmaṇa.

Translated by JULIUS EGGELING. Part IV. Books VIII, IX, and X. 12s. 6d.

VOL. XLIV. The Satapatha-Brāhmaṇa.

Translated by JULIUS EGGELING. Part V. Books XI, XII, XIII, and XIV. 18s. 6d.

VOL. XLV. The Gaiṇa-Sûtras.

Translated from Prakṛit, by HERMANN JACOBI. Part II. The Uttarādhyayana Sûtra, The Sûtrakṛitāṅga Sûtra. 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d.

VOL. XLVI. Vedic Hymns. Part II. 8vo, cloth, 14s.

VOL. XLVII. Pahlavi Texts.

Translated by E. W. WEST. Part V. Marvels of Zoroastrianism. 8s. 6d.

VOL. XLVIII. The Vedânta-Sûtras, Part III, with Rāmānuga's Sribhāshya.

Translated by G. THIBAUT.

[In the Press.]

VOL. XLIX. Buddhist Mahâyāna Texts. Buddha-karita, translated by E. B. COWELL. Sukhāvati-vyūha, Vagarakkhe-dikā, &c., translated by F. MAX MÜLLER. Amitâyur-Dhyāna-Sûtra, translated by J. TAKAKUSU. 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d.

ANECDOTA OXONIENSIA.

ARYAN SERIES.

Buddhist Texts from Japan. I. Vagrakkhedikâ ; The Diamond-Cutter.

Edited by F. MAX MÜLLER, M.A. Small 4to, 3s. 6d.

One of the most famous metaphysical treatises of the Mahâyâna Buddhists.

Buddhist Texts from Japan. II. Sukhâvatî-Vyûha : Description of Sukhâvatî, the Land of Bliss.

Edited by F. MAX MÜLLER, M.A., and BUNYIU NANJIO. With two Appendices: (1) Text and Translation of Saṅghavarman's Chinese Version of the Poetical Portions of the Sukhâvatî-Vyûha ; (2) Sanskrit Text of the Smaller Sukhâvatî-Vyûha. Small 4to, 7s. 6d.

The editio princeps of the Sacred Book of one of the largest and most influential sects of Buddhism, numbering more than ten millions of followers in Japan alone.

Buddhist Texts from Japan. III. The Ancient Palm-Leaves containing the Pragñâ-Pâramitâ-Hridaya-Sûtra and the Ushnîsha-Vigaya-Dhâraṇî.

Edited by F. MAX MÜLLER, M.A., and BUNYIU NANJIO, M.A. With an Appendix by G. BÜHLER, C.I.E. With many Plates. Small 4to, 10s.

Contains facsimiles of the oldest Sanskrit MS. at present known.

Dharma-Samgraha, an Ancient Collection of Buddhist Technical Terms.

Prepared for publication by KENJIU KASAWARA, a Buddhist Priest from Japan, and, after his death, edited by F. MAX MÜLLER and H. WENZEL. Small 4to, 7s. 6d.

Kâtyâyana's Sarvânukramanî of the Rîgveda.

With Extracts from Shadgurusishya's Commentary entitled Vedârthadîpikâ. Edited by A. A. MACDONELL, M.A., Ph.D. 16s.

The Buddha-Karita of Asvaghosha.

Edited, from three MSS., by E. B. COWELL, M.A. 12s. 6d.

The Mantrapâṭha, or the Prayer Book of the Āpa-stambins.

Edited, together with the Commentary of Haradatta, and translated by M. WINTERNITZ, Ph.D. First Part. Introduction, Sanskrit Text, Varietas Lectionis, and Appendices. Small quarto, 10s. 6d.

OXFORD

AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

LONDON: HENRY FROWDE

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE, AMEN CORNER, E.C.

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

THE SACRED BOOKS OF THE EAST

London

HENRY FROWDE

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE
AMEN CORNER, E.C.

New York

MACMILLAN & CO., 66 FIFTH AVENUE.

THE
SACRED BOOKS OF THE EAST

TRANSLATED

BY VARIOUS ORIENTAL SCHOLARS

AND EDITED BY

F. MAX MÜLLER

VOL. XLI

Orford

AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

1894

[All rights reserved]

REESE

Oxford

PRINTED AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

BY HORACE HART, PRINTER TO THE UNIVERSITY

685
M946
v. 41

THE SATAPATHA-BRÂHMANA

ACCORDING TO THE TEXT OF THE

MÂDHYANDINA SCHOOL

TRANSLATED BY

JULIUS EGGELING

PART III

BOOKS V, VI, AND VII

Oxford

AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

1894

[All rights reserved]

685
M946
V.41

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
INTRODUCTION	xi

FIFTH KÂṆDA.

A. The Vâgapeya	I
The Cups (graha) of Soma	5
The Cups of Surâ	8
Animal Victims	11
Consecration	17
Chariot-race	17
Âpti and Kîpti-formulas	29
The Mounting of the Sacrificial Post by the Sacrificer and his Wife	31
The Seating on the Throne-seat	35
Vâga-prasavanîya-oblations	37
Uggiti (victory)-formulas	40
B. The Râgasûya, or Inauguration of a King	42
Preliminary offerings	42
Seasonal-offerings	47
Indraturîya-oblation	50
Trishamyukta-offerings	54
Ratna-havîmshi, or Jewel-offerings	58
Offering to Soma and Rudra	65
Offering to Mitra and Brîhaspati	66
Abhishekanîya, or Consecration Ceremony	68
Offerings to the Divine Quickeners (devastû), viz.
Savitri Satyaprasava, Agni Grîhapat	69
Soma Vanaspati, Brîhaspati Vâk, Indra Gyeshta, Rudra Pasupati	70
Mitra Satya, Varuṇa Dharmapati	71
Preparation of the Consecration Water	73
Pârtha-oblations	81

	PAGE
Investing of the King with the Consecration
Garments, the Bow and Arrows	85
Âvid-formulas	89
Ascending of the Quarters	91
Stepping on the Tiger-skin	92
The Sprinkling (Abhisheka)	94
The Cow-raid	98
Rathavimokṣanīya-oblations	101
Game of Dice	106
The Passing Round of the Sacrificial Sword	110
Dasapeya	114
Samsrīp-oblations	115
Pañkābila-oblations	120
Prayugām havīmshi (Oblations to the Teams)	123
Kesavapanīya	126
Sautrāmanī	129

SIXTH KÂṆDA.

Agni-kr̥yana, or Building of the Fire-altar	143
Creation of the Universe	143
Animal Sacrifices	165
Layers and Bricks of the Altar	186
Sāvitra Libations	190
The Search for Agni (the Lump of Clay)	197
The Digging	203
The Making of the Fire-pan (ukhâ)	229
Dīkshâ, or Initiation	246
The Raising and Carrying of the Ukhyā Agni	265
The Fashioning of the Embryonic Agni	273
The Vishṇu-strides	275
Vâtsapra	283
The Driving-about of the Ukhyā Agni	289

SEVENTH KÂṆDA.

Agni-kr̥yana (continued).

Gârhapatya-hearth	298
Pouring thereon of the Ukhyā Agni	310
Altar of Nirr̥iti	319

	PAGE
Preparation of the (Âhavanîya) Fire-altar . . .	325
Ploughing, Watering, and Sowing of Ground . . .	326
Bricks of the First Layer	355
Lotus-leaf	363
Gold Plate	354
Gold Man	36
Svayam-âtrîmâ Brick	377
Dûrvâ Plant	380
Dviyagus Bricks	381
Retahsik Bricks	383
Visvagyotis Brick	384
Ritavya Bricks	386
Ashâdhâ Brick	387
Tortoise	389
Mortar and Pestle	393
Fire-pan	396
Victims' Heads	400
Apasyâ Bricks	413
Khandasyâ Bricks	414
Corrections	418
Plan of Fire-altar	419

Transliteration of Oriental Alphabets adopted for the Trans- lations of the Sacred Books of the East	421
---	-----

INTRODUCTION.

THE first of the three Kândas contained in the present volume continues the dogmatic discussion of the different forms of Soma-sacrifice, in connection with which two important ceremonies, the Vâgapeya and Râgasûya, are considered. From a ritualistic point of view, there is a radical difference between these two ceremonies. The Râgasûya, or 'inauguration of a king,' strictly speaking, is not a Soma-sacrifice, but rather a complex religious ceremony which includes, amongst other rites, the performance of a number of Soma-sacrifices of different kinds. The Vâgapeya, or 'drink of strength' (or, perhaps, 'the race-cup'), on the other hand, is recognised as one of the different forms (samsthâ) which a single Soma-sacrifice may take. As a matter of fact, however, this form hardly ever occurs, as most of the others constantly do, in connection with, and as a constituent element of, other ceremonies, but is almost exclusively performed as an independent sacrifice. The reason why this sacrifice has received a special treatment in the Brâhmana, between the Agnishôma and the Râgasûya, doubtless is that, unlike the other forms of Soma-sacrifice, it has some striking features of its own which stamp it, like the Râgasûya, as a political ceremony. According to certain ritualistic authorities¹, indeed, the performance of the Vâgapeya should be arranged in much the same way as that of the Râgasûya; that is, just as the central ceremony of the Râgasûya, viz. the Abhishekanîya or consecration, is preceded and followed by certain other Soma-days, so the Vâgapeya should be preceded and followed by exactly corresponding ceremonies.

¹ See Kâty. Sr. XIV, 1, 7; Lâty. Sr. VIII, 11, 7-11.

The preceding Kānda was chiefly taken up with a detailed discussion of the simplest form of a complete Soma-sacrifice, the Agnishṭoma, serving as the model for all other kinds of one-day (ekāha) Soma-sacrifices; and it also adverted incidentally to some of the special features of such of the remaining fundamental forms of Soma-sacrifice as are required for the performance of sacrificial periods of from two to twelve pressing-days—the so-called ahīna-sacrifices—as well as for the performance of the sacrificial sessions (sattra) lasting from twelve days upwards. As the discussion of the Vāgapeya presupposes a knowledge of several of those fundamental forms of Soma-sacrifice, it may not be out of place here briefly to recapitulate their characteristic features.

The ekāha, or 'one-day' sacrifices, are those Soma-sacrifices which have a single pressing-day, consisting of three services (or pressings, savana)—the morning, midday, and third (or evening) services—at each of which certain cups of Soma-liquor are drawn, destined to be ultimately consumed by the priests and sacrificer, after libations to the respective deities have been duly made therefrom. At certain stated times during the performance, hymns (stotra) are chanted by the Udgātṛis; each of which is followed by an appropriate recitation (sastra) of Vedic hymns or detached verses, by the Hotṛi priest or one of his assistants. An integral part of each Soma-sacrifice, moreover, is the animal sacrifice (parubandhu); the number of victims varying according to the particular form of sacrifice adopted. In the exposition of the Agnishṭoma, the animal offering actually described (part ii, p. 162 seq.) is that of a he-goat to Agni and Soma, intended to serve as the model for all other animal sacrifices. This description is inserted in the Brāhmaṇa among the ceremonies of the day preceding the Soma-day; whilst, in the actual performance, the slaughtering of the victim, or victims, takes place during the morning service, and the meat-oblations are made during the evening service, of the pressing-day. The ritualistic works enumerate a considerable number of 'one-day' sacrifices, all of them with special features of their own; most of these sacrifices are, however, merely modifications of one or other of the fundamental forms of ekâhas. Of such forms or samsthâs—literally, ‘completions,’ being so called because the final chants or ceremonies are their most characteristic features—the ritual system recognises seven, viz. the Agnishôma, Atyagnishôma, Ukthya, Shodasin, *Vâgapeya*¹, Atirâtra, and Aptoryâma.

The Agnishôma, the simplest and most common form of Soma-sacrifice, requires the immolation of a single victim, a he-goat to Agni; and the chanting of twelve stotras, viz. the Bahish-pavamâna and four Âgya-stotras at the morning service; the Mâdhyandina-pavamâna and four Prishtha-stotras at the midday service; and the Tritiya (or Ârbhava)-pavamâna and the Agnishôma-sâman at the evening service. It is this last-named chant, then, that gives its name to this sacrifice which, indeed, is often explained as the ‘*Agnishôma-samsthaḥ kratuh*²,’ or the sacrifice concluding with ‘Agni’s praise.’ The term ‘sâman,’ in its narrow technical sense, means a choral melody, a hymn-tune, without reference to the words set thereto. Not unfrequently, however, it has to be taken in the wider sense of a chanted verse or hymn (triplet), a chorale; but, though the distinction is evidently of some importance for the ritual, it is not always easy to determine the particular sense in which the term is meant to be applied, viz. whether a specified sâman is intended to include the original text set to the respective tune, or whether some other verses to which that tune has been adapted are intended. In the case of the Agnishôma-sâman, however, the word ‘sâman’ cannot be taken in its narrow acceptation, but the term has to be understood in the sense of ‘a hymn chanted in praise of Agni.’ The words commonly used for this chant, are the first two verses of Rig-veda S. VI, 48, a hymn indeed admirably adapted for the purpose of singing Agni's praises. For the first verse, beginning 'yagñâ-yagñâ vo agnaye,' the chief tune-book, the Grâmageya-gâna, has preserved four different tunes, all of which are ascribed to the Rishi Bharadvâga: one of them has, however, come to be generally accepted as the Yagñâyagñiya-tune κατ' ἐξοχήν, and has been made use of for this and numerous other triplets¹; whilst the other tunes seem to have met with little favour, not one of them being represented in the triplets arranged for chanting in stotras, as given in the Ūha and Uhya-gânas. Neither the Yagñâyagñiya-tune, nor its original text, is however a fixed item in the chanting of the Agnishṭoma-sâman. Thus, for the first two verses of Rig-veda VI, 48, the Vâgapeya-sacrifice² substitutes verses nine and ten of the same hymn, and these are chanted, not to the Yagñâyagñiya, but to the Vâravantiya-tune, originally composed for, and named after, Rig-veda I, 27, 1 (S. V. I, 17; ed. Calc. I, p. 121) 'asvam na tvâ vâravantam.'

¹ In this enumeration the Vâgapeya is often placed between the Atirâtra and Aptoryâma; e.g. Lâty. V, 4, 24.

² Thus on Sat. Br. V, 1, 3, 1 Âgneyam agnishôma ālabhate, Sāyana remarks, ‘agniḥ stūyate sminn ity agnishômo nāma sâma, tasmin vishayabhūta āgneyam ālabhate, etena parunā smin vâgapeye agnishômasamsthaḥ kratum evânush/kitavân bhavati.’ In IV, 2, 4, 9 seq., also, the term ‘agnishôma’ would seem to apply to the final chant rather than to the whole sacrifice.

The Ukthya-sacrifice requires the slaughtering of a second victim, a he-goat to Indra and Agni; and to the twelve chants of the Agnishṭoma it adds three more, the so-called Uktha-stotras, each of which is again followed by an Uktha-sastra recited by one of the Hotrakas, or assistants of the Hotri. As the evening service of the Agnishṭoma had only two sastras, both recited by the Hotri, the addition of the three sastras of the Hotrakas would, in this respect, equalize the evening to the morning and midday savanas. The word 'uktha' is explained by later lexicographers either as a synonym of 'sâman,' or as a kind of sâman³; but it is not unlikely that that meaning of the word was directly derived from this, the most common, use of the word in the term 'uktha-stotra.' The etymology of the word⁴, at all events, would point to the ¹ Each Sâman-tune is usually chanted thrice, either each time on a special verse of its own, or so that, by certain repetitions of words, two verses are made to suffice for the thrice-repeated tune.

² So also does the Agnishṭut ekâha, cf. Tândya Br. XVII, 5, 7.

³ Sâyana, to Sat. Br. IV, 3, 3, 2, explains it by 'stotra'; but see IV, 2, 3, 6-9 where it undoubtedly refers to the recited verses (rik), not to the sâman.

⁴ Viz. from root 'vak' to speak. I cannot see the necessity for taking meaning 'verse, hymn,' rather than to that of 'tune' or 'chant;' but, be that as it may, the word is certainly used in the former sense in the term 'mahad-uktha,' the name of the 'great recitation' of a thousand br̥ihatī verses¹, being the Hotri's sastra in response to the Mahāvṛata-stotra at the last but one day of the Gavām-ayana. And, besides, at the Agnishṭoma a special 'ukthya' cup of Soma-juice is drawn both at the morning and midday pressings, but not at the evening savana. This cup, which is eventually shared by the three principal Hotrakas between them, is evidently intended as their reward for the recitation of their 'ukthas.' At the Ukthya-sacrifice, as might have been expected, the same cup is likewise drawn at the evening service. Though it may be taken for granted, therefore, that 'uktha' was an older term for 'sastra,' it still seems somewhat strange that this term should have been applied specially to the additional sastras and stotras of the Ukthya-sacrifice. Could it be that the name of the additional Ukthya-cup, as a distinctive feature of this sacrifice, suggested the name for the sastras and stotras with which that cup was connected, or have we rather to look for some such reason as Ait. Br. VI, 13 might seem to indicate? This passage contains a discussion regarding the different status of the Hotrakas who have ukthas of their own, and those who have not; and it then proceeds to consider the difference that exists between the two first and the third savanas of the Agnishṭoma in respect of the Hotrakas' ukthas. It is clear that here also, the term 'uktha' can hardly be taken otherwise than as referring to

'br̥ihad vaśas' in Rig-veda VII, 96, 1 in the technical sense of Br̥ihat-tune, as is done by Prof. Hillebrandt, in his interesting essay, 'Die Sonnenfeste in Alt-Indien,' p. 29, merely because it is used there in connection with Indra; whilst he himself is doubtful as to whether it should be taken in the same sense in III, 10, 5 where it occurs in connection with Agni. Though the Br̥ihat-sāman is no doubt frequently referred to Indra, and the Rathanantara to Agni, the couplets ordinarily chanted to them (Rig-veda VI, 46, 1-2 and VII, 32, 22, 23) are both of them addressed to Indra. Both tunes are, however, applied to verses addressed to all manner of deities.

¹ See Catalogue of Sanskrit MSS. of the India Office, No. 434. In Kaush. Br. XI, 8, 'sadasy ukthāni sasyante,' also, the word has undoubtedly the sense of sastra, or (recited) hymn. In part i, p. 346, note 3 of this translation read 'great recitation or sastra,' instead of 'great chant.'

the sastras—though, no doubt, the stotra is sometimes said to belong to the priest who recites the sastra in response to it—and this paragraph of the Brāhmaṇa reads almost like the echo of an old discussion as to whether or not there should be recitations for the Hotrakas at the evening service of a complete Soma-sacrifice. If, in this way, the question of ‘uktha or no uktha’ had become a sort of catchword for ritualistic controversy, one could understand how the term came ultimately to be applied to the three additional stotras and sastras.

Not unfrequently, the Ukthya is treated merely as a redundant Agnishṭoma, as an ‘Agnishṭomaḥ sokthaḥ,’ or Agnishṭoma with the Ukthas¹. Considering, however, that the term Agnishṭoma, properly speaking, belongs only to a Soma-sacrifice which ends with the Agnishṭoma (sāman), and that the addition of the Uktha-stotras also involves considerable modifications in the form of most of the preceding chants, a new term such as Ukthya, based on the completing and characteristic chants of this form of sacrifice, was decidedly more convenient. In regard to the composition of the preceding stotras, with the exception of the Mādhyandina-pavamāna and the Agnishṭoma-sāman, the Ukthya, indeed, may be said to constitute a parallel form of Sacrifice beside the Agnishṭoma², the succeeding samsthās following the model of either the one or the other of these two parallel forms.

The Shodāsin-sacrifice requires, as a third victim, the immolation of a ram to Indra ; and one additional chant, the shodasi-stotra, with its attendant sastra and Soma-cup. The most natural explanation of the name is the one supplied, in the first place, by Ait. Br. IV, 1 (as interpreted by Sâyana)—viz. the sacrifice which has sixteen, or a sixteenth, stotra¹. But, as the name applies not only to the sacrifice but also to the stotra and sastra, the Brâhmana further justifies the name by the peculiar composition of the shodasi-sastra in which the number sixteen prevails². Very probably, however, the name may have belonged to the sacrifice long before the sastra, for symbolic reasons, had assumed the peculiar form it now presents.

¹ See, for instance, Tāndya Br. XX, 1, 1.

² Perhaps the most characteristic point of difference between these two forms in which the fundamental stotras are chanted is the first (or Hotrī’s) Prishṭha-stotra at the midday service. Whilst the Agnishṭoma here requires the Ra-chantara-tune chanted on the text, Sāma-veda S. II, 30, 31; the Ukthya, on the other hand, requires the text, S. V. II, 159, 160, chanted to the Bṛihat-tune. Professor Hillebrandt, l. c., p. 22, has, indeed, tried to show that these two tunes play an important part in early India in connection with the celebration of the solstices. A similar alternation of sāmans to that of the Hotrī’s Prishṭha-stotra obtains at the third, or Brāhmanābhikṣin’s Prishṭha-stotra; the Nau-dhasa-sāman (II, 35, 36) being used at the Agnishṭoma, and the Syaita-sāman at the Ukthya-sacrifice. As regards the second (or Maitrāvaruṇa’s) and fourth (or Akkāvāka’s) Prishṭha-stotras, on the other hand, the same sāman—viz. the Vāmadevyā (II, 32-34) and Kāleya (II, 37, 38) respectively—is used both at the Agnishṭoma and Ukthya.

In this summary of the characteristic features of the forms of Soma-sacrifice presupposed by the Vâgapeya, no mention has yet been made of the Atyagnishṭoma, or redundant Agnishṭoma, which usually occupies the second place in the list of saṁsthâs. This form of sacrifice is indeed very little used, and there can be little doubt that it was introduced into the system, as Professor Weber suggests, merely for the sake of bringing up the Soma-saṁsthâs to the sacred number of seven. This sacrifice is obtained by the addition of the shodasi-stotra to the twelve chants of the Agnishṭoma, as well as of the special Soma-cup and sacrificial victim for Indra, connected with that chant. It may thus be considered as a short form of the Shodasin-sacrifice (though without the full complement of stotras implied in that name), which might have suited the views of such ritualists as held the sastras of the Hotrakas at the evening service to be superfluous³.

The distinctive feature of the Atirâtra-sacrifice, as the name itself indicates, is an 'overnight' performance of chants and recitations, consisting of three rounds of four stotras and sastras each. At the end of each round

¹ This is also the explanation of the term given by Sâyana in his commentary on Tândya Br. XII, 13, 1.

² See this translation, part ii, p. 402, note 1.

³ See part ii, p. 402, note 2, where it is stated that the tenth and last day of the Dasrâtra is an Atyagnishṭoma day, called Avivâkya, i. e. one on which there should be no dispute or quarrel.

(paryāya) libations are offered, followed by the inevitable potations of Soma-liquor. That the performance, indeed, partook largely of the character of a regular nocturnal carousal, may be gathered from the fact, specially mentioned in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, that each of the Hotṛi's offering-formulas is to contain the three words—'andhas,' Soma-plant (or liquor), 'pā,' to drink, and 'mada,' intoxication. Accordingly, one of the formulas used is Rig-veda II, 19, 1 apāyy asyā-andhaso madāya, 'there has been drunk (by Indra, or by us) of this juice for intoxication.' The twelve stotras, each of which is chanted to a different tune, are followed up, at daybreak, by the Sandhi-stotra, or twilight-chant, consisting of six verses (Sāma-veda S. II, 99-104) chanted to the Rathantara-tune. This chant is succeeded by the Hotṛi's recitation of the Āsvina-sastra, a modification of the ordinary 'prātar-anuvāka,' or morning-litany, by which the pressing-day of a Soma-sacrifice is ushered in¹. The Atirātra also requires a special victim, viz. a he-goat offered to Sarasvatī, the goddess of speech. As regards the ceremonies preceding the night-performance, there is again a difference of opinion among ritualists as to whether the shodasi-stotra, with its attendant rites, is, or is not, a necessary element of the Atirātra². Some authorities³, accordingly, distinctly recognise two different kinds of Atirātra,—one with, and the other without, the shodasin. In Kātyāyana's Sūtra, there is no allusion to any difference of opinion on this point, but, in specifying the victims required at the different Soma-sacrifices, he merely remarks (IX, 8, 5) that, 'At the Atirātra there is a fourth victim to Sarasvatī.' This would certainly seem to imply that there are also to be the three preceding victims, including the one to Indra peculiar to the Shodasin. Āśvalāyana (V, 11, 1) also refers incidentally to the shodasin as part of the ¹ See part ii, p. 226 seq. On the present occasion the Prātar-anuvāka is, however, to consist of as many verses as, counting their syllables, would make up a thousand br̥hatī-verses (of thirty-six syllables each). The three sections of the ordinary morning-litany from the body of the Āsvina-sastra which concludes, after sunrise, with verses addressed to Sūrya, the sun.

² Cf. Lāṭy. Sr. VIII, 1, 16; IX, 5, 23 with commentary.

³ Notably Tāṇḍya Br. XX, 1, 1 seq.

Atirâtra, though it is not quite clear from the text of the sūtra whether it is meant to be a necessary or only an optional feature of that sacrifice. The Aitareya Brāhmaṇa (IV, 6), on the other hand, in treating of the Atirâtra, enters on a discussion with the view of showing that the night-performance of that sacrifice is in every respect equal to the preceding day-performance; and accordingly, as the three services of the day-performance include fifteen chants and recitations (viz. the twelve of the Agnishṛoma, and the three Ukthas), so, during the night, the three rounds of in all twelve stotras, together with the sandhi-stotra, here counted as three stotras (triplets), make up the requisite fifteen chants. This Brāhmaṇa, then, does not recognise the shodāsin as part of the Atirâtra, and, indeed, the manuals of the Atirâtra chants which I have consulted make no mention of the shodāsi-stotra, though it is distinctly mentioned there among the chants of the Vāgapeya and the Aptoryāma. The passage in the Aitareya, just referred to, also seems to raise the question as to whether the Atirâtra is really an ekāha, or whether it is not rather an ahīna-sacrifice. On this point also the authorities seem to differ; whilst most writers take the Atirâtra, and the analogous Aptoryāma, to be 'one-day' sacrifices, the Tāndya Brāhmaṇa (XX) and Lāṭy. IX, 5, 6 class them along with the Ahīnas¹; and they may indeed be regarded as intermediate links between the two classes of Soma-sacrifice, inasmuch as, in a continued sacrificial performance, the final recitations of these sacrifices take the place of the opening ceremony of the next day's performance. Such, for instance, is the case in the performance of the Atirâtra as the opening day of the Dvādasāha, or twelve days' period of sacrifice; whilst in the performance of the twelfth and concluding day, which is likewise an Atirâtra, the concluding ceremonies of the latter might be considered in a manner superabundant. It is probably in this sense that Lāty. (IX, 5, 4) calls the overnight performance of the last day of an ahīna (e.g. the Dvādasāha) the yagñapukṣha, or tail of the sacrifice, which is to fall beyond the month for which, from the time of the initiation, the ahīna is to last.

¹ The Aitareya Brāhmaṇa (VI, 18) in discussing the so-called sampāta hymns inserted in continued performances, with the view of establishing a symbolic connection between the several days, curiously explains the term 'ahīna,' not from 'ahas' day, but as meaning 'not defective, where nothing is left out' (a-hīna).

The Aptoryāma-sacrifice represents an amplified form of the Atirātra. It requires the shodasi-stotra and the ceremonies connected with it as a necessary element of its performance; whilst its distinctive feature consists in four additional (atirikta-) stotras and sastras, chanted and recited after the Āsvina-sastra, the concluding recitation of the Atirātra. These four chants are arranged in such a manner that each successive stotra is chanted to a different tune, and in a more advanced form of composition, from the trivṛt (nine-versed) up to the ekavimsa (twenty-one-versed) stoma. In the liturgical manuals, the Aptoryāma, moreover, performs the function of serving as the model for a sacrificial performance with all the 'prishthas'.¹ Though this mode of chanting has been repeatedly referred to in the translation and notes, a few additional remarks on this subject may not be out of place here. When performed in its 'prishtha' form, the stotra is so arranged that a certain sâman (or chanted triplet) is enclosed, as the 'garbha' (embryo), within some other sâman which, as its 'prishtha' (i. e. back, or flanks), is chanted a number of times before and after the verses of the central sâman. The tunes most commonly used for forming the enclosing sâmans of a Prishtha-stotra are the Rathantara and Brihat; and along with these, four others are singled out to make up the six Prishtha-sâmans κατ' ἐξοχήν, viz. the Vairûpa (with the text Sâma-veda II, 212-13), Vairâga (II, 277-9), Sâkvara² (chanted on the Mahânâmnî verses, ¹ From Âsvalâyana's rule (IX, 11, 4), 'If they chant in forming the garbha (i. e. in the 'prishtha' form), let him (the Hotṛi or Hotraka) recite in the same way the stotriyas and anurûpas,' it seems, however, clear that the Aptoryāma may also be performed without the Prishthas.

² The original text of the Sâkvara-sâman is stated (by Sâyana on Aitar. Br. IV, 13; Mahîdhara on Vâg. S. X, 14, &c.) to be Sâma-veda II, 1151-3, 'pro shv asmai puroratham,' but the Sâma-veda Gânas do not seem to give the tune Aitar. Âr. IV), and Raivata¹ sâmans. These six sâmans are employed during the six days' sacrificial period called Prishthya-shadaha, in such a way that one of them, in the order in which they are here enumerated, is used for the first, or Hotri's, Prishtha-stotra on the successive days of that period. In that case, however, these stotras are not performed in the proper 'prishtha' form², i. e. they have no other sâman inserted within them, but they are treated like any other triplet according to the particular stoma, or mode of composition, prescribed for them. But, on the other hand, in the Aptoryâma, when performed 'with all the Prishthas,' not only are a number of stotras chanted in the proper 'prishtha' form, but the 'prishtha' element asserts itself in yet another way, viz. by the appearance of all the six 'Prishtha-sâmans' in the course of the performance of the different stotras, in this way:—the Rathantara-tune forms the middlemost of the seven triplets of which the Madhyandina-pavamâna is composed; with that text, but with the Mahânâmnî verses (ed. Bibl. Ind. II, p. 371). The Tândya Br. XIII, 4 (and comm.), gives minute directions as to the particular pâdas of the first three Mahânâmnî triplets which are singled out as of a sâkvara (potent) nature, and are supposed to form the three stotriyâ verses of the sâkvara-sâman, consisting of seven, six, and five pâdas respectively. The asâkvara pâdas are, however, likewise chanted in their respective places, as is also the additional tenth verse, the five pâdas of which are treated as mere supplementary (or 'filling in') matter.

¹ That is, the Vâravantiya-tune adapted to the 'Revati' verses. The Vâravantiya-tune is named after its original text, Rig-veda I, 27, 1, 'asvam na tvâ vâravantam' (Sâma-veda, ed. Bibl. Ind. I, p. 121). When used as one of the Prishtha-sâmans it is not, however, this, its original text, that is chanted to it, but the verses Rig-veda I, 30, 13-15, 'revatîr naî sadhamâda' (Sâma-veda II, 434-6, ed. vol. iv, p. 56), whence the tune, as adapted to this triplet, is usually called Raivata. The Raivata-sâman, thus, is a signal instance of the use of the term 'sâman' in the sense of a chanted verse or triplet.

² The statement, in part ii, p. 403 note (and repeated in the present part, p. 6, note 2), that, while the Prishtha-stotras of the Abhiplava-shadaha are performed in the ordinary (Agnishôma) way, the Prishthya-shadaha requires their performance in the proper Prishtha form, is not correct. In both kinds of shadaha, the Prishtha-stotras are performed in the ordinary way (viz. in the Agnishôma or Ukthya way, see p. 4 note); but whilst, in the Abhiplava, the Rathantara and Brîhat-sâmans are used for the Hotri's Prishtha-stotra on alternate days, the Prishthya-shadaha requires a different Prishtha-sâman on each of the six days. The two kinds of shadahâs also differ entirely in regard to the sequence of stomas prescribed for the performance of the stotras.

the Bṛihat forms the 'garbha,' or enclosed sâman, of the *Agnishṭoma-sâman*¹; the Vairûpa the 'garbha' of the third, the Vairâga that of the first, the Sâkvara that of the second, and the Raivata that of the fourth, Prishṭha-stotra. It is doubtless this feature which gives to certain Soma-days the name of 'sarvaprishṭha,' or one performed with all the (six) Prishṭhas. Then, as regards the particular stotras that are chanted in the proper 'prishṭha' form, these include not only the four so-called Prishṭha-stotras of the midday service, but also the four Âgya-stotras of the morning service, as well as the Agnishṭoma-sâman and the three Uktha-stotras of the evening service,—in short, all the first fifteen stotras with the exception of the three Pavamâna-stotras. Of the stotras which succeed the Ukthas, on the other hand—viz. the Shodasin, the twelve chants of the three night-rounds, the Sandhi-stotra, and the four Atirikta-stotras—not one is performed in the 'prishṭha' form. How often the several verses of the 'prishṭha-sâman,' and those of the 'garbha' are to be chanted, of course depends, in each case, not only on the particular stoma which has to be performed, but also on the particular mode (vishtuti) prescribed, or selected, for the stoma. Thus, while all the four Âgya-stotras are chanted in the pañkadasa, or fifteen-verses-stoma; the four Prishṭha-stotras are to be performed in the ekavimsa (of twenty-one verses), the katurvimsa (of twenty-four verses), the katuskatvârimsa (of forty-four verses), and the ashṭâkatvârimsa (of forty-eight verses) respectively. Now whenever, as in the case of the pañkadasa and the ekavimsa-stomas, the number of verses is divisible by three, one third of the total number of verses is usually assigned to each of the three parts of the stotra, and distributed over the respective (three or sometimes four) verses of that sâman².

¹ Either the Rathantara or the Bṛihat also forms the 'prishṭha,' or enclosing sâman, of the first Prishṭha-stotra.

² Whenever the stotra is not performed in the 'prishṭha' form, but consists of a single sâman or triplet, the repetitions required to make up the number of verses implied in the respective stoma, are distributed over the three verses of the sâman in such a way that the whole sâman is chanted thrice, each time with various repetitions of the single verses. The usual form in which the

To illustrate this tripartite composition, the Hotri's Prishtha-stotra, performed in the twenty-one-versed stoma, may be taken as an example. For the 'prishtha,' the manuals give the Bṛihat-sâman, on its original text (Sâma-veda II, 159, 160, 'tvâm id dhi havâmahe,' arranged so as to form three verses), though the Rathantara may be used instead¹. For the 'garbha,' or enclosed sâman, on the other hand, the Vairâga-sâman (with its original text, S. V. II, 277-9, 'pibâ somam indra mandatu tvâ') is to be used, a most elaborate tune², with long sets of stobhas, or musical ejaculations, inserted in the text. Of the twenty-one verses, of which the stoma consists, seven verses would thus fall to the share of the 'garbha,' and seven verses to that of the 'prishtha,' as chanted before and after the 'garbha.' Thus, in accordance with the formula set forth in p. xxii, note 2, the three verses (a, b, c) of the Bṛihat would be chanted in the form aaa-bbb-c; then the verses of the Vairâga-sâman (as 'garbha') in the form a-bbb-ccc; and finally again the Bṛihat in the form aaa-b-ccc. Stotras, the total number of verses of which is not divisible by three, of course require a slightly different distribution. Thus, of the third Prishtha-stotra, the stoma of which consists of forty-four verses, the two parts of the 'prishtha' obtain fifteen verses each, whilst the 'garbha' has only fourteen verses for its share.

The Vâgapeya, the last of the seven forms of a complete Soma-sacrifice, occupies an independent position beside the Atirâtra and Aptoryâma, whose special features it does not share. Like them, it starts from the Shodasin, to the characteristic (sixteenth) chant (and recitation) of which it adds one more stotra, the Vâgapeya-sâman, chanted to the Bṛihat-tune, in the Saptadasa (seventeen-versed) stoma, and followed by the recitation of the Vâgapeya-sastra. The Saptadasa-stoma, indeed, is so characteristic of this sacrifice that—as has been set forth at p. 8 note ekaviṃśa is performed may be represented by the formula aaa-bbb-c; a-bbb-ccc; aaa-b-ccc, making together twenty-one verses.

¹ Āval. Sr. IX, 3, 4-5.

² It is given somewhat imperfectly in the ed. Bibl. Ind. V, p. 391.

below—all the preceding chants, from the Bahishpavamāna onward, are remodelled in accordance with it. Besides, over and above the three victims of the Shodasin-sacrifice, the Vāgapeya requires, not only a fourth one, sacred to Sarasvatī, the goddess of speech, but also a set of seventeen victims for Pragāpati, the god of creatures and procreation. As regards other rites peculiar to the Vāgapeya, the most interesting, doubtless, is the chariot-race in which the sacrificer, who must be either of the royal or of the priestly order, is allowed to carry off the palm, and from which this sacrifice perhaps derives its name. Professor Hillebrandt¹, indeed, would claim for this feature of the sacrifice the character of a relic of an old national festival, a kind of Indian Olympic games; and though there is perhaps hardly sufficient evidence to bear out this conjecture, it cannot at least be denied that this feature has a certain popular look about it.

Somewhat peculiar are the relations between the Vāgapeya and the Rāgasūya on the one hand, and between the Vāgapeya and the Br̥haspatisava on the other. In the first chapter of the fifth book, the author of this part of our Brāhmana is at some pains to impress the fact that the Vāgapeya is a ceremony of superior value and import to the Rāgasūya; and hence Kātyāyana (XV, 1, 1-2) has two rules to the effect that the Rāgasūya may be performed by a king who has not yet performed the Vāgapeya. These authorities would thus seem to consider the drinking of the Vāgapeya-cup a more than sufficient equivalent for the Rāgasūya, or inauguration of a king; they do not, however, say that the Rāgasūya must be performed prior to the Vāgapeya, but only maintain that the Vāgapeya cannot be performed after the Rāgasūya. The Rāgasūya, according to the Brāhmana, confers on the sacrificer royal dignity (rāgya), and the Vāgapeya paramount sovereignty (sām-rāgya). It might almost seem as if the relatively loose positions here assigned to the Rāgasūya were entirely owing to the fact that it is a purely Kshatriya ceremony to which the

¹ Vedische Mythologie, p. 247.

Brāhmaṇa has no right, whilst the Vāgapeya may be performed by Brāhmaṇas as well as Kshatriyas. But on whatever grounds this appreciation of the two ceremonies may be based, it certainly goes right in the face of the rule laid down by Āsvalāyana (IX, 9, 19) that, 'after performing the Vāgapeya, a king may perform the Rāgasūya, and a Brāhmaṇa the Bṛihaspatisava.' With this rule would seem to accord the relative value assigned to the two ceremonies in the Taittiriya Saṃhitā (V, 6, 2, 1) and Brāhmaṇa (II, 7, 6, 1), according to which the Vāgapeya is a 'samrātsava,' or consecration to the dignity of a paramount sovereign, while the Rāgasūya is called a 'varuṇasava,' i.e., according to Sāyana, a consecration to the universal sway wielded by Varuṇa¹. In much the same sense we have doubtless to understand the rule in which Kātyāyana defines the object of the Vāgapeya (VIII, 11, 1), viz. 'Whomsoever the Brāhmaṇas and kings (or nobles) may place at their head, let him perform the Vāgapeya.' All these authorities, with the exception of the Satapatha-Brāhmaṇa and Kātyāyana, are thus agreed in making the Vāgapeya a preliminary ceremony, performed by a Brāhmaṇa who is raised to the dignity of a Purohita, or head-priest (so to speak, a minister of worship, and court-priest), or by a king who is elected paramount sovereign by a number of petty rāgas; this sacrifice being in due time followed by the respective installation and consecration ceremony, viz. the Bṛihaspatisava, in the case of the Purohita; and the Rāgasūya, in that of the king. In regard to the Bṛihaspatisava, which these authorities place on an equality with the Rāgasūya, our Brāhmaṇa finds itself in a somewhat awkward position, and it gets out of its difficulty (V, 2, 1, 19) by simply identifying the Bṛihaspatisava with the Vāgapeya, and making the Vāgapeya itself to be 'the consecration of Bṛihaspati;' and Kātyāyana (XIV, 1, 2) compromises matters by combining the two ceremonies in this way that he who performs the Vāgapeya is to perform the Bṛihaspatisava for a fortnight before and after the Vāgapeya.

¹ Cf. Sāṅkh. Sr. XV, 13, 4, 'for it is Varuṇa whom they consecrate.'

The Rāgasūya, or inauguration of a king, is a complex ceremony which, according to the Srauta-sūtras, consists of a long succession of sacrificial performances, spread over a period of upwards of two years. It includes seven distinct Soma-sacrifices, viz. 1, the Pavitra, an Agnishōma serving as the opening sacrifice, and followed, after an interval of a year (during which the seasonal sacrifices have to be performed), by 2, the Abhishekanīya, an Ukthya-sacrifice, being the consecration (or anointing) ceremony. Then follows 3, the Dasapeya, or 'drink of ten,' an Agnishōma, so-called because ten priests take part in drinking the Soma-liquor contained in each of the ten cups. After another year's interval¹, during which monthly 'offerings to the beams (i.e. the months)' are made, takes place 4, the Kesavapanīya, or hair-cutting ceremony, an Atirātra-sacrifice; followed, after a month or fortnight, by 5, and 6, the Vyushī-dvirātra, or two nights' ceremony of the dawning, consisting of an Agnishōma and an Atirātra; and finally 7, the Kshatra-dhṛiti, or 'the wielding of the (royal) power,' an Agnishōma performed a month later. The round of ceremonies concludes with the Sautrāmanī, an ishī the object of which is to make amends for any excess committed in the consumption of Soma-liquor.

The fifth book completes the dogmatic discussion of the ordinary circle of sacrifices, some less common, or altogether obsolete, ceremonies, such as the Asvamedha (horse-sacrifice), Purushamedha (human sacrifice), Sarvamedha (sacrifice for universal rule), being dealt with, by way of supplement, in the thirteenth book.

With the sixth Kānda, we enter on the detailed explanation of the Agnikayana, or building of the fire-altar, a very solemn ceremony which would seem originally to have stood apart from, if not in actual opposition to, the ordinary sacrificial system, but which, in the end, apparently by some ecclesiastical compromise, was added on to the Soma ritual as an important, though not indispensable, element of it. The avowed object of this ceremony is the super-exaltation of Agni, the Fire, who, in the elaborate cosmogenic legend with which this section begins, is identified with Pragâpati, the lord of Generation, and the source of life in the world. As the present volume contains, however, only a portion of the Agnikâyana ritual, any further remarks on this subject may be reserved for a future occasion.

¹ The Brāhmaṇa (V, 5, 2, 2), however, would rather seem to dispense with this interval by combining the twelve oblations so as to form two sets of six each.

Since the time when this volume went to press, the literature of the Soma myth has been enriched by the appearance of an important book, the first volume of Professor A. Hillebrandt's Vedische Mythologie, dealing with Soma and cognate gods. As it is impossible for me here to enter into a detailed discussion of the numerous points raised in the work, I must content myself for the present with the remark that I believe Professor Hillebrandt to have fully established the main point of his position, viz. the identity of Soma with the Moon in early Vedic mythology.

SATAPATHA-BRÂHMANA.

FIFTH KÂNDĀ.

A. THE VÂGAPEYA.

FIRST ADHYÂYA. FIRST BRÂHMANA.

1. Once upon a time the gods and the Asuras, both of them sprung from Pragâpati, strove together. And the Asuras, even through arrogance, thinking, 'Unto whom, forsooth, should we make offering?' went on offering into their own mouths. They came to naught, even through arrogance: wherefore let no one be arrogant, for verily arrogance is the cause¹ of ruin.

2. But the gods went on making offerings unto one another. Pragâpati gave himself up to them: thus the sacrifice² became theirs; and indeed the sacrifice is the food of the gods³.

3. They then spake, 'To which of us shall this⁴ belong?' They did not agree together, saying,

¹ Lit. 'the mouth,' i.e. the opening or beginning, of ruin. The St. Petersburg Dict. compares Prov. xvi. 18: 'Pride goeth before destruction, and an haughty spirit before a fall.'

² Pragâpati (the lord of creatures or generation) is both the sacrifice and the year (time); see III, 2, 2, 4.

³ See II, 4, 2, 1. To them (the gods) he (Pragâpati) said, 'The sacrifice (shall be) your food, immortality your sustenance (ûrg), and the sun your light!'

⁴ For the neuter idam—hardly here 'this universe,' or 'vâ-

‘To me! to me!’ Not being agreed, they said, ‘Let us run a race for it: whichever of us shall win, to him it shall belong!’—‘So be it!’ so they ran a race for it.

4. Then Bṛihaspati hastened up to Savitri for his impulsion¹,—Savitri being the impeller (prasavitri) among the gods—saying, ‘Impel this for me, (so that) impelled by thee, I may win this!’ Then Savitri, as the impeller, impelled it for him, and impelled by Savitri, he won: he became everything here, he won everything here; for he won Pragâpati, and Pragâpati (the lord of creatures and procreation) indeed is everything here. By offering therewith he (Bṛihaspati) ascended to that upper region. Therefore who so knoweth, and who so knoweth not,—they say, ‘That upper region belongeth to Bṛihaspati.’

5. Thus they who of old used to offer the Vâgapeya, ascended to that upper region. From there Aupâvi Gânasruteya descended again: thenceforward (all men) descend again.

gapeyam,’ but rather ‘this thing, it’—the Kânva text reads ayam ‘he,’ i.e. Pragâpati, or the sacrifice (yagña, masc.); cf. note on V, 1, 4, 15.

¹ For want of a simpler and more homely set of terms for the derivatives of the verb sû ‘to animate’ here used, those used in the preceding volumes are here generally adhered to, though, as there, somewhat reluctantly. The simple ‘to bless, blessing, &c.’ might sometimes fit quite well, though no doubt they imply an idea altogether foreign to the etymological meaning of this verb, and could not possibly be used, as is the case here, of the animating influence of the sun. Sometimes ‘to speed’ has been chosen, where the etymological connection with Savitri is not insisted upon; while in other passages ‘to consecrate, consecration, &c.’ might probably come nearer to the meaning of the original. Cp. Delbrück, Altindische Syntax, p. 256.

6. Indra offered that (Vāga-peya),—he became everything here, he won everything here; for he won Pragâpati, and Pragâpati is everything here: by offering therewith he ascended to that upper region.

7. Thus they who of old used to offer the Vāga-peya, ascended to that upper region. From there Aupâvi Gânasruteya descended again: thenceforward (all men) descend again.

8. And whosoever offers the Vāga-peya, he becomes everything here, he wins everything here; for he wins Pragâpati, and Pragâpati indeed is everything here.

9. Here now they say, 'One must not offer the Vāga-peya; for he who offers the Vāga-peya wins everything here,—for he wins Pragâpati, and Pragâpati is everything here,—he leaves nothing remaining here: his people (or offspring) is like to become worse (off).'

10. Let him none the less sacrifice: whatever (priests) thus know that sacrifice properly, in respect of the Rik, the Yagus, and the Sâman, and such as are proficient, let them assist him in offering it; for verily this is the perfection of that sacrifice, when wise (priests) assist him in offering it: let him therefore sacrifice by all means.

11. Now truly this (the Vāga-peya) is the Brâhmaṇa's own sacrifice, inasmuch as Bṛihaspati (the lord of prayer and devotion) performed it; for Bṛihaspati is the Brahman (priesthood, or priestly dignity), and the Brâhmaṇa is the Brahman. And it is also that of the Râganya, inasmuch as Indra performed it; for Indra is the Kshatra (nobility, or ruling power), and the Râganya is the Kshatra.

12. To the king (râgan) doubtless belongs the Râgasûya ; for by offering the Râgasûya he becomes king ; and unsuited for kingship is the Brâhmaṇa. And, moreover, the Râgasûya is the lower, and the Vâgapeya the higher (sacrifice).

13. For by offering the *Râgasûya*¹ he becomes king, and by the Vâgapeya (he becomes) emperor (samrâg) ; and the office of king is the lower, and that of emperor the higher : a king might indeed wish to become emperor, for the office of king is the lower, and that of emperor the higher ; but the emperor would not wish to become king, for the office of king is the lower, and that of emperor the higher.

14. Thus that (king) who, by performing the Vâgapeya, becomes emperor, possesses himself of everything here. Previously to each performance (of an *ishî*²) he offers that oblation to Savitri (the sun), with the text, 'O divine Savitri, impel (prosper) the sacrifice, impel Pragâpati for his portion !'

¹ Kâty. Sr. XV, 1, 1-2, lays down the rule that the Râgasûya is to be performed by a king who has not yet performed the Vâgapeya. Ârval. Sr. IX, 9, 19, on the other hand, rules : 'After performing it (the Vâgapeya) let a king perform the Râgasûya, a Brâhmaṇa the Brihaspati-sava' (cf. V, 2, 1, 19). See also Kâty. XIV, 1, 2 seq. Cf. Lâty. Sr. VIII, 11, 1 seq.

² During the bright fortnights (of the waxing moon) preceding and following the Vâgapeya ceremony proper, the sacrificer has to perform a number of so-called pariyagñas ('surrounding or enclosing sacrifices') consisting of one-day Soma-sacrifices of different kinds, each of which is preceded by a special dîkshâ, or initiation ceremony (cf. III, 1, 2, 1 seq. ; Lâty. Sr. VIII, 11, 2). It is to the ishîs (dîkshamîyeshî, prâyanîyeshî) of these pariyagñas that the above injunction regarding the performance of the Sâvitri âhuti refers.

15. And even as then Bṛihaspati hasted up to Savitri for his impulsion—Savitri being the impeller among the gods—saying, ‘Impel this for me, (so that) impelled by thee I may win it!’ and Savitri, as the impeller, impelled it for him; and impelled by Savitri he won it; even so does this (sacrificing king) now haste up to Savitri for his impulsion—Savitri being the impeller among the gods—saying, ‘Impel this for me: may I win it, impelled by thee!’ and Savitri, as the impeller, impels it for him, and he wins it impelled by Savitri.

16. Wherefore he says (Vâg. S. IX, 1), ‘God Savitri, speed the sacrifice, speed the lord of sacrifice unto his portion! May the heavenly, thought-cleansing Gandharva cleanse our thought! May the Lord of Speech render our meat palatable, hail!’ For the Lord of Speech is Pragâpati, and meat means food: ‘May Pragâpati this day make palatable this our food!’ thus he thereby says. This same oblation he offers till the day before the Soma-feast, for thus that performance of his has been commenced; and he (Savitri, the Sun) becomes serene during that sacrifice.

SECOND BRĀHMANA.

1. He draws the *Amsu*¹ (graha), just for completeness’ sake, for it is therefore that he draws the Amsu. After that he draws those recognised Agnishôma cups¹ up to the Âgrayana.

¹ Regarding this cup, u. libation (consisting, it would seem, of imperfectly pressed Soma-plants in water), see part ii, p. 424, note 1. Here, and in the sequel, the author only refers to those points of ceremonial in which the performance differs from that of the ordinary Agnishoma sacrifice, as described in part ii.

2. He then draws the *Prishthya*²: and whatever the gods (Agni, Indra, and Sûrya) won by them, even that he wins by them.

3. He then draws the Shodasin: and whatever Indra won thereby, even that he (the sacrificer) wins thereby.

4. He then draws those five Vâgapeya cups (for Indra; the first) with the text (V. S. IX, 2), 'Thee, the firm-seated, the man-seated, the mind-seated! Thou art taken with a support³: I take thee, agreeable to Indra! This is thy womb³ (i. e. thy home): thee, most agreeable to Indra!' therewith he deposits it; for of these worlds this one, to wit the earth, is the firm one : this same world he thereby wins.

¹ Viz. the Upâmsu and Antaryâma; the Aindravâyava, Maitrâvaruna and Âsvina; the Sukra and Manthin; and the Âgrayana. Part ii, pp. 256 seq.

² That is, the three Atigrâhyas (part ii, p. 402, note 2), required for the Prishtha-stotras at the midday feast, when performed in their proper 'prishtha' form, as they are at the Prishthya shadaha, and at a Virvagit-ekâha with all the Prishthas. See IV, 5, 4, 14. The authorities of the Black Yagur adopt a somewhat different arrangement. The Vâgapeya cups are likewise called by them Atigrâhyas (Taitt. S. I, 7, 12; T. B. I, 3, 9), and these are apparently drawn by them immediately after the second of the ordinary three Atigrâhyas, the one belonging to Indra (T. S. vol. i, p. 996,—but see ib. p. 1055, where it is stated that they are drawn immediately after the Âgrayana,—that is, probably, if the ordinary Atigrâhyas are not required). Then follows (the third ordinary Atigrâhya?), then the Shodasin, and thereupon the seventeen cups for Pragâpati.—Sâyana remarks on our passage,—teshâm (atigrâhyânâm) prakritigatâ tritvasamkhyai va sâkhântaravat samkhyântarânupadesât. MS. I. O. 657.

³ For an explanation of these notions, see part ii, p. 260, notes 1 and 2.

5. [The second with,] 'Thee, the water-seated, the ghee-seated, the ether-seated! Thou art taken with a support: I take thee, agreeable to Indra! This is thy womb: thee most agreeable to Indra!' therewith he deposits it; for among these worlds that ether (mentioned in the formula) is this air: he thereby wins this air-world.

6. [The third with,] 'Thee, the earth-seated, the air-seated, the sky-seated, the god-seated, the heaven-seated! Thou art taken with a support: I take thee, agreeable to Indra! This is thy womb: thee, most agreeable to Indra!' therewith he deposits it; for god-seated, heaven-seated indeed is yonder world of the gods: the world of the gods he thereby wins.

7. [The fourth with V. S. IX, 3,] 'The waters' invigorating essence, being contained in the sun,—that which is the essence of the waters' essence, that, the most excellent, I take for you! Thou art taken with a support: I take thee, agreeable to Indra! This is thy womb: thee, most agreeable to Indra!' therewith he deposits it; for the waters' essence is he that blows (or purifies) yonder (the wind), and he is contained in the sun, he blows from the sun: that same essence he thereby wins.

8. [The fifth with IX, 4,] 'Ye cups, of strengthening libations, inspiring the sage with thought,—I have gathered together the pith and sap of you, the handleless! Thou art taken with a support: thee, agreeable to Indra! This is thy womb: thee, most agreeable to Indra!' therewith he deposits it;—pith means essence : it is the essence he thereby wins.

9. These, then, are five Vâgapeya cups he draws; for he who offers the Vâgapeya wins Pragâpati; and Pragâpati is the year, and there are five seasons in the year,—he thus wins Pragâpati : therefore he draws five Vâgapeya cups.

10. He (the Adhvaryu) then draws seventeen (other) cups of Soma, and (the Neshtri) seventeen cups of Surâ (spirituous liquor), for to Pragâpati belong these two (saps of) plants, to wit the Soma and the Surâ ;—and of these two the Soma is truth, prosperity, light; and the Surâ untruth, misery, darkness : both these (saps of) plants he thereby wins; for he who offers the Vâgapeya wins everything here, since he wins Pragâpati, and Pragâpati indeed is everything here.

11. Now as to why he draws seventeen cups of Soma ;—Pragâpati is seventeenfold, Pragâpati is the sacrifice¹ : as great as the sacrifice is, as great as is its measure, with that much he thus wins its truth, its prosperity, its light.

¹ See I, 5, 2, 17, where the principal formulas used in making oblations are computed as consisting together of seventeen syllables. Pañk. Br. 18, 6 insists especially on the symbolic identity of Pragâpati and the Vâgapeya on the double ground that the Vâgapeya consists of seventeen stotras, and has for its characteristic mode of chanting the Saptadâsa-stoma, or seventeen-versed hymn. That this is indeed so will appear from a glance at the chief chants. The Bahishpavamâna-stotra, which in the ordinary Agnishoma is chanted in the trivrit-stoma, consisting of three triplets, or nine verses (see part ii, p. 310), is at the Vâgapeya made to consist of seventeen verses, by the insertion of eight verses (S.V. II, 180-82; 186-90) between the second and third triplets. Again, the Mâdhyandina-pavamâna, ordinarily chanted in fifteen verses (part ii, p. 333), here consists of seventeen, viz. II, 105-7 (sung twice in two tunes=six verses); II, 663 (one verse); II, 663-4 (sung as triplet, in two tunes=six verses); II, 665 (one verse); II, 821-23

12. And why he draws seventeen cups of Surâ ;— Pragâpati is seventeenfold, Pragâpati is the sacrifice : as great as the sacrifice is, as great as is its measure, with that much he thus wins its untruth, its misery, its darkness.

13. These two amount to thirty-four cups ; for there are thirty-three gods, and Pragâpati is the thirty-fourth : he thus wins Pragâpati.

14. Now when he buys the king (Soma), he at the same time buys for a piece of lead the Parisrut (immature spirituous liquor) from a long-haired man near by towards the south. For a long-haired man is neither man nor woman ; for, being a male, he is not a woman ; and being long-haired (a eunuch), he is not a man. And that lead is neither iron nor gold ; and the Parisrut-liquor is neither Soma nor Surâ¹ : this is why he buys the Parisrut for a piece of lead from a long-haired man.

15. And on the preceding day they prepare two (three verses)—making together seventeen verses. Similarly, the Ārbhava-pavamāna (chanted at the Agnishōma also in the Saptadāsa-stoma, cf. part ii, p. 315 ; but here with modifications) consists of II, 165-7 (sung twice in two tunes=six verses) ; II, 42, 44 (two verses) ; II, 47-9 (in two tunes=six verses) ; II, 720-23 (three verses)—making together seventeen verses. For the similarly constructed Vāgapeya hymn see page 11, note 1. See also Lāty. Sr. VIII, 11, 15 seq., where the number of officiating priests, as well as that of the various sacrificial fees, is fixed at seventeen. Similarly, Āsv. Sr. IX, 9, 2-3 says that there are either to be seventeen dīkshās, or the whole ceremony is to be performed in seventeen days.

¹ According to Sāyana, the difference between surâ and parisrut would seem to be that the former beverage is prepared from mature shoots (of rice, &c.), and the latter from such as are not quite ripe.

earth-mounds¹, the one in front of the axle, and the other behind the axle: 'Lest we should deposit together the cups of Soma, and the cups of Surâ,'—this is why, on the preceding day, they prepare two mounds, one in front, and the other behind the axle.

16. Now, when they take the Vasatvart water² (into the havirdhâna shed) by the front door, the Neshtri takes in the Parisrut-liquor by the back door. From the south they bring in the drinking vessels. The Adhvaryu, seated in front of the axle, with his face towards the west, draws the cups of Soma; and the Neshtri, seated behind the axle, with his face towards the east, draws the cups of Surâ. The Adhvaryu draws a cup of Soma, the Neshtri a cup of Surâ; the Adhvaryu draws a cup of Soma, the Neshtri a cup of Surâ: in this way they draw them alternately.

17. Neither does the Adhvaryu hold the Soma-cup beyond the axle towards the back, nor the Neshtri the Surâ-cup beyond the axle towards the front, thinking, 'Lest we should confound light and darkness!'

18. The Adhvaryu holds the Soma-cup just over the axle, and the Neshtri the Surâ-cup just below the axle, with (V. S. IX, 4), 'United ye are: unite me with happiness!' Thinking, 'Lest we should say "evil",' they withdraw them again, with, 'Disunited ye are: disunite me from evil!' Even as one might tear a single reed from a clump of reed-grass, so do they thereby tear him from out of all evil: there is not in him so much sin as the point of a grass-blade. They deposit the two (cups each time on the mounds).

¹ The mounds (khara) thrown up in the havirdhâna cart-shed, are used for placing the cups of Soma (and Surâ) after they are drawn, until they are used for the libations. See the plan of the sacrificial ground at the end of part ii; only that on the present occasion there is to be a second mound, for the placing of the Surâ-cups, under or just behind the axle of the southern Soma-cart (in the place where the Nârâmsa cups to the Fathers were temporarily deposited at the Agnishoma; see III, 6, 2, 25 with note). On this occasion a small door is also made in the southern wall of the cart-shed, by breaking through the hurdle.

² Part ii, p. 222 seq.

19. Thereupon the Adhvaryu draws the Madhugraha (honey-cup) in a golden vessel, and deposits it in the middle of the Soma-grahas. He then draws the Ukthya, then the Dhruva. And when, at the last chant (of the evening press feast¹), he has poured those Soma-grahas one by one into the cups of the officiating priests, they make offering and drink them. At the midday-pressing it is told regarding the honey-cup, and the cups of Surâ: thereof then ².

THIRD BRÂHMANA.

1. At the Agnishṭoma (Sâman³) he seizes a (victim) for Agni, for the Agnishṭoma (i. e. 'Agni's

¹ The last chant (at the evening feast) of the Vâgapeya sacrifice is the so-called Vâgapeya-sâman, or Brîhat-stotra (Sâmanav. II, 975-7), chanted, to the Brîhat tune, in the Saptadâsa-stoma; the three verses being, by repetitions, raised to the number of seventeen.—'When he has poured . . . they offer it:' this is apparently a case of the absolute construction of the gerund in '-ya,' cf. Delbrück, Altindische Syntax, p. 108.

² On these cups, or libations, see V, 1, 5, 28.

³ Of the seven fundamental forms (samsthâ) of Soma-sacrifice, each higher, or more complex, form is obtained by some additional ceremony, or ceremonies, being added on to one of the simpler forms of sacrifice. In the present paragraph, the author briefly reviews the lower forms of Soma-sacrifice, contained in the Vâga-praise¹) is Agni: he thereby wins Agni. For the Ukthas² he seizes one for Indra and Agni; for the hymns (uktha) relate to Indra and Agni³: the hymns he thereby wins. For the Shodasin he seizes one for Indra; for the Shodasin is Indra: the Shodasin (Indra) he thereby wins.

2. For the seventeenth (or seventeenfold) stotra⁴ he seizes one for Sarasvatī: thereby, while there is no over-night performance⁵, it is yet made like the night (performance); for he who offers the Vāgapeya, with the view of enumerating the victims to be slaughtered at its performance; viz. the Agnishōma with twelve chants and one victim; the Ukthya with fifteen stotras and two victims; and the Shodasin with sixteen chants and three victims. For further particulars, see part ii, p. 397, note 2.

¹ The Agnishōma-sāman, the last (twelfth) and distinctive stotra of the Agnishōma sacrifice, is in praise of Agni (see part ii, p. 368, note 2). At the Vāgapeya the ordinary (yagnāyagnīya) hymn is not chanted, but S.V. II, 973-4, sung to the Vāravantīya tune (Calc. ed., vol. v, p. 144), takes its place. Pañk. Br. 18, 6, 16.

² The three Uktha stotras (chants) and sastras (recitations) constitute the distinctive element of the Ukthya sacrifice; as the Shodasi-stotra and sastra (part ii, p. 401, note 3; p. 402, note 1) constitute that of the Shodasin sacrifice.

³ On the important place assigned to these two deities in the traditional arrangement of the Rigveda-saṃhitā, see the introduction to part i, p. xvi.

⁴ That is the Vāgapeya-sāman, see note 1, p. 11.

⁵ The author here alludes to another form of Soma-sacrifice, not contained in the Vāgapeya, viz. the Atirātra, which is obtained by following up the Shodasin (with its sixteen chants) with the so-called rātri-paryāyāḥ, or night-rounds, consisting of three rounds of four chants each, or together twelve chants. These are succeeded, at day-break, by the Sandhi-stotra (or twilight chants), consisting of three chants. Although this night performance does not take place on the present occasion—the Vāgapeya-sāman taking its place—the author claims for this form of sacrifice also the moral benefits which would accrue to the sacrificer from the Atirātra, for the reason that the same victim (a he-goat for Sarasvatī) is offered on both occasions.

peya wins Pragâpati, and Pragâpati is the year : by that (victim) for Sarasvatî he now wins the night : hence, while there is no night performance, it is made like the night.

3. Thereupon he seizes a spotted sterile cow for the Victorious Maruts ; for the spotted sterile cow is this (earth) : whatever food, rooted and rootless, is here established on her, thereby she is a spotted cow. Now, he who offers the Vâgapeya wins food, for vâga-peya¹ doubtless means the same as anna-peya (food and drink) ; and the Maruts are the peasants, and the peasants are food (for the noble). 'To the Victorious (Maruts) !' he says, even for the sake of victory. It is difficult to obtain an invitory and offering prayer containing the word 'victorious : ' if he should be unable to obtain such as contain the word 'victorious,' any other two verses to the Maruts will do. Difficult to obtain also is a spotted sterile cow : if he cannot obtain a spotted sterile cow, any other sterile cow will do.

4. The course of procedure thereof (is as follows). When the Hotri recites after the Mâhendra libation, then let them proceed with (the offering of) her omentum, for that, the Mâhendra², is Indra's special (nishkevalya) libation ; and his also are the Nishkevalya-stotra and Nishkevalya-sastra. Now the sacrificer is Indra : thus he thereby puts strength into the sacrificer in the very middle (of the sacri-fiſce): that is why they ſhould proceed with her omentum at that particular time.

¹ In Taitt. Br. I, 3, 2, 3, on the other hand, vâgapeya (which doubtless means 'drink of strength') is explained first by vâgâpya, 'that through which the gods wished to obtain (aipsan) strength (vâgam),' and then by 'drink of strength,' i.e. Soma 'by drinking (pîtvâ) which one becomes strong (vâgin).'

² For this libation, and the accompanying Nishkevalya-sastra, at the midday Soma-feast, see part ii, pp. 338, 339, note 2.

5. They cook the portions¹ in two lots. Of the one lot thereof, after making an 'under-layer' of ghee (clarified butter) in the guhû ſpoon, he makes two cuttings from each (portion), baſtes them once, and replenishes with ghee (the empty places of) the cuttings. Thereupon he makes one cutting from each into the upabhrîit ſpoon, baſtes them twice, but does not replenish (the places of) the cuttings. Now, when of the one lot (of portions) he makes two cuttings from each, thereby that (ſterile cow) becomes whole; and when he proceeds with thoſe (portions), thereby he wins the divine race. He then preſents the (other) half to the human kind: and thereby he wins the human kind (people, viſ).

6. But let him not do it in this wiſe; for verily he who departs from the path of the ſacrifice, ſtumbles; and he who does it in this wiſe certainly departs from the path of the ſacrifice. Hence when they proceed with the omenta of the other victims, only then let them proceed with the omentum of that (cow). They cook the portions in one lot, and do not preſent any to the human kind.

7. He then ſeizes ſeventeen victims for Pragâpati. They are all hornleſs, all dark-grey², all (uncaſtrated) males; for he who offers the Vâga-peya, wins Pragâpati; but Pragâpati is food, and the victim (cattle) is food: he thus wins Pragâpati. And Pragâpati is Soma, and the victim is the viſible

¹ For particulars regarding the meat portions, ſee part ii, p. 204 ſeq.

² Or, black and white (sukla-kriſhna-varna), as 'syâma' is explained by Sâyana.

Soma : he thus wins the visible Pragâpati. There are seventeen (victims), because Pragâpati is seventeenfold : he thus wins Pragâpati.

8. Now, they are all hornless ;—for man is nearest to Pragâpati, and he is hornless, unhorned ; and Pragâpati also is hornless, unhorned ; and these (victims) belong to Pragâpati : therefore they are all hornless.

9. They are all dark-grey. Now, the dark-grey has two forms, the light hair and the black ; and a couple means a productive pair, and Pragâpati (the lord of generation) represents productiveness, and those (victims) belong to Pragâpati : therefore they are all dark-grey.

10. They are all males ;—for the male means productiveness, and Pragâpati represents productiveness : hence they are all males. Difficult to obtain are victims with these perfections : if he cannot obtain them (all) with these perfections, even some with these perfections will do ; for verily Pragâpati is everything here.

11. Now, some seize the last (victim) for Vâç (Speech), thinking, 'If there be anything beyond Pragâpati, that is Speech : we thus win Speech.' But let him not do it in this wise ; for Pragâpati is everything here,—these worlds and everything there is ;—whatever speech speaks in these worlds, that speech he wins : therefore he need not heed this.

12. The course of procedure regarding these (victims is as follows). When the Maitrâvaruṇa recites after the Vâmadevya¹, let them then proceed with their omenta ; for the Vâmadevya means productiveness, and Pragâpati means productiveness, and these (victims) belong to Pragâpati : therefore let them proceed with their omenta at that time.

¹ The Vâmadevya-sâman (Sâmv. II, 32-34) is the second Prishṭha-stotra, after the chanting of which, at the midday feast,

13. And (when) the after-offerings have been performed, and the spoons have not yet been shifted (separated)¹, then they proceed with the (chief) oblations of those (victims). That (point in the performance) is the end, and Pragâpati is the end : thus he wins Pragâpati at the very end. But were he to proceed therewith sooner, it would be just as if a man had already gone the way he still intends to go,—and where would he be after that²?—there-the first assistant of the Hotri, the Maitrâvaruṇa, has to recite his (the second) Nishkevalya-sastra ; see part ii, p. 325, note 2 ; p. 339, note 2.—As regards the Hotri's Prishtha-stotra, the Rathantara-sâman (S. V. II, 30, 31) is used for it ; while the Abhîvarta tune (S. V. ed. Bibl. Ind. III, p. 93) is employed in the chanting of the Brahma-sâman (S. V. II, 35, 36 ; see part ii, p. 434, note 1) instead of the ordinary Naudhasa tune. Pañk. Br. 18, 6, 11-14.

¹ On this ceremony with which the concluding rites of the ishṭi commence, see I, 8, 3, 1 seq.

² Or possibly, what would then become of him ? The author's reasoning seems to be that, if the sacrificer were to offer any of the chief oblations at an earlier point in the performance, he would thereby anticipate the results he wants to obtain from the whole performance,—or, so to speak, he would then already reach the goal for the attainment of which the subsequent oblations are likewise intended. For the same reason the offering of the omentum of the sterile cow, previously to and independently of the omenta of the other victims, was discountenanced in paragraph 6. Our present passage is interpreted rather differently by Professor Delbrück in his Altindische Syntax, p. 550 :—Wenn er vorher damit vorginge, so wäre das so, als ob er, nach Betretung des Pfades, den er zu betreten beabsichtigt, wo? wäre (d. h. in's Unglück gerieth): 'Were he to proceed therewith sooner, it would be just as if, after entering on the path he intends to enter upon, he would be where? (i. e. would get into trouble).'

fore they proceed with their (chief) oblations at that time.

14. But let him not do it in this wise ; for he who departs from the path of the sacrifice stumbles ; and he who does it in this wise certainly departs from the path of the sacrifice. Hence whenever they proceed with the omenta of the other victims, let them at the same time proceed with the omenta of these ; and whenever they proceed with the (chief) oblations of the other victims, let them at the same time proceed with the oblations of these. There is but one invitatory prayer, and one offering prayer ; for (these offerings) belong to one deity. He says (to the Maitrāvaruṇa), ' To Pragâpati '—saying this (name) in a low voice—' recite the invitatory prayer for the offering of the bucks ! '—' To Pragâpati '—saying this in a low voice—' urge the ready-standing offering of the bucks ! ' and as the Vashaḥ is uttered, he makes the offering.

FOURTH BRĀHMANA.

1. At the midday Soma-feast he consecrates (the Sacrificer) by sprinkling ; and at the midday Soma-feast they run a race ; for, verily, Pragâpati is that sacrifice¹ which is here performed, and from which these creatures have been produced,—and indeed, they are even now produced after this one : thus he thereby wins Pragâpati in the very centre (of the sacrifice).

2. The Mâhendra cup being not yet drawn,—for that, the Mâhendra, is Indra's special (nishkevalya) cup, and so also are his that Nishkevalya-stotra and Nishkevalya-sastra; and the Sacrificer is Indra: thus he consecrates him at his own dwelling-place. Hence, the Mâhendra cup being not yet drawn,—

¹ In the original, ' pragâpatiḥ ' is the predicate, not the subject, of the sentence ; but considerations of construction seem to render the change desirable in English.

3. He takes down the chariot¹, with (Vâg. S. IX, 5), 'Thou art Indra's thunderbolt;' for the chariot is indeed a thunderbolt, and the sacrificer is Indra: therefore he says, 'Thou art Indra's thunderbolt;'— 'a winner of wealth,' for the chariot is indeed a winner of wealth;— 'May this one win wealth by thee!'—wealth means food: 'may this one gain food by thee,' is what he thereby says.

4. That chariot, seized by the pole, he turns (from left to right) so as to make it stand inside the vedi², with, 'In the winning of wealth, the great Mother'—wealth means food; 'in the winning of food, the great Mother.'—is what he thereby says;— 'Aditi by name, we praise with speech;' now Aditi is this earth: therefore he says, 'Aditi by name, we praise with speech,'— 'whereon all this being hath settled;' for indeed thereon all being here is settled;— 'thereon may the divine Savitri prosper our stay!' whereby he means to say, 'thereon may the divine Savitri prosper our Sacrificer!'

5. He then sprinkles the horses with water, either when being led down to be watered, or when brought up after being watered. Now in the beginning the horse was produced from the water; while being produced from the water, it was produced incomplete, for it was indeed produced incomplete: hence it does not stand on all its feet, but it stands lifting one foot on each side. Thus what then was left behind of it in the water, therewith he now completes it, and makes it whole: therefore he sprinkles the horses with water, either when being led down to be watered, or when brought up after being watered.

¹ The Adhvaryu takes it down from the vâhana, or car-stand.

² It is to be placed in the north-eastern part of the vedi, so as to be ready to start on the race northwards along the space between the kâtvâla (or pit) and the utkara (heap of rubbish); the horses thus being close to where the Brahman will have to mount a cart-wheel put up on the utkara (V, 1, 5, 2).

6. He sprinkles them, with (Vāg. S. IX, 6), 'Within the waters is ambrosia, in the waters is medicine: at the praises of the waters may ye wax strong, ye horses!' And with this also, 'O divine waters, what rushing, high-peaked, wealth-winning wave ye have, therewith may this one win wealth!' wealth is food: he thus says, 'May he thereby gain food!'

7. He then yokes (the team of) the chariot. The right horse he yokes (puts to) first; for in human (practice) they indeed put to the left horse first, but with the gods in this way.

8. He yokes it, with (Vāg. S. IX, 7), 'Either the wind, or thought—' for there is nothing swifter than the wind, and nothing swifter than thought: therefore he says, 'Either the wind, or thought;'
—'(or) the seven and twenty Gandharvas¹,

¹ Professor Weber (in his essay on the Nakshatras, II, 278; Abhandl. of Berlin Academy, 1861) takes this passage (= Taitt. S. I, 7, 7, 2; Kāṇḍaka 13, 14; Maitr. S. I, 11, 1) to contain the first allusion to the system of Nakshatras, or lunar mansions marking the daily stations occupied by the moon (masc.) during his circuit round the heavens.—In the ritual of the Black Yagus (Taitt. S.

they yoked the horse at first;’ for the Gandharvas indeed yoked the horse at first: ‘May they who yoked the horse at first yoke thee!’ this he thereby says;—‘they laid speed into him,’—he thereby says, ‘May they who laid speed into it, lay speed into thee!’

9. He then yokes the left horse, with (Vâg. S. IX, 8), ‘Become thou swift as the wind, O courser, being yoked!’—thereby he says, ‘Become quick as the wind, O courser, being yoked;’—‘be thou as Indra’s right (steed) in beauty!’—he thereby says, ‘Even as Indra’s right (steed) for beauty, so be thou that of the sacrificer for beauty!’—‘May the all-knowing Maruts yoke thee!’ he thereby says, ‘may gods yoke thee!’—‘May Tvashṭri lay speed into thy feet!’ in this there is nothing obscure. He then yokes the right side-horse; for in human (practice) they indeed yoke the left side-horse first, but with the gods in this way.

10. He yokes it, with (Vâg. S. IX, 9), ‘What speed hath been secretly laid into thee, O courser, and what (speed), bestowed on the eagle, went along in the wind;’—he thereby says, ‘what speed of thine, O courser, is hidden away even elsewhere, therewith win this our sacrifice, Pragâpati!’—‘with that strength be thou strong and wealth-winning for us, O courser, and victorious at the gathering!’—wealth means food: he thus means to say, ‘And be thou a food-winner for us at this our

I, 7, 7, 2) this formula runs thus: ‘Either Vâyu, or Manu, or the Gandharvas, the twenty-seven, harnessed the horse at first, laid speed into him,’—which Sâyana, however, interprets as meaning, ‘Vâyu, and Manu, and the (twenty-five) Gandharvas,—these seven and twenty &c.’

sacrifice, at the gathering of the gods win thou this sacrifice, Pragâpati!'

11. Now only those three (horses) are yoked, for what is threefold belongs to the gods, and this (sacrifice is) with the gods. Alongside the yoke (laid) on the side-horse¹ goes a fourth (horse), for that one is human. When he is about to give that (chariot to the Adhvaryu), he gives it after yoking the fourth (horse) thereto. Hence also at any other sacrifice only those three (horses) are yoked; for what is threefold belongs to the gods, and this (sacrifice is) with the gods. Alongside the yoke of the side-horse goes a fourth (horse), for that one is human. When he is about to give that (chariot) away, he gives it after yoking the fourth (horse) thereto.

12. He now takes out material for a wild-rice pap of seventeen plates for Bṛihaspati; for he who offers the Vâga-peya wins food,—vâga-peya being doubtless the same as anna-peya (food and drink): thus whatever food he has thereby won, that he now prepares for him.

13. And as to why it belongs to Bṛihaspati:—Bṛihaspati won it in the beginning, therefore it belongs to Bṛihaspati.

14. And why it is prepared of wild rice:—Bṛihaspati is the Brahman (priesthood), and those wild-rice grains are cooked with the Brahman (prayer),—therefore it is of wild rice. It is one of seventeen plates, because Pragâpati is seventeenfold: he thus wins Pragâpati.

¹ Or, of the leader, as would appear from Sâyana to Taitt. S. I, 7, 8 (p. 1024),—'Between the right-hand and the left-hand horse he allows the shafts to project, and between them he puts the horse called "sapti" (in the text).' No fourth horse is, however, apparently mentioned in the ritual of the Black Yagus.

15. He makes the horses smell it, with 'Ye coursers—;' for horses are coursers (vâgin): therefore he says, 'Ye coursers,'—'wealth-winners,'—wealth is food: 'food-winners' he thereby says;—'starting upon the course;' for they are about to run a race;—'smell ye Brîhaspati's portion!' for this indeed is Brîhaspati's portion: therefore he says, 'smell ye Brîhaspati's portion!' And why he makes the horses smell it: he thinks, 'may I win Him¹!' therefore he makes the horses smell it.

FIFTH BRÂHMANA.

1. Now when they run a race, he thereby wins this same (terrestrial) world. And when the Brahman sings a Sâman on the cart-wheel set up on (a post) reaching to his navel, he thereby wins the air-world. And when he erects the sacrificial post, he thereby wins the world of the gods. Hence that threefold performance.

2. The Brahman mounts a cart-wheel, set up on (a post) as high as his navel², with (Vâg. S. IX, 10), ¹ That is, Brîhaspati; unless 'lokam' has to be supplied to 'imam' ('this world'), as might appear probable from the next paragraph. See also V. I, 5, 27-28.

² According to the Taittirîya ritualists, as quoted by Sâyana (Taitt. S. I, 7, 8), the wheel after being mounted by the Brahman is to be turned round thrice in a sunwise motion;—the (pointed) end of the post being apparently inserted in the navel of the wheel, lying horizontally upon it. The turning wheel is there compared with the Vagra, or disk-shaped thunderbolt. While the wheel is turning round its axle, the Brahman sings the Sâman. Cf. also Lâṭy. Sr. V, 12, 9 seq., according to which authority, however, the Brahman

‘At the impulse (sava) of the god Savitri, of true impulsions, may I ascend unto the highest heaven of Brihaspati!’ thus, if a Brâhmana sacrifices; for Brihaspati is the Brahman (priesthood, or sanctity), and the Brâhmana is the Brahman.

3. And if a Râganya sacrifices, (he does so) with, ‘At the impulse of the divine Savitri, of true impulsions, may I ascend unto the highest heaven of Indra!’ for Indra is the Kshatra (nobility, or power), and the Râganya is the Kshatra.

4. Thrice he sings the Sâman¹. Having thrice sung it, he descends with, ‘At the impulse of the divine Savitri, of true impulsions, I have ascended unto the highest heaven of Brihaspati!’—thus, if a Brâhmana sacrifices, for Brihaspati is the Brahman, and the Brâhmana is the Brahman.

5. And if a Râganya sacrifices,—with, ‘At the impulse of the divine Savitri, of true impulsions, I have ascended unto the highest heaven of Indra!’ for Indra is the Kshatra, and the Râganya is the Kshatra.

6. They put up seventeen drums along the edge of the altar, from the Âgnîdhra backwards (towards would seem only to put his arms on the wheel, and turn it round, while singing.

¹ Viz. the ‘vâginâm sâman’ (Tândy. Br. 18, 7, 12), Sâman. I, 435, ‘âvir maryâ â vâgam vâgino agman,’ &c. ‘The fiery steeds have gathered fiery mettle, the impulse of the god Savitri; win ye the heaven, O coursers!’ Lâty. Sr. V, 12, 14. This singing of the Sâman takes place while the race lasts, the Brahman remaining all the time on the cart-wheel put up on a short post on (or near) the utkara, or heap of rubbish.—The author then anticipates in this and the next two paragraphs what the Brahman is to do when he descends from the wheel after the race is over. The placing of the drums next referred to must also be imagined as taking place whilst the Brahman is mounting the wheel.

the west); for he who offers the Vāgapeya wins Pragâpati; but Pragâpati is speech, and that doubtless is the supreme speech which is (the outcome) of seventeen drums: he thus wins the supreme speech, the supreme Pragâpati. Seventeen there are, because Pragâpati is seventeenfold: he thus wins Pragâpati.

7. One of these drums he (the Brahman) beats (while praying) with a sacrificial formula: thereby all of them become beaten with a sacrificial formula.

8. He beats it with (Vâg. S. IX, 11), 'O Brîhaspati, win the race! lift ye up your voice unto Brîhaspati: make ye Brîhaspati win the race!' thus, if a Brâhmana sacrifices; for Brîhaspati is the Brahman, and the Brâhmana is the Brahman.

9. And if a Râganya sacrifices, (he does so) with, 'O Indra, win the race! lift ye up your voice unto Indra: make ye Indra win the race!' for Indra is the Kshatra, and the Râganya is the Kshatra.

10. And when those race-running chariots¹ have come up again, he takes down one of those drums with a sacrificial formula; whereby they all become taken down with a formula.

11. He takes it down, with (Vâg. S. IX, 12), 'This hath been your true concord whereby ye (drums) have caused Brîhaspati to win the race;—Brîhaspati ye have caused to win the race: be released, ye wood-lords!' thus, if a Brâhmana sacrifices; for Bṛihaspati is the Brahman, and the Brāhmaṇa is the Brahman.

¹ Besides the Sacrificer's chariot inside the vedi, sixteen others, each drawn by four horses, have been got ready, outside the vedi, for the race to the udumbara branch, as its goal and turning-point. In paragraphs 10-12 the author again anticipates what is to be done with the drums after the race has taken place, just in order to deal with that item of the ceremonial as a whole.

12. And if a Rāganya sacrifices, with, 'This hath been your true concord whereby ye have caused Indra to win the race;—Indra ye have caused to win the race: be released, ye wood-lords!' for Indra is the Kshatra, and the Rāganya is the Kshatra.

13. A Rāganya then¹ shoots seventeen arrow's ranges northwards from the edge of the altar; for as much as is one arrow's range, so much is Pragâpati crosswise; and as much as are seventeen arrow's ranges, so much is Pragâpati lengthwise.

14. And as to why a Rāganya shoots,—he, the Rāganya is most manifestly of Pragâpati (the lord of creatures): hence, while being one, he rules over many; and because 'pragâpati' has four syllables, and 'rāganya'² also has four syllables, therefore a Rāganya shoots. He shoots seventeen arrow's ranges, because Pragâpati is seventeenfold: he thereby wins Pragâpati.

15. And whichever (horse) he yokes with a formula, up to that the Sacrificer now steps³, with (Vāg. S. IX, 13), 'At the impulse of the divine Savitri,

¹ That is, after (or at the same time when) the drums are put up. He is to shoot northwards through the space between the utkara and kâtvâla. At the end of the seventeenth arrow's range he plants an udumbara branch in the ground to serve as the goal round which the chariots are to turn sunwise on their way back to the sacrificial ground.

² Pronounce 'râ-ga-nf-a.'

³ In the Taittirîya ritual (Taitt. S. I, 7, 7, 2; Taitt. Br. I, 3, 5, 4) the Sacrificer steps up to the chariot with the three Vishnu-strides, with appropriate formulas.

of true impulsion, may I win the race of the race-winning Bṛihaspati!’

16. And even as then Bṛihaspati hasted up to Savitri for his impulsion,—Savitri being the impeller among the gods—saying, ‘Impel this for me: impelled by thee, may I win this!’ and Savitri, as the impeller, impelled it for him, and impelled by Savitri, he won; in like manner does he thereby haste up to Savitri for his impulsion,—Savitri being the impeller among the gods,—saying, ‘Impel this for me: impelled by thee, may I win!’ and Savitri, as the impeller, impels it for him, and impelled by Savitri he wins.

17. And if a pupil of the Adhvaryu’s or some (other) theological student were to know that prayer, stepping up he makes (the Sacrificer) say, ‘O coursers!’—for horses are indeed coursers: therefore he says, ‘O coursers’—‘wealth-winners!’ for wealth is food: ‘food-winners’ he thereby says;—‘keeping the roads,’ for they indeed run keeping (within) the roads;—‘measuring the stages,’ for measuring the stages they run over the course;—‘go ye to the winning-post!’ In order that the evil-doers, the Rakshas, may not hurt them midways, he thus says this.—They run the race, they beat the drums, and he (the Brahman) sings the Sâman.

18. He (the Adhvaryu) then¹ either offers or addresses (the horses) with those two gagati-verses: whether he offers, or whether he addresses (the horses), the significance (of the performance) is the same.

¹ That is, he does so whilst the cars are running; the offering or prayers being intended to make the Sacrificer’s car win the race.

19. He offers, with (Vâg. S. IX, 14; Rîk S. IV, 40, 4), 'That courser speedeth after the whip, fettered at the neck and shoulder and mouth: may Dadhikrâ win according to his power; may he run along the windings of the roads, hail!'

20. [Vâg. S. IX, 15; Rîk S. IV, 40, 3], 'And of him, the running, speeding, there fanneth like the wing of the eager bird,—as of the gliding eagle,—about the breast of Dadhikrâvan passing along with might, hail!'

21. He then either offers or addresses (the horses) with the following tristich: this is twofold, because he either offers or addresses. Whether he offers, or addresses (the horses), the significance is the same: he thereby speeds those running horses, imbues them with energy. There are here three earths, namely this one, and two beyond it: these he thereby wins.

22. He addresses (the horses, with Vâg. S. IX, 16; Rîk S. VII, 38, 7), 'Auspicious be the coursers unto us at the invocations in the divine service, running their measured course, with beautiful song; swallowing the dragon, the wolf, the evil spirits: may they ever keep away from us affliction!'

23. [Vâg. S. IX, 17; Rîk S. X, 64, 6], 'Those racers, wont to hear the calls, may they all hear our call, the coursers running their measured course: they, the winners of thousands, eager to win at the winning of oblations, who have carried off great gain in the contests.'

24. [Vâg. S. IX, 18; Rîk S. VII, 38, 8], 'In every race, help us, ye racers, at the prizes, ye wise, immortal knowers of the divine law: drink of this mead, be gladdened, and satisfied walk ye on the paths trodden by the gods!

25. He then ¹ steps over against (the horses) with the Bârhaspatya pap, and touches it; for he who offers the Vâgapeya wins food, since 'vâga-peya' is the same as 'anna-peya': whatever food he has thus gained that he now, having reached that goal, brings in contact with himself, puts within himself.

26. He touches it, with (Vâg. S. IX, 19), 'May gain of wealth come to me!' wealth means food: he thus says, 'May gain of food come (accrue) to me;'—'May these two, Heaven and Earth, the all-shaped, come to me!' for Pragâpati is Heaven and Earth;—'May father and mother come to me!' for Pragâpati is both father and mother;—'May Soma come to me with immortality!' for Pragâpati is Soma.

27. He makes the horses smell it, with, 'Ye coursers!' for horses are coursers: therefore he says, 'Ye coursers!'—'wealth-winners!' wealth is food: 'food-winners' he thereby says;—'having run the course—' for 'starting (upon the course)' he said before, as then they were indeed starting; but now he says, 'having run,' for they indeed have run (the race): therefore he says, 'having run;'—'smell ye Brihaspati's portion—' for this is Brihaspati's portion: therefore he says, 'Smell ye Brihaspati's portion;'—'taking (it) in!' whereby he imbues the Sacrificer with energy. And as to why he makes the horses smell,—he made them smell before, thinking, ‘May I win this (world);’ and now (he does so) thinking, ‘I have won this (world):’ that is why he makes the horses smell.

¹ That is, after the cars have come back, that of the Sacrificer keeping ahead of the others.

28. Now on one of those race-running (rival) chariots there has been standing either a Vaisya, or a Râganya; he now sits down on the northern hip of the altar. Thereupon the Adhvaryu and Sacrificer, taking the honey-cup, step out by the front door (of the cart-shed), and place it in the Vaisya’s, or Râganya’s, hand. And the Neshtri, taking the cups of Surâ, steps out by the back door. He walks round by the back of the hall, and placing one (of the cups) in the Vaisya’s, or Râganya’s, hand, he says, ‘With this I buy Him of thee!’ For the Soma is truth, prosperity, light; and the Surâ is untruth, misery, darkness: he thus imbues the Sacrificer with truth, prosperity, and light; and smites the Vaisya with untruth, misery, and darkness;—whatever benefit (or enjoyment) he desires, he obtains for himself by those (cups of Surâ). But that cup of honey he presents to the Brahman, together with the golden vessel. In presenting it to the Brahman, he imbues himself with immortal life; for gold is immortal life;—and whatsoever benefit he desires that he thereby obtains for himself.

SECOND ADHYĀYA. FIRST BRĀHMANA.

1. Thereupon, taking the dipping-spoon (sruva) and the pot for melting butter, he goes to the Âhavanīya fire. He either offers those twelve âptis¹, or makes (the Sacrificer) pronounce (the formulas). Whether he offers, or makes him pronounce (the formulas), the significance is the same.

¹ The term âpti, literally ‘obtainment, gain,’ is technically used

2. He offers, with (Vâg. S. IX, 20), 'To the ally, hail!—To the good ally, hail!—To the after-born, hail!—To the purpose, hail!—To the Vasu, hail!—To the Lord of day, hail!—To the failing day, hail!—To the failing one, sprung from the evanescent, hail!—To the evanescent one, sprung from the terminal, hail!—To the terminal descendant of being, hail!—To the Lord of being, hail!—To the over-lord, hail!' These twelve âptis (obtainments) he offers, because there are twelve months in the year, and Pragâpati is the year, and the sacrifice is Pragâpati: hence whatever obtainment, whatever accomplishment there is for him¹, that he thereby wins, that he makes his own.

3. He then either offers six kṛiptis², or makes (the Sacrificer) pronounce them. Whether he offers, or makes him pronounce them, the significance is the same.

4. He makes him pronounce (Vâg. S. IX, 21), 'May the life prosper through sacrifice!—May the breath prosper through sacrifice!—May the eye prosper through sacrifice!—May the ear prosper through sacrifice!—May the back prosper through sacrifice!—May the sa-for the twelve formulas, given in the next paragraph, as well as for the oblations made therewith. The first of these formulas is 'âpâye svâhâ,' whence the above term is probably derived.

¹ Or perhaps, 'there is of (belongs to) that (sacrifice).'

² This term, literally 'success, accomplishment,' is technically used to denote the succeeding formulas containing the verb 'kṛip,' to succeed, prosper, as well as the oblations made therewith.

crifice prosper through sacrifice!' These six k/iptis he makes him pronounce, because there are six seasons in the year, and Pragâpati is the year, and the sacrifice is Pragâpati : thus whatever success, whatever accomplishment there is for him, that he thereby wins, that he makes his own.

5. The sacrificial post is eight-cornered ; for the Gâyatri metre has eight syllables, and the Gâyatri is Agni's metre ; he thereby wins the world of the gods. The post is either wrapt up, or bound up, in seventeen cloths ; for Pragâpati is seventeenfold : he thus wins Pragâpati.

6. There is a wheaten head-piece¹ on it ; for man is nearest to Pragâpati, and he is skinless². And among plants wheat comes nearest to man, (for) it has no skin : thus he thereby wins the world of men.

7. The post has a hollow (at the top), and is not pointed at the end ; for the hollow is sacred to the Fathers : he thus gains the world of the Fathers. It is seventeen cubits long, for Pragâpati is seventeenfold : he thus wins Pragâpati.

8. Thereupon the Neshtrî, being about to lead up the (Sacrificer's) wife, makes her wrap round herself, over the garment of consecration, a cloth, or skirt, made of Kusa grass³ ; for she, the wife, is the hind

¹ For the ordinary mortar-shaped top-piece fixed on the post, see part ii, p. 168, note 1. On the present occasion it is to be made of wheaten dough.

² According to a legend given at III, 1, 2, 13 seq., man had originally a (hairy) skin, or hide ; but the gods having flayed him, put his skin on the cow.

³ In the ceremonial of the Black Yagus (Taitt. Br. I, 3, 7, 1) the Sacrificer himself has to put on a 'târpya' garment, for which see note on V, 2, 5, 20.

part of the sacrifice¹; and he wishes her, thus coming forward, to propitiate the sacrifice. But impure is that part of woman which is below the navel, and pure are the plants of (Kusa) grass: thus having, by means of those plants of (Kusa) grass, made pure whatever part of her is impure, he causes her to propitiate the sacrifice, while coming forward. This is why the Neshtri, being about to lead up the wife, makes her wrap round herself, over the garment of consecration, a cloth, or skirt, made of Kusa grass.

9. He then leans a ladder (against the post). He may ascend either from the south northwards, or from the north southwards; but let him rather ascend from the south northwards (udak), for thus it goes upwards (udak).

10. Being about to ascend, he (the Sacrificer) addresses his wife, 'Come, wife, ascend we the sky!'—'Ascend we!' says the wife. Now as to why he addresses his wife: she, the wife, in sooth is one half of his own self; hence, as long as he does not obtain her, so long he is not regenerated, for so long he is incomplete. But as soon as he obtains her he is regenerated, for then he is complete. 'Complete I want to go to that supreme goal,' thus (he thinks) and therefore he addresses his wife.

11. He ascends, with, 'We have become Pragâ-pati's children;' for he who offers the Vâgapeya indeed becomes Pragâ-pati's child.

12. He then touches the wheat (top-piece)², with,

¹ Viz. because her ordinary seat is at the back, or west, end of the altar.

² According to the ritual of the Black Yagus (Sây. on Taitt. S. I, 7, 9, vol. i, p. 1039), the Sacrificer, having ascended, lifts up his

‘We have gone to the light, O ye gods!’ for he who offers the Vâgapeya, indeed goes to the light.

13. And as to why he touches the wheat : wheat is food, and he who offers the Vâgapeya, wins food, for vâga-peya is the same as anna-peya (food and drink): thus whatever food he has thereby won, therewith now that he has gone to that supreme goal, he puts himself in contact, and possesses himself of it,—therefore he touches the wheat (top-piece).

14. He then rises by (the measure of) his head over the post, with, ‘We have become immortal!’ whereby he wins the world of the gods.

15. Thereupon, while looking in the different directions, he mutters (Vâg. S. IX, 22), ‘Ours be your power, ours your manhood and intelligence, ours be your energies!’ For he who offers the Vâgapeya wins everything here, winning as he does Pragâpati, and Pragâpati being everything here;—having appropriated to himself the glory, the power, and the strength of this All, he now lays them within himself, makes them his own : that is why he mutters, while looking in the different directions.

16. They throw up to him bags of salt ; for salt means cattle, and cattle is food ; and he who offers the Vâgapeya wins food, for vâga-peya is the same as anna-peya : thus whatever food he thereby has gained, therewith now that he has gone to the supreme goal, he puts himself in contact, and makes it his own,—therefore they throw bags of salt up to him.

17. They (the pieces of salt) are done up in asvattha arms to heaven, praying, ‘We have gone to the light, to the gods, we have become immortal ; we have become Pragâpati’s children !’

(ficus religiosa) leaves; because Indra on that (former) occasion called upon the Maruts staying on the Asvattha tree¹, therefore they are done up in asvattha leaves. Peasants (vis) throw them up to him, for the Maruts are the peasants, and the peasants are food (for the nobleman): hence peasants throw them up. There are seventeen (bags), for Pragâpati is seventeenfold: he thus wins Pragâpati.

18. Thereupon, while looking down upon this (earth), he mutters, 'Homage be to the mother Earth! homage be to the mother Earth!' For when Bṛihaspati had been consecrated, the Earth was afraid of him, thinking, 'Something great surely has he become now that he has been consecrated: I fear lest he may rend me asunder²!' And Bṛihaspati also was afraid of the Earth, thinking, 'I fear lest she may shake me off!' Hence by that (formula) he entered into a friendly relation with her; for a mother does not hurt her son, nor does a son hurt his mother.

19. Now the Bṛihaspati Soma-feast³ is the same as the Vâgapeya; and the earth in truth is afraid of that (Sacrificer), thinking, 'Something great surely has he become now that he has been consecrated: I fear lest he may rend me asunder!' And he himself is afraid of her, thinking, 'I fear lest she may shake me off!' Hence he thereby enters into a friendly relation with her, for a mother does not hurt her son; neither does a son hurt his mother.

¹ See part ii, p. 334, with note 2. On the 'asvattha devasādāna' cp. also Ath.-veda V, 4, 3; Rig-veda I, 164, 20-22; A. Kuhn, Herabkunft des Feuers und des Göttertranks, p. 126 seq. (Mythol. Stud. i. p. 112 seq.).

² Or, 'I hope he will not rend me asunder.' For this construction—exactly corresponding to the German 'dass (or, wenn) er mich nur nicht aufreißt!' (cf. also the colloquial use of the French 'pourvu,'—'pourvu qu'il ne me déchire pas!')—see part ii, p. 31, note 1.

³ The Bṛihaspatisava is performed by a Brâhmana with a view to obtaining the office of Purohita (royal chaplain, or family priest). For Âsvalâyana's rule, which places it on a level with the Râgasūya sacrifice of a king, see p. 4, note 1.

20. He then descends (and treads) upon a piece of gold;—gold is immortal life: he thus takes his stand on life immortal.

21. Now (in the first place) he (the Adhvaryu) spreads out the skin of a he-goat, and lays a (small) gold plate thereon: upon that—or indeed upon this (earth) itself—he (the Sacrificer) steps.

22. They then bring a throne-seat for him; for truly he who gains a seat in the air¹, gains a seat above (others): thus these subjects of his sit below him who is seated above,—this is why they bring him a throne-seat.

23. It is made of udumbara wood,—the Udumbara tree being sustenance, (that is) food,—for his obtaining of sustenance, food: therefore it is made of udumbara wood. They set it down in front of the Havirdhâna (cart-shed), behind the Âhavantya (fire).

24. He then spreads the goat-skin thereon; for truly the he-goat is no other than Pragâpati, for they, the goats, are most clearly of Pragâpati (the lord of generation or creatures);—whence, bringing forth thrice in a year, they produce two or three²: thus he thereby makes him (the Sacrificer) to be Pragâpati himself,—this is why he spreads the goat-skin thereon.

¹ The Sacrificer is supposed to have done so by the symbolical act of raising his head above the sacrificial post; see paragraph 14 above.

² See IV, 5, 5, 6; part ii, p. 407, note 3.

25. He spreads it, with, 'This is thy kingship¹!' whereby he endows him with royal power. He then makes him sit down, with, 'Thou art the ruler, the ruling lord!' whereby he makes him the ruler, ruling over those subjects of his;—'Thou art firm, and steadfast!' whereby he makes him firm and steadfast in this world;—'Thee for the tilling!—Thee for peaceful dwelling!—Thee for wealth!—Thee for thrift!' whereby he means to say, '(here I seat) thee for the welfare (of the people).'

SECOND BRÂHMANA.

1. He now proceeds with the Bârhaspatya pap. Its svishṭakṛit remains yet unoffered, when he (the Adhvaryu) brings² him (the Sacrificer) some food; for he who offers the Vâgapeya wins food, vâgapeya being the same as anna-peya: thus whatever food he (the Sacrificer) has thereby gained, that he (the Adhvaryu) now brings to him.

2. In a vessel of udumbara wood—the Udumbara tree being sustenance, (that is) food—for the obtaining of sustenance, food: therefore it is in a vessel of udumbara wood. He first brings water, then milk, then (other) kinds of food, as they occur to him.

3. Now some bring seventeen kinds of food,

¹ Thus the formula 'iyam te râṭ' is interpreted by Mahîdhara (who, however, takes it to be addressed to the throne-seat, and not, as would seem preferable, to the king), and apparently also by our author. The word 'râg' would indeed seem to mean here something like the energy (śakti), or the symbol, of the king. The St. Petersburg dictionary, however, takes it here as the name of a female deity.

² He collects (sambharati), or provides food for him; this ceremony corresponding to that of equipping or provisioning the sacred fire with the so-called sambhâras, at the Agny-âdhâna; see II, 1, 1, 1 seq.; part i, p. 276, note 1.

saying, 'Seventeenfold is Pragâpati.' But let him not do so: surely all the food is not appropriated to Pragâpati¹, and, compared to him, what is man that he should appropriate to himself all food? Hence, while bringing every kind of food that occurs to him, let him not bring of some one (particular) kind of food.

4. And whatever food he does not bring to him, let him (the Sacrificer) forswear² that, and not eat of it as long as he lives: thus he does not go to the end, thus he lives long. Of all that food brought together he offers the (seven) Vâga-prasavanîya³ oblations, cutting out (pieces) with the dipping-spoon. Thus to whatever deities he is now offering, they give an impulse to him, and impelled by them he wins: therefore he offers the Vâgaprasavaniya oblations.

¹ Or 'from Pragâpati;' or perhaps, 'surely not all Pragâpati's food is appropriated.' The Kânva recension reads thus, VI, 2, 3, 3. He first brings water, then milk, then, as they occur to him (other) kinds of food. 'Let him bring those seventeen kinds of food,' they say, 'for Pragâpati is seventeenfold.' Nevertheless (tadu) let him bring whatever kinds of food he can either think of or obtain. 4. Of this his food that has been brought together, let him set aside (udhareṭ) one (particular kind of) food: let him forswear that (tad udbruvîta), and not eat of it as long as he lives (yâvag gîvet). By that much also (or, even so long, tâvad api vai prâgapateḥ sarvam annam anavaruddham) all the food of Pragâpati is not appropriated; and who is man (compared) to him, that he should appropriate to himself all food? Thus he does not go to the end, thus he lives long: that (food) is here left over for his offspring (or people).

² Sâyaṇa explains 'tasya udbruvîta' by,—one ought to proclaim it, saying aloud 'such and such food has not been brought;'—na sambhṛitam ity ukṛtais tannâma brūyât.

³ That is, oblations calculated to promote or quicken (pra-su) the strength (food,—vâga) by their prayers, the first three of which begin with 'vâgasya . . . prasavaḥ.' See p. 2, note 1. In the Black Yagus ritual these oblations are called 'Annahomâḥ' or 'food-oblations.' Taitt. Br. I, 3, 8, 1. The Sûtras seem, however, likewise to use the term 'Vâgaprasavanîya' (or Vâgaprasaviya).

5. He offers with (Vâg. S. IX, 23-29), 'The impulse of strength impelled of old that king Soma in the plants, in the waters: may they be rich in honey for us! may we be wakeful in the kingdom, placed in the front, hail!'

6. 'The impulse of strength spread over this sky, and over all these worlds, as the all-ruler; knowing he causeth him to give gifts who wisheth not to give: may he bestow upon us wealth with the full muster of heroes, hail!'

7. 'Yea, the impulse of strength prevailed over all these worlds, on every side; from days of yore the king goeth about knowing, increasing the people, and the well-being amongst us, hail!'

8. 'To king Soma, to Agni we cling¹ for help, to the Âdityas, to Vishnu, to Sûrya, to the Brahman Brîhaspati, hail!'

9. 'Urge thou Aryaman, Brîhaspati, Indra to the giving of gifts, Vâk², Vishnu, Sarasvatî, and the vigorous Savitrî, hail!'

10. 'O Agni, speak to us here, be thou gracious unto us! bestow blessings upon us, O winner of thousands, for thou art the giver of wealth, hail!'

11. 'May Aryaman bestow blessings upon us, and Pûshan, and Brîhaspati! may the divine Vâk give us gifts, hail!'

12. With the remaining (offering material) he sprinkles him (the Sacrificer); he thereby sprinkles

¹ Rig-veda X, 141, 3 reads,—King Soma, Agni we invoke with our voices, the Âdityas, &c.

² Rig-veda X, 141, 5 has Vâta (Wind) instead of Vâk (Speech).

him with food, bestows food upon him: for this reason he sprinkles him with the remaining (material) ¹.

13. He sprinkles with (Vâg. S. IX, 30), 'At the impulse of the divine Savitṛi, (I sprinkle) thee, by the arms of the Asvins, by the hands of Pûshan!' he thus sprinkles (consecrates) him by the hands of gods;—'I place thee in the leading of Sarasvatî Vâk, the leader;' for Sarasvatî is Vâk (speech): he thus places him in the leading of Vâk, the leader.

14. Here now some say, 'I place thee in the leading of the leader of all the gods;' for all the gods are the All: he thus places him in the leading of the leader of the All. But let him not say so; let him rather say, 'I place thee in the leading of Sarasvatî Vâk;' for Sarasvatî is Vâk: he thus places him in the leading of Vâk.—'I consecrate thee, N. N., with the supreme rulership of Brihaspati!' therewith he mentions the (Sacrificer's) name: he thus makes him attain to the fellowship of Brihaspati, and to co-existence in his world.

15. He then says, 'All-ruler is he, N. N.! All-ruler is he, N.N.!' Him, thus indicated, he thereby indicates to the gods: 'Of mighty power is he who has been consecrated; he has become one of yours; protect him!' thus he thereby says. Thrice he says it, for threefold is the sacrifice.

¹ According to the Taittirîyas (Taitt. S., vol. i, p. 1049), the Sacrificer is made to sit on the black antelope skin, with his face to the east, with a small gold and silver plate placed on either side of him; and he is then sprinkled in front, on the head, so that the liquid runs down to his mouth, thus symbolizing the entering of food and strength into him.

16. He then either offers, or makes him pronounce (the formulas of) the Uggiti oblations¹. Whether he offers or makes him pronounce (the formulas), the significance is the same.

17. He makes him say (Vâg. S. IX, 31-34), 'With the (word of) one syllable Agni won the breath: may I win that! — —² With the (metre of) seventeen syllables Pragâpati won the seventeenfold stoma: may I win that!' whatever those deities won by means of those (formulas), that he now wins by them. There are seventeen (formulas), for Pragâpati is seventeenfold: he thus wins Pragâpati.

18. Thereupon he says, 'Recite (the invitory formula) to Agni Svishṭakṛit!' Now, as to why this rite is performed between two oblations. Pragâpati, truly, is that sacrifice which is here performed, and from which these creatures have been produced, —and, indeed, they are even now produced after this one: he thus wins Pragâpati in the very middle: therefore that rite is performed between two oblations. Having made (the Āgntidhra) utter the

¹ That is, oblations of 'victory,' with the formulas used therewith, containing each two forms of the verb ud-gi, 'to conquer.'

² The intervening formulas here understood, and given in the Vâg. Samhitâ, are to the effect that the Asvins, by two syllables, gained the two-footed men; Vishṇu, by three, the three worlds; Soma, by four, the four-footed cattle; Pûshan, by five, the five regions (the four quarters and the upper region); Savitri, by six, the six seasons; the Maruts, by seven, the seven kinds of domestic animals; Bṛhaspati, by eight, the Gâyatri metre; Mitra, by nine, the Trivṛt stoma (hymn-tune); Varuṇa, by ten, the Virâg metre; Indra, by eleven, the Trishṭubh metre; the All-gods, by twelve, the Gagati metre; the Vasus, by thirteen, the thirteenfold stoma; the Rudras, by fourteen, the fourteenfold stoma; the Ādityas, by fifteen, the fifteenfold stoma; Aditi, by sixteen, the sixteenfold stoma.

Sraushat, he says, 'Pronounce the offering-prayer to Agni Svishṭakṛit!' and offers as the Vashat is uttered.

19. He then puts the Idā on (the idāpātri). The Idā having been invoked¹, he, having touched water, draws the Māhendra cup. Having drawn the Māhendra cup, he sets the chant agoing². He urges him (the Sacrificer) forward to the chant: he gets down (from the throne-seat); he is in attendance at the Stotra, in attendance at the Sastra.

20. Here now some, having performed that, perform that³; but let him not do it thus; for the Stotra is his (the Sacrificer's) own self, and the Sastra is his people (or offering): thereby then he ruins the Sacrificer; he goes astray, he stumbles;—hence having performed that, let him perform that:—

21. He puts the Idā on (the dish). The Idā having been invoked, he, having touched water, draws the Māhendra cup. Having drawn the Māhendra cup, he sets the (Prishṭha-) Stotra agoing. He urges him (the Sacrificer) forward to the chant: he gets down (from the throne-seat); he is in attendance at the chant (stotra), in attendance at the recitation (sastra).

¹ See I, 8, 1, 18 seq.

² That is, the (first or Hotri's) Prishṭha-stotra, for which see above, p. 15, note 1; part ii, p. 339, note 2. Its chanting is followed by the Nishkevalya-sastra, recited by the Hotri.

³ That is to say, according to Sâyana,—they make the Svishṭakṛit, and the rising of the Sacrificer from the throne-seat, take place after the pronunciation of the 'uggiti' formulas, the drawing of the Māhendra cup, and the performance of the Stotra and Sastra.

B. THE RĀGASŪYA, OR INAUGURATION OF A KING.

SECOND ADHYĀYA. THIRD BRĀHMANA.

1. He offers a full-offering¹; for the full means the All: 'May I be consecrated after encompassing the All!' thus he thinks. At this (offering) he bestows a boon; for a boon means all: 'Having encompassed the All (the universe), may I be consecrated!' thus he thinks. He may perform this offering, if he chooses; or, if he chooses, he may disregard it.

2. And on the following day he prepares a cake on eight potsherds, as sacrificial food for Anumati². And whatever portion of (the grains) being ground,—either flour or rice-grains,—falls down behind the pin, that he throws together into the dipping-spoon

¹ On the pûrnâhuti, or libation of a spoonful of ghee, see part i, p. 302 note. According to Kâty. Sr. XV, 1, 4 seq., Âsv. Sr. IX, 3, 2, and other authorities, this full-offering is preceded by the Pavitra (purificatory ceremony), a Soma-sacrifice with four dikshâs or initiation days (?commencing on the first day of the bright fortnight of Phâlguna), serving as the ordinary opening offering (anvârambhanîyeshî). That it formed part of the ceremonial at the time of the composition of the Brâhmana there can be little doubt (cf. Pañkav. Br. 18, 8, 1), but as it is an ordinary Agnishoma, the author had no reason to refer to it.

² I. e. the approval or favour of the deities, personified.—According to Yâgyñika Deva (to Kâty. Sr. XV, 1, 8), the ceremonies now beginning would commence on the 10th day of the bright half of Phalgunî; the fifth day's ceremony from this day, viz. the first of the four seasonal offerings, having to be performed on the Full-moon of that month; see p. 47, note 1.

(sruva)¹. They take a firebrand from the Anvâhâr-yapaṭana (or southern) fire, and therewith go southward. And where he finds a self-produced hollow² or cleft,—

3. Having there made up a fire, he offers with (Vâg. S. IX, 35), 'This, O Nirṛiti, is thy portion: accept it graciously, hail!' For Nirṛiti is this (Earth); whomsoever she seizes upon with evil, him she seizes upon with destruction (nirṛiti): hence whatever part of this (Earth) is of the Nirṛiti nature, that he thereby propitiates; and thus Nirṛiti does not seize upon him, while being consecrated. And the reason why he offers in a self-produced hollow or ¹ The authorities of the Black Yagus prepare therewith a cake on one kapāla. Taitt. S. I, 8, 1.

² Sâyana, perhaps rightly, takes 'irīṇa' here (and on Taitt. S. vol. ii, p. 6) in the sense of 'ūshara,' a spot of barren (or saline) soil. Cf. VII, 2, 1, 8: 'In whatever part of this (earth) there is produced (of itself) a cleft, or in whatever part of it plants are not produced, verily that part of it Nirṛiti seizes upon.'—Kausika-sūtra XIII, 28 (A. Weber, Omina und Portenta, p. 386) recommends the following propitiatory rites in case of a sudden cleft in the ground: 'If in the village, or house, or fire-house, or meeting-place, (the ground) should burst open, four cows are got ready, a white, a black, a red, and a one-coloured one. For twelve days he puts down the butter, milked together from these. In the morning of the twelfth, having made up a fire north of where there was that cleft, having swept and sprinkled it, and strewn sacrificial grass around it; and having mixed (the butter) with ghee from the white (cow), and addressed it (the spot) with the three verses, Ath-veda XII, 1, 19–21 ("Agni is in the earth, in the plants, the waters carry Agni, Agni is in the flints, Agni is within men; in cows, in horses are Agnis," &c.), and touched it, let him then offer. In the same way on the south side; in the same way on the western side. Having concluded on the north side, let him offer with the (formulas addressed) to Vâstoshpati (the tutelary genius of the dwelling). Having poured the refuse in the cleft, and completed the oblations, he sprinkles the cleft with lustral water.'

cleft, is that that much of this (earth) is possessed with Nirṛiti.

4. They then return (to the sacrificial ground) without looking backward. He now proceeds with the cake on eight potsherds for Anumati. For Anumati is this (Earth); and whosoever knows to do that work which he intends to do, for him indeed she approves (anu-man) thereof: hence it is her he thereby pleases, thinking 'May I be consecrated, approved by that (genius of) approval!'

5. And as to why it is a (cake) on eight potsherds,—the Gâyatrî consists of eight syllables, and this earth is Gâyatrî. And as to why he offers of the same sacrificial food¹ both (oblations): thereby, indeed, both of it comes to be this latter one (viz. Anumati, or approval). A garment is the sacrificial fee for this (offering): for even as one clad in a garment does not venture into the forest, but having deposited that garment (somewhere) escapes (robbers), in like manner no assault befalls him while being consecrated.

6. And on the following day he prepares a cake on eleven potsherds for Agni and Vishṇu, and offers it in the same way as the (regular) ishṭi: this indeed is just what that approved initiation-offering to Agni and Vishṇu is there². Now Agni is all the deities, since in Agni one offers to all deities; and Agni forsooth is the lower end, and Vishṇu is the upper end: 'May I be consecrated, after thus encompassing all the deities, and after encompassing the whole sacrifice!' thus he thinks, and hence there is a cake on eleven potsherds to Agni and Vishṇu. Gold is the sacrificial fee for this (offering); for to Agni belongs this sacrifice, and gold is Agni's seed. As to Vishṇu, he is the sacrifice, and Agni forsooth is the sacrifice: nevertheless this is Agni's alone, therefore gold is the fee.

¹ Though he has offered twice (to Nirṛiti and Anumati), he has only once taken out rice for oblation.

² Viz. at the ordinary Soma-sacrifice; for the Dīkshāñiyeshṭi, see part ii, p. 12.

7. And on the following day he prepares a cake on eleven potsherds for Agni and Soma, and offers it in the same way as an (ordinary) ishî, for it was thereby Indra slew Vṛitra, and thereby he gained that universal conquest which now is his. And in like manner does this (king, the Sacrificer) thereby slay his wicked, hateful enemy, and in like manner does he gain the victory. 'May I be consecrated, when safety and security from evil-doers have been gained!' thus he thinks: hence there is a cake on eleven potsherds for Agni and Soma. For this (offering) a bull set at liberty is the sacrificial fee; for yonder moon¹ they slay while setting him at liberty²: to wit, by the full-moon offering they slay him, and by the new-moon offering they set him at liberty;—therefore a bull set at liberty is the fee.

8. And on the following day he prepares a cake on twelve potsherds for Indra and Agni, and offers it in the same way as an (ordinary) ishî. Now when

¹ On the identification of Vṛitra with the moon (and Soma), see I, 6, 3, 17. On the moon serving as food to the gods, see part ii, Introduction, p. xiii. According to a later conception, one kalâ (or sixteenth part of the moon's disc) was taken off each day during the period of the waning, and again added to it during the period of the waxing moon.

² Utsargam . . . ghnanti; perhaps the former has to be taken here as infinitive (in order to set him at liberty) rather than as gerund.

Indra slew Vṛitra, that vigour and energy of his went out of him, being frightened : by this offering he again possessed himself of that vigour and energy. And in like manner does this (Sacrificer) by this offering possess himself of vigour and energy ; for Agni is fiery spirit, and Indra is vigour and energy : 'May I be consecrated, having embraced both these energies!' thus he thinks : hence there is a cake on twelve potsherds for Indra and Agni. A bull is the fee for this (offering), for by his shoulder he is of Agni's nature¹, and by his testicles he is of Indra's nature : therefore a bull is the fee for it.

9. Thereupon he performs the offering of first-fruits² ; for verily he who performs the Rāgasūya secures for himself (the benefits of) all sacrificial rites, all ishṭis, even the spoon-offerings ; and instituted by the gods, in truth, is that ishṭi, the Āgrayaneshṭi : 'May this also be offered by me ! May I be consecrated by this (offering) also !' thus he thinks, and therefore he performs the offering of first-fruits. Moreover, it is for the plants that he who is consecrated, is consecrated ; therefore he now makes the plants healthy and faultless, thinking, 'May I be consecrated for (the obtainment of) healthy, faultless plants (crops) !' A cow is the fee for this (offering).

10. Thereupon he performs the Seasonal offerings³ ; for verily he who performs the Rāgasūya secures for himself (the benefits of) all sacrificial

¹ Cp. I, 1, 2, 9, '(Like) fire, verily, is the yoke of that cart : hence the shoulder of those (oxen) that draw it becomes as if burnt by fire.'

² For the Āgrayaneshṭi, see part i, p. 369 seq.

³ For the four Kāturmāsya (enumerated in the next chapter), see part i, p. 383 seq.

rites, all ishṭis, even the spoon-offerings; and instituted by the gods, in truth, is that sacrificial rite, the Seasonal offerings: 'May these also be offered by me! May I be consecrated by these (offerings) also!' thus he thinks, and therefore he performs the Seasonal offerings.

FOURTH BRĀHMAṆA.

1. He offers the Vaisvadeva¹ (All-gods' offering); for by means of the Vaisvadeva, Pragâpati created abundance (of food) and creatures, thinking, 'May I be consecrated, after creating abundance and creatures!' And in like manner does this (Sacrificer) now, by the Vaisvadeva, create abundance and creatures, thinking, 'May I be consecrated, after creating abundance and creatures!'

2. He then offers the Varunapraghâsâh²; for by means of the Varunapraghâsâh Pragâpati delivered the creatures from Varuna's noose, and those creatures of his were produced healthy and faultless: 'May I be consecrated for healthy, faultless creatures!' he thought. And in like manner does this (Sacrificer) now, by the Varunapraghâśâh, deliver the creatures from Varuna's noose, and those creatures of his are produced healthy and faultless: 'May I be consecrated for healthy, faultless creatures!' so he thinks.

¹ This, the first of the Seasonal offerings, is to be performed on the full-moon of Phalgunî, the other three then following after intervals of four months each. During these intervals the ordinary fortnightly sacrifices are to be performed from day to day in this way that either the Full-moon and New-moon sacrifice are performed on alternate days, or the former on each day of the bright fortnights, and the latter on each day of the dark fortnights. Thus, according to Âsv. Sr. IX, 3, 6; while Kâty. XV, 1, 18 allows only the latter mode. The final Seasonal offering, or Sunâsîrya, which ordinarily is performed a twelvemonth after the Vaisvadeva, or on the full-moon of Phâlguna, is on the present occasion to be performed just a year after the opening sacrifice, or Pavitra (p. 42, note 1), i. e. on the first day of the bright fortnight of Phâlguna, being immediately followed by the Pañḍavâtîya.

² See part i, p. 391 seq.

3. He then performs the Sâkamedhâh¹; for by the Sâkamedhâh the gods slew Vṛitra, and gained that universal conquest which now is theirs. And in like manner does this (Sacrificer) thereby now slay his wicked, hateful enemy; and in like manner does he gain the victory, thinking, 'May I be consecrated, when safety and security are gained!'

4. He then performs the Sunâśīrya², thinking, 'May I be consecrated, having encompassed both essences!' Thereupon the Pañkavâtīya³ (oblation to the five winds). Having poked the Âhavanīya fire asunder into five parts, he offers, cutting out butter with the dipping-spoon.

5. He offers in the forepart (of the fire), with (Vâg. S. IX, 35), 'To the Agni-eyed gods, the east-seated, hail!' He then offers in the southern part

¹ See part i, p. 408 seq.

² See part i, p. 444 seq., where the word is fancifully explained as composed of suna (prosperity) and sîra (=sâra, sap),—the two essences here referred to. Sâyana, following Yâska (and Sat. Br. II, 6, 3, 6-8?), identifies the two component elements with Vâyu, the wind, and Âditya, the sun; see part i, p. 445, note 3.

³ The authorities of the Black Yagus (Taitt. Br. I, 7, 1, 5) call this oblation Pañkavattīya, i.e. 'consisting of fivefold cut (or ladled) ghee, which is offered without disturbing the fire. Prior to this oblation, Âpastamba (Taitt. S., vol. ii, p. 93), however, prescribes a so-called Pañkedhmīya, i.e. an oblation 'on five fire-brands,' the fire being, as here, poked about so as to form separate heaps in the four quarters and in the centre.

with, 'To the Yama-eyed¹ gods, the south-seated, hail!' He then offers in the hind part with, 'To the Visvadeva-eyed gods, the west-seated, hail!' He then offers in the northern part with either, 'To the Mitrâvaruṇa-eyed gods,—or, To the Marut-eyed gods,—the north-seated, hail!' He then offers in the centre with, 'To the Soma-eyed gods, the above-seated, the venerable, hail!'

6. Having then poked (the fire) together, he offers with (Vâg. S. IX, 36), 'The gods that are Agni-eyed, east-seated, to them hail!—The gods that are Yama-eyed, south-seated, to them hail!—The gods that are Visvadeva-eyed, west-seated, to them hail!—The gods that are Mitrâvaruṇa-eyed—or, Marut-eyed—north-seated, to them hail!—The gods that are Soma-eyed, above-seated, venerable, to them hail!' Now as to why he thus offers.

7. Now when, by means of the Sâkamedhâ, the gods were gaining that universal conquest, which now is theirs, they said, 'Verily the fiends, the Rakshas, suck out these (creatures) in the (four) quarters: come, let us throw the thunderbolt at them!' Now the ghee is a thunderbolt: with that thunderbolt, the ghee, they smote the fiends, the Rakshas, in the (four) quarters, and gained that universal conquest which now is theirs. And in like manner does this (Sacrificer) smite the fiends, the Rakshas, in the quarters, by that thunderbolt, the ghee; and thus he gains the victory, thinking, 'May

¹ Yama is the ruler of the departed ancestors, residing in the southern quarter.

I be consecrated, when safety and security have been gained !'

8. And as to why he offers those five latter oblations. Now when they poke the Āhavanīya asunder into five parts, thereby they wound and tear some of the fire ; and hereby now he heals it : therefore he offers those five latter oblations.

9. For this (offering) a carriage and pair, with a side horse, is the priest's fee. Three horses, the warrior, and the charioteer,—these are five breaths, and the breath is the same as the wind : and because that is the fee for this sacrifice, therefore it is called Pañkavātīya (belonging to the five winds).

10. He may also heal (some disease¹) with this (offering) : For yonder blower (or purifier, the wind) is this breath ; and the breath is the same as the vital energy. Now he (the wind) blows as one only, but on entering into man, he is divided tenfold ; and ten are those oblations he offers : thus he (the priest) endows him with the ten vital airs, with the whole, entire vital energy ; and were he now even as one whose vital spirit has departed, verily by this (offering) he (the priest) brings him round again.

11. Thereupon the *Indraturīya*².—There is a cake on eight potsherds for Agni, a barley pap for Varuna, a pap of gavedhukā seed (coix barbata) for Rudra ; and a mess of sour curds from a yoke-

¹ Tenāpy etena vish/āvrāge (v. l. vish/ābrāge) bhishagyet. Kaṇva rec.

² That is, the ceremony in which the fourth oblation belongs to Indra. While the Mādhyandinas perform this ceremony on the same day (the pratipad of the bright fortnight of Phalgunī), the Kāṇvas do so on the following day ; the Apāmārgahoma being then likewise shifted on another day.

trained cow for Indra: this Indraturtya he offers. Now Indra and Agni on that occasion consulted with each other: 'Verily the fiends, the Rakshas, suck out these (creatures) in the (four) quarters: come, let us throw the thunderbolt at them!'

12. Agni then spake, 'Let there be three shares for me, one for thee!'—'So be it!'—By that offering those two smote the fiends, the Rakshas, in the (four) quarters, and gained that universal conquest which now is theirs. And in like manner does this (Sacrificer) by that offering smite the fiends, the Rakshas, in the quarters; and gain the victory, thinking, 'May I be consecrated, when safety and security have been gained!'

13. Now what cake on eight potsherds there is for Agni, that is one of Agni's shares; and what barley pap there is for Varuṇa—Varuṇa being the same as Agni—that is Agni's second share; and what pap of gavedhukâ seed there is for Rudra—Rudra being the same as Agni—that is Agni's third share. And as to why it is prepared of gavedhukâ seed: that god surely is (the recipient) of refuse (remains of offering)¹, and gavedhukâ grass is refuse, —hence it is prepared of gavedhukâ seed. And what mess of sour curds there is from a yoke-trained cow for Indra, that is the fourth share (being that) of Indra—turtiya being the same as katurtha (fourth)—hence the name Indraturtya. That same yoke-trained cow is the fee for this (offering); for by her shoulder she is of Agni's nature, since her shoulder is, as it were, fire-burnt; and in that, being a female, she improperly draws (the cart), that is her Varuṇic nature ; and in that she is a cow, she is of Rudra's nature¹ ; and in that Indra's sour curds (come) from her, thereby she is of Indra's nature. Indeed that (cow) commands all that : therefore that same yoke-trained cow is the fee.

¹ On Rudra's epithet vâstavya, see I, 7, 3, 1. 8.

14. Thereupon he performs the Apâmârgahoma ; for by means of apâmârga plants (achyranthes aspera) the gods wiped away (apa-marg) the fiends, the Rakshas, in the quarters, and gained that universal conquest which now is theirs. And in like manner does this (Sacrificer) now by means of apâmârga plants wipe away the fiends, the Rakshas, in the quarters ; and in like manner does he gain the victory, thinking, ' May I be consecrated, when safety and security have been gained ! '

15. He takes apâmârga grains in a dipping-spoon of either palâra (butea frondosa) or vikaṅkata (flacourtia sapida) wood. They take a firebrand from the Anvâhâryapaṭana (southern) fire ; and proceed therewith eastward or northward ; and there having made up a fire he offers.

16. He takes the firebrand with (Vâg. S. IX, 37 ; R̥k S. III, 24, 1), ' Encounter the arrays, Agni ! '—arrays means battles : ' encounter the battles ! ' he thereby says ;—' Repel the evil-wisher ! '—the evil-wisher is the enemy : ' beat off the enemy ! ' he thereby says ;—' Unconquerable, conquering the evil-doers ! '—unconquerable he is indeed, by the Rakshas, the fiends ; and conquering the evil-doers, for he conquers every evil :

¹ Rudra rules over the beasts (III, 6, 2, 20), whence he is also called the lord of beasts (paśûnâm pati, I, 7, 3, 8 ; Parupati V, 3, 3, 7). Pûshan, the genius of thrift and prosperity, is also (like the Greek Pan) regarded as the protector of cattle ; see V, 2, 5, 8.

therefore he says, 'conquering the evil-doers ;'—
 'Bestow glory upon the offerer of sacrifice!'—
 'bestowing blessing on the Sacrificer,' is what he thereby says.

17. Thereupon making up the fire he offers with
 (Vâg. S. IX, 38), 'At the impulse of the God
 Savitri I offer with the arms of the Asvins, with the hands of Pûshan, with the strength of the Upâmsu !' for the Upâmsu ¹ (cup of Soma) is the mouth (or opening) of the sacrifice : thus he slays the fiends, the Rakshas, by the mouth of the sacrifice ;—
 'Slain is the Rakshas, hail !' thus he slays the fiends, the Rakshas.

18. If the dipping-spoon is of palâsa wood,—the palâsa being the Brahman—it is with the Brahman that he slays the fiends, the Rakshas ; and if it is of vikaṅkata wood,—the vikaṅkata being the thunderbolt—it is with the thunderbolt that he slays the fiends, the Rakshas : 'For the slaughter of the Rakshas (I take) thee !' therewith he slays the fiends, the Rakshas.

19. If he offers after going eastward, he throws the spoon towards the east ; and if he offers after going northward, he throws the spoon towards the north, with, 'We have slain the Rakshas !' thus he slays the fiends, the Rakshas.

20. Thereupon they return (to the sacrificial ground) without looking back. Now by this (ceremony) also he may make for himself a counter-charm ². In whatever direction from there (his evil-wisher) is,

¹ See part ii, p. 248.

² Viz. an amulet consisting of a band running back into itself.
 The Kâṇva text has,—Tena hâpy etena vishâvrâge pratisaram kurvita.

looking back thither he offers ; for the Apâmârga is of a backward effect : whosoever does anything to him there, him indeed he thereby pitches backward. Let him indicate the name of that one, saying, ' We have slain so and so ! So and so is slain ! ' thus he slays the fiends, the Rakshas.

FIFTH BRÂHMANA.

1. He prepares a cake on eleven potsherds for Agni and Vishnu, a pap for Indra and Vishnu, and either a cake on three potsherds, or a pap, for Vishnu. He performs that Trishamyukta¹ offering. Therewith the gods came by men, and in like manner does this (king) now thereby come by men.

2. Now as to why there is that cake on eleven potsherds for Agni and Vishnu ;—Agni is the giver, and men are Vishnu's : thus Agni, the giver, gives him (the king) men.

3. And as to why there is a pap for Indra and Vishnu ;—Indra is the Sacrificer, and men are Vishnu's : thus Agni, the giver, gives him (the

¹ That is, ' the triply connected,' the ceremony being made up of three rounds, each of which consists of three separate oblations, viz. :—

1. Âgnâvaishnava cake, Aindrâvaishnava pap, Vaishnava pap ;

2. Âgnâpaushna cake, Aindrâpaushna pap, Paushna pap ;

3. Agnîshomiya cake, Aindrâsaumya pap, Saumya pap.

In this way one of the three divinities for whom the offering is intended,—viz. Vishnu, Pûshan, and Soma,—is each time connected with the two head-gods, Agni and Indra.—In the Black Yagur-veda, this set of offerings (not, however, called there by this name), is preceded by another ceremony consisting of five oblations to Dhâtvi, Anumati, Râkâ, Sinivâlî, and Kuhû. Taitt. S. I, 8, 8. Cf. Sat. Br. IX, 5, 1, 38.

Sacrificer) men ; he now puts himself in contact with them, makes them his own.

4. And as to why there is either a cake on three potsherds, or a pap, for Vishṇu ;—whatever men Agni, the giver, gives him, among them he thereby finally establishes him (the king) ; and whatever work he wishes to do with his men, that he is able to do. Thus he thereby approaches the men, thinking, ‘ May I be consecrated, and possessed of men ! ’ A dwarfish bull is the sacrificial fee for this (offering), for the dwarf belongs to Vishṇu ¹.

5. He then performs another Trishamyukta offering. He prepares a cake on eleven potsherds for Agni and Pûshan, a pap for Indra and Pûshan, and a pap for Pûshan : this Trishamyukta he offers. Thereby the gods obtained cattle ; and in like manner does this (king) thereby obtain cattle.

6. Now as to why there is that cake on eleven potsherds for Agni and Pûshan ;—Agni is the giver, and the cattle are Pûshan’s : thus Agni, the giver, gives him cattle.

7. And as to why there is a pap for Indra and Pûshan ;—Indra is the Sacrificer, and the cattle are Pûshan’s : whatever cattle Agni, the giver, gives him, therewith he now puts himself in contact, those he makes his own.

8. And why there is a pap for Pûshan ;—whatever cattle Agni, the giver, gives him, therewith he thereby finally establishes him, and whatever work he wishes to do with his cattle, that he is able to do : thus he comes by cattle, thinking, ' May I be consecrated, possessed of cattle ! ' A dark-grey¹ bull is the fee for this (offering), for such a dark-grey one is of Pûshan's nature : there are two forms of the dark-grey, the white hair and the black ; and ' two and two ' means a productive pair, and Pûshan represents productiveness, for Pûshan is cattle, and cattle means productiveness : thus a productive pair is obtained,—hence a dark-grey bull is the sacrificial fee.

¹ See the legend, I, 2, 5, 1 seq., which represents Vishṇu as a dwarf, who obtained from the Asuras as much ground for the gods, as he lay upon.—‘ Tad dhi parushu vaishnavam rūpam yad vā-manasya goḥ. ’ Kāṇva rec.

9. He then performs another Trishamyukta offering. He prepares a cake on eleven potsherds for Agni and Soma, a pap for Indra and Soma, and a pap for Soma : this Trishamyukta (triply connected) he offers :—Thereby the gods attained glory ; and in like manner does this (king) thereby attain glory.

10. Now as to why there is that cake on eleven potsherds for Agni and Soma ;—Agni is the giver, and Soma is glory : thus Agni, the giver, gives him glory.

11. And as to why there is a pap for Indra and Soma ;—Indra is the Sacrificer, and Soma is glory : whatever glory Agni, the giver, gives him, therewith he now puts himself in contact, that he makes his own.

12. And why there is a pap for Soma ;—whatever glory, Agni, the giver, gives him, therein he now finally establishes him ; and whatever work he, the glorious, wishes to do, that he is able to do. Thus he thereby attains glory,—thinking, ' May I be consecrated, endowed with glory ! ' for the inglorious one has no concern with success. A brown bull is the fee for this (offering) ; for such a brown one is of Soma's nature.

¹ See V, 1, 3, 9.

13. And on the following day he prepares a cake on twelve potsherds for (Agni) Vaisvânara, and a barley pap for Varuṇa. These two offerings he performs either on days following one another, or so as to use the same barhis¹.

14. And as to why there is that (cake) for Vaisvânara ;—Vaisvânara ('belonging to all men') truly is the year, and Pragâpati is the year; and Pragâpati indeed thereby created abundance and creatures, thinking, 'May I be consecrated, having created abundance and creatures!' And in like manner does that (king) thereby create abundance and creatures, thinking, 'May I be consecrated, having created abundance and creatures!'

15. And why it is one on twelve potsherds ;—twelve months there are in the year, and Vaisvânara is the year: this is why it is one on twelve potsherds.

16. And as to why there is a barley pap for Varuṇa ; he thereby frees the creatures from every snare of Varuṇa, from all that comes from Varuṇa² ;

¹ That is to say, he is either to perform the Vaisvânara on one, and the Vâruṇa one on the next—in which case a different barhis, or altar-covering of sacrificial grass, would be needed—or he may perform them both on one and the same day, with the same barhis serving for both.

² See III, 8, 5, 10 where I translated, 'from all (guilt) against Varuṇa ;' varuṇya, doubtless, implies both the guilt incurred by the infringement of Varuṇa's sacred laws, and the punishment inflicted by him. As regards the 'swearing by Varuṇa (?)' there referred to, see Rîk S. X, 97, 16 where the conjurer mutters: 'May they (the plants) free me from the (evil) resulting from the curse and from Varuṇa ;'—muṣkantū mā śapathyād atho varuṇyād uta.

and those creatures of his are produced sound and faultless: 'May I be consecrated for sound and faultless creatures (or subjects)!' he thinks.

17. A bull is the fee for the Vaisvânara (oblation); for Vaisvânara is the year, and Pragâpati is the year; and the bull is the Pragâpati (lord of creatures or generation) among cows: therefore a bull is the fee for the Vaisvânara. A black cloth for the Vâruṇa (oblation), for what is black belongs to Varuṇa. If he cannot obtain a black one, any kind of cloth will do: it is by its knots that the cloth belongs to Varuṇa, for the knot is sacred to Varuṇa.

THIRD ADHYÂYA. FIRST BRÂHMANA.

1. Having taken up both (the Gârhapatya and Âhavanīya) fires on the two kindling-sticks¹, he goes to the house of the Commander of the army, and prepares a cake on eight potsherds for Agni Anīkavat; for Agni is the head (anīka) of the gods, and the commander is the head of the army: hence for Agni Anīkavat. And he, the commander, assuredly is one of his (the king's) jewels²: it is for ¹ Each of the two 'araxis' is held for a moment to one of the two fires, which are thereby supposed to become inherent in them till they are 'churned out' again for the new offering fire required. For this 'mounting' of the fire see part i, p. 396.

² Ratna, jewel, precious thing; whence the eleven offerings described in this section are called ratna-havis, or ratninām havīmshi; the recipients of these sacrificial honours, on the part of the newly-consecrated king, being called ratninaḥ, 'possessed of the Jewel (offering).'—In the ritual of the Black Yagus (Taitt. S. I, 8, 9; Taitt. Br. I, 7, 3) the order of the Ratninaḥ, at whose houses these oblations are performed on successive days, is as follows:—1. Brahman priest (a pap to Br̥haspati); 2. Râganya (a cake of eleven kapālas to Indra); 3. Consecrated Queen (pap to him that he is thereby consecrated (or quickened), and him he makes his own faithful (follower). The sacrificial fee for this (jewel-offering) consists in gold; for Agni's is that sacrifice, and gold is Agni's seed: therefore the sacrificial fee consists in gold.

2. And on the following day, he goes to the house of the Purohita (the king's court chaplain), and prepares a pap for Brîhaspati; for Brîhaspati is the Purohita of the gods, and that (court chaplain) is the Purohita ('praepositus') of that (king): hence it is for Brîhaspati. And he, the Purohita, assuredly is one of his (the king's) jewels: it is for him that he is thereby consecrated, and him he makes his own faithful follower. The sacrificial fee for this is a white-backed bullock; for to Brîhaspati belongs that upper region, and there above lies that path of Aryaman (the sun)¹: therefore the fee for the Bârhaspatya (oblation) is a white-backed (bullock).

3. And on the following day he prepares a cake on eleven potsherds for Indra at the dwelling of him who is being consecrated (the king); for Indra is the Kshatra (ruling power), and he who is consecrated is Aditi); 4. The king's favourite wife (pap to Bhaga); 5. A discarded wife (pap to Nirriti); 6. Commander of the army (cake of eight kap. to Agni); 7. Sûta (charioteer, Sây.—cake of ten kap. to Varuna); 8. Grâmanî (cake of seven kap. to Maruts); 9. Kshattri (chamberlain, or superintendent of seraglio, Sây.—cake of twelve kap. to Savitrî); 10. Samgrahîtri (treasurer, Sây.—cake of two kap. to Arvins); 11. Bhâgadugha (collector of taxes, Sây.—pap to Pûshan); 12. Akshâvâpa (dyûtakâra, superintendent of gambling, Sây.—gavidhuka pap to Rudra).—Finally the king offers in his own house two cake-oblations (of eleven kapâlas) to Indra Sutrâman (the good protector) and Indra Amhomu (the deliverer from trouble).

¹ Whence the back of that upper region is white, or bright.

the Kshatra : hence it is for Indra. The sacrificial fee for this is a bull, for the bull is Indra's own (animal).

4. And on the following day, he goes to the dwelling of the Queen, and prepares a pap for Aditi ; for Aditi is this Earth, and she is the wife of the gods ; and that (queen) is the wife of that (king) : hence it is for Aditi. And she, the Queen, assuredly is one of his (the king's) jewels : it is for her that he is thereby consecrated, and he makes her his own faithful (wife). The sacrificial fee, on her part, is a milch cow ; for this (earth) is, as it were, a milch cow : she yields to men all their desires ; and the milch cow is a mother, and this (earth) is, as it were, a mother : she bears (or sustains) men. Hence the fee is a milch cow.

5. And on the following day, he goes to the house of the Sûta (court-minstrel and chronicler), and prepares a barley pap for Varuṇa ; for the Sûta is a spiriter (sava), and Varuṇa is the spiriter of the gods : therefore it is for Varuṇa. And he, the Sûta, assuredly is one of his (the king's) jewels : it is for him that he is thereby consecrated ; and him he makes his own faithful (follower). The sacrificial fee for this one is a horse, for the horse is Varuṇa's own.

6. And on the following day, he goes to the house of the Headman (Grāmānt¹), and prepares a cake on seven potsherds for the Maruts; for the Maruts are the peasants, and the headman is a peasant; therefore it is for the Maruts. And he, the headman, assuredly is one of his (the king's) jewels: it is for him that he is thereby consecrated, and him he makes his own faithful follower. The sacrificial fee for this (jewel) is a spotted bullock, for in such a spotted bullock there is abundance of colours; and the Maruts are the clans (or peasants), and the clan means abundance; therefore the sacrificial fee is a spotted bullock.

¹ The exact function of this officer is not clearly defined. Though the term is also used of an ordinary village headman (Patel, Adhikârin, Adigar), this could hardly apply here. Sâyana, on one passage, indeed explains the term by 'Grāmāṇī nayati,' but elsewhere he explains it by 'Grāmāṇī netâ ;' and some such meaning it may perhaps have here,—the head of communal administration, either for a district (like one of Manu's lords of a hundred, or a

7. And on the following day he goes to the house of the Chamberlain (kshattri), and prepares a cake on either twelve, or eight, potsherds for Savitri; for Savitri is the impeller (prasavitri) of the gods, and the chamberlain is an impeller: hence it is for Savitri. And he, the chamberlain, assuredly is one of his (the king's) jewels: it is for him that he thereby is consecrated, and him he makes his own faithful (follower). The sacrificial fee for this (jewel) is a reddish-white draught-bullock; for Savitri is he that burns yonder, and he (the sun) indeed moves along; and the draught-bullock also moves along, when yoked. And as to why it is a reddish-white one;—reddish-white indeed is he (the sun) both in rising and in setting: therefore the sacrificial fee is a reddish-white draught-bullock.

8. And on the following day he goes to the house thousand villages), or for the whole country. If, however, the headman of a single village be intended (as the coupling of the office with the Maruts might lead one to suppose), he would probably be a hereditary territorial proprietor residing near the place where the inauguration ceremony takes place. Cf. V, 4, 4, 18; and Zimmer, Altindisches Leben, p. 171.

of the Charioteer (samgrahîtri), and prepares a cake on two potsherds for the Asvins; for the two Asvins are of the same womb; and so are the chariot fighter¹ and the driver (sârathi) of the same womb (standing-place), since they stand on one and the same chariot: hence it is for the Asvins. And he, the charioteer, assuredly is one of his (the king's) jewels: it is for him that he is thereby consecrated, and him he makes his own faithful follower. The sacrificial fee for this (jewel) is a pair of twin bullocks, for such twin bullocks are of the same womb. If he cannot obtain twins, two bullocks produced by successive births (of the same cow) may also form the sacrificial fee, for such also are of the same womb.

9. And on the following day he goes to the house of the Carver (bhâgadugha¹), and prepares a pap for Pûshan, for Pûshan is carver to the gods; and that (officer) is carver to that (king): therefore it is for Pûshan. And he, the carver, assuredly is one of his (the king's) jewels: it is for him that he is thereby consecrated, and him he makes his own faithful follower. The sacrificial fee for this (jewel) is a dark-grey bullock: the significance of such a one being the same as at the Trishamyukta².

¹ Savyashîtri (otherwise savyeshîtri, savyeshîha;—savyastha, Kāṇva rec.) is explained by the commentaries as a synonym of sârathi, charioteer (with which it is compounded in savyeshîha-sârathi, Taitt. Br. I, 7, 9, 1, where Sâyana makes them the two charioteers standing on the left and right side of the warrior), but it seems more probable that the former terms refer to the warrior (παρὰ-βάρης) himself (as savyashîhâ, Atharva-veda VIII, 8, 23, undoubtedly does), who stands on the left side of the driver (sârathi, ἡνίοχος); the change of meaning being perhaps due to caste scruples about so close an association between the Kshatriya warrior and his Sûdra servant, as is implied in this and other passages. (Cf. V, 3, 2, 2 with note.)—On Taitt. S. I, 8, 9, Sâyana explains samgrahîtri as the treasurer (dhanasamgrahakartâ kosâdhyakshah), but on I, 8, 16 optionally as treasurer or charioteer; while the Sûta is I, 8, 9 identified by him with the charioteer (sârathi). It is more probable, however, that at the time of the Brâhmana the Sûta occupied much the same position as that assigned to him in the epics, viz. that of court-bard and chronicler. The connection of the samgrahîtri with the Asvins can also scarcely be said to favour the interpretation of the term proposed by Sâyana (who, moreover, is himself compelled, on Taitt. S. I, 8, 15; Taitt. Br. I, 7, 10, 6, to take it in the sense of charioteer).

10. And on the following day, having brought together gavedhukâ (seeds) from the houses of the Keeper of the dice (akshâvâpa³) and the Huntsman (govikartana⁴), he prepares a gavedhukâ pap for Rudra at the house of him who is consecrated. These two, while being two jewels (of the king), he makes one for the purpose of completeness. And as to why he performs this offering,—Rudra is hankering after that (cow) which is killed here in this hall;

¹ The meaning 'tax-gatherer, collector of tithes (or rather, of the sixth part of produce)' assigned to the term by Sâyana, both here, and on Taitt. S. I, 8, 9, might seem the more natural one, considering the etymology of the term. See, however, the explanation given of it in our Brâhmana I, 1, 2, 17:—'Pûshan is bhâgadugha (distributor of portions) to the gods, who places with his hands the food before them.' This clearly is Homer's δαιτρός,—Od. I, 141-2:

δαιτρός δὲ κρείων πίνακας παρέθηκεν αἰείρας παντοίων, παρὰ δὲ σφί τιθει χρύσεια κύπελλα.

² See V, 2, 5, 8.

³ 'The thrower, or keeper, of the dice,' according to Sâyana. At V, 4, 4, 6 the verb â-vap is used of the throwing the dice into the hand of the player; and it is perhaps that function of the keeper of the dice which is meant to be expressed by the term ('der Zuwerfer der Würfel').

⁴ Literally, the cutter up of cows, the (beef-) butcher. But according to Sâyana, this official was the constant companion of his master in the chase.

now Rudra is Agni (fire), and the gaming-board being fire, and the dice being its coals, it is him (Rudra) he thereby pleases. And verily whosoever, that knows this thus, performs the Rāgasûya, in his house that approved (cow) is killed. And he, the keeper of dice, and the huntsman, are (each of them) assuredly one of his (the king's) jewels: it is for these two that he is thereby consecrated, and these two he makes his own faithful followers. The sacrificial fee for this (jewel) is a bicoloured bullock—either one with white fore-feet, or a white-tailed one,—a claw-shaped knife, and a dice-board¹ with a horse-hair band²; for that is what belongs to those two³.

11. And on the following day he goes to the house of the Courier, and having taken ghee in four ladlings, he offers the ghee to the way, with, 'May the way graciously accept of the ghee, hail!' For the courier is to be dispatched, and when dispatched goes on his way: therefore he offers the ghee to the way. And he, the courier, assuredly is one of his (the king's) jewels: it is for him that he is thereby consecrated, and him he makes his own faithful follower. The sacrificial fee for this (jewel) consists in a skin-covered bow, leathern quivers, and a red turban, for that is what belongs to him.

12. These are the eleven jewels (ratna) he completes; for of eleven syllables consists the Trish-ubh, and the Trish/ubh is vigour: it is for the sake of vigour that he completes the (eleven) jewels. Then as to why he performs the oblations of the Ratnins: it is their king he becomes; it is for them that he thereby is consecrated, and it is them he makes his own faithful followers.

¹ Or, a dice-box, as 'akshâvapanam' is explained by some commentaries,—akshâ upyante sminn ity akshâvapanam aksha(akshadyûta-)sthânâvapanapâttram, Sây.

² Or, fastened with a hair-chain (romasragâ prabaddham, Sây.).

³ That is to say, the knife and the dice-board are the objects those two officials have chiefly to do with.

13. And on the following day he goes to the house of a discarded (wife), and prepares a pap for Nirṛiti;—a discarded wife is one who has no son. He cooks the pap for Nirṛiti of black rice, after splitting the grains with his nails. He offers it with (Vâg. S. IX, 35), 'This, O Nirṛiti, is thy share: accept it graciously, hail!' For a wife that is without a son, is possessed with Nirṛiti (destruction, calamity); and whatever of Nirṛiti's nature there is in her, that he thereby propitiates, and thus Nirṛiti does not take possession of him while he is consecrated. The fee for this (oblation) consists of a black, decrepit, diseased cow; for such a one also is possessed with Nirṛiti. He says to her (the wife), 'Let her not dwell this day in my dominion¹!' thus he removes evil from himself.

SECOND BRÂHMANA.

1. After the 'jewels' he offers (a pap) to Soma and Rudra. It is cooked in milk from a white (cow) which has a white calf. And as to why, after the 'jewels,' he offers (a pap) to Soma and Rudra.

2. Now, once upon a time, Svarbhânû, the Âsura, struck the sun with darkness, and stricken with darkness he did not shine². Soma and Rudra

¹ According to the commentary on Kâty. Sr. XV, 3, 35 she has to betake herself to a Brâhman's house, where the king has no power.

² According to Rig-veda V, 40, 5-9 (cf. Sat. Br. IV, 3, 4, 23 removed that darkness of his ; and freed from evil he burns yonder. And in like manner does that (king) thereby enter darkness,—or darkness enters him,—when he puts those unworthy of sacrifice¹ in contact with the sacrifice ; and he does indeed now put those unworthy of sacrifice—either Sûdras or whom-ever else—in contact with the sacrifice. It is Soma and Rudra who remove that darkness of his ; and freed from evil he becomes consecrated. And as to why it is cooked in milk from a white (cow) which has a white calf,—darkness is black : that darkness he removes. The sacrificial fee for this (oblation) is a white (cow) which has a white calf.

3. Even he who, while being qualified for fame, is not yet famous, may perform that offering. Now he who is learned (in the Veda), while being qualified for fame, is not famous ; and he who is not famous, is covered with darkness : that darkness of his Soma and Rudra thereby remove ; and freed from evil he becomes a very light by his prosperity and renown.

4. Thereupon he prepares a pap for Mitra and Bṛihaspati². For verily he who departs from the with note) it was Atri who restored the light of the sun. Professor Ludwig (Bohemian Academy of Sciences, Sitzungsber., May, 1885) has tried to prove that solar eclipses (partly available for chronological purposes) are referred to in this and some other passages of the hymns. Compare also Professor Whitney's remarks thereon, Proceedings of Am. Or. Soc., Oct. 1885, p. xvii.

¹ That is, some of those officials of his to whom the ratna-havis were offered ; Sâyana specifying 'the Commander of the army and others' as Sûdras ; and the 'Huntsman and others' as of whatsoever (low) caste.

² According to the Taittirîya ritualists this double oblation forms part of the dîkshâ, or initiation ceremony (V, 3, 3, 1). See Taitt. S., vol. ii, p. 108.

path of the sacrifice stumbles; and he does indeed depart from the path of the sacrifice, when he puts those unworthy of sacrifice in contact with the sacrifice, and he does indeed now put those unworthy of sacrifice—either Sûdras or whomever else—in contact with the sacrifice. And the path of the sacrifice is Mitra and Bṛihaspati; for Mitra is the Brahman, and the Brahman is the sacrifice; and Bṛihaspati is the Brahman, and the Brahman is the sacrifice. Thus he returns again to the path of the sacrifice; and as soon as he has returned to the path of the sacrifice he is consecrated: therefore he prepares a pap for Mitra and Bṛihaspati.

5. The course of this (is as follows). Any asvattha branch broken off by itself, either on the eastern or on the northern side (of the tree), from that he makes a vessel (to hold the pap) for Mitra; for that which is hewn by the axe belongs to Varuṇa; but that which is broken off by itself belongs to Mitra: therefore he makes the vessel for Mitra from a branch broken off by itself.

6. Thereupon having curdled the (milk into) curds, and poured it into a leathern bag; and having put (the horses) to the cart, and fastened (the bag on the cart), he tells it to 'fly away.' This is that (kind of) fresh butter which is self-produced¹; for that which is churned belongs to Varuṇa, and that which is self-produced belongs to Mitra: therefore it is self-produced butter.

7. They divide the rice-grains into two parts: the smaller and broken ones belong to Bṛihaspati, and the larger and unbroken ones to Mitra. For Mitra injures no one, nor does any one injure Mitra ; neither a kusa stalk nor a thorn pricks him, nor has he any scar ; for Mitra is every one's friend (mitram).

¹ That is, produced in the leathern bottle without further direct human agency, and by the mere motion of the cart.

8. He then puts the pap for Bṛihaspati on (the fire), covers it with the vessel for Mitra's (pap), pours the butter (into the latter), and throws in the (larger) rice-grains. It is cooked merely by the hot steam¹ ; for what is cooked by fire belongs to Varuṇa, and what is cooked by hot steam belongs to Mitra : therefore it is cooked by hot steam. Making cuttings from both these sacrificial dishes, he says, 'Pronounce the invitatory prayer to Mitra and Bṛihaspati!' Having called for the *Srausha*ḥ, he says, 'Pronounce the offering-prayer to Mitra and Bṛihaspati!' and offers as the *Vasha*ḥ is uttered.

THE ABHISHEKĀNĪYA², OR CONSECRATION CEREMONY.

THIRD BRĀHMANA.

1. He performs the initiation ceremony. On the day of preparation he seizes the victim for Agni

¹ That is, by the steam rising from the Bṛihaspati pap in the bottom vessel.

² The Abhishekānīya (or Abhisheka, literally 'the sprinkling'), the Consecration ceremony (corresponding to the Anointment of modern times), requires for its performance five days, viz. one dīkshā (initiation ceremony), three upasads, and one sutyā or Soma-day, the particular form of Soma-sacrifice being the Ukthya (part ii, p. 325, note 2). The Dīkshā is performed immediately after the expiration of the dark fortnight following the full-moon of Phalgunī, that is to say, on the first day of Kāitra (about the middle of March).—According to Kāty. XV, 3, 47 both the Abhishekānīya and Dasapeya require special offering-places, the latter being north of the former. Cf. note on V, 4, 5, 13.—As regards and Soma. Having performed the offering of the omentum thereof, he prepares a cake on eleven potsherds for Agni and Soma¹. Thereupon the offerings of the Divine Quickeners (Devasû) are prepared.

2. For Savitri Satyaprasava (of true impulse) he prepares a cake from fast-grown (plāsuka) rice², on either twelve, or eight, potsherds; for Savitri is the impeller (prasavitri) of the gods: 'May I be quickened³, impelled by Savitri!' thus (he thinks). And as to (its being) of fast-grown rice: 'May they quickly impel me!' he thinks.

3. For Agni Grīhapati (the house-lord) he then prepares a cake on eight potsherds from quick-grown (âsu) rice⁴; for the house-lord's position means prosperity: as much as he (the king) rules over, over the chants (stotra) of the Consecration ceremony, the Pavamāna-stotras are chanted in the thirty-twofold, the Âgya-stotras in the fifteenfold, the Prishṭha-stotras in the seventeenfold, and the Agnish-toma-sâman and Uktha-stotras in the twenty-onfold mode of chanting (stoma). Pañk. Br. 18, 10, 9. The Bahishpavamâna is specially constructed so as to consist of the following parts,—Sâma-veda II, 978-80; further six so-called sambhâryâ verses; further II, 125-27; II, 4-6; II, 431-3; II, 128-30; II, 555-59; II, 7-9; II, 981-83; see Pañk. Br. 18, 8, 7 seq.—The Taittirīya ritual (Taitt. Br. I, 8, 7 seq.), on the other hand, prescribes for the Pavamāna-stotras, the thirty-four-versed stoma, commencing the Bahishpavamâna by II, 920; II, 431, &c.

¹ This is the ordinary Paru-purodâsa, or cake of animal (offering). See part ii, p. 199, note 2 (where read Agni and Soma, instead of Indra and Agni).

² That is, according to Sâyana, rice which has sprung up again and ripens very rapidly. Taitt. S. I, 8, 10 has 'âsu' instead, for which see next paragraph.

³ Or, consecrated (sû).

⁴ That is, according to Sâyana, rice ripening in sixty days. The Taitt. S. prescribes a cake of black rice for Agni.

that Agni, the house-lord, leads him to hold the position of a master of the house. And as to its being of quick-grown rice: 'May they quickly lead me!' so he thinks.

4. For Soma Vanaspati (the wood-lord or tree) he then prepares a pap of syâmâka millet: thereby Soma, the wood-lord, quickens him for the plants. And as to its being prepared of syâmâka,—they, the syâmâkas among plants doubtless are most manifestly Soma's own: therefore it is prepared of syâmâka grain.

5. For Brîhaspati Vâk¹ (speech) he then prepares a pap of wild rice: thereby Brîhaspati quickens him for speech. And as to its being prepared of wild rice,—Brîhaspati is the Brahman, and they, the wild rice-plants, are ripened by the Brahman²: hence it is prepared of wild rice.

6. For Indra Gyeshtha (the most excellent) he then prepares a pap of red rice-grains (hâyana)³: thereby Indra, the most excellent, leads him to excellence (or, lordship). And as to its being prepared of red rice: outstanding doubtless are those plants, the red rice, and outstanding is Indra: therefore it is prepared of red rice.

7. For Rudra Pasupati (lord of beasts) he then prepares a Raudra pap of gavedhukâ seeds (coix barbata): thereby Rudra, the lord of beasts, quickens him for cattle. And as to its being prepared of gavedhukâ seed ;—that God is (the recipient of) refuse (remains of offering), and gavedhukâ seeds are refuse : therefore it is (prepared) of gavedhukâ seed.

¹ Brîhaspati Vâkpati (lord of speech), according to the Black Yagus, where the order of the 'Divine Quickeners' is moreover somewhat different.

² ? Or cooked by the Brahman, that is by Brâhmans, when living the life of hermits or ascetics.

³ The Taitt. S. prescribes a cake prepared of large rice (mahâ-vrihi).

8. For Mitra Satya (the True) he then prepares a pap of Nâmba¹ seed : thereby Mitra the True quickens him for the Brahman. And as to its being prepared of Nâmba seed,—to Varuṇa, no doubt, belong those plants which grow in ploughed ground ; but those, the Nâmba plants, belong to Mitra : therefore it is (prepared) of Nâmba seed.

9. For Varuṇa Dharmapati (the lord of the law) he then prepares a Varuṇa pap of barley : thereby Varuṇa, the lord of the law, makes him lord of the law ; and that truly is the supreme state, when one is lord of the law ; for whosoever attains to the supreme state, to him they come in (matters of) law : therefore to Varuṇa Dharmapati.

10. He then proceeds with the cake for Agni-Soma. The Svishṭakṛit of that (oblation) remains yet unoffered, when he proceeds with those (other) oblations.

11. Thereupon, taking hold of him (the Sacrificer) by the right arm, he mutters (Vâg. S. IX, 39, 40), 'May Savitrî quicken thee for (powers of) quickening (ruling)², Agni for householders, Soma for trees, Bṛihaspati for speech, Indra for lordship, Rudra for cattle, Mitra for truth, Varuṇa for the lord of the law.'

12. 'Quicken him, O gods, to be unrivalled!'

¹ The Taitt. S. and Br. read 'âmba' instead, 'a kind of grain,' according to Sâyana.

² Or, perhaps, 'on the part of the quickeners (rulers, savânâm).'

—he thereby says, ‘Quicken him, O gods, so as to be without an enemy;’—‘for great chiefdom, for great lordship!’ in this there is nothing obscure;—‘for man-rule!’ ‘for the ruling of men,’ he thereby says;—‘for Indra’s energy!’ ‘for vigour’ he means to say when he says, ‘for Indra’s energy;’—‘him, the son of such and such (a man), the son of such and such (a woman),’—whatever be his parentage, with reference to that he says this;—‘of such and such a people,’ that is to say, of the people whose king he is;—‘this man, O ye (people)¹, is your king, Soma is the king of us Brāhmans!’ He thereby causes everything here to be food for him (the king); the Brāhman alone he excepts: therefore the Brāhman is not to be fed upon, for he has Soma for his king.

13. Now those gods have the power of quickening, whence their name ‘devasû’ (Divine Quickeners). It is those gods who now quicken him thus, and quickened (consecrated) by them he will be consecrated on the morrow.

14. They are double-named, for a coupling means strength: ‘May the strong quicken (him),’ thus he thinks, and therefore they are double-named.

15. He now says, ‘Pronounce the invitatory prayer to Agni Svishṭakṛit.’ And as to why that ceremony is performed here between two offerings²,—verily Pragâpati is that sacrifice which is here performed, and from which all these creatures were produced,— and so they are even now produced after this one. Thus he places him (the Sacrificer) in the very middle of that Pragâpati, and quickens him in the middle : this is why that ceremony is performed between two offerings. Having called for the Sraushat, he says, 'Urge for Agni Svishṭakṛit !' and offers as the Vashaṭ is pronounced.

¹ Here the name of the people, e. g. ‘O ye Kurus, O ye Pañ-kālas!’ is inserted. The Taitt. S. reads, ‘O ye Bharatâh.’

² That is to say, the oblations to the ‘Divine Quickeners,’ which were inserted between the chief oblation of the (Agnishomīya) parupurodâsa and the Svishṭakṛit of it; see above, parag. 10.

FOURTH BRÂHMANA.

1. He collects (various kinds of) water. The reason why he collects water, is that—water being vigour—he thereby collects vigour, the essence of the waters.

2. In a vessel of udumbara wood,—the udumbara (ficus glomerata) being sustenance, (that is) food—for the obtainment of sustenance, food : hence in an udumbara vessel (he mixes the different liquids).

3. He first takes (water)¹ from the (river) Sarasvatî, with (Vâg. S. X, 1), 'The gods took honey-sweet water,'—whereby he says, 'the gods took water full of essence ;'—'sapful, deemed king-quickenning,'—by 'sapful' he means to say, 'full of essence ;' and by 'deemed king-quickenning' he means to say, '(water) which is recognised as king-quickenning ;'—'wherewith they anointed Mitra and Varuṇa,' for therewith they did anoint (sprinkle) Mitra and Varuṇa ;—'wherewith they guided

¹ This water gathered from an adjacent river and pond, with some admixture of genuine water from the sacred river Sarasvatî—whence the whole water is also called 'sârasvatya âpah'—is to be used partly in the place of the ordinary Vasatîvarî water, and partly for the consecration or anointment (sprinkling) of the king. The different kinds of water or liquids are first taken in separate vessels of palâra (butea frondosa) wood, and then poured together into the udumbara vessel.

Indra past his enemies,' for therewith they indeed guided Indra past the fiends, the Rakshas. Therewith he sprinkles him,—Sarasvatî being (the goddess of) Speech : it is with speech he thereby sprinkles him. This is one kind of water : it is that he now brings.

4. Thereupon the Adhvaryu, having taken ghee in four ladlings, steps down into the water, and takes the two waves which flow away (in different directions) after an animal or a man has stepped (or plunged) into it.

5. The one which rises in front of him he catches up with (Vâg. S. X, 2), 'Thou art the male's wave, a bestower of kingship : bestow kingship on me, hail!—Thou art the male's wave, a bestower of kingship : bestow kingship on N. N. !'

6. He then catches up that (wave) which rises up behind him with, 'Thou art the lord of a host of males, a bestower of kingship : bestow kingship on me, hail!—Thou art the lord of a host of males, a bestower of kingship : bestow kingship on N. N. !' With that (water) he sprinkles ; for indeed that is the vigour of the water which rises when either beast or man plunges into it : it is with vigour he thus sprinkles him. This is one kind of water : it is that he now brings.

7. He then takes flowing (water) with (Vâg. S. X, 3), 'Task-plying ye are, bestowers of kingship : bestow ye kingship on me, hail!—Task-plying ye are, bestowers of kingship : bestow ye kingship on N. N. !' With that (water) he sprinkles ; for with vigour these (waters) flow, whence nothing stops them flowing along : it is with vigour he thus sprinkles him. This is one kind of water: it is that he now brings.

8. He then takes such (water) as flows against the stream of the flowing water with, 'Powerful ye are, bestowers of kingship: bestow ye kingship on me, hail!—Powerful ye are, bestowers of kingship: bestow ye kingship on N. N.!' With that (water) he sprinkles, for with vigour indeed those (waters) flow against the stream of the flowing ones: it is with vigour he thus sprinkles him. This is one kind of water: it is that he now brings.

9. He then takes (water) that flows off (the main current) with, 'Overflowing waters ye are, bestowers of kingship: bestow ye kingship on me, hail!—Overflowing waters ye are, bestowers of kingship: bestow ye kingship on N. N.!' With that (water) he sprinkles. Now that (flow of water), after separating itself from that (main current), comes to be that again¹; and so there is in his kingdom even one belonging to some other kingdom, and even that man from another kingdom he absorbs: thus he (the Adhvaryu) bestows abundance upon him (the king), and it is with abundance that he thus consecrates him. This is one kind of water: it is that he now brings.

